King Henry immediately after his Arrival, made a Viſit to the French King, the Queen, and the Princeſs Catharine; to the latter of whom he made his Addreſſes, and preſented her with a Ring of ineſtimable Value. There were afterwards many Aſſemblies of the King's Council fully to conclude the Peace and the Alliance; and King Henry having alter'd what he miſs-lik'd in the Treaty, which before had been drawn up in Writing, it was at laſt intirely compleated on the twenty firſt Day of May, 1420. The Articles of this Treaty were large and numerous, and very much to the Advantage and Honour of King Henry. By theſe it was agreed, 'That the ſaid King Henry ſhould marry the 'Princeſs Catharine, and allow her the uſual Dowry of the Queens of En- 'gland, forty thouſand Crowns per Annum: That after the Death of King 'Charles, who was to hold his preſent Poſſeſſions during Life, the Crown of 'France, with all the Rights and Dominions appertaining to it, ſhould devolve 'upon King Henry and his Heirs for ever. But becauſe King Charles was in- 'diſpos'd and uncapable to reign, the whole Power and Exerciſe of the Go- 'vern- The Treaty concluded with a Peace. The Subſtance of it.

'gent of that Kingdom, to govern in Conjunction with the Council of the 'Eſtates of the Realm, according to the known Laws and Uſages of it. To 'make which the more eaſie to King Henry, all the Nobility both Spiritual and 'Temporal, and all Corporations and Communities ſhould be oblig'd to take 'particular Oaths of Fidelity to King Henry, both as to his preſent Admini-
'ſtration, and future Inheritance. Then to preſerve an intire Peace and Con'cord between England and France, whenever King Henry, or any of his Heirs
'ſhould come to wear the Crown of France, the two Kingdoms ſhould ever be 'united under one King, viz. under King Henry during his Life, and after

'by two Kings; and yet the Rights, Liberties and Laws of each Kingdom ſhould
'be kept diſtinct and inviolable, without ſubjecting one to the other: The bet'ter to eſtabliſh which, all Hatred, Animoſities, Diviſions and Wars, ſhould

Theſe, and ſeveral other ſubſervient Articles being confirm'd, the Princeſs Catharine, who had alſo the Title of Dutcheſs of Bar, was affianc'd to King Henry in St. Peter's Church at Troyes. The King came attended with forty Engliſh Nobles and Gentlemen, and the Dutcheſs of Clarence with her Train of Ladies; and the Queen of France and the Princeſs were attended by the Duke of Burgundy, and forty of his Council. King Henry and the Queen of France met in the middle of the Church, and went together up to the high Altar, where the Articles of Peace being openly read, were ſeal'd with the two Seals of both the Kings, and a ſolemn Oath taken to obſerve them; and the King and Princeſs joining their Hands, were contracted. Then the Duke of Burgundy took an Oath to obey King Henry as Regent of France during the preſent King's Life; and that after his Deceaſe he would become his Liege Subject. On the other Side King Henry promis'd, that he would deliver to the Duke all the Murderers of his Father who ſhould fall into his Power. In concluſion of all, the Peace was proclaim'd firſt in the French Tongue, and then in the Engliſh; and the Articles of it publiſh'd at Paris, and all the principal Citys of France. King Henry alſo in a Letter to his Brother the Duke of Bedford, gave him an Account of the Concluſion of this great Treaty, ordering him to proclaim the Peace throughout England, and inſtructing him about altering his Title in his Seals and Proclamations during the French King's Life, which was now to run thus: Henry by the Grace of God King of England, Heir and Regent of the Realm of France, and Lord of Ireland. On the thirtieth of May, the Nuptials were Solemniz'd between King Henry and the Princeſs Catharine, with extraordinary Pomp and Magnificence, and grac'd with the Preſence of the Duke of Burgundy the Prince of Orange, the Count de Luxemburgh, and the principal Nobility of Burgundy and France.

King Henry being now proclaim'd Regent of France, all the Nobility that were at Troyes, readily ſwore Fidelity to him: For the Fame of his Heroic Actions in War, when his Perſon was unknown to them, had acquir'd him an univerſal Eſteem, and they knew not which moſt to admire, his Courage, Conduct or Succeſs; but now his noble Preſence, happily join'd with Majeſty and Affability, procur'd a greater Veneration. They knew him to be prudent in Counſels, experienc'd in War, undaunted in Danger, and proſperous in all Attempts; and therefore perſuaded themſelves that their Country would be happy under the Influences of his Government. was confirm'd, when they heard him in a full Aſſembly thus expreſs the Moderation and Temper of his Soul. My noble Lords, I do aſſure you, it is and ſhall be my perpetual Concern, how by all my Councils and Actions I may make both theſe Nations, now by the Favour of Heav'n ſo fortunately united, a great and flouriſhing Kingdom; and as it is at preſent the moſt glorious in Europe, *ſo all Animoſities and Factions extinguiſh'd, it may continue happy as well as great to all future Succeſſions. Pol. Virg. &c.

V. The mighty King Henry had now in a great meaſure arriv'd at the Top of his Aims and Deſigns, obtaining not only an admirable Queen, but alſo the Soveraignty over a new Kingdom; yet ſtill the Dauphine and his Followers vigorouſly oppos'd him, and reſolv'd never to deſiſt 'till they had brought him to their own Terms. Their firſt Counſel was how to preſerve themſelves in ſo imminent a Danger; they were ſenſible that to ſit ſtill would but increaſe the Succeſs of the Engliſh, and to riſe without ſufficient Strength would plunge themſelves into further Misfortunes. In this Diſtraction that Voice was beſt heard that ſpoke moſt for the Safety of the Dauphine, whoſe Breath alone gave Life to the after-Hopes of France, and for the fortifying thoſe Places which might be of moſt Offence to the Enemy. This then was agreed in a Council of War, That the Dauphine ſhould at no Time hazard his Perſon in the Field, and that Levies of Soldiers ſhould be made, to be garriſon'd in convenient Places, and leave the reſt to Time and Opportunity; in which Reſolution every Man took to his Charge, and all to oppoſe the Actions of King Henry. As theſe conſulted for the State of the French, ſo at the ſame Time in Paris a Parliament of the three Eſtates was aſſembled, in which ſuch as were guilty of the Duke of Burgundy's Death were ſentenc'd, the Diſinhering of the Dauphine confirm'd, and Forces prepar'd againſt thoſe Towns that held for him.

Monſtrel. La Fevre. Livius. &c.

In the mean Time the two Kings with their Queens, and the Dukes of Clarence and Burgundy march'd againſt Sens, a Town in Burgundy; which after twelve Days Siege ſurrender'd upon Compoſition of Life, thoſe only excepted that were guilty of the Duke of Burgundy's Death. Montereau was the next Place, which was enter'd by Force, where the Body of the Duke of Burgundy, undecently bury'd by the Dauphinois, was taken up, and by his Son Philip ſent in great Pomp to Dijon, the Capital of his Dukedom, and there honourably interr'd. The Town being taken, the Caſtle held out, under the Government of the Lord De Guitry, to whom were ſent ſome French Priſoners under a Guard to perſuade him to ſurrender, which they did with Tears and on their Knees; but his obſtinate Perſiſting, and his affronting the Herald ſent to ſummon him to ſurrender, occaſion'd the Hanging up of thoſe Priſoners, as Rebels to the French King, their natural Soveraign. The Beſieged held out eight Days longer, and then ſurrender'd the Caſtle on Condition of having Life, Liberty and Goods ſecur'd; but all Perſons concern'd in the Duke of Burgundy's Murder were excepted. Next the King undertook the Siege of Melun, a Town of great Strength on the Sein, and made more ſtrong by the Valour of its Governors, who were the Lord De Barbaſan and Pierre de Bourbon, the former an admirable Commander, and the latter a Prince of the Blood, whoſe Garriſon conſiſted of ſeven hundred Dauphinois. Theſe made ſo ſtout a Defence, that the Beſiegers could not make their Approaches without great Difficulty and Danger; but the Cannon making a Breach, the Engliſh and Burgundians enter'd a ſtrong Outwork, and built a Bridge of Boats over the River Sein, ſo that from either Quarter they had Communication with each other without Impediments. Both King Henry and the Duke of Burgundy fortify'd their Camps after an extraordinary Manner, and in this Poſture the Siege continu'd eighteen Weeks, in which Time the Soldiers of the Garriſon made ſome, tho' not frequent, Sallies. King Henry, impatient of Delays, preſs'd forward the Siege to the utmoſt, and made a large Mine underneath the Walls, which being perceiv'd, the Beſieg'd countermin'd againſt him; where the King with great Reſolution entring firſt into the Mine, and Barbaſan likewiſe his within the Town, met each other with their drawn Swords, and nobly perform'd the Parts of private Combatants: 'Till at length they reſolv'd to diſcover themſelves, and firſt Barbaſan made known his Name, then King Henry did his; whereupon the French Lord ſuddenly retiring, caus'd the Barricadoes to be clos'd, and King Henry return'd ſafe to his Camp.

During this Siege, King Henry often went to Corbeil, where the Court then was, which now conſiſted of French and Engliſh, the Dutcheſs of Clarence, and other Ladies of the higheſt Quality being the chief Ornaments of it. Here he perſuaded the King of France to repair with him to the Camp, that his Preſence before the Walls might influence his Rebellious Subjects to return to their Duty. But when they were ſummon'd to yield to their natural Soveraign, they reſolutely anſwer'd, That they would joyfully open their Gates to their Monarch, but they would never obey an Engliſh King, the ancient and mortal Enemy of France. Tho' neither the Preſence nor Authority of the French King could avail, yet he ſtill continu'd in the Camp, to which the beautiful Queen of England likewiſe came with a ſhining Train of Ladies, for whoſe Entertainment a fair Houſe was built at ſuch a Diſtance as ſecur'd them from all Danger. To entertain them with martial Muſick, eight or ten Trumpets were ſounded every Morning and Evening before the Tent of the King of England, who had the State and Magnificence of a Court amidſt all the Noiſe and Diſorders of War; and yet with uninterrupted Diligence imploy'd himſelf in all the Buſineſs of the Siege. As there was a ſtrong Party of Scots in the Garriſon, the young King of Scotland, now in the Army with King Henry, ſent to require them upon their Allegiance, that they ſhould not employ their Arms againſt Troops where he was in Perſon, but come and fight under the Standard of their King. To whom they return'd this Anſwer, That they would not own or obey him as their King, who was in the Power of another; for which Affront, twenty of them were afterwards executed. About the ſame Time mandatory Letters were ſent by King Charles into Picardy, to put all Places that held for him in thoſe Parts into King Henry's Poſſeſſion, and to take the Oath of Obedience to him as to the only Heir, Succeſſor, Regent and Governor of France; the Execution of which was committed to the Care of ſeveral of the French Nobility.

The Diſtreſs of Melun now became exceeding great, as well upon the Beſiegers as Defendants; the one afflicted and extreamly weaken'd with Mortality, and the other violently oppreſs'd with Famine, and other Calamities incident to long Sieges. After eighteen Weeks Siege, the Engliſh were ſupply'd with Soldiers out of Picardy, the Sight of which at firſt put the Town in Hopes of Relief from the Dauphine; but the Garriſon finding themſelves unhappily diſappointed, in Deſpair capitulated, and were forc'd to ſurrender upon hard Articles, one of which was That they ſhould be all made Priſoners of War, and that all the Engliſh and Scots ſhould in a ſpecial Manner be left to the abſolute Diſpoſal of the King of England; and that all Acceſſaries to the Duke of Burgundy's Murder ſhould ſuffer Death. The Articles being concluded, an Engliſh Garriſon was put into Melun: The Men at Arms who adher'd to the Dauphine's Party, of whom the principal were Pierre de Borbon and the Lord de Barbaſon, with five or ſix hundred Perſons of Quality of both Sexes, and the greateſt Part of the chief Citizens, were convey'd under a ſtrong Guard to Paris, and there committed Priſoners to the Chaſtelet, the Baſtile, and other Places. Two Monks, who were convicted of ingaging in Burgundy's Murder, were beheaded in the City, with a Gentleman of King Henry's Houſhold, whoſe Name was Bertrand de Chaumont. This latter had renounc'd the Intereſt of France, and devoted himſelf to the Service of the King of England, and was highly in his Favour, as a Man of approv'd Valour. But clear Evidence being brought againſt him, That during the Treaty for ſurrendring the Town, for a Sum of Mony he had favour'd the Eſcape of one Aimerion de Lau, a ſuſpected Accomplice in the Duke's Murder; the King, tho' with Regret to loſe ſo gallant a Man, and tho' the Dukes of Clarence and Burgundy interceded for his Life, would not pardon him, but gave Order for his Execution, declaring He would have no Traitors in his Army: Yet to ſhow his Value for his Abilities, he was hear'd ſorrowfully to ſay, He would have given fifty thouſand Nobles that Chaumont had not been guilty of ſuch a Crime. The valiant Barbaſan was accus'd by the Duke of Burgundy as an Accomplice in his Father's Murder; but he in an open Trial defended himſelf, proteſting, That tho' he was a Servant to the Dauphine, he was ſo far from conſenting to the Fact, that he knew nothing of it 'till it was effected. Tho' the Evidence againſt him was not clear, yet there was ſo ſtrong a Suſpicion as not to admit of his being ſet at Liberty; ſo that he was continu'd a Priſoner nine Years. Some Writers inform us that he ſav'd his Life by pleading it would be a Diſhonour for King Henry to put a Perſon to Death, who was his Brother in Arms, and had ſignaliz'd himſelf in a ſingle Combate with him; which by the Heralds was allow'd to be the ſame Thing as if he had fought with him in appointed Liſts.

Monſtrel. La Feyre. Hall. Melun thus taken, and the Government given to the Earl of Huntington, the two Kings with the Duke of Burgundy made a publick Entry into Paris, being met by the Citizens, who in great Solemnity came out to congratulate their Arrival. The Streets were ſpread, and the Houſes hung with rich Cloath, while the People in all Parts expreſs'd their extraordinary Joy in the higheſt Acclamations. The two Kings rod together under a rich Canopy, Henry on the left Hand, next to whom follow'd the Dukes of Clarence and Bedford, and on the other Side of the Way the Duke of Burgundy in deep Mourning; the Princes and Nobility in each Nation follow'd in Order, the Clergy with Proceſſions, and their venerable Relicks, going before them to Notredame Cathedral. Rich Preſents, Flags, Streamers and Conduits running with Wine, were all us'd by the Citizens to expreſs how grateful the Peace was to them, and how much they exulted in the Honour of having two Kings reſident amongſt them. King Henry's Palace was prepar'd in the Louvre, and was moſt rich and magnificent, and King Charles's Court in the Hoſtel St. Pol, and much inferior in all Reſpects; for, as one Author obſerves, young Henry commanded all, and his Brothers exercis'd ſupream Authority, while old Charles ſtood as a Cypher, and the French Nobility had nothing to do. As King Henry had the Diſpoſal of all Places of Honour and Truſt, ſo the French Nobility and Gentry addreſſed themſelves to him, and endeavour'd to raiſe their Fortunes by obtaining an Intereſt in his Favour. He made a great Alteration of the Officers, diſplacing many who had been put in by the old Duke of Burgundy or his Son, and conferring their Employments on others whom he accounted more firm to his Intereſts. As Regent of France he alſo redreſs'd Grievances, reform'd Abuſes, and corrected all Miſcarriages in the Government; and he caus'd a new Coin to be ſtamp'd, to expreſs the Union of the two Kingdoms, in the Reverſe of which the Arms of England and France were quarter'd together.

A Parliament meet at Paris.

The better to eſtabliſh all Things during King Henry's Stay in Paris, a grand Parliament was ſummon'd to meet at that City; in which was the final Agreement between the two Kings openly acknowledg'd by King Charles, as made by his Aſſent, and with the Advice of all the Council of France; whereupon it was there alſo ratify'd by the general States of the Kingdom, and ſolemnly ſworn to by all the Nobility and Magiſtrates, Spiritual and Temporal, who alſo ſet their Seals to the Inſtruments of the Agreement, which were ſent into England to be kept in the King's Exchequer at Weſtminſter. But in this Parliament the Murder of the Duke of Burgundy was in a more ſpecial and particular manner examin'd, and the Actors, with all their Accomplices were ſolemnly ſentenc'd; and Methods were us'd to oblige them likewiſe to build Churches, and perform ſeveral publick Acts of Charity, in order to expiate the execrable Fact. And the Aſſembly proceeded ſo far as to ſummon the Dauphine himſelf before the Grand Marble Table, with all the uſual Formalities. Upon his Non-Appearance, he was publickly attainted and convicted of Murder, was declared unworthy of all Succeſſion, namely of that to the Crown of France, and was baniſh'd the Kingdom for ever. From this Sentence, as given by incompetent Judges, and contrary to the Laws of the Kingdom, the Dauphine appeal'd to God and his Sword, and immediately transferr'd the Parliament and Univerſity to the City of Poictiers, at which Place the moſt illuſtrious Members of thoſe two Bodies did not fail to appear. Thus almoſt every thing was double in the Kingdom of France; there were two Kings, two Regents, two Parliaments, two Conſtables, two Chancellors, two Admirals, and ſo of moſt of the great Officers, not to mention the Multitude of Marſhals of France, whereof each Party made as many as they thought fit.

King Henry having eſtabliſh'd the grand Affairs of France, as well as theſe unſetled Times would permit, he reſolv'd for a while to return into England, and there perform the Solemnities of his beloved Queen's Coronation; in order to which he firſt appointed for his Lieutenant of France his Brother the Duke of Clarence, a brave Prince inferior to none but himſelf, and alſo left the Duke of Exeter with five hundred Men at Arms to continue in the City of Paris; and ſo attended with great Magnificence he repair'd to Amiens, and then to Calais. But before he took Shipping, he adjuſted ſeveral Affairs in Normandy and other Parts, treated with the Duke of Bretaign, and generouſly diſcharged the Count De Richemont, who had been Priſoner ever ſince the Battel at Agincourt. But for the Duke of Bourbon, who was diſcharg'd afterwards, he agreed for a Ranſom of no leſs than a hundred thouſand Crowns, beſides other Advantages. From Calais, with a glorious Train the King croſs'd the Seas to Dover, and made a triumphant Entry at London, the People receiving him as an Angel from Heav'n, with Torrents of Joy and Exultation to ſee their King return crown'd with new Victories, and with the Acceſſion of another Kingdom to his own. But as he piouſly aſcrib'd the Glory of all his Conqueſts to a Superior Power, ſo he gave all the Praiſe to Heav'n, and commanded the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury to appoint a publick Day of Thankſgiving.

A. D. 1421. Reg. 8/9.

VI. The mighty King Henry was now in the Height of his Grandeur, and at his Return into England he found the Nation flouriſhing and proſperous under the Government of Humphry Duke of Gloceſter his Brother, who had ſucceeded the Duke of Bedford in the Regency with equal Wiſdom and Succeſs. The Arms of the King had not only been ſucceſsful in France, but alſo in Ireland, ever ſince his Acceſſion to the Crown; ſo that he found no Diſaſter to cloud his Joy in the Poſſeſſion of the moſt excellent Princeſs of that Age, or to diſturb the Pomp which was preparing for her Coronation. for this great Solemnity was the twenty fourth of February; where after the Ceremonies of the Coronation in Weſtminſter Abby, the Queen with her noble Retinue came into the Hall, where many Tables were ſpread, and a ſplendid Entertainment provided for the Nobles, Biſhops, Ladies, Mayor and Aldermen of London. On the Right Hand, and End of the Queen's Table, were ſeated the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and the Cardinal Biſhop of Wincheſter; on the Left the King of Scotland in his Robes, with the Dutcheſs of York and Counteſs of Huntington. The Earl of Marche holding the Royal Scepter in his Hand, kneel'd on the Right Hand of the Queen, and the Earl-Marſhal in like manner on the Left; the Counteſs of Kent ſat at her Right Foot, and the Counteſs Marſhal at her Left; while the Duke of Gloceſter, as Overſeer, ſtood before her Majeſty bare-headed. The reſt of the ſplendid Train had their ſeveral and diſtinct Tables in the Hall; and the whole Feaſt, tho' in the Time of Lent and furniſh'd all with Fiſh, was great and pompous to the utmoſt Degree. After the Solemnities of the Coronation, the King, with the Queen and ſome of the Nobility, took a Journey to York, where they were joyfully and magnificently receiv'd, and the Citizens made them many rich Preſents. The Queen continu'd at York, but the King went in Pilgrimage to Bridlington, where having paid his Devotions, he afterwards viſited a great Part of his Kingdom; and in all Places where he came his Ears were open to the Complaints of the injur'd and oppreſs'd: He redreſs'd their Wrongs, puniſh'd the Corrupters of Juſtice, and reform'd the Abuſes in Government. Particularly a great Abuſe in the Church, ariſing from the Pope's Diſpoſal of the vacant Biſhopricks and Benefices, was this Year remov'd; and with that Vigour and Reſolution, that it gave ſuch a Blow to the uſurping Power of Rome in this Kingdom, as greatly weaken'd, and at laſt intirely deſtroy'd it.

Walſing. Fabian. Pol Virg. In May the King met his Parliament at Weſtminſter, and repreſented to them the State of the publick Affairs, the Conqueſts he had made in France, and the Supplies neceſſary to continue the War; that the Dauphine and his Party, who maintain'd ſome Provinces and Cities againſt him, being ſubdu'd, that Kingdom might be annex'd to the Engliſh Crown. The Commons chearfully gave a Fifteenth, tho' a Petition was preſented, fill'd with the ſad Complaints of the Poverty of the People, and intolerable Burden of the War, fomented by ſome Perſons more affecting their private Intereſt than the Proſperity of their Country, who regretted to part with any Mony to advance the Greatneſs and Honour of the Government. At the ſame Time there was a Convocation of the Clergy at St. Paul's, who offer'd a Tenth to the King, and the rich Biſhop of Wincheſter in Advance of the Mony lent him twenty thouſand Pound. At the ſame Time the King wiſely took care to ſecure his Kingdom from any Invaſion of the Welſh or Scots during his Abſence. He compos'd the Tumults in Wales, and reduc'd that People to their Duty; and to make the Scots his Friends, he gave Liberty to their King to return to his Country and Throne ten Years after his being firſt taken by Henry IV. and detain'd in the Engliſh Court. But he did not return 'till a few Years after in the next Reign. He alſo eſtabliſh'd a Peace with him, ſtrengthen'd with an Alliance, by giving him in Marriage the Lady Ann his Niece, and Daughter of the Duke of Clarence. It was agreed that her Dowry ſhould pay part of his Ranſom; that for the Payment of the reſt, he ſhould give Hoſtages, and likewiſe ingage himſelf never to make War on England. Having taken all neceſſary Precautions, King Henry with a choice Army of four thouſand Men at Arms, and twenty four thouſand Archers, return'd into France to proſecute thoſe Wars.

He calls a Parliament.

He ſets the King of the Scots at Liberty.

Buchan. Walſing. &c. The King now found his Preſence highly neceſſary, for before he took Shipping, he was ſurpriz'd with the News of the unfortunate Miſcarriage of his admirable Brother the Duke of Clarence, of which this was the Occaſion. The Earl of Buchan, and the Earl of Douglas, and other Commanders, with ſeven thouſand Scots had paſs'd over into France to the Aſſiſtance of the Dauphine; phine; and joining with his Party in Anjou, design'd to surprize the Duke of Clarence before he was provided: In which Enterprize, four straggling Scots, taken and brought Prisoners to him as he sat at Dinner, discover'd the Design and Strength of the Enemy, whose Approach was very near. Upon hearing of this News the Duke, all in a Flame, too suddenly took Horse, crying They are all Ours! leaving his Troops to follow him with what Expedition they could. His unexpected Appearance caus'd some of the Scots to take into the Church of Baugy for their Safety, where while they were defending themselves, the rest of their Forces took the Alarm; and the Earl of Buchan secur'd the main Bridge, to whose Assistance came Hugh Kennedy with a hundred Horse. The Duke of Clarence seeing no possibility to force his Passage with his slender Troop of Horse, dismounted with his Men, and made a noble Charge upon the Earl of Buchan; and the English, fir'd with Disdain to meet with their old Enemies, fought with the greatest Fierceness imaginable. But none was more brave and daring than the Duke himself, who being distinguish'd by his rich Armour, and a golden Coronet sparkling with Jewels, but more remarkable for his Valour, was singled out by John Swinton a Scotch Cavalier, who with his Lance wounded him on the Face. The Duke notwithstanding rush'd undauntedly into the Thickest of the Enemy's Troops, where the Earl of Buchan on Horseback struck him down with a Truncheon, which put an End to his Life. The English, dishearten'd at the Fall of so great a General, and being furiously attack'd by the whole Army, were soon routed with the Loss of fifteen hundred Men, after they had slain above a thousand of the Enemy. The Deaths of the Lords Ross and Gray, and Sir Gilbert Umfreville, and the Captivity of the Earls of Huntington, Somerset and Perche, the Lord Fitz Walter and Sir William Bower, caus'd a general Concern in the English Army; yet the Duke of Clarence had the greatest share in their Sorrow, who as he was generally belov'd for his Wisdom, Valour and other excellent Qualities, so his Death was universally lamented, not only by the English, but by the Enemy. His Body remain'd a few Hours in their Hands, who were carrying it to the Dauphine; but they did not long keep either that or the Field of Battel: For tho' the Body of the Army, which under the Earl of Salisbury had follow'd the Duke, could neither keep Peace with his swift March, nor advance Time enough to prevent his Fate and the Loss of so many gallant Soldiers, yet they came up soon enough to force the French to a disorderly Retreat, and to recover the dead Body of the Duke, which was convey'd into England, where it was interr'd with great Solemnity. The Earl of Buchan for his Valour was by the Dauphine made Constable of France.

The Duke slain in Battel.

His Body sent into England.

King Henry both griev'd and inrag'd at the Loss of a Brother he so justly lov'd and admir'd, hasten'd his Expedition into France; and leaving his Brother John Duke of Bedford his Lieutenant, and his beloved Queen honourably attended, upon the tenth Day of June he landed at Calais with all his Forces, making now his last Entrance into France. On the Day after his Arrival he dispatch'd the Earl of Dorset and the Lord Clifford with twelve hundred Horse and Foot into Paris, to relieve the Duke of Exeter, who was straiten'd of Provisions by the Dauphinois, that harrass'd the adjacent Country, and had taken Boneval, Galandon, and some other Forts, and after that march'd to Chartiers, and invested it with seven thousand Men at Arms, four thousand Cross-Bows, and six thousand Archers. King Henry, after a short Continuance in Calais, march'd to Monstrelet, and there quartering his Army, he found the Duke of Burgundy somewhat impair'd in his Health. Three Days being spent in Conference, the King march'd into Ponthieu, and the Duke to Abbeville upon Somme, to facilitate his Passage there to be made, of which they had some Doubt, by reason of the Dissatisfaction of many of the Inhabitants. Henry in his March took the Fort call'd La Ferte, commanded by the Bastard of Belluy, which surrender'd upon Summons; but being committed to the Custody of Borslers

King Henry makes his last Expedition into France.

Borflers of Picardy, was again betray'd into the Hands of the Dauphine. From hence the King paſs'd the River at Abbeville, where he was ſpendidly entertain'd, and richly preſented; from whence he march'd to Beauvois, Giſors and Bois-de-Vincennes, where King Charles and his Queen reſided, and receiv'd him with great Honour, and laſtly to the City of Paris, where he was receiv'd in Joy and Triumph. He enters Paris.

Monſtrel. Mezeray. Walſing. &c. But this Heroe, more regarding Laurels and Conqueſts than the delicate Pleaſures of a Court, after he had concerted Meaſures, and levy'd French Forces to add to the Engliſh, march'd towards Meaux, reſolving in Revenge of his Brother's Death to fight the Dauphine, who had now laid before Chartiers the Space of three Weeks. But he hearing of King Henry's Approach at the Head of a formidable Power, broke up the Siege and retir'd; upon which the King march'd directly to Dreaux, and ſat down before that Place. The Inhabitants and Garriſon, apprehenſive of their Danger, beat a Parly, and agreed to ſurrender the Town, if the Dauphine did not relieve them by a certain Day; which being expir'd, the Town was deliver'd, and eight hundred of the Dauphine's Party permitted to retire upon their Oaths not to bear Arms againſt King Henry for the Space of one Year. While Henry lay before this Place, Mezeray tells us, That an honeſt Hermit unknown to him, came and repreſented to him the great Evils he brought upon Chriſtendom by his unjuſt Ambition and Uſurpation of the Kingdom of France, againſt known Right and the Will of Heav'n; wherefore in the Name of God he threaten'd him with a ſevere and ſudden Puniſhment, if he did not deſiſt. The King took this Exhortation either for a viſionary Fancy, or a Suggeſtion of the Dauphine's, therefore proſecuted his Deſigns with greater Vigour; and purſuing the flying Dauphine, he took Baugency and Vendoſme upon the River Loire, with other Forts, but could not encounter that Prince who ſo induſtriouſly avoided Battel. And tho' he had the greater Army, and had engag'd himſelf by his Heralds to meet the King of England in the Field, confirming it alſo with an Oath, he contenting himſelf with waſting the Country, drew off to Bourges, as a Place of ſafe Retreat, both for the Strength of the Place, and the Fidelity of the People: And for his conſtant Reſidence there, he was by way of Jeer call'd The King of Bourges. King Henry finding it was in vain to attack him in that advantagious Poſt, firſt ravag'd the Country, and then reſolv'd to beſiege Meaux, the Capital City of the Country of Brie, a Place of great Strength and Conſequence. Having provided Engines, and all other Neceſſaries, he ſent his Uncle the Duke of Exeter, with four thouſand Men, to poſſeſs himſelf of the Suburbs, to prevent the Garriſon from firing them; and then following himſelf with an Army of twenty thouſand Men, on October the ſixth he inveſted the Place, incloſ'd his Camp with an Intrenchment, and rais'd his Batteries againſt the Walls and Gates. The Governor of the City was the Baſtard De Varus, who had with him many other Officers, and a thouſand ſelect Soldiers, beſides the Inhabitants, who were alſo reſolute to defend the Place to the laſt Extremity. And indeed they bravely held out for the Space of ſeven Months, while great Numbers of the Engliſh and Burgundians dy'd either by Sickneſs, Sallies, or the Shot from the Walls.

He takes ſeveral Towns from the Dauphine.

The Siege of Meaux.

Walſing. Monſtrel. &c. During this tedious Winter Siege, the King had the Satisfaction of hearing that his Queen was deliver'd of a young Prince at Windſor on St. Nicholas Day, to whom he gave the Name of Henry ſur les Fous. It is commonly related, that when he heard his Son was born in Windſor Caſtle, he rais'd a bad Omen from the Place, as foreboding ſome unhappy Fate; and, as Hall ſays, ſpoke theſe prophetical Words to the Lord Fitz-Hugh his Chamberlain: I Henry born at Monmouth ſhall a ſmall Time reign, and gain much; and Henry born at Windſor ſhall reign long, and loſe all; but God's Will be done. Among thoſe to whom the Care of this Royal Infant was committed, Jaqueline de Bawieri Dutcheſs of Brabant had the principal Imployment. At the ſame Time

His Father's Words upon his Birth.

Time the Duke of Richemont, whom King Henry had releas'd without Ranſom, came at the Head of a numerous Body of Horſe to the Camp before Meaux, to ſerve him in the Siege, which was ſtill proſecuted vigorouſly; tho' upon Notice that ſome of the Dauphine's Troops had ſurpriz'd Auranches, and kill'd and taken two or three hundred of the Garriſon, the King order'd a ſtrong Detachment to march to the Aſſiſtance of the Earl of Salisbury Governor of Normandy, who with thoſe Recruits ſoon recover'd the Town. About that Time Jaques de Harecourt, in Service of the Dauphine, with ſeven hundred Soldiers harraſs'd the Parts about Vimen, againſt whom ſome Engliſh Garriſons aſſembling, ſlew three hundred of his Men, himſelf hardly eſcaping by the Fleetneſs of his Horſe. Likewiſe Oliver de Mauny invaded Conſtantine, notwithſtanding he had ſolemnly ſworn at the Surrender of Falaiſe never to bear Arms againſt King Henry; but in the midſt of his Carreer he was defeated and taken Priſoner by the Earl of Suffolk. This perfidious Man being brought before King Henry, a true Obſerver of all Faith, he openly ſpoke thus to him,

His Words to De Mauny.

You are an ancient Knight, and ought to have obſerv'd your Faith and Honour, which you have baſely broken, and by the Law of Arms deſerve immediate Death: But we give you your ignominious Life, and ſhall only ſend you into England, there to learn the Language, and truer Maxims of Honour.

King Henry's Forces being diminiſh'd by theſe Commotions in Normandy, and his Thoughts much employ'd that way, the valiant De Offemont, whom the Garriſon of Meaux earneſtly deſir'd ſhould be their Governor, found an Opportunity to approach the Walls with forty ſelect Soldiers, in Order to enter the Town; but ready to be receiv'd by Ladders over the Walls in the Night, Centinels diſcover'd the Men, and he himſelf not being able to recover the Ladders, fell into the Ditch, where not being able to free himſelf from his heavy Armour, he was wounded, and then taken Priſoner, with moſt of his Followers. King Henry eſteem'd the Taking of ſo brave and valiant a Commander as a Prize of great Importance, and puſh'd forwards the Siege with freſh Vigour and Reſolution. At length the Defendants, hopeleſs of Relief, and finding themſelves unable to hold out, carry'd all their Goods from the Town into the Caſtle; but the Beſiegers diſcovering their Actions, and fearing to loſe their Booty, made a ſudden and furious Attack, and by Force made way into the Town with Sword in Hand. Then Henry planting his Cannons, began to batter the Caſtle, and ſhortly reduc'd it to that Extremity, that beſides want of Bread, moſt of their Hand-Weapons were broken, and the Men dangerouſly wounded; yet they did not deſiſt from provoking the Engliſh with opprobrious Words and vile Indignities, which caus'd harder Conditions to be laid upon them, than in any other Town taken the whole War. By which the whole Garriſon and the Inhabitants were to be Priſoners at the King's Pleaſure, only having their Lives ſav'd; but the Governor De Varus, and ſome other Men of Note and Quality, were to be deliver'd up to immediate Execution. The City thus ſurrender'd, King Henry immediately ſent eight hundred ſelect Men Priſoners to Paris, Roan and England. The Governor was beheaded, and his Body hung on a Tree before the Town, call'd by his own Name, becauſe he had formerly hang'd on it many Engliſh and Burgundians, and his Head was fix'd on a Pole upon the Top of the ſame Tree. This was follow'd by the Execution of ſeveral others of Quality in Paris, who had given more than common Provocations during the Time of the Siege; and all the Riches of the City was diſtributed by King Henry to his Commanders and moſt deſerving Men. Orders being taken for the repairing the Breaches, and the City well garriſon'd, Creſpy, the Caſtle of Pierrepont, Merlau, Offemont, and ſeveral other Places ſubmitted to the King's victorious Arms; while others were ſet on Fire to hinder him of the Fruits of his Conqueſts. When the Governors of Places in the Marches of Beauvais, heard how King Henry, by a Courage and Conduct which nothing could reſiſt, had taken Towns and Forts which they thought impregnable, ble, they had ſuch an Apprehenſion of his Might, that they ſent Deputies to treat about ſurrendring at an aſſign'd Time, if the Dauphine did not give them due Aſſiſtance.

Monſtrel. Caxton. &c. Queen Catharine in England daily hearing of the King's Succeſs, greatly deſir'd the Sight of his Perſon, and for that End prepar'd for a Voyage to France, under the Conduct of Duke John the King's Brother, then Regent of England, who for the Time of his Abſence deputed his Brother Humphry Duke of Gloceſter, and took Shipping at Southampton. The Winds being proſperous, on the twenty firſt of May ſhe landed at Harfleur, and with encreaſing Trains of Nobility by eaſie Journies came to Roan, and from thence to Bois-de-Vicennes, where her Royal Husband, with her Father and Mother, came in great Pomp to meet her with the utmoſt Demonſtrations of Joy. From thence they all enter'd the City of Paris; and at the Celebration of the Feſtival of Pentecoſt, a magnificent Feaſt was prepar'd in the great Hall of the Louvre, where at one Table the King and Queen of England ſat with their Imperial Crowns and Robes, and at the other many of the French and Engliſh Nobility and Gentry. The French Court at the Hoſtel St. Pol was at the ſame Time very thin, and King Charles ſaw himſelf neglected and abandon'd by thoſe who were born his Subjects, who now ador'd their young riſing Soveraign. The former had the Title of King of France, while the latter govern'd all; at which, tho' many of the French were uneaſie, yet the Engliſh King was manifeſtly too great to be oppos'd. Here he made a bold Effort of his Power, in cauſing the Tax rais'd on the Marks of Silver for Minting his new Mony, to be collected at Paris, as it had been in other Places; and tho' the People murmur'd and talk'd out their Diſcontents, yet they were ſo aw'd, that they durſt not break out into any Tumult. But their Reſentments were abated, or rather turn'd into Affection, when they felt the kind Influences of King Henry's juſt and moderate Government, and obſerv'd his exact Adminiſtration of Juſtice in redreſſing Wrongs, and puniſhing the Actors without Partiality or Favour. By this juſt Conduct he eſpecially gain'd the Love of the Common People, who regarded him not as their Conqueror, but as their Father and Protector.

Monſtrel. Le Fevre. Tho' the Provinces of Champaign, Picardy, Brie, Normandy, and Iſle of France, were in King Henry's Poſſeſſion, yet all were not reduc'd to a quiet Obedience; for a great and ſtrong Part ſtill held out for the Dauphine, who with twenty thouſand effective Men beſieg'd La Charitie upon the Loire, and took it; from whence he march'd to Cone upon the ſame River, where the Beſieged treated about a Surrender, and gave Hoſtages to deliver it up on the ſixteenth of Auguſt, if they were not reliev'd before that Time by the Duke of Burgundy. The Prince and the Duke by Conſent agreed to put the Cauſe to the Deciſion of a Battel, to be fought on the ſaid ſixteenth of Auguſt; and this was mutually declar'd by their Heralds. The Duke not only ſent Orders to levy new Forces to augment his Army, but likewiſe begg'd King Henry's particular Aſſiſtance; to which the King gave Anſwer, That he himſelf would come at the Head of his whole Army, to join with him in the Battel. But as this mighty Conqueror prepar'd for his March, Heav'n thought fit to put a Period to all his encreaſing Glories, and ſtruck him with a Diſtemper that prov'd fatal to him; and all he could do was to command the Duke of Bedford and Earl of Warwick to give all neceſſary Aſſiſtance to the Duke of Burgundy. Tho' he was much weaken'd by his Diſeaſe, he was yet animated by a Courage natural to him; ſo that taking his laſt Leave of King Charles and the two Queens at Senlis, he repair'd to Melun, with a Deſign to go from that City, and put himſelf at the Head of the Army. But his Diſtemper increaſing, his Body was too feeble to anſwer the invincible Greatneſs of his Soul: And therefore tho' he went in a Litter, to be carry'd among his Troops, yet finding himſelf extreamly ill, he was oblig'd to return and ſtay at Bois-de-Vincennes, while the Duke of Bedford by his Order march'd with the whole Army to join the Duke of Burgundy at Vezelay.

King Henry deſigns to fight the Dauphine.

His laſt Sickneſs.

The

The Duke of Burgundy gratefully acknowledg'd the King of England's Kindneſs; and joining all the Forces, he took his March to Cone, which was beſieg'd by the Dauphine, and encamp'd near the Town, preparing for that important Battel which was to be fought the next Day. The French Prince finding his Enemies to exceed him in Number and Strength, notwithſtanding he had made a publick Defiance by his Heralds, immediately broke up the Siege, and retreated to Bourges in Berry. The Duke having thus rais'd the Siege, and forc'd his Enemies to a moſt diſhonourable Retreat without Fighting, return'd to Troyes with his Army. In their March the Duke of Bedford receiv'd the mournful News, that his Brother King Henry's Life was in Danger; upon which he left the Army, and attended with a few choice Friends, rod full Speed to le Vincennes. The brave King ſenſible that he was dying, gave Orders that the Duke of Bedford, the Duke of Exeter, the Earl of Warwick, Sir Lewis Robeſſart, and ſeven or eight more, who had the greateſt Place in his Affection and Confidence, ſhould ſtand around his Bed. To whom he ſpoke to this Effect. I am juſt now approaching the Period of my Life, which tho' ſhort, has been glorious and conducing to the Good and Honour of my People; and tho' it has been ſpent in Wars and Bloodſhed, yet ſince milder Methods have been ineffectual, and nothing leſs could vindicate my Right, the Miſeries produc'd are not to be imputed to me, but to my Enemies, as the Effect of their Injuſtice. As Death never appear'd formidable in ſo many Battels and Sieges, ſo I can now without Horror behold its gradual Approaches in a Diſeaſe; and ſince it is the Will of Heav'n to put an End to my Days, I chearfully reſign my ſelf to its Pleaſure: Nor ſhould I leave the World with the leaſt Reluctancy, if two Things did not nearly touch me. One is, that I muſt go out of it when my Subjects are involv'd in the Confuſions of a War, before I ſee the Enemy, who oppoſes the Peace and Glory of both Nations, intirely ſubdu'd by my Arms; and the Other is, that I ſee my ſelf call'd from the Throne at a Time, when my Son is only an Infant, and incapable of filling it. Therefore to obviate all future Inconveniencies, he with the moſt pathethick and endearing Expreſſions urg'd them all ſtrictly to obſerve his Advice and Inſtructions. The Subſtance of which was, That they would take the moſt exact Care in the Education of his Son, and inviolably preſerve their Loyalty to him; and that they would comfort his beloved Wife, now the moſt diſconſolate Princeſs living: That they would keep ſtrict Faith with the Duke of Burgundy, and never make Peace with the Dauphine, on any other Condition than that of having all the Dukedom of Normandy entirely ſecur'd to the Engliſh Crown: That they would preſerve a ſtrict Union among themſelves, and not diſcharge the Duke of Orleans, the Count d'Eu, and ſome other noble Priſoners, 'till his Son was of Years to govern: That his Brother the Duke of Bedford, with the Aſſiſtance of the Duke of Burgundy, ſhould manage the Kingdom of France; and that his Uncle the Duke of Exeter, with his Brother the Duke of Gloceſter, ſhould govern that of England.

His Speech upon his Death-Bed.

His Inſtructions.

The ſorrowful Nobles obſerv'd in profound Silence, and with aſſured Promiſes gave their Approbation to theſe laſt Counſels ſo ſenſibly urg'd by their expiring Monarch; who having thus eſtabliſh'd his ſecular Affairs, had his Thoughts wholly imploy'd about the Condition of his Soul now departing into another World. Ordering his Phyſicians to come to him, he demanded of them how long he had to live; but they declining a direct Anſwer, and flattering him with the Hopes of Life, the King with Diſſatisfaction charg'd them upon their Allegiance to declare their Opinion in poſitive Terms. After ſome little Conſultation among themſelves, one of them kneeling down in the Name of the reſt ſaid, Sir, think upon your Soul, for as we judge, without a Miracle, you cannot live longer than two Hours. Upon which with the higheſt Devotion he proceeded to Confeſſion, commanding his Prieſts to ſing the ſeven penipenitential Pſalms; and when in the fifty firſt Pſalm they came to thoſe Words, Build up the Walls of Jeruſalem, he bad them ſtop, and with a loud Voice declar'd upon the Word of a dying Man, That after the Settlement of the Kingdom of France, he really intended, with the Will of Heav'n, to have made War againſt the Infidels, for the Conqueſt of Jeruſalem. Having finiſh'd their Devotion, this great King expir'd at the Hour which the Phyſician had foretold, on the thirty firſt Day of Auguſt, in the Prime of his Years the thirty fourth of his Age, after a ſhort, but moſt glorious, magnificent and triumphant Reign of nine Years, four Months, and eleven Days. and Death.

Holling. Monſtrel. By the Gratitude of this Age his Funeral Obſequies were proportion'd to his Worth and Grandeur. His Body, embalm'd and enclos'd in Lead, was laid on a Chariot of State, richly adorn'd with Cloath of Gold; and on a Bed in the ſame Chariot was laid a lively Figure of his Perſon, with Imperial Robes, a Crown of Gold, a Scepter and Globe, like a triumphant Monarch; and over all was a glorious ſilk Canopy. The Chariot was drawn by ſix Horſes in rich Harneſs: The firſt bore the Arms of St. George, the ſecond the Arms of Normandy, the third thoſe of King Arthur, the fourth thoſe of St. Edward, the fifth the Arms of France, and the ſixth thoſe of England and France. James King of the Scots follow'd it as principal Mourner; and after him the Duke of Exeter, the Earls of Warwick, Marche, Stafford and Mortaigne, the Lords Fitz-Hugh, Hungerford, Bourchier, Fanhope and Cromwell, Sir Robert Robeſſart, and Sir John Cornwall. The Banners of the Saints were born by the Lords Lovel, Audely, Morley and Zouch; the Baron Dudley bore the great Standard, and the Earl of Longueville the Banner. The Hachments were carry'd by twelve Commanders, and around the Chariot rod five hundred Men at Arms all in black Armour, their Horſes barb'd black, and their Lances held with the Points downward. Three hundred cloath'd in White, bearing lighted Torches, alſo ſurrounded the Chariot, with Lords bearing Banners, Bannerols and Penons; thoſe of the King's Houſhold cloath'd in Black follow'd it, and after them the Royal Family in deep Mourning; while the ſorrowful Queen with a noble Retinue follow'd at a League's Diſtance. In this ſolemn Manner the Body was convey'd from Bois de Vincennes to Paris, and ſo to Roan, to Abbeville, to Calais, to Dover, from thence through the City of London to Weſtminſter, where it was interr'd with ſuch pompous Ceremonies, ſuch Mournings of the Nobility, Prayers of the Eccleſiaſticks, and Lamentations of the Commons, as were never known before in the Kingdom of England. He was bury'd in the Abby Church, and his Queen caus'd his Image in Silver gilt, of the full Proportion, to be laid on his Tomb. His pompous Obſequies.

Theſe were the laſt Honours done to this mighty Monarch, the Wonder of all Chriſtendom, who was ſo highly reverenc'd and lov'd by all his People, that his Funerals were attended with an univerſal Sorrow. They ſaw all their Hopes of ſubduing France loſt in the Death of a Prince, who only knew how to conquer it, and that with an Army never exceeding thirty thouſand; ſo that ſome believe his Enemies took away his Life by Poiſon, which they could not deſtroy in open War. He had all the Accompliſhments of Body and Mind which are requir'd to the finiſhing a great Man. His Stature was tall and majeſtick, his Body tho' lean and ſlender, had all its Limbs well proportion'd, and ſtrongly fram'd; his Neck long, his Hair black, and a manly Beauty ſhin'd in his Face, as well as ſparkled in his Eyes. His Strength and Agility was admirable in all the Exerciſes he perform'd; which was continually preſerv'd by his being temperate, chaſte, enur'd to all the Hardſhips of War, patient of Heat and Cold, Hunger and Thirſt, and moderate in Sleep. He was a nice Obſerver of Juſtice, pious in his Religion, conſtant in his Devotions, a great Patron of the Church and Clergy, and abounding in Works of Charity; wiſe in his Counſels, magnanimous in his Deſigns, and reſolute in purſuing them; great and ſomewhat reſerv'd in his Temper, given to ſpeak little, but all he ſaid was His Character.

like himſelf. As to his Valour and Bravery his whole Reign was a continu'd and wonderful Inſtance of it; in the Exerciſe of which, his ſtricteſt Orders were ſo nicely obey'd, that he reviv'd the martial Diſcipline of the old Romans, by which they conquer'd the World: And never was the Engliſh Valour ſo glorioufly diſplay'd, as in this Reign. For his great Acts he has been compar'd to no leſs than three of the nine Worthies of the World; to David the Prophet, for Piety; to Cæſar the Invincible, for Glory; and to Alexander the Great, for Magnanimity: And with this Advantage, that he was not unchaſte like David, vain-glorious like Cæſar, nor intemperate like Alexander; who while they conquer'd others, became Slaves to their own Paſſions. As he exceeded them in theſe Qualifications, ſo he was not inferior to them in his Fortunes, being neither ſo dejected as David, ſo much envy'd as Cæſar, nor ſo dreaded as Alexander; it being his good Fortune never to be diſtreſs'd, diſtruſted or deſpis'd. But the unexpected Loſs of this Prince in the Flower of his Youth, and in the Midſt, or rather Riſing of his proſperous Fortune, will ſerve for a pregnant Inſtance and Example to ſhow what ſlender Hold mortal Man has of Worldly Greatneſs and Glory, being continually ſubject either to the ſudden Loſs of it, or as ſuddenly to be taken from it: And indeed there ſeems to be ſomething of the more immediate Hand of Providence in it, which now began to chaſtiſe the Progeny of King Henry the Fourth.

His publick Works. His Works of Piety were ſhewn in erecting the Monaſteries of Bethlem and Bridget, near his Manor of Richmond, as alſo his bounteous Gifts to the Works and Furniture of Weſtminſter Church, beſides the Fraternity of St. Giles without Cripplegate; and many other greater Things he had projected at Oxford and other Places. To leave a Teſtimony of his Affection to Arms, he firſt inſtituted Gartar principal King at Arms; beſides other honourable Augmentations to the Order of St. George. In this Reign flouriſh'd, beſides the moſt renowned Soldiers, many Men of Note for Arts and Learning, as William Linwood the great Canoniſt of that Age, Stephen Patrington, Robert Maſcal, Alain de Lyn, Thomas Otterborn, John Sherburn, John Leland, and many others.

SECT. III.

The Reign of King HENRY the Sixth.

Containing 38 Years, 6 Months, and 4 Days.

A. D. 1422. Reg. 1.

I. AFTER God had depriv'd the Engliſh of the greateſt King in the World, he thought fit that an Infant ſhould ſucceed him, now but nine Months old, who upon the thirtieth Day of Auguſt was by the Sound of Trumpets proclaim'd King of England and France, by the Name of Henry the Sixth. But as the Wiſdom of ſome ſupplies the Defects of Age in others, ſo his Father had by his laſt Will appointed, and now the Lords by their Conſent confirm'd the grand Care of the Publick to his two brave and powerful Uncles, John Duke of Bedford, and Humphry Duke of Gloceſter: The former, joining with the Duke of Burgundy, had the Regency of France, and the latter the Government of England; and the Care and Tuition of the Royal Infant was committed to the two Brothers, Thomas Duke of Exeter, and Henry Beaufort Biſhop of Wincheſter and Chancellor of England. This Appointment prov'd really advantagious to the Engliſh Nation; for they all carry'd themſelves ſo upright and carefully in their ſeveral Stations, that it well appear'd the Truſt repos'd in them by the dying King, had made a noble Impreſſion preſſion of Love and Loyalty towards his Son. And indeed the Beginning of this Reign, like the fair Morn of a moſt tempeſtuous Day, promis'd nothing leſs than a Continuance of paſt Felicities. For the State of the Engliſh Affairs was great and flouriſhing; England without Tumult, the natural fierce Humours of her People conſuming or encreaſing themſelves in France; and France her ſelf, for the nobler Parts, together with the grand City of Paris, was at their Devotion. There wanted nothing but the mighty Henry himſelf to compleat the Work begun; for beſides the valiant Duke of Bedford, there were the two Terrors of France, Thomas Earl of Salisbury, and John Lord Talbot, and Armies of veteran Soldiers, where almoſt each Man was equal to a Commander. Yet Providence in Time thought fit to change the whole Courſe of Affairs; and the firſt Diſadvantage which happen'd to the Engliſh Cauſe was the Death of Charles King of France, who ſurviv'd King Henry no more than fifty three Days. This may be truly call'd the firſt Diſadvantage, becauſe the Imbecilities of that Prince were a great Strength to the Engliſh; and on the other Side the Infancy of young Henry was an Advantage to Charles the Dauphine, who by thoſe of his own Party was now proclaim'd King of France, as the Engliſh in Deriſion us'd to ſtile him King of Berry, becauſe he had not much more left than that Province.

Pol. Virg. Sped. &c.

In England a Parliament was aſſembled the better to eſtabliſh the Crown upon the Infant, and to provide for the publick Uſes and Neceſſities of the State; among which Mony was liberally granted, particularly five Nobles upon every Sack of Wool. It was a new and uncommon Sight to the Engliſh Nation, to ſee an Infant ſitting in his Mother's Lap, and exerciſing Soveraign Power in open Parliament; for Queen Catharine, to illuminate that publick Aſſembly with the Preſence of her Royal Babe, remov'd from Windſor to London, and with him in her Arms was carry'd through the City in a pompous and ſplendid manner to Weſtminſter; where being ſeated upon his Throne, by the ordinary Mouth of that high Court, he ſaluted the Auguſt Body, and propos'd Matters of the higheſt Conſequence to their moſt mature Conſideration. As the Affairs of this young Monarch were wiſely eſtabliſh'd in England, ſo they were no leſs vigorouſly proſecuted in France by the worthy Regent the Duke of Bedford; who heartily joining with the Duke of Burgundy, fortify'd the Frontiers of their Poſſeſſions, aſſembled their Deputies and Repreſentatives, and us'd all Methods to retain the Hearts of their own Party. In a publick Aſſembly at Paris the Duke of Bedford in a ſolemn Speech exhorted the Nobility of France, Not to violate their ſworn Allegiance, nor endeavour by themſelves or others to defraud their Soveraign Lord King Henry of his rightful Inheritance; nor to countenance any faithleſs Men who would revive the expiring Animoſities between the French and Engliſh Names and Nations. That they would remember, how by the Bounty of Providence, the two Kingdoms of France and England were in perpetual League united into one glorious Monarchy, and lately eſtabliſh'd beyond the Extent of all Human Force. That tho' they had been great Sufferers by the War, yet they would be no leſs Gainers, if they honour'd, lov'd and obey'd their lawful Soveraign King Henry, and according to their bounden Duty proſecuted his Enemies to the utmoſt Extremity. This Speech found plauſible Admiſſion; and young Henry was in Paris ſolemnly proclaim'd King of England and France, and ſuch Noblemen as were preſent did their Homages, and took their Oaths of Fealty. The like Obligations and Oaths of Allegiance were in the ſame manner put upon all Frenchmen in the Engliſh Dominions in France.

The Dauphine, who now ſtil'd himſelf King of France by the Name of Charles the Seventh, being then about twenty ſeven Years of Age, full of Courage and new Hopes, gathered together what Forces he could. He had the Duke of Alenſon, with ſeveral Princes of the Blood and Peers of France on his Side, all whom he purchas'd at a dear Rate; for he was conſtrain'd to engage gage his Caſtles and the beſt Part of his Demeaſnes in pawn for them. But the greateſt Strength of his Army conſiſted of ſome thouſands of the Scottiſh Nation, who as true Enemies to the Engliſh, ſerv'd under his Banner. The firſt Attempt made by Charles his Forces prov'd unfortunate; for marching to relieve Cravant, which the Engliſh had beſieg'd, they were put to flight with the Loſs of two thouſand of their Men. Charles and his Adherents were ſo far from ſinking under the Apprehenſions of ſo ill an Omen, that they reſolv'd to encounter adverſe Fortune with Encreaſe of Courage. Purſuing this Reſolution, they in a ſhort Time after repair'd the late Loſs by an Overthrow which they gave to a Party of Engliſh, from whom, with the Slaughter of fifteen hundred, they recover'd a great Booty, eſpecially of Cattle, which they had gotten in the Counties of Nugion and Main. Proceeding in this Courſe Charles took Meulan upon the Sein, and put the Engliſh Garriſon to the Sword: But the Poſſeſſion was ſhort, and the Revenge ſpeedy; for the Earl of Salisbury, whom Polydore compares to the old Romans for Valour and Bravery, taking with him John of Luxemberg, General of the Burgundian Horſe, ſoon recover'd the Place, and kill'd all the French that were found in it.

An Alliance between the Dukes of Bedford, Burgundy and Bretaign.

The better to eſtabliſh the Engliſh Affairs, at the City of Amiens in Picardy, the three great Dukes of Bedford, Burgundy and Bretaign, with the Earl of Richemont, met in great State; where they renew'd the former League, adding, 'That each ſhould be the other's Friend, and that all of them ſhould unite their 'Forces in the Defence of King Henry's Right. But for the better Confirmation of this profitable Alliance, the Duke of Bedford, then a Batchelor, marry'd the Lady Anne, Siſter to the Duke of Burgundy; and the Earl of Richemont marry'd another of the Duke's Siſters nam'd Margaret. While the Regent was abſent from Paris upon theſe juſt Occaſions, the Pareſians, who not long before had ſent Ambaſſadors into England to acknowledge King Henry, now enter'd into a Deſign to deliver up the City to Charles the new King. The Regent had timely Notice of this dangerous Conſpiracy, and with his Preſence reduc'd them to their Duty, with the Execution of ſeveral of the chief Actors. Not long after there ſeaſonably arriv'd out of England ten thouſand freſh Soldiers, over whom for Commanders he appointed the famous Earl of Salisbury, William Pole Earl of Suffolk, Robert Willoughby and others; while he himſelf for the general Service led eight hundred Horſe-men, and eight thouſand Foot. With theſe Field Forces the main of the Engliſh Eſtate in France was ſupported and held together, tho' not without Difficulties and various Adventures; in which the Regent took from Charles ſeveral ſtrong Towns and Forts, as Crotoy, Compeigne, Baſas, and many others.

The Regent's chief Deſign was to draw Charles to a general Battel, hoping by that to finiſh his Work; to that End he march'd into Normandy, while the other muſter'd his Soldiers in Tourain. To promote this Deſign, the Regent laid Siege to Ivry; whereupon the Duke of Alenſon was detach'd at the Head of ſixteen thouſand Men, with Inſtructions to fight, if Occaſion ſerv'd, but Charles himſelf was not permitted to hazard his Perſon. Not far from the Town of Vernevil, which the Engliſh had taken before Alenſon and his Charolines could relieve it, the two Armies drew up in Battalia. The Fight began with Arrows and Darts, which being not quick enough to diſpatch the Work, the eager Combatants proceeded to Hand-Blows, where for ſome Hours they maintain'd a conſtant and doubtful Conflict with prodigious Fury. The Engliſh enur'd to the French Wars, having born the firſt and fierceſt Attacks of their Enemies, by an uniform Courage intirely broke them and put them to flight; and the Regent himſelf with his Battel-Ax did Wonders, and won immortal Honour in the bloody Conteſt. In this Battel, which was fought on the eighteenth of Auguſt, were ſlain on the French Side five Earls, two Viſcounts, twenty Barons, and above ſeven thouſand Soldiers, beſides two thouſand ſeven hundred

After which, the Regent return'd to Paris, and the Earl of Salisbury with ten thouſand Men took the ſtrong City of Mans, the Town of St. Suſan, the Fort of St. Bernard, and other Places; from whence, marching into Anjou, he there perform'd ſuch Heroick Acts, that his very Name grew terrible to all France. The News of theſe Tranſactions arriving in England caus'd great Rejoicings among the People, both for the Victory in the open Field, and the gaining of ſo many conſiderable Places; for which general Proceſſions and publick Thankſgivings were appointed.

Holling. &c. In England, during theſe proſperous Proceedings, James the Firſt King of Scotland, whoſe Ranſom had been ſetled in the late Reign, was now fully ſet at Liberty: But before his Departure out of the Kingdom he did Homage to young King Henry in Windſor Caſtle in the Preſence of many of the Nobility and Gentry in theſe Words, I James Stuart, King of the Scots, will be true and faithful to you Lord Henry, King of England and France, the Superior Lord of Scotland, and to you I make my Fidelity for the ſaid Kingdom, which I hold and claim of you, and will do you Service for the ſame, ſo help me God, and theſe Holy Evangeliſts. But notwithſtanding this ſolemn Oath, and the many munificent Preſents that were made to him, he did not long continue in the Engliſh Intereſt, but afterwards became as firm to the French as any of his Predeceſſors. After Eaſter, in the Third Year of this Reign, by the Advice of the Peers, the young King call'd a Parliament; and going to the Houſe himſelf, he was convey'd through the City upon a noble Courſer, in extraordinary Triumph, the People thronging the Streets to behold the Child, whom they judg'd to have the lively Features and Countenance of his glorious Father, and likely to ſucceed him in all mighty Qualifications and Abilities, as well as Kingdoms and Dominions. During this Seaſon, Edmund Mortimer the laſt Earl of Marche of that Name, and neareſt Heir to the Crown of England, deceas'd without Iſſue, and his great Patrimony deſcended to Richard Plantagenet Earl of Cambridge, Son and Heir to the ſame Earl of Cambridge that was beheaded in the Beginning of the laſt Reign. Ibid. In the mean Time the Amity and Alliance with the Duke of Burgundy, which the Engliſh had found ſo advantagious in their Conqueſts, having otherwiſe receiv'd ſome ſlight Flaws, was now in danger of being utterly broken upon this Occaſion. Humphry Duke of Gloceſter, Protector of England, following Advices unworthy of his Perſon and Station, contracted himſelf with the Lady Jaqueline of Bavaria, Inheritrix of Holland, Zealand, Hainault, and of many other fair Dominions in the Netherlands, notwithſtanding that the Duke of Brabant her Husband was then living, and that the Suit of Divorce commenc'd by Jaqueline was ſtill depending between them. The Duke of Burgundy in this Affair join'd with Brabant; which ſoon rais'd the Indignation of the Duke of Gloceſter, who not being us'd to meet with Oppoſition, went over in Perſon with an Army to take Poſſeſſion of Hainault in Right of his ſuppos'd Wife; but finding himſelf diſappointed by the Succours which Burgundy ſent to the Duke of Brabant, he proceeded to challenge the former in Combate; and to call him Traitor. This was accepted, but by the Duke of Bedford's Mediation the Challenge fell, and the Matter was accommodated; ſo that that the Duke of Gloceſter, without performing any Thing for which he came, left his Lady at her Town of Mons, and return'd into England. Here Mezeray is of Opinion that if this unſeaſonable Conteſt had not happen'd, the reſt of France at this Time

Time had undoubtedly been ſubdu'd. Not long after the Duke of Gloceſter's Return, the firſt Marriage which had been made and conſummated between the Duke of Brabant and the ſaid Lady Jaqueline, was pronounc'd lawful and valid by Pope Martin the Fifth. Whereupon the Duke of Gloceſter, having ſuſtain'd many Loſſes both of Friends and Treaſure, in Puniſhment of his Crime of taking another Man's Wife, ſhortly after marry'd Eleanor, Daughter to the Lord Cobham of Sterborough; by which he is ſaid to have made her Compenſation for that unlawful Familiarity that had formerly paſs'd between them.

A. D. 1425. Reg. 3. 4.

A Diſpute between the Duke of Gloceſter and Biſhop of Wincheſter.

II. By this Time the Court of England began to diſcover the uſual Effects of an Infant's ſitting upon the Throne, by the dangerous Emulation of the two principal Men in the Nation, the Duke of Gloceſter and his Uncle the Biſhop of Wincheſter, the one Protector of the Kingdom, and the other a Tutor to the King. Whether it was that the former hated the Riches and pompous Living of the latter, or that the latter envy'd the great Authority of the former; it is certain that the Engliſh Court, the City of London, and the whole Kingdom was diſturb'd by this unhappy Contention: Alterations not to be wonder'd at; for as Thunder foreruns a Storm, ſo King Henry's Misfortunes were not to fall out without a Precedency of many Diſorders, which tho' ſeparately conſider'd were of no great Moment, yet being join'd were ſuch as at length caus'd his Ruin. The News of theſe Domeſtick Diſturbances oblig'd the great Duke of Bedford to return from France, tho' the State of that Realm ſufficiently requir'd his Preſence. For the Duke of Bretaign, notwithſtanding his late Renovation of the League with the Regent, growing jealous of the Engliſh Greatneſs, ſuddenly turn'd to Charles's Party; and with him the Earl of Richemont his Brother. This gave freſh Life to the declining Prince, who made Richemont Conſtable of his Part of France, in the Room of the Earl of Douglaſs ſlain in the Battel of Vernevil; and he to ſhow his Gratitude gather'd about twenty thouſand Men, and ſuddenly inveſted St. Jean, a Town in Normandy, upon the Frontiers of Bretaign, which the Duke of Somerſet, Governor of Normandy had lately fortify'd and repleniſh'd with Soldiers. This unexpected Approach of the French at firſt much perplex'd the Engliſh; but upon better Conſideration, they valiantly ſally'd upon them, both on the Front and the Rear, which ſtruck ſuch a Terror into them, that with the Loſs of their Artillery, and many of their Men, they abandon'd the Siege. To redeem which Diſhonour Richemont turn'd his Fury againſt the Country of Anjou, pillaging and depopulating many Places. The Regent having reſolv'd to return into England, left behind him the valiant Beauchamp Earl of Warwick for his Lieutenant, who was lately arriv'd in France with ſix thouſand freſh Soldiers. Having enter'd the City of London, the Duke was magnificently receiv'd by the Citizens, and preſented with two Silver Baſons gilt, and a thouſand Marks in Mony, as an Inſtance of their Eſteem and Gratitude.

Hollingſ. Pol. Virg. &c.

To reconcile which the Duke of Bedford returns into England.

The happy Preſence of the Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, was highly uſeful to the State of England. For the Wiſdom and Authority of ſo great a Prince, eldeſt Uncle to the King, and one whom many Actions had render'd famous, ſoon allay'd the Diſtemper which he found at his Arrival. It was a Work worthy of his Labour, and he found it a Work not eaſie no be effected by a Labour and Power leſs than his own. The Differences were debated firſt at St. Albans, then at Northampton, and laſtly in a Parliament at Leiceſter, which continu'd there 'till towards the End of June. The Duke of Bedford himſelf, to avoid all Marks of Partiality to his Brother of Gloceſter, here would not intermeddle otherwiſe than in general Words to incourage Amity, but had the whole Cauſe referr'd to the moſt conſiderable Men in the Nation, both for Birth and Wiſdom. By the prudent Endeavours of theſe all their Differences, Grievances and Accuſations were equally thruſt into one Bag, to be ſeal'd up by Oblivion for ever; and without Mention of Compenſations on either Side, the the Duke ſwore by his Princehood, and the Biſhop by his Prieſthood, truly to obſerve the Award, and were for that time fully reconcil'd. This pious and neceſſary Work of private Reconciliation was ſucceeded by ſeveral Acts of Feſtivity and Honour. For in the ſame Town of Leiceſter, the young King, not then five Years of Age, was at the high Feaſt of Whitſuntide ſolemnly knighted by his Uncle the Regent of France. Immediately after the King honour'd Richard Earl of Cambridge, Heir to the late Earl of Marche, with the ſame Order of Knighthood, and about forty more with him. This Earl of Cambridge was at this Parliament, by a fatal Error, not only reſtor'd to his Blood, tainted by his Father, but likewiſe created Duke of York; and he was the Perſon that afterwards caus'd the Extirpation of the Male Lines, both of his own and the Houſe of Lancaſter. And it was more than probable that he would never have made ſuch a bold Attempt, had he not been promoted to this Honour, and to other Dignities and Places of Truſt, that gave him Opportunity to effect his Purpoſes. But Providence governs Affairs here below by Means contrary to ſecular Reaſon; for while Men weakly imagine that good Turns will extinguiſh the Memory of paſt Offences, Examples manifeſt how often they have been ſuperſeded by Intereſt, Humour and Ambition.

Pol Virg. Mexray. Now the triple Cord began to be untwiſted, and one of the great Supporters of the King's Infancy, the Duke of Exeter departed this Life; a Man of no ſmall Wiſdom and Abilities, who having no Sons, made the King his Heir, tho' beſides the Biſhop of Wincheſter his Brother, and the Counteſs of Weſtmorland his Siſter, he had many Nephews. To ſupply his Room, Beauchamp Earl of Warwick was conſtituted Guardian and Tutor to the young King. But he did not immediately return into England, for being Lieutenant to the Duke of Bedford in France, he continu'd there for ſome Time, and perform'd many noble Actions. He enter'd into the Country of Main and took the Town of Chaſteau de Loire, and after that the Caſtles of Maiet and Lude, in all which he put Garriſons and Engliſh Governors. Here he was inform'd that the French were gather'd together in the Country of Beaux, upon which he haſten'd to have given them Battel, but they underſtanding his Deſign, fled at the Terror of his Name and Nation. The Earl in his Return won the Caſtle of Montdubleau, where leaving the valiant Lord Willoughby, he return'd to Paris. It would be endleſs to take Notice of all the Sieges, Skirmiſhes, and Enterprizes in theſe Wars both foreign and domeſtick. There was not a City or Borough in France without Garriſons; Forts and Caſtles were built in all convenient Places, upon Hills, Rivers, narrow Ways and open Fields; every Lord had his Soldiers, or rather his Bands of Robbers, who maintain'd themſelves by feeding upon the poor miſerable Country People. During theſe Calamities, Means were us'd by the Duke of Burgundy for the Freedom of the Duke of Alenſon, taken at the Battel of Vernevil; and now for the Sum of two hundred thouſand Crowns he was ſet at Liberty; but nothing could induce him to acknowledge King Henry's Title in France.

Holling. Pol. Virg. &c. The great Duke of Bedford having at length worthily eſtabliſh'd the Peace of England, took Shipping with his Lady, and landed at Calais; where the Biſhop of Wincheſter, who went over with him, receiv'd the Habit, Cap and Dignity of a Cardinal; which Promotion the late King, with a penetrating Eye ſeeing his boundleſs Ambition, had more than once defeated. But now the King being young, and the Regent his Friend, he obtain'd his Purpoſe to his great Profit, and the Impoveriſhment of the Spiritualities of England: For by a Legantine Bull, which he purchas'd from Rome, he gather'd ſo much Treaſure, that he gain'd the Name of the rich Cardinal of Wincheſter. With the Regent there went over a great Number of ſelect freſh Soldiers, under the Command of that renowned Lord Talbot, whoſe Victories, ſays Polydore, were ſo numerous, that his Name was not only formidable to the French, but famous throughout the World, even to this preſent Time. per and Fierceneſs, upon one Side of his broad Sword he had this Motto, Sum Talboti, and on the other this boiſterous Sentence, Pro vincere Inimicos meos. Not long after his Arrival, at Montarges, near Orleans, a Party of Engliſh receiv'd an Overthrow with the Loſs of about fifteen hundred Men; and in Bretaign the French ſuſtain'd great Damages from a Commander under the Duke of Somerſet. After which the Inhabitants of Mans in Maine had let in the French by Night, who barbarouſly maſſacred moſt of the Engliſh in the Place. William Earl of Suffolk, Governor of the Town, retiring with ſome Men into the Caſtle, ſent to the Lord Talbot for Succour. He immediately came, and his Men unexpectedly crying out St. George a Talbot! the French were ſuddenly reduc'd to the laſt Extremity, and moſt of the Soldiers put to the Sword. All the reſt were ſpar'd, only thirty Citizens and thirty five Prieſts and Religious were beheaded as Traitors, and the City remain'd in its former Condition; and it was hard to judge which of three Things were moſt commendable in Talbot, his Wiſdom, his Celerity, or his Valour.

He relieves the Earl of Suffolk.

A. D. 1428. Reg. 6/7.

Above a Year after the Earl of Warwick had been declar'd Governor to the King, he left France and return'd into England; and the Earl of Salisbury ſucceeded him in his Charge, who went over with five thouſand Soldiers. Conſulting with the Regent, he bethought himſelf of ſome Action that might anſwer the Greatneſs of his own Name, and the publick Occaſions; and the Siege of Orleans was by him propos'd in Council. The Credit of the Earl was a ſufficient Reaſon to convince them how practicable it was; and was accordingly furniſh'd with all competent Proviſions. The Inhabitants of Orleans, dreading the approaching Storm, with great Diligence provided for their Defence; and the Suburbs, as large as ſome Cities, were levell'd to the Ground, that the Enemy might not annoy them from thence; and they wanted not Men, Victuals, Ammunition and a conſtant Reſolution to fight. The Earl of Salisbury, the Lord Talbot, and a formidable Force under expert Commanders, in a ſhort Time preſented themſelves before this large and beautiful City. No Enemies appearing abroad, the Earl approach'd near to the Walls; and finding Attacks fruitleſs, he intrench'd about the City, and to ſecure his Camp, he caſt up Ramparts and other Works of Defence. He ſeiz'd upon the Fort which ſtood at the Bridge Foot beyond the River Loire, and ſurrounded the Beſieged on every ſide, ſo that Charles of France could ſend no ſufficient Relief to them. When Human Helps fail, God often interpoſes his Hand, which is generally moſt conſpicuous in the Deliverance of Nations. The City was now reduc'd to the laſt Diſtreſs, the Siege having laſted ſixty Days, not without great Bloodſhed on both Sides. The valiant Earl of Salisbury, impatient of ſuch Delay, propos'd to give a general Aſſault; and the better to conſider of the Manner of it, he ſtood to take a View at a Window, barr'd with Iron, which over-look'd the City towards the Eaſt. Here Providence began to ſhew it ſelf againſt the Engliſh Affairs; for a Cannon Bullet levell'd by a Boy againſt the Window, ſtruck the Iron Grates, ſo that the Splinters ſo wounded the Earl, and one Sir Thomas Gargrave, that they both dy'd within a few Days. Here our Authors tell us That ſoon after this Man's Death the Fortune of War chang'd; and now both mortal and immortal Powers began to look favourably on the declining State of France. This to the Engliſh was ſaid to be the Beginning of Misfortunes, for after this by ſeveral backward Steps they loſt all their Poſſeſſions in that Kingdom; and tho' they ſometimes gain'd after that, yet they uſually loſt three Times as much. For which Reaſon Polydore, after many Encomiums upon the Earl, calls him the Man in whom the Safety of the Engliſh State conſiſted.

At length the City offer'd to ſurrender, but not to the Engliſh; the Beſieg'd were content that the Duke of Burgundy ſhould have the Honour: A ſubtle Artifice to break the Alliance between the Engliſh and him. The Regent and his Council being ſent to, they concluded it unreaſonable, ſince the Engliſh had been at all the Labour and Charge. The Duke of Burgundy ſecretly reſented this Refuſal, which ever after pall'd his Reliſh to the Engliſh Friendſhip: Yet the Regent's Anſwer was juſt and honeſt, That the War was made in King Henry's Name, therefore Orleans ought to be his.

Serres. Pol. Virg. Monstrel. &c.

In theſe Difficulties were the French Affairs involv'd: But while Charles of France grew more ſenſible of the miſerable Straits of his beloved City, and ignorant how to remedy ſo near a Misfortune; at Chenon a young Virgin of eighteen Years of Age preſented her ſelf to him, call'd Joan of Lorrain, Daughter to James of Arck, dwelling in Damremy upon the Meauſe, an ordinary Shepherdeſs, who bad him not to faint, conſtantly affirming That God had ſent her to deliver the Realm of France from the Engliſh Yoke, and reſtore him to all his Dominions. She was not immediately credited; but when the Wiſeſt of Eccleſiaſticks and military Men had put many Queſtions to her, and ſhe ſtill continu'd to her firſt Words, uttering nothing but what was modeſt, chaſt and holy, Honour and Belief was at length given to her Sayings. Upon which Joan arm'd her ſelf like a Man, and requir'd to have that Sword which hung in St. Catharine's Church of Fierebois in Tourain; which Demand encreas'd their Admiration of her, ſince ſuch a Sword was found among the old Donaries or Votive Tokens of that Church. Thus warlikely accouter'd ſhe rod immediately to Blois, where Forces and freſh Proviſions lay for the Relief of Orleans; with which ſhe and the Admiral and Marſhal of France ſafely enter'd. This highly incourag'd the declining French; and Joan the Maid of God, as ſhe was now call'd, wrot this peculiar Letter to the Earl of Suffolk then lying before the Town. King of England, *do Juſtice to the King of Heav'n, in his Blood Royal; deliver up to the Virgin the Keys of all the good Cities you have forc'd. In Memory of this extraordinary Deliverance the A Monument erected to her Memory. City of Orleans erected a Monument, where Charles the Seventh King of France and Joan the martial Maid were repreſented, kneeling in Armour, elevating their Eyes and Hands to Heav'n, in Token of their Thanks and Acknowledgment.

Now there was an interchangeable Taking and Recovering of Towns, and Places of Importance on both Sides. The Caſtle of Galiard was ſurrender'd to the French upon Compoſition, where in a grated Chamber they found the valiBarbaſon's Fidelity. ant Lord Barbaſon, who having ſworn to be a true Priſoner, could not be induc'd to come out of that Place, 'till Captain Kingſton, to whom he had given that Oath, was upon ſafe Conduct recall'd to acquit him, which was accordingly done: A rare Example of Conſtancy in him, conſidering how little Regard the reſt of the Nation at that Time had to Oaths. The Lord Talbot took Laval, and the Earl of Suffolk threw himſelf into Jergeaux. To which laſt Place the Duke of Alenſon with Joan and other great Commanders march'd, and forc'd it by Storm. Sir Alexander Pool Brother to the Earl of Suffolk was ſlain, with many others in the Encounter, and the Earl himſelf was taken Priſoner. After the Duke of Alenſon had added ſome other Places to his Conqueſts, his Numbers were augmented by the Conjunction of the Conſtable of France, the Earl of Vandome, the Lord Dalbret and others; ſo that now their whole Army conſiſted of about twenty three thouſand effective Men. With theſe they ſuddenly attack'd the valiant Lord Talbot, who had not above a fifth Part of their Number, at a Village call'd Patay, whom they charg'd ſo unexpectedly, that his Archers had no Time to fortifie their Stations after their uſual Manner, by Paliſadoes or Empalement of Stakes, ſo that they were driven The Engliſh worſted at Patay. to uncommon Difficulties. After three Hours brave Reſiſtance, the Engliſh were put to the worſt; and the Lord Scales, the Lord Hungerford, Sir Thomas Rampſtone, and even the Lord Talbot himſelf, after a great Wound in the Back, were taken Priſoners. The Footmen forc'd to truſt to their Swords, under the Shelter of ſuch Horſemen as remain'd, retreated in good Order, and got to a Place of Safety, after they had loſt about twelve hundred Men, and the French about half that Number. This Blow ſhook the very Foundation of the Engliſh Greatneſs in France, and awak'd Multitudes, even of thoſe who had before ſworn Fealty to King Henry; and now having a Colour of Divine Warrant for violating their Oaths, they readily join'd with the Victors for Recovering of the common Liberty. There ſucceeded an immediate Revolt of ſeveral Towns; and it was not long before Charles himſelf iſſu'd out in Arms, and recover'd the City of Rheims in Champaign; where, according to the Charles crowned at Rheims. Maid's Direction, he was ſolemnly crown'd King of France. Hitherto ſhe might plauſibly be thought prophetical and fortunate; and it ſeem'd that the chief Part of her Imployment was accompliſh'd, yet ſhe flouriſh'd for ſome Space longer.

The Duke of Bedford to prop the declining State of the Engliſh, upon the Ibid. unfortunate News of the Relief of Orleans, and Captivity of Talbot, gather'd his whole Forces together, which amounted to about ten thouſand Engliſh, be*The Regent prepares againſt him.* ſides certain Auxiliaries of Normans. With theſe he march'd out of Paris, and bravely oppos'd himſelf againſt the Current of Charles's new Proſpects, who now deſign'd to have attempted that Capital City; being incourag'd by ſome of the the Citizens who held ſtrict and ſecret Correſpondence with him. But this Prince, knowing the Regent's Valour and Reſolution, ſuſpended the Execution of his Deſign, as yet having no Hopes to effect it; and being by Joan diſſuaded from Fighting, the Regent return'd to Paris. Shortly after Compeign and Beauvois voluntarily ſubmitted to the new crown'd King. The Regent having ſetled the State and Garriſons of the chief City, paſs'd into Normandy, to provide for a ſafe Retreat there, if the Engliſh ſhould be conſtrain'd to quit their other Holds and Dominions; of which he began to be apprehenſive, becauſe he had Information of many ſecret Endeavours to win the Burgundians from King Henry's Side. While the Regent was abſent upon this Occaſion, Charles gain'd the Town of St. Denis, not far from Paris, but held it not long in Poſſeſſion. From whence he ſent the Duke of Alenſon with the Maid of France, to try their Friends and Fortunes at Paris. Here they found none of their expected Succeſs; for the Engliſh gave them ſo rough an Entertainment, that Joan her ſelf was wounded, and the reſt with great Slaughter repell'd. The Regent hearing of theſe Attempts, entruſted the Coaſt Towns of Normandy to the Care of the Duke of York, and Roan the Capital City to the Duke of Somerſet, and haſten'd to Paris, where he highly commended the Soldiers and Citizens for not imitating the Diſloyalty of their Neighbours.

Pol. Virg. Holling. &c. New Supplies arriving out of England, the next Enterprize was to reduce Compeign to Obedience; to effect which John of Luxemburg with the Burgundians and ſome Engliſh Soldiers inveſted it. Here all the Glory of Joan the Maid of France came to a Period; for coming to relieve the Place, ſhe ſucceſsfully enter'd; but afterwards ſallying out, her Troops were beaten, and her ſelf, as ſome ſay betray'd, taken Priſoner by the ſaid Burgundian Knight, who for the Value of her Ranſom, which was ten thouſand Pounds Tournoys, and three hundred Crowns annual Rent, deliver'd her into the Hands of the Engliſh. Notwithſtanding the Siege was rais'd; after which they ſent Joan to the City of Roan, where about nine or ten Months after ſhe was burnt alive. The Roman Cloelia was ſav'd by Porſenna; and it is not to be doubted but that the Magnanimity of the Engliſh would have ſpar'd her, had they not found it neceſſary to deface the Opinion which the French to the higheſt Superſtition had entertain'd of her. The Engliſh Writers ſhow, how the Courſe of her Life being legally examin'd by the Biſhop of Beauvois, in whoſe Dioceſs ſhe was taken, and ſhe being for Sorcery, Bloodſhed, and unnatural Uſe of Maſculine Habiliments, condemn'd to die, was notwithſtanding, upon her ſolemn abjuring all her lewd Practices, pardon'd her Life, 'till again convicted of a perjurious Relapſe, tho' acknowledging her ſelf a Strumpet, and feigning her ſelf with Child, ſhe deſervedly met with that Puniſhment which ſhe thought to have deferr'd. Many of the French Writers ſhow the higheſt Value for her Memory; and Mezeray ſays, that being on the Pile for Execution ſhe foretold the Engliſh, That the Hand of God was ready to ſtrike them, and that his Juſtice would not only drive them out of France, but purſue them into England, and make them ſuffer the ſame Miſeries and Calamities they had inflicted on the French. However this is certain, that ſhe was one of extraordinary Valour and Spirit, and the main Reſtorer of the Kingdom of France, and if ſhe did not drive the Engliſh from thence, as ſhe her ſelf boaſted, ſhe was the chief, or at leaſt one of the chief Human Cauſes why the Engliſh loſt France.

Pol. Virg. Æmilius Holling. &c. The Engliſh Affairs ſtill more and more declin'd; but to remedy theſe Misfortunes, it was by the wiſeſt thought neceſſary for young King Henry to come over and be crown'd in Paris. He had the laſt Year with great Solemnity receiv'd the Crown of England at Weſtminſter, being then about nine Years of Age, and ready to receive all Impreſſions either of Good or Bad. This Year reſolving for France, before his Departure, Richard Duke of York was by a particular Patent made High-Conſtable of England during Life; which gave him a more ſenſible Taſte of Greatneſs, and ſecretly whetted his ambitious Appetite.

petite. The Affairs of England being ſetled, and new Supplies of Mony granted by Parliament, the young King with a Noble Retinue took Shipping at Dover, and landed at Calais; from whence, after ſome Continuance, he remov'd to Roan, where he was receiv'd with all the Marks of Joy and Triumph. In the Month of November he departed from Roan in Order to make a publick Entry into the City of Paris; all which was magnificently perform'd in the Company of the two great Cardinals of Wincheſter and York, and the chief Princes of the Blood, Dukes, Earls, Barons, Prelates, the Flower of the Engliſh, French, Burgundians and Normans, with a ſelect Body of three thouſand Men for the Guard of his Perſon. It would be tedious to mention with what Honour and Pomp he was receiv'd into this glorious City, and what Pageants, Ornaments and Entertainments were prepar'd to render the Thing more ſolemn and triumphant. On the ſeventh Day of December he was publickly crown'd King of France in the grand Cathedral at Paris by his great Uncle the Cardinal of Wincheſter; and in his Return to the Palace he had one Crown on his Head, and another born before him; as likewiſe one Scepter in his Hand, and a ſecond carry'd before him; implying that he was King of two ſeveral Kingdoms. The Duke of Bedford entertain'd the great Aſſembly with a ſet Speech, in which he declar'd King Henry his Nephew's undoubted Title to the Crown on his Head, and recommended the ſame to their Fidelities, adding large Promiſes both of Honour and Advantages. Such of the French Nobility as were then preſent did their Homage; the People had obliging and gracious Words given them, and Quantities of Mony, Corn and Wine by way of Donative liberally beſtow'd amongſt them; and Proclamations made that all Frenchmen who came in by a fix'd Day, ſhould be protected.

King Henry goes into France.

He is crown'd King at Paris.

This great and ſplendid Feaſt did not paſs without ſome Diſpleaſure among the Engliſh Nobility; for the Cardinal of Wincheſter, who at this Time would ſuffer no Equal, commanded the Duke of Bedford to lay aſide the Name of Regent, during the King's Preſence, alledging, that while he was there in Perſon, the Power of a Subſtitute was at an end. The Duke of Bedford took ſuch a ſecret Diſpleaſure at this haughty Proceeding, that he never after favour'd the Cardinal, but oppos'd him in all his Actions; and this was the Root, as ſome think, of that Diviſion among the Engliſh Nobility, where their Glory in the Realm of France began firſt to decline. After five Days Continuance in Paris from the Coronation, which were ſpent in publick Tournaments and the moſt ſplendid Entertainment, the King was adviſ'd to leave the Air of Paris and remove to Roan, where he kept his Chriſtmaſs. Still Charles of France eſteem'd himſelf no leſs a King, but daily purſu'd his Affairs; and his Men took the City of Chartres by Stratagem, and put the Biſhop of the Place and others to the Sword. Nor were the Engliſh unemploy'd; for the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Arundel, Warwick and Suffolk, ſoon made up the Loſs with much Advantage; which was increas'd by the Deliverance of the valiant Lord Talbot, who by vertue of an Exchange was now ſet free. It was obſervable among Foreigners, and not without Admiration, that the ſmall and diſtant Country of England, under the Government of an Infant, ſhould ſo long, and ſo ſucceſsfully contend with ſuch a potent and populous Kingdom as France. But at that Time ſuch was the Valour and Martial Vigour of the Engliſh Nation, that they ſcarce knew any Medium between Death and Victory; always preferring an honourable End before a lingring Servitude. This mov'd Pope Eugenius, and all the Chriſtian Princes, ſo often to make Overtures of Accommodation between theſe two contending Kingdoms, but 'till this Year could effect nothing, but a very imperfect Truce for ſix Years. Which being agreed upon, King Henry took his laſt Farewel of France, and landing at Dover, upon the twenty firſt Day of February he was triumphantly receiv'd at London.

III. Young

Stow. Holling. Serres.

III. Young King Henry being ſafely return'd from his Foreign Kingdom of France, his Uncle the Duke of Gloceſter gave a very faithful Account of his Government in England; of which, the Suppreſſion of an Inſurrection at Abbington in Oxfordſhire was not the leaſt Service. A Weaver, the Bailiff of the Town, was the corrupt Head to which all the Contagion gather'd; who changing his Name, call'd himſelf Jack Sharp of Wigmore's Land in Wales. One of his main Deſigns was to have maſſacred Prieſts, whoſe Heads he ſaid he would make as cheap as Sheeps Heads; for which he deſervedly loſt his own, and had his four Quarters hung upon Stakes. However his Pretenſions were, the mentioning of Wigmore's Lands, the ancient Inheritance of Earl Mortimer, and now in Poſſeſſion of the fatal Duke of York who from thence challeng'd the Crown of England, did inſinuate and ſignifie ſomething further. It is to be wonder'd the Council of State under King Henry, hearing that Title ſo often glanc'd at, provided no better againſt the Miſchief; but the Eyes and Hearts of the wiſeſt are blind, when God reſerves a ſecret Scourge, or deſigns to hide that Fire which ſhall afterwards conſume a Nation. Unquiet Humours were now abroad as well as at home; for the Soldiers of Calais, diſſatisfy'd with their Wages, began to be very mutinous and troubleſome. But the Regent going there in Perſon, ſoon put an end to the Tumult by beheading four of the Ringleaders, and caſhiering and baniſhing a hundred and ten of the reſt, as had been formerly done to ſix-ſcore others. Theſe were inconſiderable Affairs; but the Loſs of France began to be more conſpicuous, and it is worthy to obſerve the Steps that Providence ſeems to have us'd in depriving England of that Kingdom. In the Regent's Journey, King Henry's Intereſt was apparently depreſs'd; for being a Widower, and arriving at Turwin, without the Duke of Burgundy's Privacy, he marry'd the Lady Jaquet, about Seventeen Years of Age, Daughter to Peter of Luxemburg Earl of St. Paul, no Friend to the Duke. The Match was injurious to the Engliſh Affairs; for Anne, the Regent's former Wife, Siſter to the Duke of Burgundy, a ſtrong Ligament of Amity between them, weaken'd the ſame by her Death; and this ſecond Marriage, unpleaſing to the Duke, did ſtill more and more diminiſh it.

A Diſturbance in England.

Steps towards the Loſs of France.

Villet. Æmilius Pol. Virg.

Still the Accidents of War between the Engliſh and French were numerous and various, ſometimes the one, and ſometimes the other, getting and loſing, as Opportunities ſerv'd; which Uncertainties produc'd the ordinary Effects of inteſtine Convulſions, great Outrages, an unreſtrain'd Licentiouſneſs, and a Scarcity of Neceſſaries for Human Life. It would be both tedious and endleſs to recount the particular leſſer Actions, and almoſt impoſſible to deſcribe all the Sieges, Surprizes, Skirmiſhes, and the like, being ſo confus'dly related by Authors. Yet the Fortune of Reyner Duke of Anjou and Barre, is not to be omitted, becauſe King Henry afterwards unhappily marry'd into his Family. His Wife was Iſabel, Daughter and Heireſs to Charles Duke of Lorrain, upon whoſe Death Reyner expected to ſucceed him in all his Dominions; but the Earl of Vallemont, Brother to Duke Charles, preſuming he had a nearer Title, drove the Matter to be decided by War. Charles King of France was a ſteady Supporter of Reyner's Claim, in Conſideration of the like Services done to him in Times of the greateſt Difficulty; and the Regent and Duke of Burgundy eſpous'd the Cauſe of the Earl. The Aſſiſtance of the latter prevail'd ſo far, that Reyner's Troops were beaten from the Siege of Vallemont, with the Loſs of three thouſand Men, and himſelf with two hundred others remain'd Priſoners to the Duke of Burgundy, one of whoſe Subjects commanded in chief in that Enterprize. The King of France might ſeem to have ſuſtain'd a mighty Loſs by the Captivity of the Duke; but the Engliſh gain'd no Advantage by it; for his Perſuaſions, and private Services on the behalf of King Charles, did not a little prepare the Duke of Burgundy's Heart in due Time to receive Impreſſions of Reconciliation. The French who liv'd under the Regency, or were in in danger of the Engliſh Power, made Choice of the Duke of Burgundy to protect them, from which they could not be fairly debarr'd, becauſe as yet he appear'd to be King Henry's Friend. Indeed this Scene and unfix'd State of Affairs was full of Horror and Confuſion, which Polydore deſcribes after this manner. While the Engliſh and the French contend for Dominion, Soveraignty and Life it ſelf, Mens Goods were violently taken by the Licentiouſneſs of War, Churches robb'd, People in all Places murder'd, wounded or tortur'd; Matrons abus'd, Virgins torn from their Parent's Arms to be raviſh'd, Towns daily taken, daily plunder'd, daily defac'd, the Riches of the Inhabitants us'd at the Conqueror's Pleaſure; Houſes and Villages on all Sides flaming with Fire; no Kinds of Cruelty unpractis'd upon the miſerable French; omitting innumerable other Calamities, which all at once oppreſs'd them. Add to this, that the whole Republick, being deſtitute of the Benefit of Laws, which for the moſt part are ſilent in Times of War and Mutiny, floated up and down without any Anchorage of Right or Juſtice. Nor was England her ſelf free from theſe Calamities, who every Day heard the News of her valiant Childrens Funerals ſlain in perpetual Skirmiſhes and Encounters, and found her general Wealth continually ebbing and decreaſing; ſo that the Evils ſeem'd almoſt equal, and the whole Weſtern World eccho'd the Groans and Cries of either Nations Quarrels, as being the common Foundation of Diſcourſe and Compaſſion throughout Chriſtendom.

The Miſeries of France.

A. D. 1434. Reg. 12/13.

The Methods at this Time us'd by the Engliſh did only faintly keep alive the general State of the Regency in France, without putting a Period to the War, either by finiſhing the Conqueſt, or eſtabliſhing what was gain'd. Some Perſons urg'd to have large Supplies of Men and Mony to be levy'd, that King Charles might have no Reſt in any Place; of which Opinion was the Regent himſelf, with the two Dukes of York and Somerſet. This Counſel was not follow'd, but others in Appearance more frugal, which ſtill fed the Evils, but redreſs'd none; which ſhew'd that preſent Sparings often draw after them infinite Waſtes, and that no Husbandry is ſo pernicious as unſeaſonable Parſimony. In the mean Time, the Earl of Arundel and Lord Talbot rang'd about with victorious Forces, terrifying Anjou, Main, and other Parts, with their ſeveral Succeſſes. In Normandy, nevertheleſs the common People gather'd together in great and dreadful Multitudes; of whom were ſixty thouſand rebelliouſly combining in Vex in Normandy, and twenty thouſand in Caux. Their Deſign and Pretenſions were to drive out all the Engliſh Officers, and to have favour'd King Charles's Intereſt; but what are a Multitude without Advice or Conduct? To ſtop their Inſolency, and the Progreſs they made towards Caen, the Earl of Arundel with Robert Lord Willoughby, with thirteen hundred light Horſe, and ſix thouſand Archers, march'd againſt them, by the Direction of the Dukes of York and Somerſet, who had the chief Lieutenancies in Normandy. The Earl laid in Ambuſcade with two Parts of his Men, while the Lord Willoughby drew the Rebels into it with a third. The Conſequence was that a thouſand of them were cut in pieces, before the Soldier's Hands could be ſtopp'd to ſpare the reſt, who baſely threw down their Arms, and begg'd for Mercy. The Multitudes were permitted to return home, but the Ringleaders loſt their Lives by Execution; and all the World could gather from this popular Inſurrection was, That the Normans would gladly be freed from the Engliſh Government. Not long after, the Earl of Arundel, after ſeveral noble Actions perform'd during the Wars in France, receiv'd his Deaths Wound in a Skirmiſh at Gerberoy in Beauvoiſin, where La Hire, a famous French Commander, won the Day.

A. D. 1435. Reg. 13/14.

The Regency ſtill continu'd, and the Miſeries of France were no ways diminiſh'd; and nothing could put a Period to them while the Duke of Burgundy kept faithful to the Engliſh. Therefore to prepare Matter for a Separation between the Regent and the Duke, ſuch of the Nobility as went over to the latter inſinuated to him That King Charles had upon all Occaſions ſpoke honourably rably of him, and inwardly wiſht well to him; and that he never hear'd the Murder of his Father nam'd, but it caus'd him with Sighs and Proteſtations to declare his Innocence. Theſe and the like mollifying Allegations ſoon began to operate, when apply'd to the Mind of one whoſe Affections towards the Engliſh daily decreas'd, by means of ſeveral Jealouſies and Averſions; ſo that there wanted nothing but an outward honourable Occaſion to bring him intirely to the French Party. In the mean Time, to put an End to the general Calamity, the Deputies of the Grand Council urg'd the French, Engliſh and Burgundians to come to a Treaty; and the City of Arras was appointed for that Purpoſe. From the Pope and Council of Piſa came the Cardinals of St. Craſſe and Cyprus, with twelve Biſhops: For the King of France were the Duke of Bourbon, the Earl of Richemont, the Arch-Biſhop of Rheims, and many other great and learned Men: For the King of England were the two Cardinals of York and Wincheſter, the Earls of Suffolk and Huntington, the Lord Hungerford, and ſeveral Doctors of Divinity: For the Duke of Burgundy were the Duke of Guelders, the Earl of Naſſau, and ſuch a Number of other Noblemen as were ſufficient to ſhew that tho' in Title he was but a Duke, yet in Greatneſs he was equal to a King. Mezeray ſays that this was the greateſt and nobleſt Aſſembly that had been known to this Age, where all the Princes of Chriſtendom had their Ambaſſadors; and the Harbingers took up Stabling for ten thouſand Horſes. But notwithſtanding all this Care, it prov'd ineffectual; for the Engliſh being in Poſſeſſion ſtrenuouſly urg'd the Right of Deſcent, and the Act of the late King Charles the Sixth, by which the Crown of France was ſetled upon Henry the Fifth, and the Iſſue of Catharine his Wife; and therefore they propos'd no other Conditions of Peace, but that Henry their King ſhould have all, and Charles to hold under him. The French offer'd intirely the two Dukedoms of Normandy and Gaſcony; and the Aſſembly broke up without any further Agreement. King Charles therefore reſolving to maim the Engliſh Faction upon any Terms, tho' never ſo mean, ſent the Duke of Burgundy a blank Paper, bidding him preſcribe his own Conditions and Demands; which he did: And his Conditions, ſays a French Author, were ſo numerous as to fill a Volume, and ſo unreaſonable, that it was amazing that ſo great a Monarch ſhould ſtoop ſo much to his Subject and Vaſſal. But Neceſſity urging, they both join'd upon the twenty fourth Day of September; and the Duke, tranſported by Profit, declar'd himſelf an Enemy to all Oppoſers of King Charles, after he had caus'd the Deaths of three hundred thouſand Men in his Quarrel, beſides the Deſtruction of innumerable Cities and Towns.

The Treaty of Arras.

Æmilius. Pol. Virg. &c.

This may be ſaid to have been the firſt parting Blow which ſeparated the French Dominions from the Engliſh Soveraignty; and the Event declar'd, That the Engliſh had done more politickly, if they had accepted of Normandy and Gaſcony, but in thoſe Circumſtances they could not in Honour comply; and if Counſels were to be determin'd by the Event, the moſt fooliſh would ſometimes paſs for prudent. By this Conjunction King Henry loſt not only a powerful Alley, but was conſtrain'd to rely upon his own ſingle Strength, as well againſt King Charles his declar'd Enemy, as now againſt the Duke of Burgundy, who more than ſeem'd to have betray'd the Cauſe. To give a fair Colour to this Fact, the Duke diſpatch'd Ambaſſadors into England to King Henry, to give the Reaſons of his Treaty with King Charles, and to perſuade him to reſt ſatisfy'd with what had been tranſacted; which Embaſſy was ſo odious to the Engliſh, that they took the Liberty to call the Duke a Time-Server, a perjur'd Man, and a Traitor; and the popular Fury aroſe ſo high againſt the Duke's Subjects reſiding in London, that many of them were beaten and ſlain, before a Proclamation could put a Stop to it. The Ambaſſadors return'd with honeſt Admonitions to their Maſter, againſt which his Ears and his Senſes were irreſiſtably fortify'd; for King Charles had ſurrounded and loaded him with Royalties, Privileges, Honours, Mony, Cities, Towns, and indeed whole Provinces, that that were confirm'd to him, only to oblige him to abandon the Engliſh. His extraordinary Munificence ſoon made the Duke a true Frenchman; and tho' he paid ſo vaſtly dear for his Alliance, yet it was worth the Expence, for Æmilius tells us, That the Ceſſation of his Anger redeem'd the French from a Foreign Government, as his firſt Aſſuming of it made the Engliſh Lords over France. But however the Duke's Indignation for the Murder of his Father had mov'd him firſt to embrace the Engliſh Intereſt, he afterwards, by way of Compenſation, ſubtily converted his Revenge to the Enlargement of his own Riches and Power. After the Return of his Ambaſſadors, he ſent back all Contracts to the Duke of Bedford at Paris, and renounc'd the Alliance of England, declaring That every Man ſhould look to himſelf.

Upon this each Party made new and vigorous Preparations, in order to recover that by Force which they could not obtain by Reaſoning: But all Things manifeſtly favour'd the French Deſigns; for this was the general State of the Engliſh Affairs. King Henry was ſcarce out of his Childhood, and after that not Man enough to deal with ſuch turbulent Occurrences; the Princes of the Blood weakly united for the common Good; the Protector tho' vigilant over England, and the Regent careful for France, yet both privately envy'd; Richard Duke of York, encreaſing in Strength, but ambitiouſly reſerving himſelf for a ſelect Day; many of the great Engliſh Warriors ſlain; and in Sum, a declining Inability through the whole Body of the Engliſh Forces; which tho' otherwiſe they might have prolong'd the War, and kept their Footing, yet the Death of the mighty Regent doubled the Difficulty, or almoſt the Impoſſibility. In removing this triumphant Hero, God made it manifeſt that he accounted the Engliſh unworthy and unfit to continue their Empire any longer among the French. This Prince, not long after the Revolt of the Duke of Burgundy, dy'd in the City of Paris, after a fourteen Years Regency; uncertain to ſome whether out of Grief for the Evils he foreſaw, or of ſome other Diſtemper. How powerful this Prince was appears in ſome meaſure from his Titles, which were Regent of France, Duke of Bedford, Alenſon and Anjou, Earl of Maine, Richmond and Kendale, and High-Conſtable of England. And what exceeded his Greatneſs was his being one of the beſt Patriots and Generals that ever ſprung out of the Royal Stem of the Plantaganets. His Valour was not more formidable to the Enemy, than his Memory was honourable; for Lewis XI. the next King of France, being afterwards adviſ'd by certain envious Perſons to demoliſh his ſtately Tomb at Roan, in which was bury'd all the good Fortune of the Engliſh, he generouſly return'd this noble Anſwer. What Honour can it be to Us, or You, to deface this Monument, and to diſturb the Bones of him, who when living, neither my Father, nor your Progenitors with all their Power, were once able to repel? Who by his Strength, Policy and Conduct kept them all out of the principal Dominions of France, and out of this noble Dukedom of Normandy: Wherefore I ſay firſt, God ſave his Soul, and let his Body now lye at reſt; who when he was alive would have terrify'd the Proudeſt of us all: And as for his Tomb, I think it not ſo worthy or convenient, as his Honour and Acts deſerv'd. It is obſervable that none of the Sons of King Henry the Fourth did degenerate; a Thing not uſual in ſo large a Family: Henry the Fifth dy'd glorioufly in the Purſuit of his Conqueſts, the Duke of Clarence valiantly fighting, and tho' Bedford of a natural Death, and Gloceſter afterwards of a violent, yet they dy'd not with leſs Fame than the reſt. So as Nature having done her utmoſt in them, if ſhe fail'd in the preſent Henry, it is not to be admir'd; for having cloath'd him with the inner Garments of Piety, ſhe was ſparing in an upper Robe of other Virtues and Fortune.

The Death of the Duke of Bedford, Regent of France.

His Character.

A. D. 1436. Reg. 14/15. IV. The Regent of France being dead, the late Treaty between King Charles and the Duke of Burgundy ſoon produc'd Effects moſt dangerous to the Engliſh Cauſe; for many Towns immediately revolted, and Multitudes of the French, Æmilius Sprot. Fabian.

French, who through Fear had been reſtrain'd, falling away, all the Engliſh Dominions were fill'd with private Aſſemblies, Practices and Correſpondences with the Enemy. Such Engliſh as were then in France were not altogether idle, but yet, through a fatal Security or Negligence at home, they wanted Recruits to ſupport them. To ſupply the Vacancy of the great Duke of Bedford, Richard Duke of York, now a prevailing Favourite, was created Regent of France; and Edmund Duke of Somerſet, his perpetual Rival, ſtill continu'd Governor of Normandy. This latter violently oppos'd the Advancement of the former to this nice Station; wiſely foreſeeing more than the Protector and all the Council of England: Yet his Oppoſition was unſeaſonable and fruitleſs; for York's Carriage had won ſuch a Party about the King, that notwithſtanding the Diſadvantage of his latent Title, which alone was ſufficient to have excluded him from great Truſts in a politick Government, he prevail'd. But before he could arrive in France, the Capital City of Paris was loſt. Robert Lord Willoughby was then Governor for the Engliſh, who had not above two thouſand Soldiers with him; for in Caſe of Extremity, the Faith of the Citizens was preſum'd to ſupply all Defects againſt a common Reſiſtance. But on the contrary the Citizens, perceiving the Declenſion of the Engliſh, eſpecially after the Regent's Death, conſpired againſt them; and the Treaſon was carry'd on ſo ſubtlely by ſome of the principal Magiſtrates, who articled for a general Pardon from King Charles, that the Deſign took effect before it could be diſcover'd. The Lord Beaumont introduc'd the Loſs with his own Misfortune; for the Earl of Richmont, Conſtable of France, hovering about Paris, in hopes to recover the Place, the Lord Beaumont with ſome hundreds of Engliſh, falling in with him about St. Denis, were worſted. While the Rumour of this inconſiderable Defeat was freſh, and much aggravated, the French advanc'd their Banners up to the City Walls, upon which a Gate was immediately open'd to them by their Partiſans. And now the Citizens, who were lately Subjects, ſuddenly turn'd Enemies; and Women and Children attack'd the Engliſh from their Windows with all ſorts of miſſive Weapons, and many were beaten down and maſſacred in the Streets. The Lord Willoughby, Governor of the Place, with many others fled to St. Anthony's Gate and the Baſtile, Places which they had reſerv'd for Defence in Times of Neceſſity. Many more had been ſav'd in thoſe Places, but the perfidious Citizens drew Chains over the Streets, and ſtopp'd their Paſſage. At length thoſe in the Baſtile, after ſome Shew of Defence, demanded a Parly, and agreed to depart with their Lives and Baggage. They were conducted about the Town beneath the Louvre, to embark upon the River Sein, and ſo paſs to Roan; for they could not ſafely paſs through the City. The People being adviſ'd of this ran to the Walls, and with great Shouts baited the Engliſh like Dogs, whom lately they had fear'd and honour'd as their Maſters. Thus Paris return'd to its former Government, above ſixteen Years after the Duke of Clarence had plac'd a Garriſon there in behalf of his Brother Henry the Fifth.

The Engliſh Affairs decline in France.

The Duke of York made Regent.

Paris loſt from the Engliſh.

Paris was loſt in the worſt Time to march an Army, which was wiſely projected by the French, elſe their Deſign might have fail'd; for the Duke of York the new Regent, being hinder'd by the Badneſs of the Seaſon, arriv'd afterwards, accompany'd with the Earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, the Lord Falconbridge, and other worthy Perſons, and an Army of eight thouſand Men. But this Regent never did any good Service in France; tho' ſtill the Engliſh Affairs were not come to the laſt Extremity. In the late conquer'd Parts of France they held Normandy entire, but not without much Trouble; for the People again rebell'd in Caux, which Diſturbance was quell'd with a greater and more mercyleſs Deſtruction of the Authors and Actors, than the former. No leſs than five thouſand of them were cut in Pieces and trampled on by the juſt Fury of the Engliſh, under the Conduct of the Lord Scales, the Lord Hoo, and others; who burnt all their Habitations, made Booty of their Goods, and drove the whole Body of them out of the Country. The Lord Scales not long after defeated La Hire and his Men not far from Roan. The War was manag'd on all Sides without full or compleat Armies; Skirmiſhes were the ordinary Ways of Fighting; and the French were cautious in venturing all upon a pitch'd Battel.

The Duke of Burgundy as yet had not in Perſon given any Proof againſt the Engliſh of his Affection to King Charles; but now he ſet himſelf to an Enterprize worthy that Expectation, which was the Recovery of Calais; tho' he is believ'd to have been mov'd to this Action by a Deſire of private Revenge. For the Engliſh, upon his forſaking their Alliance, had endeavour'd to ſtir up the Inhabitants of Gaunt, and other Flemmiſh Towns ſubject to the Duke, to riſe in Rebellion; but the Opinion that King Henry's Fortunes in France were dangerouſly declining, made them unwilling to move. However the News of this ſucceſsleſs Attempt excited the Duke to a Revenge; and caus'd him to bring an Army of forty thouſand Men before Calais. The chief Commanders there for King Henry were the Lord Dudley, who had the Charge of the Caſtle, and Sir John Ratcliff of the Town. The Duke's Deſign was to have block'd up the Harbour by ſinking Ships loaden with Stones; but upon the Ebb-Tide the Caliſians eaſily remov'd thoſe Impediments. King Henry being inform'd of the Siege of this important Place, the Protector the Duke of Gloceſter was ſent over in Perſon with a powerful Fleet and Army, who bravely challeng'd the Duke of Burgundy to meet him in the open Field. Here Authors differ, yet they generally agree in this, That the Duke of Burgundy rais'd the Siege without any Battel. Some ſay that the very Rumor of the Protector's Approach drove him away, and that the Protector came the next Day after the Burgundians Flight; and others excuſe him by alledging that the Flemmings grew mutinous, and reſolv'd to return home. The Protector became Maſter of the Duke's Camp, and ſpent eleven Days in his Dominions, burning Poppering and Bell, and doing great Damages about Graveling, Boloign and other Places; then ſetling the Affairs of Calais, he return'd home with great Honour to his Charge in England. The Engliſh were thought to have created new Work for this active Duke in his own Dominions, where many great Tumults aroſe, in one of which his own Perſon was indanger'd at Bruges, where Liſle Adam the Captain of his Guard was ſlain. Hence it came perhaps that a Medium was found out, by Contracts made with Iſabel the Dutcheſs, his third Wife and an ingenious Woman, to hold a League with England, and yet make no Breach with France.

But in vain.

A. D. 1437. Reg. 15/16.

The following Year was memorable for the Death of three great Princeſſes, Catharine, Mother to the preſent King Henry, and Siſter to the King of France; the old Dowager of King Henry the Fourth, Daughter to the King of Navarre; and the old Counteſs of Armanack, Daughter to the Duke of Berry, and Mother to the Duke of Savoy; who all dy'd within forty eight Hours of each other. The former of the three, not long after the Death of her Husband Henry the Fifth, ſecretly marry'd to Owen ap Tudor, a Welſh Gentleman and of the Court, the moſt noble and beautiful Perſon of that Nation, who drew his Deſcent from Cadwallader, the laſt King of the Britains; by which Husband ſhe had ſeveral Children, two of whom, Edmund and Jaſper, bear a Part in the Royal Hiſtory. The former, (being afterwards created Earl of Richmond, and marry'd to Margaret, the Daughter of John Duke of Somerſet, who was Grandſon to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter) became Father to the famous King Henry the Seventh. In the ſame Year the Dutcheſs Dowager of Bedford, Widow to the late Regent of France, marry'd alſo below her Degree to Sir Richard Woodvile, who became Father to the Lady Elizabeth, who had the Honour to marry King Edward the Fourth, and by this was both her ſelf a Queen, and a Progenitreſs of thoſe Kings and Queens that follow'd: For from her and this Match ſprung another Elizabeth, the renowned Wife of King Henry the Seventh, as King Henry himſelf did of the former Match. Both theſe Matches prov'd prov'd moſt fortunate to England; but another happen'd which now threaten'd preſent Danger to King Henry, and that was what James King of Scotland made with France, who marry'd his Daughter Margaret to Lewis the Dauphine, and ſent new Supplies of Men againſt the Engliſh. He deſign'd alſo to have attempted ſomething in Perſon, but before he could effect it, he was moſt impiouſly murder'd by certain bloody Traitors at Perth, ſubborn'd by the Earl of Athol his near Kinſman, in hopes to attain the Crown; for which in part of his Puniſhment he had a red hot Crown of Iron put upon his Head. Tho' King James was a Prince of noble Worth and Virtues, yet this horrible Murther is by ſome Hiſtorians accounted as a juſt and deſerved Puniſhment upon him, for that voluntary Breach of his Homage, Oath and Fidelity made to King Henry the Sixth, at the Time when he was ſet at Liberty after his long Captivity in England. And here an Italian Author makes this Remark upon the Scotch Hiſtory, That among the numerous Race of Kings in that Nation, about one half of the Number met with untimely Deaths.

James King of Scotland murder'd by his Subjects.

Sarra. &c. In France, the new Regent the Duke of York continu'd active, but perform'd nothing memorable, tho' he wanted not Advantages and Opportunities of ſignalizing himſelf. For two thouſand French Horſemen were mutinous, and rang'd about in great Diſorder: Paris was dreadfully puniſh'd with Famine, and its uſual Attendants, peſtilential Diſtempers: The Countries adjacent lay open and deſolate; and the Courtiers were diſcontented and divided. Still nothing of note was done by the Regent; which ſome impute to the Oppoſition he met with from the Duke of Somerſet, who out of Envy and Diſdain incommoded his Diſpatches. However the Duke of Somerſet, accompany'd with the Lords Talbot and Falconbridge, and other brave Men, and a competent Force laid Siege to Harfleur which the Normans in the late Rebellion had ſeiz'd, and maintain'd under French Commanders. King Charles upon this ſent a Body of four thouſand Men to relieve the Place, but not being able to effect it, Harfleur ſurrender'd to the Duke. Not long after the Duke of York was recall'd, and in November Richard Earl of Warwick was ſent over to ſucceed him as Regent of France: He carry'd with him a thouſand freſh Soldiers, and arriving at Harfleur, he from thence march'd to Roan, now the chief City of the Engliſh Dominions in North France, as Bourdeaux was in the South; to which laſt Place the Earl of Huntington, with certain Troops of Soldiers, was ſent as Lieutenant.

Holling. Mezeray. This new Regent vigorouſly apply'd himſelf to the Buſineſs of his Station; and under him the Duke of Burgundy and his Forces were driven from Crotoy, by the brave Lord Talbot: Abbeville was freed from the Danger of a Fort with which the Duke had bridled the Town; and the Engliſh for twenty Days together took their Pleaſure in ravaging the Country of Picardy about Amiens and Artois. After this the Earl of Mortaign Son to the Duke of Somerſet ariv'd at Cherburgh with four hundred Archers and three hundred Spears, and paſſing through Normandy into the Country of Maine, he beſieg'd a Caſtle call'd Anian, in which were three hundred Scots, beſides Frenchmen. He ſoon took this Caſtle by Storm, ſlew all the Scotch, and hung up the French, becauſe they had been ſworn to the Engliſh Government. After theſe, and many other inferior Actions of the like Nature, at the Sollicitations of the Dutcheſs of Burgundy and the Pope's Legate, a grand Conference was held between Graveling and Calais, the Deputies of England and France, and thoſe of Burgundy meeting to treat about a Peace. But the Engliſh not receding from that Condition, that Normandy and their other Conqueſts ſhould be left to them in full Soveraignty, they parted without effecting any thing. Still the Engliſh Intereſt was retain'd in France, not only by means of King Henry's Miniſters and Forces, but alſo by the Remiſsneſs of King Charles, who gave his Son an Occaſion to raiſe a Rebellion againſt him; but the Fear of the Engliſh Power, and the wiſe Management of ſome, ſoon produc'd a perfect Reconciliation.

Various Actions in France.

A. D. 1439. Reg. 17/18.

Before any great Advantage could be made of this hopeful Breach, the Regent the Earl of Warwick after many worthy Actions dy'd at Roan; and the Duke of York was a second Time sent over in Quality of Regent of France.

The Earl of Warwick dies. The Duke of York returns to France.

King Charles was now fallen into some Disfavour with his People, but to redeem his Credit, he attempted the Recovery of Ponthoise, near Paris, which the Lord Clifford had not long before surpriz'd by a Stratagem; and accordingly he sat down before it with ten or twelve thousand Men, while the Lord Clifford made a brave Defence within. The Duke of York lately landing in Normandy, as Regent assembled his chief Forces, consisting of seven or eight thousand Men, and offer'd the King Battel; but he kept himself within his Trenches. The Regent, agreeable to the Humour of the English, eager of present Action, unexpectedly pass'd the River Oyse, which ran between the two Camps; which caus'd King Charles to remove with such Precipitation, that the French could hardly excuse him from flying. The Duke having gain'd the Spoil of the French King's Camp, reinforc'd Ponthoise, and attack'd a Fortress, where King Charles had left three thousand Men to maintain the Appearance of a Siege. But it was judg'd more advantagious to pursue the King who was arriv'd at Poisie; where the Duke again very nobly provok'd him to the Field. King Charles, finding the Hazards unequal, endur'd the Bravado; so that the Duke was constrain'd to return to his main Charge in Normandy. King Charles fell into such Obloquy and Contempt with his People by this dishonourable Retreat, especially with the Parisians, that if he had not a second Time attempted and prevail'd against Ponthoise, it might have endanger'd his whole Fortunes; for a Faction was then ready to make use of any false Step. He therefore return'd in a great Fury to the Siege, and took it by a general Assault, with extraordinary Bloodshed on his own Side, and the Loss of five hundred of the English. The King was one of the first that enter'd at the Breach, chusing to be rather thought rash than timorous; by which Exploit he re-establish'd his Reputation with his People.

Monstrel. Serres, &c.

The French King succeeds.

Both Sides began by this Time to grow weary of the War; and the State of England under King Henry, whose Softness and Lenity gave way to several dangerous Court Factions, requir'd some Rest: For which Reason Commissioners for a Treaty met at Calais; where nothing was concluded but the Freedom of Charles Duke of Orleans, for a Ransom of three hundred thousand Crowns, after he had been Prisoner in England about twenty six Years, ever since the famous Battel of Agincourt, where he was taken. The Duke of Burgundy was a main Agent as to his Enlargement, designing to secure his own Greatness by Acts of Benificence; this high born Prince, for the Murther of his Father, being naturally the Head and Spring of that unfortunate Feud that had most mortally rag'd between the Houses of Burgundy and Orleans. The Duke of Gloceſter prudently foreseeing the Dangers like to ensue upon Orleans's Liberty, strenuously oppos'd it, and that upon important Reasons, which he requir'd to have Register'd, that they might remain on Record for a Testimony of the Discharge of his Duty. This great Duke had no better Success when he set about to reform the State of England, which suffer'd much from the Mismanagements of the two Cardinals of York and Winchester, especially the latter. For tho' the Duke was Governor of the King and Protector of the Realm, yet the Cardinal of Winchester, with the other acted many Things without the Consent of the King or him; at which being greatly offended, he in Writing declar'd to the King how much the Cardinal and the Arch-Bishop had offended both his Majesty and the Laws of the Nation. This Complaint of the Duke's was drawn up in twenty four long Articles, which chiefly imported, That the Cardinal of Winchester had continually, through his ambitious Desire of surmounting all others in Honour and Dignity, sought to inrich himself, to the great Damage of the King, as not only defrauding him of his Treasure, but also practising Things highly prejudicial to his Affairs in France, particularly by freeing the King of Scotland upon on ſuch eaſie Conditions that his Majeſty became a great Loſer. Tho' theſe Things were heard and examin'd before the Council, yet the Cardinal found ſo many Friends, as not only protected him, but afterwards found means to effect the Duke of Gloceſter's Ruin.

Holling. &c. Still the Miſeries and Calamities of France continu'd, and the Wars were carry'd on with various Succeſs, but yet after a more feeble and languid manner than formerly. The County of Amiens was ravag'd by the Engliſh under the Lords Willoughby and Talbot; the Regent and the Duke of Somerſet march'd into Anjou, where they loaded their Carriages with much Plunder, and return'd into Normandy: After which the Duke of Somerſet parted from the other, and perform'd ſeveral Exploits in and about Bretaign. Dieppe in Normandy being beſieg'd by the Engliſh, was reliev'd by the Dauphine, to the great Loſs of the former; while the French King gain'd ſome Advantages in and about Gaſcony. During theſe variable Tranſactions, John the valiant Lord Talbot, lately recall'd into England, was, for his approv'd Courage and Wiſdom, both in England and France, as well in Peace as War, created Earl of Shrewsbury, and with a Body of three thouſand Men ſent over again into Normandy, for the better Defence of that Country. Not long after the Counteſs of Cominges dying, the King of France and the Earl of Armagnack became violent Competitors for the Inheritance. The Earl took Poſſeſſion; but fearing the King of France's Greatneſs, offer'd his Daughter in Marriage to the King of England, with a large Portion in Mony; promiſing alſo to deliver full Poſſeſſion of all ſuch Towns and Caſtles, as were by him or his Anceſtors detain'd in Gaſcony, and had been formerly conquer'd by King Henry's Predeceſſors. The Ambaſſadors for this Affair were graciouſly receiv'd by King Henry, and honourably ſent back: After whom were ſent Sir Edward Hall, Sir Robert Roſs, and others, to conclude all Things; by whom the young Lady was by Proxy affianc'd to King Henry. But the King of France highly diſliking this Match, ſent the Dauphine with a powerful Army, who took the Earl Priſoner, with his youngeſt Son, and both his Daughters, and gain'd the Counties of Armagnack, Louverne, Rovergne and other Parts, chaſing the Baſtard of Armagnack out of the Country; by which means the Conſummation of the Marriage was deferr'd, and never effected.

Ibid. In this Diſtraction of Chriſtendom, many Princes, as the Kings of Spain, Denmark and Hungary, became Mediators for a Peace between the two Kings of England and France. Ambaſſadors on all Sides were ſent, many Meetings were heard, and many Propoſals made; but in Concluſion only a Truce for eighteen Months was agreed on. During this Negotiation, De la Pole Earl of Suffolk, a great Favourite and one of the Commiſſioners for this Peace, took upon him a bold Thing beyond his Commiſſion; and without acquainting his Aſſociates treated of a Marriage between the King of England and Margaret the Daughter of Reyner Duke of Anjou, and Niece to the Queen of France. This Reyner now ſtil'd himſelf King of Sicily, Naples and Jeruſalem; and the Earl of Suffolk was ſo active in this Affair, that it brought the Aſperſion of Bribery upon him; and without his Maſter's Warrant he proceeded ſo far as to appoint an Enterview between the two Kings, which was to be held betwixt Roan and Chartres. Upon the Return of the Commiſſioners, the Earl of Suffolk ſet forth the Beauty and Qualifications of the propos'd Bride, and the Benefits of Peace that would redound to the Kingdom by this Match. The King and many others were eaſily induc'd to credit the Relation, but the worthy Duke of Gloceſter bravely oppos'd it, partly becauſe it was a manifeſt Injury to the Earl of Armagnack's Daughter, to whom the King had been ſolemnly affianc'd, which Match was honourable and advantagious; and partly becauſe this latter brought nothing with it but Loſs and Diſhonour, as the Delivery of the Dukedom of Anjou and County of Maine, Bulwarks to Normandy, which now ought eſpecially to be retain'd in order to conclude a laſting Peace with France.

A. D. 1444. Reg. 22 23.

But

But all Reaſons were of no effect, when the Heav'ns had decreed that for this Cauſe the Duke ſhould loſe his Life, the King his Crown and Dignity, the Kingdom all its foreign Poſſeſſions, and the People that Peace at home they had hitherto enjoy'd. King Charles underſtanding that Henry had conſented, he ſent over the Count of Vendoſme and the Arch-Biſhop of Rheims, who concluded the Contract; and the more to honour this unfortunate Match King Henry created three Dukes and one Marqueſs, which latter was the Earl of Suffolk, who for his further Honour was made his Deputy to celebrate the Formality of the Nuptials, and to bring the Bride into England.

yet after that was contracted to the Duke of Anjou's Daughter.

A. D. 1445. Reg. 23/24. All Things being in Readineſs, the new Marqueſs went over into France, with his Wife and great Numbers of Ladies and Gentlemen glorioufly adorn'd, and Letters for the Bride's Father, who tho' he was rich in Titles of imaginary Kingdoms, was not able to ſend her honourably to her Husband; ſo that all the Charge, which was vaſt and extraordinary, fell to King Henry's Share. The noble Company being arriv'd at Tours, the Marqueſs marry'd the Lady in the Name of his Maſter, in the Preſence of the King of France, the Queen, and a numerous Train of Princes and Noblemen, among whom were the Dukes of Orleans, Calabria, Alenſon and Bretaign; and the Nuptials were ſolemniz'd with magnificent Feaſts and Tournaments. After this the Lady in great State was convey'd into England, and at Southwike in Hampſhire was ſolemnly marry'd to King Henry. From thence ſhe remov'd to London, being met after a moſt pompous manner by the Duke of Gloceſter, and others of the Nobility; and the famous Poet John Lydgate Monk of St. Edmund's Bury compos'd the Speeches for ſuch Triumphant Receptions as were made upon her Entrance into the City. A few Days after, on the thirtieth of May, ſhe was crown'd Queen at Weſtminſter with all the uſual Solemnities. Polydore gives no improper Character of this beautiful Queen, when he ſays ſhe was one ſufficiently provident, ambitious of Glory, abounding in Diſcourſe, Counſel, Officiouſneſs and maſculine Courage; in which appear'd much Ingenuity, Vigilance and Care; but not free from the Humour of Women, which, as he ſays, is uſually vehement and apt to change.

The Character of the new Queen.

A. D. 1446. Reg. 24/25. V. The Kingdom of France had for above thirty Years ſuffer'd all the Convulſions and Calamities of War, both Civil as well as Foreign; but thoſe Miſeries ſeem'd to be transferr'd by gradual Steps to England, and from this Time began the apparent Forerunners of the Nation's Misfortunes. Here ſome of our Engliſh Writers very freely tell us, That it appear'd that God was not pleas'd with the late Marriage: For from that Day forward the Fortune of the World began to fall from the King, ſo that he loſt all his Friends in England, and all his Dominions in France: For in a little Time all was govern'd by the Queen and her Council, to the great Detriment of the King and his Realm, and the no leſs Obloquy of the Queen, who thereby became expos'd to many falſe Reports. All which Miſery, ſays Fabian, aroſe from BREACH OF THE PROMISE made by the King to the Earl of Armagnack's Daughter, as moſt Writers agree: All which Miſery, as he adds, will in ſome meaſure appear by the Loſs of Normandy, and the reſt of France, the Diviſion of the Lords within this Kingdom, the Rebellion of the Commonalty againſt their Prince and Soveraign, and finally the King himſelf depos'd, and the Queen with the Prince forc'd to fly the Land, and loſe the Government of it for ever. Theſe and many other Evils were the Products of the ſucceeding Times. However ſtill ſome Care was taken about the Affairs of France; and the Parliament granted Supplies of Mony to carry on the War upon the Expiration of the Truce. The Duke of York was recall'd from his Regency, and the Duke of Somerſet, in an unfortunate Hour, was ſent in his Place, with ſuch Proviſions as were reputed competent.

The

Holl. Holling. &c.

The renowned Protector, the Duke of Gloceſter, felt the firſt fatal Blow of the evil Angel that was ſent to puniſh England, and root out her Nobility. This Duke had been a brave Oppoſer of the late Marriage, and was much hated by the Queen and her Faction, as the only Man who by his Prudence, as alſo by the Honour and Authority of his Birth and Place, ſeem'd to hinder that Soveraign Power which they pretended to ſettle in the King's Perſon, but deſign'd indeed, as is uſual under ſoft Princes, to reign themſelves in another's Name. The Marqueſs of Suffolk, and ſeveral of the Nobility, at the Time of a Parliament held at St. Edmund's Bury, were drawn on to concur to his Ruin; not perceiving, that by ſo doing they pull'd up the Flood-Gate, at which the Duke of York enter'd, overwhelming all of them in a Deluge of Blood. Whether they had any real Fear of Gloceſter himſelf, leſt perhaps he ſhould take Revenge upon ſome particular Perſons among them, is uncertain; tho' it ſeems probable enough, that they had. Beſides the Duke's frequent Conteſts with the Cardinal of Wincheſter, and ſeveral others, there were ſome former Accidents that concurr'd to make Way towards his Ruin. For about five Years before, Eleanor his Dutcheſs was convented for Witchcraft and Sorcery, and afterwards indited for Treaſon before the Earls of Huntington, Stafford, Suffolk and Northumberland, and other Lords and Judges; of which Crime ſhe was appeal'd by one Bolingbrook an Aſtronomer, and Thomas Southwell a Canon, which laſt was charg'd with ſaying Maſſes over certain Inſtruments, by which the Aſtronomer ſhould practiſe Negromancy againſt the Life of the King. Theſe being taken, accus'd her as an Acceſſary, and one who had deſir'd the Aſſiſtance of their Art to know her Fortune; and Part of this ſhe confeſs'd, for which ſhe was put to publick and ſolemn Penance in London, upon three ſeveral Days, with extraordinary Shame to her Perſon, and after that ſhe was committed to perpetual Impriſonment under the Care of Sir Thomas Stanley. The Duke of Gloceſter her unhappy Lord and Husband, whom by Love-Potions ſhe was ſaid to have inchanted, being provok'd with this Reproach, might reaſonably be ſuppos'd to have ſtirr'd in this Affair. However it was, his Deſtruction certainly borrow'd Countenance from that Opinion. The Duke therefore being come to attend in this Parliament at St. Edmund's Bury, in the ſecond Day of the Seſſions he was arreſted of High-Treaſon by the Lord Beaumont Conſtable of England, the Duke of Buckingham and others, and all his Followers taken from him, whereof thirty two were committed to ſeveral Priſons; and the Day after his Impriſonment he was found murther'd in his Bed. Yet he was expos'd the ſame Day with a Deſign to have it thought he dy'd of a Palſie or Impoſtume, tho' all that ſaw his Body found that he dy'd of a violent and unnatural Death; ſome ſay ſtrangled; ſome that a hot Spit was thruſt up his Fundament; and ſome that he was ſtifled between two Feather-Beds. His Corps was convey'd the ſame Day to St. Albans, and there interr'd. Five of his menial Servants being condemn'd to be hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, the Marqueſs of Suffolk, to affect Popularity, brought their Pardons, and ſav'd their Lives, after they had been hang'd, let down quick, ſtript naked, and mark'd with a Knife to be quarter'd. By a Pardon granted to one of his Servants may be ſeen the Pretence made for committing the Murther, namely, he was one of the many Traitors who came with the Duke of Gloceſter to deſtroy the King, and ſet his Wife Eleanor at Liberty.

Such was the End of this great Prince, who, notwithſtanding his Body was expos'd, and many Crimes pretended, was by the People of England thought to be doubly murther'd, in his Reputation, as well as his Perſon. His Death was much lamented by the whole Kingdom, from whom he deſerv'd the Sirname of Good, for he was a Lover of his Country, a Friend to Good Men, a Protector of the Learned, of which himſelf was one, and ſo great an Incourager of them, that he built the Divinity Schools at Oxford, a Work worthy to be admir'd in all Reſpects. His main Opinion concerning the Government of King

His Character.

King Henry's French Dominions was generally oppos'd by the Cardinal of Wincheſter, and ſome others, who altogether perſuaded Peace, to which this Heroical Duke, nicely inſiſting upon the Honour and Majeſty of the Engliſh Name, was a profeſs'd Enemy: From which Fountain of divided Councils flow'd innumerable Inconveniencies. Tho' he had many virtuous Qualifications, yet he has been blam'd for Incontinency and Ambition, one or both of which formerly caus'd a dangerous Breach with the Duke of Burgundy. After him the Title of Gloceſter was reputed ominous; for the four laſt Gloceſters came to violent Ends: Thomas, Son to Edward the Third, was ſtrangled at Calais; Thomas Spenſer Earl of Gloceſter beheaded at Bury; Humphry the preſent Duke dy'd as now related; and Richard Duke of Gloceſter afterwards ſlain in Battel. The Death of the preſent Duke, prov'd the Queen, who was eſpecially concern'd in it, not to have been ſo careful or politick as common Reaſon ſeem'd to require of her; for while he liv'd his Authority and near Relation to the Crown would eaſily have ſtifled the Duke of York's Claim: And here were the firſt Seeds ſown between the Houſe of Lancaſter, whoſe Badge was the Red-Roſe, and the Houſe of York, who gave that of the White. And now, ſays Polydore, Good Men, apprehenſive of their own Safeties, voluntarily forſook the Court, into whoſe Places ſucceeded many, who for the moſt Part ſeeking their own Intereſt, open'd an eaſie Way for new Factions. The Duke of Gloceſter was ſoon follow'd by his great Enemy the Cardinal of Wincheſter, the other chief Counſellor of the Nation; ſo that the whole Frame of the Government was laid upon the Queen, and ſuch Favourites as the King, by her Recommendation, approv'd of. We are aſſur'd that when this rich Prelate lay upon his Death-Bed he cry'd out, Why ſhould I dye that have ſo much Wealth? If the whole Kingdom would ſave my Life, I am able by my Policy to get it, or by my Mony to buy it. Will not Death be brib'd, nor Mony do nothing? Being dead, he was ſucceeded in his Biſhoprick by a more worthy Perſon, William Wanfleet, ſo called from the Place of his Nativity in Lincolnſhire, tho' his real Name was Patin; who afterwards founded Magdalen Colledge in Oxford, one of the nobleſt Foundations in Europe.

The Cardinal of Wincheſter dies.

A. D. 1448. Reg. 26/27. The Marqueſs of Suffolk now the chief Favourite, was created a Duke, which render'd him a more conſpicuous Mark of Envy than ever, beyond even the Protection of the King or the Queen. And now the Affairs of France, where Somerſet was Regent, were neither duly inſpected, nor the Govenors of the Country well advis'd; but the King and Realm of England, much more than France, lay expos'd to the deep and pernicious Deſigns of Richard Duke of York. He, by an Error of the State, being made great, and grown ſtronger by affected Popularity, perceiving the King to be a Ruler and not to govern, began ſecretly to allure his Friends of the Nobility, and privately declar'd to them his Title to the Crown; as likewiſe he did to certain Governors of Cities and Towns; which Attempt was ſo politickly and ſecretly carry'd on, that his Proviſion was ready, before his Purpoſe was diſclos'd. The publick State of Affairs ſeem'd to favour this fatal Conſpiracy: There was a milder King than England then deſerv'd; a Council out of Favour with the People, numerous Loſſes and Diſhonours abroad; a turbulent and unſetled Condition of all Things at home. Of all which, and many more Miſchiefs, the Duke of York, having Henry the Fourth for a dangerous Precedent, made his pernicious Uſe, cheriſhing the popular Averſions, without ſeeking to redreſs any Evils, but repreſenting them worſe than they were, only to bring about his ambitious Purpoſes. His Removal from the Regency of France did not a little diſoblige him, becauſe the Duke of Somerſet gain'd it from him; but it was not long before Somerſet's ill Management of that Truſt, and the declining Fortune of the Engliſh gave him Occaſion to rejoice at the Foil of his dreaded Enemy. Which in ſhort was thus.

Serres. Mezeray. &c.

During the Truce between England and France, one Sir Francis Surienne a Knight of Arragon, ſerving under the Regent, ſurpriz'd the City of Fougers, belonging to the Duke of Bretaign, where he met with a Booty of above ſixteen hundred thouſand Crowns. Upon which Reparation and Reſtitution was demanded; but the Duke of Somerſet, a proud Man, contrary to good Diſcipline, cheriſhing his Soldiers in their Riots and Diſorders, wilfully neglected the Juſtice of Nations in that Point. After ſix Months Delays the Duke of Bretaign began the Revenge, and by the French King's Conſent ſurpriz'd Pont de Larche, and Town after Town, ſo many and ſo faſt, that King Charles, after he found no Reſtitution would be made, uniting his Forces, ſoon became Maſter of Roan it ſelf, of Caen, Bayeux, and indeed of all other Places belonging to the Engliſh in thoſe Parts; to the great Diſhonour of the Duke of Somerſet and the Engliſh Nation. And thus was all Normandy regain'd by the French, or rather, as Mezeray ſays, help'd to recover it ſelf, in one Year and ſix Days; after it had continu'd in the Poſſeſſion of the Engliſh above thirty Years from the Conqueſt of it by Henry the Fifth. In this Dukedom were a hundred ſtrong Towns and Forts, all tenable and of Conſequence, beſides thoſe deſtroy'd in the Wars; and it alſo contain'd one Archbiſhoprick and ſix Biſhopricks. Some are of Opinion that the Engliſh wanted Strength, either to man the Towns as they ought, or Numbers to inhabit the Country, which was the Reaſon they could not keep it. Others charge it upon the Avarice of the Duke of Somerſet, who kept not half the Number of Soldiers for which he was allow'd, and thoſe ſo ill paid, that he was forc'd to connive at all their Outrages. But the principal Cauſe, as moſt agree, was the fatal Diviſions within the Kingdom of England, where every great Man deſiring rather to be reveng'd on his Foe at home, than the common Enemy abroad, no timely Succours could be ſent. Yet ſtill if we conſider the general Deportment of the Engliſh Nation, the Concurrence of Martial Men, their Counſel, Diſcipline and Deſigns, from the Beginning of Edward the Firſt to this Time, which was a hundred and eighty Years; it muſt be acknowledg'd that they were Men of extraordinary Worth and Valour, and carry'd the Palm of Victory before them wherever they went

VI. After the diſhonourable Loſs of Normandy, the Calamities of England began to diſcover themſelves more openly than ever: For while the French triumph'd in their new Acquiſitions, three cruel Enemies, among many others, grievouſly urg'd on the Ruin of the Nation at home. One was Preſump ion in Governing, by ſome that were moſt unfit to rule, as the Queen with her Privy-Counſellors and Favourites; next the inveterate Malice and Pride, as well as inſatiable Avarice in the States both Spiritual and Temporal; and laſtly the general Diſcontents of the People, who began to ſink under the Tediouſneſs as well as Weight of their Burthens. Theſe finding that by Miſgovernment all Things were running towards Confuſion, as well within the Realm as without, they began to exclaim againſt the Duke of Suffolk, charging him as the only Cauſe of the Delivery of Anjou and Main, the chief Procurer of the Duke of Gloceſter's Death, the very Occaſion of the Loſs of Normandy, the Devourer of the King's Treaſure, the Remover of good and virtuous Counſellors from about the Prince, and the Advancer of vicious Perſons, and ſuch as were Enemies to the Publick. The Queen at this apprehending not only the Duke's Deſtruction, but alſo her own Confuſion, caus'd the Parliament, which had met at London, to be adjourned to Leiceſter, thinking there, by Force and Rigour of Law, to ſuppreſs all the Malice and ill Opinions conceiv'd againſt the Duke and her ſelf. At which Place few of the Nobility would appear; therefore the Parliament was again adjourn'd to Weſtminſter, where there was a full Appearance. In this Seſſion the Commons drew up many Articles of Impeachment againſt the Duke of Suffolk, conſiſting of ſeveral Crimes, as well Treaſon as leſſer Miſ-demeanors; moſt of which he deny'd. But when he was charg'd with making the unhappy Marriage for the King, and the Loſs of Anjou and Main, he alledg'd that the very next Parliament after the Conſummation of the Match had ſo well approv'd of it, as to vote him Rewards for his Service. But notwithſtanding all his Defence, the Queen juſtly doubting ſome Commotion if he paſſed with Impunity, caus'd him for a Colour to be committed to the Tower: Where remaining about a Month, he was again deliver'd, and reſtor'd to the King's Favour; which ſo diſpleas'd the People, that if extraordinary Care had not been taken, innumerable Miſchiefs might have happen'd. For the common People in ſeveral Places of the Kingdom aſſembled in numerous Bodies, and choſe a Captain for themſelves, whom they call'd Blue-beard; but before they had perform'd any Enterprize, their Leaders were apprehended, and the Matter pacify'd without any further Damage.

After theſe Outrages were allay'd, the Parliament was adjourn'd to Leiceſter, where the King and Queen appear'd in great State, and with them the Duke of Suffolk as chief Counſellor. The Houſe of Commons not forgetting their old Reſentments, petition'd the King that all ſuch Perſons as conſented to the Delivery of Main and Anjou might be duly puniſh'd. And as privy to that Fact they accus'd the Duke of Suffolk as Principal, with John Biſhop of Salisbury, and Sir James Fines, Lord Say, and divers others. The King perceiving that no common Methods would appeaſe the Peoples Fury, to pacifie their inveterate Hatred, he firſt remov'd the Lord Say from being High-Treaſurer, and ſome others of the Duke's Adherents from their Offices and Places; and after that baniſh'd the Duke himſelf for five Years, as being the preſent Annoiance of the Nation. But he was now purſu'd by a more inevitable Vengeance from above: For embarking in Suffolk to go for France, he was ſet upon by a Man of War belonging to the Earl of Exeter, taken by the Captain, and brought into Dover Road, where his Head was ſtricken off in a Cock-boat, and his Body ignominiouſly thrown upon the Shore; from whence it was taken by one of his Chaplains, and bury'd in the College of Wingfield in Suffolk. This was the remarkable End of William de la Pole Duke of Suffolk; a Perſon of very conſiderable Abilities, who had warr'd in France forty four Years without Intermiſſion, in ſeventeen of which he never ſaw his own Country: When he was taken Priſoner his Ranſom coſt him twenty thouſand Pounds, tho' then he was only a Knight; he was of thirty Years ſtanding of the Order of the Garter, his Father was ſlain at the Siege of Harfleur, his eldeſt Brother at Agincourt, and his two younger in the ſame Wars; ſo that it cannot be deny'd but that his Prince and Country did owe much to him, ſince he ſpent his Life in the Service of the one, and his Reputation in the Service of the other. But after all, ſuffering himſelf to be guided by a prodigious Ambition, he fell into two dreadful Errors, his making of a State Marriage, not only pernicious in it ſelf, but contrary to an expreſs Contract before; and his contributing towards the worthy Duke of Gloceſter's Murther: For which he met with ſuch a Puniſhment, as look'd more like the Hand of Heav'n, than the Hatred of the People.

His Character.

The Death of this Miniſter was highly prejudicial to the King, who greatly ſtood in need of his Service and Support; and this Chance did much animate thoſe of the Duke of York's Faction, who now ſpar'd no Pains to render the King deſpicable, and the Queen odious. They alſo inſiſted upon the Duke's brave Management in Ireland, where at preſent he reſided as Governor, and where by his Wiſdom and Valour he had in a manner tamed a ſavage People, and reduc'd them to that Diſcipline and Obedience, that he thereby ſhow'd how much England wanted ſuch a King. Theſe Inſinuations were not only privately whiſper'd, but publickly diſpers'd; and every Man had the Vanity to blaze 'em abroad, to ſhew their Wiſdom, and their Affection to the publick Weal. The Duke of York before the Death

The Duke of York's further Deſigns.

Death of Suffolk had wrought the End of Adam Molleins Biſhop of Chicheſter, and Lord Privy-Seal; for fearing that a Man of his Integrity might oppoſe his Deſigns, he caus'd him to be aſſaſſinated by Fiſhermen at Portſmouth, that he might be thought to be ſlain by the outragious Commotion of that baſer ſort of People. But theſe Things tending more to the ruining than the raiſing of his Projects, he deſign'd to begin his Work with ſome popular Sedition, which precipitating the Rebels into a Crime unpardonable, and the Fear of Puniſhment making them obſtinate, he might uſe them either collected or diffus'd as Occaſion ſhould ſerve. For that End the common People of Kent were excited to take up Arms, under the Conduct and Command of Jack Cade, who had formerly been a Servant to Sir Thomas Dagre a Suſſex Knight, and killing a Woman with Child, abjur'd the Land and turn'd French; and returning was an Inſtrument to hang out Mortimer's Name, as a Flag, to draw in a Party, feigning himſelf of that Family, and to be a Couſin to the Duke of York. A peſtilent Contrivance to ſound the Affections of the Multitude, and to proclaim that Title to the Crown, which the Duke as Heir to the Family afterwards challeng'd: For who would not ask what ſhould move him to uſe the Name of Mortimer?

Jack Cade's Rebellion in Kent.

Holling. Stow, &c. This Cade, a Man of no ſmall Courage, having drawn great Numbers together, encamp'd at Black-Heath by Greenwich, and in his Writings ſtil'd himſelf the Captain of Kent, and Captain Mendall; and his Pretences, like thoſe of all other Rebels, were the publick Good of the Nation. The King and his Council being mov'd at the News of this dangerous Inſurrection, this Captain ſent a large Roll of Complaints and Demands to his Majeſty. One of which was, That Richard Duke of York ſhould be recall'd out of Ireland, and with the Duke of Buckingham and certain others be principally us'd in Council. Another was, That as the Duke of Gloceſter had been falſely proclaim'd Traitor, ſo the Authors of his Death might be puniſh'd. Beſides theſe and other plauſible Demands, great Complaints were made of many Grievances and Extortions, proceeding from the Courts of the Kings-Bench and the Exchequer, with many other Particulars too numerous to recite here. Theſe Matters being inſiſted upon with extraordinary Inſolence and Bravados, the King ſoon became ſenſible of the Indignity and Danger; and raiſing an Army of fifteen thouſand Men, he march'd in Perſon againſt the Rebels. Upon which Cade politickly withdrew his Forces into Sevenoke Wood; upon Notice of which the King retir'd again to London; but the Queen longing for a Diſpatch, ſent the two Staffords, Sir Humphry and William, with many fiery Youths of the Court, to follow the Rebels. But theſe were ſoon cool'd; for they found the Kentiſh Captain in good Order ready to receive them, and in the firſt Encounter ſlew Sir Humphry, and afterwards his Brother, and put all the reſt to Flight. The King's Forces being at Black-Heath, could neither by Threats or Intreaties be oblig'd to march to their Reſcue; but rather wiſh'd the Queen and her Favourites to meet with the Staffords Fate: Or that the Duke of York were in England, to aſſiſt his Couſin Mortimer; and many of them ſtole away to the Rebels, whoſe Numbers from Suſſex and Surry daily encreas'd. And now the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury and the Duke of Buckingham were ſent to expoſtulate with the Rebels about their Demands; to whom Cade gave civil Language, but directly deny'd a Ceſſation from Arms, unleſs the King in Perſon would hear the Grievances of his Subjects, and paſs his Royal Word for the Redreſs of them. This Reſolution being made known to the King, who was not ſure of his Soldiers Fidelity, he and his Queen retir'd to Kenelworth Caſtle in Warwickſhire; having firſt committed the Tower to the Cuſtody of the Lord Scales and the renown'd Matthew Gouge, and the City of London to the Fidelity of Sir Thomas Charlton Lord Mayor.

The King marches againſt him.

The King retires to Warwickſhire.

Ibid. The Kentiſh Captain taking Advantage of the King's Abſence, march'd into the Borough of Southwark, where he quarter'd his Men, ſtrictly charging them to commit no Outrage, nor do Injury to any; which was duely obſer'd. The next Morning, being the ſecond of July, he march'd to London Bridge, where without Reſiſtance he caus'd his Men to cut the Ropes of the Draw-Bridge; and ſo in good Order march'd into the City, and coming to London-Stone, he ſtruck his Sword upon it, crying, Now is Mortimer Lord of London! The Lord Mayor, ſtanding by his Door, bad him Beware of attempting any thing againſt the Peace of the City; to whom he made Anſwer, Let the World judge of our honeſt Intentions by our Actions. And indeed this orderly Behaviour of himſelf and his Company gain'd him an extraordinary Opinion among the common ſort of People. And now aſſuming to himſelf the Place of Chief, he ſent out his Letters of ſafe Conduct to ſuch as he thought fit to employ; among others he wrote to Thomas Cock, Woollen-Draper of London, commanding him to bring him a certain Number of Arms and Horſe, and a thouſand Marks of Mony at the Charge of the Genoeſe, Venetian and Florentine Merchants; and threatening to take the Heads of all that refus'd Payment: All which was perform'd by thoſe Foreign Merchants. At Night he return'd into Southwark, where Robert Poinings, Eſq; was his Sword-Bearer and Carver. The next Morning he return'd into the City, and immediately ſent to the Lord Scales to bring his Priſoner the Lord Say to Guild-Hall, to which Place he ſummon'd the Lord Mayor and his Brethren. Before theſe he caus'd the Lord Say to be arraign'd, who deſiring to be try'd by his Peers, was ſuddenly taken from his Keeper, hurry'd to the Standard in Cheap-ſide, and had his Head ſtrucken off, which upon the End of a Pike was born before him to Mile-End, where he went to confer with the Rebels of Eſſex; and in the Way meeting with Sir James Cromer, High-Sheriff of Kent, and lately marry'd to the Lord Say's Daughter, he alſo caus'd his Head to be taken off, and carry'd before him in Deriſion, The next Morning he again enter'd the City; where after publick Execution done upon ſome of his Aſſociates, who had acted contrary to his Proclamation, upon ſome Diſpleaſure conceiv'd againſt Alderman Malpas, he ſent and ſeiz'd upon all his Wares and Goods, and fin'd Alderman Horn five hundred Marks.

Cade enters London.

His Tyrannical Behaviour.

The chief Citizens now finding the intolerable Inſolence of Cade, and that they had born too much before, ſecretly ſent to the Lord Scales in the Tower for Aſſiſtance; and the brave Matthew Gouge with ſome Forces in the Night came to them. The Rebels in Southwark hearing that their Entrance would be diſputed, ran furiouſly to Arms, and Cade endeavour'd to open his Paſſage by Force; but notwithſtanding all his Power, the Citizens made good and defended London Bridge againſt him, tho' with the Firing of ſeveral Houſes, and the Loſs of many honeſt and valiant Men, for the Conflict continu'd all Night, 'till nine in the Morning. Among ſuch as were ſlain on the King's Side were John Sutton Alderman, Robert Heyſand, and Matthew Gouge himſelf: Which laſt, an Eſquire of Wales, was a Man of admirable Virtue, Manhood and Zeal for his Country, and of great Renown in the Wars of France, where he had nobly ſerv'd for above twenty Years; and his Deſerts at this Time merited a Statue in the City, for whoſe Deliverance he ſpent his laſt Blood. To give quick Diſpatch to theſe Troubles, Impunity was proclaim'd for all Offenders, and ſent them in the King's Name by the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, Lord-Chancellor, under the Great-Seal of England. The Rebels were ſoon diſpers'd with this Aſſurance of their Safeties, and every Man retir'd in Peace from following ſuch a peſtilent Impoſtor. Cade afterwards attempting new Troubles in Kent, a thouſand Marks were promis'd to him who kill'd or took this counterfeit Mortimer; and Alexander Eden, a Gentleman of Kent, had the good Fortune to diſcover and kill him by main Force at Hothfield in that County. His Body was brought to London, and beheaded and quarter'd; his Head ſet upon London Bridge, and his Quarters diſpers'd in divers Places in Kent; to which Country the King came ſhortly after in Perſon, where tho' five hundred were found found guilty, only eight were executed. Tho' London was the chief Stage of this Rebellion, yet other Countries were not free, eſpecially Wiltſhire; for the Rebels there proceeded ſo far as to draw William Askot, Biſhop of Salisbury, from the High Altar, when he was ſaying Maſs in Edington Church, to the Top of the Hill; and there in his Epiſcopal Robes moſt inhumanly murther'd him. The Rebellion ended.

Pol. Virg. Speed. &c. The Kentiſh Rebellion being thus pacify'd and ended, far greater and more dangerous Troubles ſucceeded, as it is uſual to Human Bodies, which by Relapſes are ſhaken more terribly than ever. All theſe Troubles had their prime Source from Richard Duke of York, the true Son of that Richard whom Henry the Fifth had created Earl of Cambridge, and loaden with Wealth and Favours; but as no Bounty nor Benefits can change a treacherous Diſpoſition, ſo he conſpir'd the Death of his Benefactor Henry the Fifth, as the Duke of York his Son labour'd to depoſe the preſent King Henry his great Advancer. The Humours of the People were in the laſt Commotion not obſcurely diſcover'd; and the Commonwealth had really ſome Enormities, through the Miſmanagement of great Officers, but yet ſuch as the Malady was far leſs pernicious than the Remedy. Upon Intelligence of which the Duke of York came ſuddenly out of Ireland, and to begin his uſurp'd Authority, he apprehended John Sutton Lord Dudley, Reginald Abbot of Glaſtenbury, and another, and impriſon'd them in his Caſtle of Ludlow. Edmond Duke of Somerſet was the Man, who after Suffolk's Death, moſt ſupported the King's Intereſt by his Vigilance, Hazards and good Counſels, endeavouring by all Methods to clear the Realm from Factions, and to preſerve the Kingdom in Quiet. York ſeeing this, ſoon found that Suffolk periſh'd in vain, if the ſame Favours were conferr'd upon Somerſet; againſt whoſe Perſon he had a particular Pretence of Quarrel, becauſe the City of Caen in Normandy, the Duke of York's own Charge, was by him delivered to the French, when the Engliſh Affairs became deſperate in thoſe Parts; Sir David Hall, then Lieutenant to the Duke of York, not allowing it, tho' the renowned Talbot was preſent at the Surrender, and became a Hoſtage for Performance of Articles. The Duke of York hereupon conſulted with his chief Friends the Earl of Salisbury and his Son, the Earl of Devonſhire, the Lord Cobham and others, how he might beſt get into the Throne of England, and how to ruin the Duke of Somerſet, from whom they were to expect the greateſt Oppoſition. At length they agreed to have recourſe to Arms, but to ſmother the mention of the Duke of York's Title, they publiſh'd to the World, That they deſign'd all Honour and Obedience to King Henry, but only would remove certain ill Men from about his Perſon, who oppreſs'd the People, and made a Prey of the Publick. Which to gain the more Credit, and to blind the eaſie King, the ſubtle Duke in a Proclamation us'd theſe Hypocritical Words: God knows, from whom nothing is hid, I am, have been, and ever will be, his true Liege-man, &c. For Proof of which, I offer my ſelf to be ſworn on the bleſſed Sacrament, and receive it as a Pledge of my Salvation at the Day of Doom. Becauſe it was the Misfortune of the Duke of Somerſet, that Normandy was loſt during his Regency, his Enemies had the more Opportunity to aſperſe him with the People, who forbore not at his Return to offer him ſeveral Injuries and Indignities, 'till upon Pain of Death they were reſtrain'd, for the Breach of which Proclamation one was beheaded in Weſt-Cheap in London.

He takes up Arms.

Ibid. Notwithſtanding all the winding Artifices of the Duke, the King ſaw ſo much of his Deſigns, as not to rely upon his plauſible Pretenſions; but by the Advice of his Friends, and chiefly of the Duke of Somerſet, he ſoon gather'd a more numerous Force than the Duke, and march'd againſt him towards Wales; in which the King acted wiſely, but not ſo much as the Occaſion requir'd. The Duke having Notice of the King's Approach, turn'd aſide, and with the utmoſt Expedition march'd towards London; but that City, the vain Hope of all Rebellions, bellions, would not harken to them. Upon which he retir'd with his Forces into Kent, the Place of his greateſt Intereſt, and incamp'd at Brent-Heath near Dertford, about twelve Miles from London, deſigning to fight the firſt Opportunity. The King with no ſlow Marches return'd back, and pitch'd his Royal Standard upon Black-Heath, with a full Purpoſe to teach his Couſin of York more Duty and Loyalty. Here we may ſee the Fate of England; when God had put an excellent Opportunity into the King's Hands of rooting out all Hazards and Dangers that threaten'd his Family, for the Duke was far inferior in Numbers. Such therefore as ſecretly favour'd him, fearing his Overthrow, were ready to adviſe the King to an Accommodation, and Meſſengers were daily ſent between the two Armies. The Duke in a Letter to the King, after his uſual Manner, pretended Loyalty and particular Injuries, as that the King's Servants, Sir John Talbot at Holt Caſtle, Sir Thomas Stanley in Cheſhire, and others in other Places, were ſent to be Spies upon him. That by two of the Norris's, Bulkley, Gurſt, Bould and other Gentlemen, he was forbidden to land at Bewmaris, or to have any Refreſhment, affirming to him that he was againſt the King's Intentions, and as a Traitor. The King condeſcended to anſwer this Letter, letting him underſtand, That the Suſpicion univerſally conceiv'd of his Behaviour produc'd thoſe Effects: Nevertheleſs, in regard of the humble Obedience he had lately proteſted, he, for the eaſing the Duke's Heart, does declare, repute and admit him as a true and faithful Subject, and as his well-beloved Couſin. The Duke upon this advanc'd one Step further, and wrote to the King, That Juſtice might be done upon all Perſons of what Degree ſoever, which were guilty, or reported to be guilty of Treaſon; aiming at the Duke of Somerſet in particular, whom he doubted not to overwhelm with Slights and Calumnies, as he and his Adherents had done to the Duke of Suffolk.

A. D. 1452. Reg. 30 31. The poor King, relying upon weak and treacherous Counſels, was contented that Somerſet ſhould be commanded Priſoner to his own Houſe, and that the Duke of York, having firſt disbanded his Forces, ſhould come in Perſon, and put himſelf into the King's Hands. All this being done, in the King's Preſence he exhibited a grievous Complaint againſt the Pride and Avarice of the Duke of Somerſet, and very artfully accuſing none but him, he ſought the Favour and good Opinion of all others: A moſt ſubtle Project, by which he threw upon his Enemy all the Envy of the People, and left him ſingly to ſtand againſt the Effects. Somerſet, a Prince of great Wit and Spirit, reſolving as well for his own Honour as the Intereſt of the Publick, not to endure ſuch an Indignity, bravely preſented himſelf before the King, Face to Face anſwer'd the Duke of York, and in expreſs Terms accus'd him of the higheſt Treaſon, as having conſpir'd to depoſe the King, and uſurp the Sovereignty himſelf: Vehemently urging, That the Duke might be committed and arraign'd, that by his deſerved Death, and the Incapacity of his Poſterity, all civil War might be extinguiſh'd; finally praying, That Heaven would not ſuffer the Enemy of the Kingdom to eſcape the Hand of Juſtice. This in probability had been effected, but the publick Faith ſeem'd engag'd for the Duke's Indemnity, as having come upon the King's Word, and alſo that the Hearts of the People were not well aſſur'd to the King, which by executing the Duke might have been more unſettled, becauſe they would have been ready to believe, that he was ſacrific'd to Somerſet's Reſentments, and not for the Safety of the Nation. Upon theſe Conſiderations, and the Reports of the Duke's Son being ready with an Army to reſcue his Father, the Duke was no longer kept under Reſtraint, as he had been by Somerſet's weighty Accuſations; but to aſſure the gentle and indulgent King of his Allegiance, he made a formal Submiſſion, and ſolemnly took his Oath to be a true, faithful and obedient Subject. This was firſt done in St. Paul's Church in the Preſence of the King and moſt of the chief Nobility, as the Dukes of Buckingham, Norfolk and Somerſet, nine Earls, two Viſcounts, many many Barons, both the Arch-Biſhops of the Realm, and three Biſhops. The Form of Words to which he ſwore and ſubſcrib'd. were long, expreſs and moſt ſolemn, and may be ſeen both in Hollingſhed and Speed; which being afterwards reiterated by him at Weſtminſter, and then at Coventry, the Breach of them do manifeſtly diſplay the higheſt Degree of Perjury, Treachery and Treaſon.

Speed. Holling. &c. As it were to divert theſe domeſtick Rancors and Diſturbances, two French Noblemen came ſecretly over from Gaſcony into England, petitioning for an Army into their Country, declaring that Bourdeaux and the Gaſcoigns would readily return to the Engliſh Subjection, if they were duely ſupported againſt the French King. Upon which an Army was ſoon decreed for their Reduction; and the renowned Talbot, firſt Earl of Shrewsbury, was made General in that Enterprize; who landing in Gaſcony, the Fame of ſuch a Soldier caus'd ſeveral Places to yield. The City of Bourdeaux it ſelf ſecretly open'd a Gate to him, which the French Garriſon perceiving, fled out at a Poſtern; but many being overtaken, were cut in pieces by the Lord L'Eſparre and the Engliſh. After which new Supplies and Proviſions arriv'd, under the Conduct of the Earl of Shrewsbury's younger Son; and Bourdeaux being well mann'd and fortify'd, the Earl receiv'd Advice that the French had laid Siege to Caſtillion, a Place of Importance upon the River Dardonne. To that Place the Earl directed his March; but too adventrouſly charging the Enemy upon unequal Terms, he was there, together with his Son, unfortunately ſlain. The Engliſh Fortunes and Hopes which began to revive, with this Commander made an unhappy Concluſion, to the infinite Loſs of the Engliſh, and the great Affliction of the Gaſcoigns, who generally miſlik'd the French, and approv'd of the Engliſh, as having ſo long and honourably govern'd thoſe Dominions. This was the End of that mighty Earl, in the eighteth Year of his Age, after he had ſerv'd his King and Country in the French Wars for twenty four Years with the higheſt Commendations; a moſt noble and valiant Man, by whoſe Virtue the Engliſh Name did principally become formidable to France. Bourdeaux it ſelf, and all other Places after this, were by Siege reduc'd again to the French King, who proſecuted thoſe Affairs in his own Perſon. From that Time forwards the Engliſh never obtain'd any further Hold or Footing in thoſe Parts, the Fortune of this Attempt breaking all further Combinations of the Gaſcoigns. This Dukedom of Gaſcony or Aquitain was a large Province, containing four Archbiſhopricks, twenty four Biſhopricks, fifteen Earldoms, two hundred and two Baronies, and above a thouſand Captainſhips and Bailywicks; ſo that the World may eaſily conjecture how great the Loſs was of ſuch a noble Inheritance, which had continu'd Engliſh for about three hundred Years. Here in a great Meaſure ended all the Engliſh Soveraignty in France, when all the martial Men were recall'd from that Country, to carry on more unfortunate and calamitous Deſigns in their own. At this Time a French Captain ſcoffingly ask'd an Engliſh Man When they would return again into France? to whom the latter made this memorable Anſwer, When your Sins are greater and more crying than ours: A Sentence worthy the Notice of all Engliſh Men to this Day.

In this fallen Eſtate of the Engliſh, the Queen, upon the thirteenth Day of October, was deliver'd of a firſt Son, whoſe Name was Edward; proving the Child of Sorrow and Infelicity. And as this was an unfortunate Year to England, ſo it was no leſs to all Europe by the great Progreſs of the Turks, who in the ſame Year became Maſters of the famous City of Conſtantinople, and finally diſſolv'd the Grecian Empire, after it had laſted from Conſtantine the Great eleven hundred and twenty three Years.

Foundation of them was the ſubtle and ambitious Duke of York, who ever reſtleſs in his Deſigns, now contrary to the moſt religious and ſolemn Oaths, reſolv'd to mount the Throne of England. He doubted that King Henry's known Goodneſs and Piety would render the Buſineſs extreamly difficult; eſpecially ſince he held the Crown not by any Uſurpation of his own, but by two ſucceſſive Deſcents from Father and Grandfather, and both worthy Princes. This Conſideration ſo far prevail'd as long to keep him within the Bounds of Diſſimulation; for knowing how dangerous it might prove if he made known his Deſigns, he thought it beſt to make the World believe that he acted for the publick Good, when he only ſought his own Ends. He knew alſo that by reviving his Pretenſions againſt the Duke of Somerſet, he might revenge himſelf of a mortal Enemy, free himſelf from his greateſt Obſtacle, deprive the King of his greateſt Supporter, and at the ſame time purchaſe the Love of all Men; the Love of the People, by ruining a Man deteſted for the Loſs of Normandy, and the Love of the Nobility, by reducing him who for his exorbitant Authority was highly envy'd by moſt of them. But not contented with this, he forbore not to vilifie King Henry's Reputation, repreſenting him to be poorly ſpirited, and affirming the Condition of the preſent Times requir'd a King that would not be govern'd by his Wife, or any Third Perſon, but by his own Judgment, a wiſe Man and vigorous, and Maſter of ſuch Virtues as were not to be found in him. Having by theſe Means prepar'd the Peoples Inclinations, he firmly ſecur'd to himſelf two extraordinary Men, the Father and Son, the one the Earl of Salisbury whoſe Daughter he had marry'd, and the other the Earl of Warwick; the firſt celebrated for his wiſe Counſel, and the latter for his invincible Reſolution. By the Aſſiſtance of theſe two, he caus'd the Duke of Somerſet to be arreſted in the Queen's own Lodgings, and ſent to the Tower; to which he was more embolden'd by reaſon of the King's being at that Time ſick; whoſe double Weakneſs both of Body and Mind encourag'd him, and aſſiſted his working himſelf into the Government.

He arreſts the Duke of Somerſet.

A. D. 1455. Reg. 33/34.

But as ſoon as King Henry recover'd his Health, underſtanding that Malice and Deſign were the chief Cauſes of York's Accuſations, he not only ſet the Duke of Somerſet at Liberty, but alſo made him Governor of Calais with the County of Guiſnes, the only Remainder the Engliſh had in France. This gave new Occaſions of Diſguſt, and York finding that he had twice fail'd in his Endeavours to ruin him, retir'd into Wales, where having gather'd a conſiderable Army, he march'd towards London, accompany'd with the fore-menti-on'd Lords, and many others. The King ſo much diſtruſted the Fidelity of that City, that he would not ſtay for the Duke's coming there, but went and encamp'd with his Forces at St. Albans, where the Adverſary preſented himſelf to give him Battel. The King had in his Camp the Dukes of Somerſet and Buckingham, the Earls of Ormond, Pembroke, Stafford, Northumberland, Devonſhire and Dorſet, with the Lords Clifford, Ludley, Berners, Roſs, and others; and proceeding according to his pacifick Diſpoſition, he ſent ſome to the Duke to know why he came in that hoſtile Manner. The Duke in a Letter to the King requeſted That he would deliver up ſuch Perſons as he ſhould name to deſerv'd Puniſhment. The King, to let him know his Authority, return'd this Anſwer, That he and the reſt of his Adherents were Traitors; and rather than they ſhould have any Lord from him at that Time, he himſelf would live and die in the Quarrel. Upon this the bold Earl of Warwick unawares attack'd the Vantguard Royal, and diſorder'd it before the Duke of Somerſet could remedy the ſame; ſo that the Forces on both Sides falling in, a bloody Battel enſu'd; in which, on the King's Party were ſlain the Duke of Somerſet himſelf, the Earls of Northumberland and Stafford, and the Lord Clifford, with about five thouſand of the inferior ſort, and about ſix hundred on the other Side. The King himſelf was ſhot in the Neck with an Arrow, the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Scales in the Faces, and the Lord Dorſet was was ſo wounded, that he was forc'd to be carry'd away in a Cart. The King's Army being at length all diſpers'd or ſlain, the King himſelf, unguarded, fled to a poor thatcht Houſe not far off; of which the Duke of York having Notice, he with the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, the Father and Son, approach'd him on their Knees, humbly craving his Royal Pardon; declaring, That ſince the common Enemy was dead, they had no more to require. Upon which the poor King with Trembling anſwer'd, Let there be no more Bloodſhed, and I will do what you'll have me. This firſt Battel of St. Albans was fought upon the twenty third Day of May, and thirty third Year of this Reign; and the Bodies of the Duke of Somerſet, the Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Clifford were bury'd in the Chappel of that Town. And now the Duke of York in the King's Name commanded a Ceſſation from further Hoſtilities, and with a great Appearance of Reverence convey'd the King to London, where they kept the Feaſt of Pentecoſt together.

The King worſted.

Ibid. A Parliament was immediately call'd, in which all Things were decreed directly oppoſite to what had been enacted in former Parliaments, to teſtifie that the late Government had been unjuſt, and the King abus'd by the Malice of thoſe who counſell'd him; Humphry Duke of Gloceſter was declar'd to have been Loyal to the King, and Faithful to his Country; all Grants whatſoever, whether by Patent from the King or by Parliament, beginning from the firſt Day of the preſent Reign, were revok'd as Things that impoveriſh'd the Crown and diminiſh'd its true Luſtre. And that the late Inſurrection, tho' condemn'd by all Laws, might be thought meritorious, Declaration was made, That the Duke of Somerſet, the Lord chief Juſtice Thorp, and William Joſeph, were the grand Occaſions of it, by detaining a pacificatory Letter, which if it had been deliver'd to the King, it would have remov'd the Foundation of the foreſaid Diſorders; wherefore the Duke of York, the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick and their Adherents ought not to be blam'd for the future. Theſe Pretences thus paſs'd over, they proceeded more directly to their Buſineſs by framing a Triumvirate for the Groundwork of their deſign'd Monarchy; York caus'd himſelf to be created Protector of the Kingdom, Salisbury Lord Chancellor, and Warwick Governor of Calais; ſo that the Political Authority remain'd in the Firſt, the Civil in the Second, and the Military in the Third: Whilſt Henry, King only in Name, was depriv'd of all Authority and Safety; all that had a Dependance upon the King were gradually remov'd from his Council, and from all Places of Truſt and Honour; and John Holland Duke of Exeter was by Force taken from Weſtminſter, whither he was fled for Sanctuary, and ſent Priſoner to Pomfret Caſtle; a Sacrilege not formerly ventur'd on by any King.

A Parliament call'd.

The Duke of York encreaſes in Power.

Wetham. Helling. The King was now in a very declining Condition, and the Queen ſo ſuſpicious, that ſhe durſt only truſt thoſe, who being injur'd, were to run the like Fortune with her Husband. Yet the Reſpect due to the King was not ſo much diminiſh'd, nor his Majeſty ſo much darken'd, but that the young Duke of Somerſet, the Duke of Buckingham and other Lords, reſolv'd no longer to endure the Injury done to him, and to quit themſelves of the imminent Danger that threaten'd them: For every Man now ſaw York's Deſigns to be the Uſurpation of the Crown, and that his Delays proceeded from the Apprehenſions of Danger; for the King by Reaſon of his Piety being reverenc'd by the Beſt, he thought he could not ſuddenly compaſs his Deſigns without direct Scandal; and being oppos'd by the greateſt Part of the Kingdom, if that happen'd, it might for the preſent ruin, and for the future totally loſe all his Hopes. After a Conſultation had with the Queen, who was of a high Spirit and impatient under Subjection, a great Council was call'd at Greenwich, wherein it was reſolv'd, that ſince the King was no Child, and conſequently needed no Protector, nor was ſo void of Underſtanding as to be govern'd by other Mens Diſcretions, therefore the Duke of York ſhould be freed from his Protectorſhip, and the Earl of Saliſbury from being Lord Chancellor, and that he ſhould ſurrender the Great Seal to whom the King ſhould think fit. The Duke of York could not fence himſelf from this ſudden Blow, being taken unprovided; and it was ſtrengthen'd with Reaſons not to be gainſaid without a direct Rebellion; ſo that he was now forc'd to endure it, but not without the great Diſlike of his Adherents, who were not wanting to add new Fuel to the Fury of the People. This they did by cauſing them to riſe in a Tumult in the City of London, occaſion'd by a Diſſention between a Merchant and an Italian; but tho' an Inſurrection was made, yet Matters did not ſucceed as they expected; for after having pillag'd many Houſes of the Venetians, Florentines and other Foreigners, the Tumult was appeas'd, and the Authors of it puniſh'd.

A. D. 1457. Reg. 35/36.

The Duk of York left the Court confirm'd in his former Deſigns by this new Affront, while the Scots took the Opportunity to enter England in one Part, and the French in two other. The Scots having endamag'd the Borders, retir'd with their Booty into their own Country; the French pillag'd ſome Houſes, ſurprized Sandwich, took ſome Ships and return'd to Normandy; but the Surprize of Sandwich did them no great Service, they finding it not tenable againſt ſo many Enemies. England was now like a Body oppreſs'd by a general Diſtillation, malignant Humours diſpers'd themſelves in every Part, and the vital Faculties the Laws had not Force enough to repel them; for while one Party endeavour'd to deſtroy the other, all Care of the Common-wealth was laid aſide, and Juſtice and Equity clearly baniſh'd the Realm. Many Quarrels happen'd between the Nobility; particularly between the Baron of Egremont and the Earl of Salisbury's Sons, in which a conſiderable Number of People were ſlain and hurt. In the mean time the Queen, not being able to ſecure her ſelf, the King and Kingdom, but by the Ruin of the Duke of York and the two Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, nor yet able to work their Ruin but by Fraud and Stratagem, caus'd the King to go to Coventry, under Pretence of paſſing away his Time in Hunting and Hawking, and of changing the Air. She found that London was too much inclin'd to ſupport their Intereſts, therefore feigning ſome grand Affair, ſhe ſent for theſe three Perſons by expreſs Letters from the King, requiring their immediate Preſence at Coventry, to which Place without Suſpicion of Danger they obediently reſorted. But being admoniſh'd by private Friends of what was deſign'd againſt them, they by Flight avoided that Danger, which otherwiſe might have been fatal to them. So without taking Leave they departed from Court; the Duke to Wigmore in the Marches of Wales, the Earl of Salisbury to his Caſtle of Middleham in the North, and the Earl of Warwick to Calais. And tho' theſe Three were ſeparated in their Perſons, yet they continu'd firmly united in Hearts and Intereſts, and kept an uninterrupted and faithful Correſpondence with each other.

The Queen's Deſigns againſt the Duke of York.

A. D. 1458. Reg. 36/37.

The good King was much diſpleas'd at theſe Proceedings of the Queen, as being contrary to his pious Inclinations; wherefore returning to London he call'd a grand Council, where having ſtated the Condition of the Kingdom, he ſhew'd That the late Diviſions had incourag'd both the Scots and the French to aſſault him at home, and therefore a Reconciliation was neceſſary, which if the Failings of particular Men, and thoſe of his own Family were likely to obſtruct, he for his Part would forget the Injuries done to himſelf, and would endeavour for his Relations Agreement with them, who in the late Conteſts had ſhed their Blood; promiſing That the Duke of York and his Friends ſhould in this Affair have nothing to do, but barely to ask and deſire. Upon this obliging Declaration, choice was made of proper Perſons to be ſent to the chief Men of both Parties, many of whom had forborn coming to Court ſince the Battel of St. Albans; and theſe were deſir'd to come and treat of Things neceſſary and expedient for the publick and private Peace. The Duke of York accordingly came to London, and with four hundred well appointed Men lodg'd at his Houſe call'd Baynard's Caſtle; the Earl of Salisbury with five hundred lodg'd at his Houſe call'd the Herbour; the Duke of Exeter, lately releas'd, and and the Duke of Somerſet with eight hundred more were lodg'd within Temple-Bar; the Earl of Warwick with ſix hundred, all in one ſort of remarkable Habit, were lodg'd at the Gray-Friars; and the Earl of Northumberland, with the Lords Egremont and Clifford, with fifteen hundred Men were lodg'd in Holborn: Such was the Cuſtom of that military Age. Upon the ſeventeenth of March the King and Queen came to London, and were lodg'd at the Biſhop's Palace; and Godfrey Bolein, the Mayor and Anceſtor to the famous Anne Queen to Henry the Eighth, having five thouſand Men in Readineſs, with a competent Number rod daily round the City, for the Preſervation of the King's Peace. The Lords lodging within the City, held their Council at Black-Friars; the other at the Chapter-Houſe in Weſtminſter.

Ibid. After a few Meetings, by the prudent and pious Exhortations of the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and other worthy Prelates, the Parties offended were induc'd to a Communication, and afterwards to a final Agreement, upon ſeveral Articles in Writing, of which the King himſelf, as a Perſon of Impartiality and Integrity, was made the ſole Arbitrator of their Differences. Certain particular Satisfactions were awarded to be made by the Duke of York, and his two Friends the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, upon the Account of the Death of the Duke of Somerſet, and others ſlain in the Battel of St. Albans. And the ſaid Duke of Somerſet, the Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Clifford, ſlain at St. Albans, were declar'd true Liege-men to the King at the Day of their Deaths, as well as the Duke of York, the Earls of Warwick and Salisbury. Many other healing Articles and Awards were made in order to reconcile and unite the alienated Hearts and Affections. The Rejoycings for this hopeful Accommodation were extraordinary among all good Engliſhmen, who in great Multitudes throng'd to the publick Celebration of it. For upon the twenty fifth of March, a moſt ſolemn Proceſſion was made into St. Paul's Cathedral, where the King, adorn'd with his Crown and Royal Robes, went in Perſon, before whom walk'd the Duke of Somerſet and the Earl of Salisbury in one Rank, the Duke of Exeter and the Earl of Warwick in another, and ſo one and one of each Party, 'till they were all marſhall'd: And behind the King himſelf, came the Queen led by the Duke of York, with the moſt obliging Marks of Satisfaction on both Sides.

They come to a hopeful Agreement.

The Solemnity of it.

Pol. Virg. Fabian &c. VIII. The Affairs of the Publick for a ſhort Time ſeem'd to have been in a peaceable and happy Condition; but Providence had ſtill reſerv'd far greater Puniſhments for the Engliſh Nation, which were to be brought about by the Head and Hands of Richard Duke of York. It is not to be doubted, but a Man of his profound Thought and reſtleſs Ambition, ſtill continu'd his Deſigns for the Crown, notwithſtanding all his varniſh'd Pretences, and did only ſeem to lay it aſide, becauſe he preſum'd the Time incommodious. On the other ſide the Queen, who was the Head and Life of the contrary Party, in regard of her ſelf, her Husband and Son, may probably be thought to have omitted any Thing rather than that Vigilance and Jealouſie which former Perils, and the Enemy's preſent Power might juſtly keep alive in her. The thin Aſhes therefore which cover'd theſe glowing Coals were eaſily unrak'd and blown away, and particularly by means of this Accident. While the King and many of the Lords continu'd at Weſtminſter, there happen'd, or perhaps was deſign'd a Quarrel between one of the King's Servants and an Attendant of the Earl of Warwick, who hurt the King's Servant. Upon which his Fellow Servants of all ſorts, and with all Kinds of Weapons, in a great Diſorder aſſaulted the Earl himſelf, as he was coming from the Council; in which Conteſt many were hurt, and the Earl with great Difficulty eſcap'd into a Barge, and gain'd the City. The Queen immediately commanded the Earl to be committed to the Tower, but he foreſeeing the Danger, poſted into Yorkſhire, where he acquainted the Duke of York and his Father the Earl of Salisbury of all the Occurrences, with the Queen's inveterate Diſpoſition, adviſing them to ſtand upon their Guard, and provide againſt the approaching Storm. The Torkiſts directly charged the Queen with all this as a Plot laid for the Earl's Deſtruction; and Warwick haſten'd to Calais, and being then Lord Admiral, he took with him all the King's Ships that were in Readineſs; and ſcouring the Seas, met with five great Carricks, three of Genoa and two of Spain, and after two Days Fight took three of them, which he carry'd into Calais. There unloading their Fraight he found it worth ten thouſand Pounds in ſtaple Commodities, beſides the Ships and Priſoners. Shortly after the young Duke of Somerſet was ſent to be Governor of Calais; but Warwick refus'd to reſign, notwithſtanding the King's Commands, alledging he was conſtituted by the Parliament. So that Somerſet was rejected not only with Danger to his Perſon, but with the Loſs of ſeveral of his Mens Heads, which Warwick commanded to be cut off. Theſe were bold Proceedings in this Earl; whom yet the unskilful and impetuous Multitude highly extoll'd and applauded.

The Civil War begins again.

The Duke of York in the mean Time, and Warwick with his Father the Earl of Salisbury, the Triumvirate of England, carefully conſulted of their Affairs: Salisbury reſolv'd with Sword in Hand to expoſtulate the Danger and Injury offer'd to his Son at Weſtminſter. The Queen, a Lady of great Magnanimity and Penetration, being juſtly ſenſible, that now King Henry or the Duke of York muſt periſh, and that one Kingdom was not capacious enough for both their Families, actively ſtirr'd her ſelf to maintain the Poſſeſſion of the Crown, and advance her own Son Prince Edward, by ruining the other's Houſe, whoſe whole Building conſiſted of Lancaſtrian Beneficence. Therefore ſhe daily conſulted, ſent, ſpoke, gave, and ſtrengthen'd her ſelf with Friends on all Sides, eſpecially in Cheſhire; cauſing her Son to diſtribute Silver Swans, as his Badge and Device, to all the Gentlemen of that County, and to many others throughout England. In a ſhort Time Salisbury ſet forwards from his Caſtle at Middleham with four or five thouſand Men; but James Touchet Lord Audeley, by the Queen's Orders unadviſedly encounter'd him upon Blore-Heath near Muckelſtone. The Fight was long and bloody, but at length King Henry's evil Fortune gave the Advantage to the Earl of Salisbury; where, beſides the valiant Lord Audeley himſelf, were ſlain no fewer than two thouſand four hundred Men; but the chief Loſs fell upon the Cheſhire Men, who wore the Prince's Livery. This was the ſecond Battel fought between the Families of York and Lancaſter, which was the Chance that ruin'd both Parties, tho' for a while it was fortunate to York's Succeſſor; for God, after having chaſtis'd one Side and the other, was pleas'd at length to appeaſe his Anger, by uniting both the Houſes, and putting a Period to the Civil Wars.

The Second Battel at Blore-Heath.

By this laſt Action the Earl of Salisbury open'd himſelf a Paſſage to Ludlow, where the Head of their Combination the Duke of York employ'd himſelf in gathering of Forces; and being met, they concluded, that ſince the Conteſt was become Mortal, they would act no longer in Clouds, but fight it out to the laſt Extremity. Men were drawn out of all Parts with large Hopes and Promiſes of ſharing in their Fortunes; and the Earl of Warwick, leaving his Charge at Calais, with the valiant Captain Andrew Trollop, and a Troop of ſelect Men, came to the general Rendezvous of the Torkiſts, at the Caſtle of Ludlow. The King in the mean Time, according to the Exegency of his Affairs, aſſembled a great Number of faithful Subjects; and being attended by the Dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, and others of his choice Friends, march'd againſt his Enemies. He began firſt with offering them a general Pardon; which they utterly refus'd, calling it a Staff of Reed, or a Glaſs-Buckler. Upon which the King commanded his Standards to advance towards the Enemy; but during this March, a Letter fill'd with the uſual hypocritical Pretences was deliver'd to the King: In which, among many other Inſinuations, were theſe alſo: Moſt Chriſtian King, right, high and mighty Prince, and our moſt dread Soveraign Lord, &c. we

William Linwood Doctor of Divinity, who ſeverally miniſter'd to us the Bleſſed Sacrament of the Body of Jeſus, upon which we all of us depos'd of our ſaid Truth and Duty. But the Letter made no Overture of any Conditions upon which they would yield to lay down their Arms, alledging, They would but make their Way to the King for Redreſs of Abuſes; and that they were conſtrain'd to ſtand together for their own Defence, againſt ſuch great Courtiers and Favourites as deſign'd their Deſtruction; meaning in Reality ſuch Perſons whoſe Vigilance and Valour might protect and guard him from their violent Practices.

Pol. Virg. Grafton. &c. The King now came in ſight of his Foes, when the Triumviri, York, Warwick and Salisbury, being ſtrongly intrench'd before Ludlow, deſign'd to attack him. Upon the Approach of the Armies, the King generouſly caus'd Proclamation to be made, That whoever would abandon the Duke of York, ſhould be receiv'd into Mercy, and have Pardon. Upon this the brave Andrew Trollop, finding himſelf deceiv'd by the Duke and his Party, who pretended nothing but the King's Preſervation, abandon'd the Duke's Camp at Midnight, and with all his ſelect Men, not only preſented his Service to the King, but alſo diſcover'd all the Duke's Counſels. This extreamly diſcourag'd the Duke, who reſolv'd to betake himſelf to flight; but whether it proceeded from his Fear of Trollop's Valour and Wiſdom upon whom he had much rely'd, or from the Fear that his Example ſhould induce others to follow his Steps, is uncertain. However, taking his younger Son the Earl of Rutland with him, he haſten'd into Ireland: The Earl of Marche, his eldeſt Son and Heir, the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, with much Difficulty eſcap'd to Calais; which Place, as Polydore obſerves, if Henry had in Time taken from his Enemies, they had without Queſtion been irrecoverably ruin'd. The Multitude that ſerv'd under the Triumvirate found Mercy; but their Tenants were many of them executed, maimed, or for the moſt part pillag'd. The Town of Ludlow it ſelf was plunder'd to the bare Walls, and the Dutcheſs of York depriv'd of all her Goods; and nothing leſs could be the Effects againſt the Friends of ſuch Adverſaries, upon ſo publick an Act and Advantage. The Cauſe was purſu'd more ſeverely againſt the great Offenders in the next Parliament, which was held at Coventry: Where Richard Duke of York, Edward Earl of Marche his eldeſt Son, Richard Earl of Warwick, Edmund Earl of Rutland, Richard Earl of Salisbury, Alice his Wife, by whoſe Right he was Earl, two or three Lords, nine Knights, and certain others, were publickly and ſolemnly attainted of High-Treaſon, and their whole Eſtates confiſcated.

The Duke and his Adherents diſperſe and fly.

Witham. Holling. Thus was Henry once more abſolutely King, and Somerſet was made Governor of Calais, who with the Lords Roſs and Audley were ſent over with Forces to take it from Warwick and his Adherents. Their Succeſs was unfortunate, for Somerſet was forc'd to fly, his Soldiers were pillag'd by Warwick's Men, the Lord Audley was taken into the Town, and the Lord Roſs could hardly eſcape. Letters were hereupon written from the Court into Foreign Parts, deſiring, That no Relief might be given to the Traitors that kept Calais againſt the King; and all Men at home were forbidden to tranſport any Victuals or Refreſhment to that Place. The Duke of Somerſet being at Guiſnes, a neighbouring Caſtle, daily diſturb'd the Caliſians; but Warwick's main Buſineſs was to conſult the Duke of York in Ireland, who now had that Kingdom at his Command. But hearing that the King had certain Ships lying at Sandwich to tranſport Supplies and Succours to Somerſet, that he might not leave ſuch Danger behind him, he ſent away Sir John Denham with a Company of Soldiers more valiant than numerous, who with a Wind as favourable to them as contrary to their Enemies, enter'd the Haven and Town of Sandwich, which being unguarded and her Inhabitants aſleep, he took the Lord Rivers and his Son in their Beds, and tho' the Soldiers awakened, made head and wounded Den-

Denham ſo as to lame him, he notwithſtanding worſted them, and plunder'd many Houſes; and being favour'd by the Mariners, he made himſelf Maſter of the King's Ships, furniſh'd with all warlike Proviſions, and brought them with ſeveral Priſoners into Calais. With theſe Ships Warwick convey'd himſelf into Ireland to the Duke of York; and in his going and coming, he was ſo favour'd by the Winds that he ſpent not above thirty Days in his whole Voyage. The Duke of Exeter was made Admiral, with Orders to intercept his Paſſage; but he fail'd in the Attempt, and many of his Men deſerting him, he durſt not attack the Earl, nor was he willing to attack the Duke, upon Pretence that he was of the King's Blood: Such was the Artifice and Subtlety of the Yorkiſts, to pretend Reverence to that Blood they moſt deſir'd to ſhed. Five hundred freſh Soldiers waited at Sandwich, to be ſhipp'd over to the Duke of Somerſet for his ſafe Conduct into England; but Warwick's Men came ſuddenly upon them, ſlew Montfort their Commander, with many others, and diſarm'd the reſt. Such was the diſtracted State of miſerable England, through the Pride and reſtleſs Ambition of one or two preſumptuous Men. And tho' nothing was more true, than that the Duke of York ſought the Crown of England; yet nothing was more plain than that his Friends pretended the contrary: For the Veneration of King Henry's Piety and Purity was likely to turn greatly to their Prejudice and Diſadvantage.

The Yorkiſts Remonſtrance.

The King failing thus to gain the Perſon of the Earl of Warwick, or his Town of Calais, the Yorkiſts ſent over certain Articles into Kent, in which they ſubtlely complain'd of certain general Enormities concerning Injuries done to the Church, and the ill Adminiſtration of Juſtice, Abuſe of Purveyors, the King's Poverty by the Corruption of his Officers, and other Things of the like plauſible Nature. Where they mention'd the Perſon of the King, they freed him from all Exceptions, as being of as noble, virtuous, righteous, and bleſſed a Diſpoſition as any Earthly Prince whatever. When they mention'd their Enemies, who were the King's faithful Friends and Subjects, they nam'd the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Wiltſhire, and the Lord Beaumont, as principal Perſons concern'd in the Attainders of the Yorkiſts at Coventry. Where they ſpoke of themſelves and their Intentions, they profeſs'd all Sincerity and Loyalty to King Henry, and that they only meant to come upon their Guard to ſpeak with him concerning the Common Good, and their own Safeties; and that now they would attempt the ſame again in the Name of the Land, and not ſuffer ſuch Miſchiefs to gain upon them. In the Concluſion of theſe their ſpecious Pretences they had theſe Words; Requiring you, on God's Behalf, therein to aſſiſt us, doing always the Duty of Liege-men in our Perſons to our ſaid Soveraign Lord, to his Eſtate, Prerogative and Preeminence, and to the Security of his moſt noble Perſon, to which we have ever been, and will be as true as any of his Subjects alive; whereof we call God, our Lady St. Mary, and all the Saints in Heav'n to Witneſs. With theſe treacherous and impious Proceedings they prevail'd upon the unthinking Multitude; and the Lord Fauconbridge was ſent over to ſound their Affections, and draw the purulent Matter to a Head; and ſhortly after, the Earls of Marche, Warwick and Salisbury landed in Kent. But the People were not the only deluded Perſons; for the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and other venerable Men, believ'd they ſpoke Truth; which that they might do effectually, the Earl of Warwick publickly took an Oath upon the Croſs of Canterbury, That they had ever born true Faith and Allegiance to King Henry. The King before their Arrival had quitted the City of London, as not greatly truſting the Affections of the Citizens, who hated ſeveral of his Miniſters, and appointed the Rendezvous of his Forces at Northampton, where he reſided. The Enemy advanced that way; and in the mean Time their Accomplices endeavour'd to take the Tower of London, in which were ſeveral Loyal Noblemen, as the Lord Scales, Hungerford, Veſcie, Lovel, De la Ware, and others.

In the mean Time the Queen, with the King in her Company, had gather'd a conſiderable Army at Northampton; and among other Lords in the Army were the Duke of Somerſet lately return'd from Guiſnes, and the Duke of Buckingham, who were no ſooner arriv'd but they heard of the Enemy's Approach, therefore paſſing the River, they went and encamp'd in the neighbouring Fields. The Earls of Marche and Warwick, being deny'd Admittance to the King's Preſence, proceeded to a new Piece of Subtlety, and order'd a Cry to go through the Field, That no Man ſhould lay Hands upon the King, nor the common People, but upon the Lords, Knights and Eſquires. Early in the Morning the Earl of Marche, urg'd on by his Youth and Valour, began the Battel, which was very bloody and obſtinate for five Hours together, without any great Inequality. At length, the Lord Grey of Ruthen running over to the Earl's Side, the King was defeated with the Death of ten thouſand Men; a great Loſs, but not of ſuch Conſequence had he not loſt himſelf; for being depriv'd of his Defenders who were ſlain round his Perſon, he fell into the Power of his Enemies. This dreadful Battel was fought upon the ninth Day of July, in which the King's Ordnance could not play by reaſon of the Rains, wherein were ſlain the Duke of Buckingham, Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, who fighting valiantly did not degenerate from his Father, the Lord Egremont, the Vicount Beaumont, beſides many other Knights and Gentlemen: And the Priſoners were very numerous, eſpecially among the Knights and Gentlemen; for being alighted from their Horſes to fight on Foot, they had no means to eſcape. The Queen, with Prince Edward her Son and the Duke of Somerſet, fled to the Biſhoprick of Durham. The Victors being return'd to London, inflicted ſuch Puniſhments as uſually attend the Injuſtice of Civil Wars; among ſuch of their Adverſaries as were found in the City, thoſe who could eſcape had the beſt Fortune. Thomas Thorp, ſecond Baron of the Exchequer, endeavouring to eſcape in the Habit of a Monk, was taken and committed Priſoner to the Tower, and after that by the Commons beheaded at High-Gate. Thoſe in the Tower had yielded upon certain Conditions, which forc'd the Lord Scales to endeavour to take Sanctuary at Weſtminſter; but being upon the Thames he was murder'd by certain Watermen belonging to the Earl of Warwick, and his Body wallowing in Blood was ſtript of all its Apparel, and left to the publick View of all Men. Yet ſtill the two Earls of Marche and Warwick continu'd their uſual Hypocriſie to the King, now in their Poſſeſſion, and thus addreſs'd themſelves to him, Moſt noble Prince, be not diſpleas'd that God has granted us the Victory over our mortal Enemies, who by their inveterate Malice have unjuſtly excited your Highneſs to baniſh us from the Land, and would have put us to final Shame and Confuſion. We come not to diſquiet or afflict your Highneſs, but to pleaſe your noble Perſon, tenderly deſiring the Proſperity of that and all your Realm, and to be your true Liege Subjects as long as our Lives ſhall endure.

In the mean Time Scotland, by reaſon of the late Affinity with the Houſe of Beaufort, whoſe Head was the Duke of Somerſet, deſcended from John of Gaunt, was a ſpecial Support to King Henry in all his tempeſtuous Adverſities; but now that Refuge was much hazarded. For King James the Second, partly in Favour of King Henry, laid Siege to Roxborough Caſtle, then in Cuſtody of King Henry's Enemies; where going into the Trenches to ſee the Lion, a famous Piece of Ordnance, and the other Artillery diſcharg'd, one of them broke, and with a Shiver of it ſlew the King, and dangerouſly wounded the Earl of Angus. This unfortunate Accident happen'd upon Sunday the third of Auguſt. The Queen of Scotland nevertheleſs maintain'd the Siege, and gain'd that Place as well as the Caſtle of Warke, both which ſhe in Revenge laid level with the Ground. James the Third, a Child of ſeven Years of Age, ſucceeded his Father, as well to the Support of the diſtreſſed Engliſh, as to the Crown of Scotland. The Death of the King of the Scots was follow'd by that of of Charles King of France, which tho' it was not violent, was no leſs ſtrange and unuſual. Being ſick, ſome of his Flatterers, to manifeſt their Zeal, put an Imagination into his Head that ſome Perſons deſign'd to poiſon him; which caus'd him to abſtain from all Suſtenance for ſeveral Days. And when his Phyſicians told him that his Weakneſs proceeded from Want of Meat, and not from any Sickneſs, he endeavour'd to eat but could not; for the Channels through which his Meat ſhould paſs were clos'd up; whereupon he dy'd with Hunger, and left his Kingdom to his Son Lewis the Eleventh.

The Death of the French King.

The News of the Battel of Northampton being convey'd to the Duke of York in Ireland, he now reſolv'd to throw off the Mask he had ſo long worn, and with all Expedition came to London, where the Earls of Marche and Warwick had ſummon'd a Parliament to meet in the King's Name upon the Eighth Day of October. He made his Entry with numerous Troops of Men, and Trumpets ſounding before him; cauſing the Sword to be carry'd before him as Kings uſually did, only with this Difference, that it was now carry'd naked, whereas in the Preſence of Kings it us'd to be ſheath'd. He alighted from his Horſe at the King's Palace at Weſtminſter, and entring into the upper Houſe of Parliament, he laid his Hand a conſiderable Time upon the Throne, as if by that Act he had taken Poſſeſſion of it; and when he remov'd his Hand, he turn'd to thoſe that were by, as deſirous to read his future Succeſs in their Countenances; and, as it is uſual for Men to flatter themſelves in what they moſt paſſionately deſire, he thought they approv'd of this Action. But the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury ſtanding up and asking him if he would be pleas'd to go and ſee his Majeſty, he chang'd Countenance and angerly anſwer'd him, He knew none in the Kingdom to whom he ought that Duty, but on the contrary all Men ought it to him. The Arch-Biſhop going forth to acquaint the King with his Anſwer, who lay in the Queen's Lodgings, the Duke likewiſe went forth and boldly enter'd the King's Lodgings, and broke open all the Doors and Locks, to the great Indignation of many. After this, without any Reſerve, he made his Claim to the Crown of England, notwithſtanding the moſt ſolemn Oaths and Ingagements to the contrary; and publiſh'd it in open Parliament, together with his Pedigree. Moſt of the Houſe ſtood amaz'd, both to find him ſeated on the Royal Throne, and for this unexpected Challenge. But the Duke, tho' at firſt he fully deſign'd to have depos'd King Henry, and crowned himſelf by the firſt of November, yet finding ſuch Aſtoniſhment and Silence, he ſent them his Pedigree and his Claim in Writing, that they might better conſider of it; yielding, as he pretended, to ſubmit to their general Determination.

The Duke of York's Entry into London.

He claims the Crown of England.

The Subſtance of the Duke of York's Claim to the Crown of England was as follows. 'King Edward the Third had ſeven Sons, Edward Prince of 'Wales, William of Hatfield, Lionell Duke of Clarence, John of Gaunt Duke 'of Lancaſter, Edmund Duke of York, Thomas Duke of Gloceſter, and William of Windſor. Edward the Eldeſt dy'd during his Father's Life, and left 'one Son, King Richard the Second, who dy'd without Iſſue, as alſo did King 'Edward's Second Son William. Lionell the Third Son had only one Daughter nam'd Philippa, who being marry'd to Edmund Mortimer Earl of Marche, 'ſhe had by him Roger Earl of Marche, who afterwards had two Sons and two 'Daughters, of whom three dy'd without Iſſue; only Anne the ſole Heireſs of 'the Houſe marry'd to Richard Earl of Cambridge, the Son of Edmund Duke 'of York, the fifth Son of King Edward the Third, which Earl of Cambridge 'begot Richard Duke of York the preſent Claimant. On the other Side John 'of Gaunt, the Fourth Son of King Edward the Third, and younger Brother 'to Lionell, had a Son nam'd Henry, who immediately after King Richard's 'Reſignation, unrighteouſly enter'd upon the Throne; becauſe Edmund Earl 'of Marche, Son to Philippa the Daughter and Heireſs of the foreſaid Lionell 'elder Brother to John of Gaunt, was then alive; and the ſaid Henry, Son to

'John

'John of Gaunt, and his Succeſſors, had hitherto held the Crown of England 'unjuſtly, becauſe the ſaid Richard Plantagenet, the preſent Duke of York, 'was the lawful Heir, as being the Son of Richard Earl of Cambridge and Anne 'before mentioned.

Ibid. This was the Subſtance of the Duke of York's Title and Claim, which as to Matter of Genealogy was undoubtedly true; tho' in Bar to this Claim King Henry's Friends, without denying any Part of the Premiſes, had not a little to plead for him; and among other Things they alledg'd 'That King Richard the 'Second reſign'd up his Crown and Authority at large; and that no other ma- 'king Claim but Henry Duke of Lancaſter, Son of John of Gaunt, he was 'admitted to the Throne by the Conſent of the three Eſtates of the Land: 'That Richard Earl of Cambridge was attainted of High-Treaſon and execu- 'ted, and his Iſſue render'd incapable of any Inheritance; that Richard his 'Son now challenging the Crown of England, being reſtor'd and advanc'd by 'the meer Clemency and Goodneſs of King Henry the Sixth, had voluntarily 'acknowledg'd him for his lawful Soveraign, and ſolemnly ſwore to the ſame; 'and that the ſame Richard after that had been juſtly attainted for Treaſon, and 'adjudg'd incapable of inheriting. They further alledg'd ſeveral Acts of Parliament 'to eſtabliſh the Right of the Line of Lancaſter; the Succeſſion of three Kings, 'Henry the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth, the politick Government of the Firſt, 'the noble Victories of the Second, and the pious Life of the Third; which 'three Kings Reigns contain'd no leſs than ſixty Years, in which Number this 'was the thirty ninth of King Henry the Sixth, who was deſcended from the 'Male Line, and the Duke of York but from the Female, which Line had ne- 'ver been in Poſſeſſion of the Crown. Theſe were thought great and weighty Points, and the more conſiderable, becauſe King Henry's Perſon being no better than a Priſoner, no Act of his to eſtabliſh the Duke's Title could bind in Law or Conſcience; and the leſs, becauſe he had a Wife and a Son both at Liberty, and ready to free him by Force of Arms, or to hazard the Deſtruction of the Engliſh Name. But they who on the Duke's Behalf abſtractedly diſputed theſe high Queſtions, inſiſted upon a Rule of Law, That the Rights of Blood are not to be alter'd by Civil Powers; and the Lancaſtrians were not without their ſpeculative and remote Conſiderations, to countenance the Particulars of their Cauſe. By which it appear'd that in Monarchies, tho' the nobleſt Form of Government, where Lineal Succeſſion is the Rule of Inheritance, there ſometimes happen as great and as indeterminable Difficulties, as where Election deſigns the Succeſſor: Of which both France and England have been miſerable Inſtances.

The Anſwer to it.

Caxton. Holling. Grafton. While this weighty Controverſie was debating, there happen'd this ſurpriſing Accident: A Crown that was hung up for Ornament in the Parliament Houſe, without the leaſt Touch or Blaſt of Wind ſuddenly fell down; as likewiſe did another which for the ſame Cauſe was plac'd upon the higheſt Tower of Dover Caſtle: Which was generally believ'd to portend That King Henry's Reign was ended, and that the Crown ſhould be transferr'd from one Line to another. The Lords forgot not the Duke's Demands, and to take the better Directions, divers of them both Spiritual and Temporal with many grave and wiſe Perſons of the Commons, daily met at the Black-Friars, and other Places, to treat of this Matter, that was of ſo great Importance. During which Time the Duke of York, tho' both the King and himſelf were lodg'd in the Palace Royal, would by no Inducements once viſit his Majeſty, 'till ſome Concluſion was made in the Affair; declaring That he was ſubject to no Man, but only to God, under whom he had no Superior. After a long debating of the Matter, and deliberate Conſultation among the Peers, Prelates and Commons, upon the Vigil of All-Saints it was thus concluded and determined, 'That foraſmuch as Henry had 'been acknowledg'd King for the Space of thirty eight Years and more, he 'ſhould enjoy that Name and Title, and the Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, during his

'his natural Life. And if he either dy'd, or reſign'd, or forfeited the ſame 'by breaking or violating any Point of this Contract, then the ſaid Crown and 'Dignity ſhould immediately be devolv'd upon the Duke of York, and the law-'ful Heirs of his Body, excluding all thoſe of King Henry. This ſolemn Agreement being put into divers Articles, was ingroſs'd, ſign'd, ſeal'd and ſworn to by the King and Duke, as likewiſe all enacted in this Parliament. For Joy of this, the King, accompany'd with the Duke of York, on All-Saints Day, rod in ſolemn Proceſſion to the Cathedral of St. Paul's with the Crown upon his Head. And upon the Saturday following, the Duke of York was by Sound of Trumpets ſolemnly proclaim'd Heir apparent to the Crown of England, and Protector of the Realm.

The Queen and her Friends ſtand out.

The active Queen, now in the North, would by no means allow of this Determination, ſo prejudicial to her ſelf and Poſterity; therefore when the King, at the Duke of York's Inſtigation, ſent for her to repair to him at London, ſhe relying upon the Dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, and other Royaliſts, utterly refus'd; and Henry being ſtill acknowledg'd as King, the Arms taken for his Deliverance had the greater Juſtice. The Duke of York miſſing his expected Prey, left the King at London with the Duke of Norfolk and Earl of Warwick; and taking with him his young Son the Earl of Rutland, the Earl of Salisbury, and five thouſand Men, he march'd towards Wakefield in Yorkſhire to purſue the Queen and her Son, ſending Orders to the Earl of Marche to follow with all his Power. In the Caſtle of Sandall within view of Wakefield the Duke took up his Quarters upon Chriſtmaſs Eve, waiting for the Encreaſe of his Army. The Queen being adviſ'd of this, thought it Wiſdom to fight before the Duke grew too ſtrong; and thereupon advanc'd with an Army of eighteen thouſand Men, led by the Dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, the Earls of Devonſhire and Wiltſhire, the Lords Nevill, Clifford and Roſs, and in effect all the Northern Nobility. Part of the Army preſented it ſelf before Sandall Caſtle, in order to provoke the Duke to Battel; who fir'd with this Bravado, and perhaps ignorant of his Enemies Multitude, reſolv'd to meet them, tho' the Earl of Salisbury and Sir David Hall earneſtly urg'd him to ſtay 'till his valiant Son the Earl of Marche came up with his numerous Forces. But the Vengeance of Heav'n would forbear him no longer, but like a ſtrict Maſter reſolv'd to call him to an immediate Account; by which he might find whether all the Kingdoms in the World were worth the leaſt Sin, much leſs a wilful Perjury.

The fourth Battel at Wakefield.

The Queen therefore added Policy and Stratagem to her Power, that his Ruin might be inevitable; for which Cauſe, on the laſt Day of December, the Earl of Wiltſhire upon one Side of the Hill, and the Lord Clifford upon the other, lay in Ambuſcade to get between him and the Caſtle; while the Dukes of Somerſet and Exeter drew up in open Field. This Deſign had its deſir'd Effect; for the Duke iſſuing out of the Caſtle with his ſmall Army down the Hill, ſoon found himſelf ſurrounded; and tho' he ſhew'd great Valour and Bravery, within half an Hour his whole Forces were defeated, himſelf with many of his dear Friends beaten down and ſlain. There lay dead about him the Lord Hartington, Sir Thomas Nevill Son to the Earl of Salisbury, Sir David Hall, with ſeveral Knights, and others to the Number of two thouſand eight hundred Men; among whom were the Heirs of many Southern Gentlemen of great Account, whoſe Blood was ſhortly after ſeverely reveng'd. The Duke's Chaplain, and Tutor to the Earl of Rutland, a hopeful Lad of twelve Years of Age, ſeeing the ill Succeſs, led his Charge out to ſave him; but the Lord Clifford obſerving his rich Habit, follow'd, and with a Dagger in his Hand demanded who he was. The unfortunate Youth ſtruck dumb with Fear, with Knees, Hands and Eyes begg'd for Mercy and Pardon; and the Chaplain, who by naming him thought to have ſav'd him, told him who he was, and That if he would ſave his Life, he would ſpend it in his Service; but Clifford ſwore dreaddreadfully, That as his Father had ſlain his, ſo would he ſerve him and all his Progeny, and then ſtruck his Dagger into his Heart, rejoicing at the moſt barbarous and inhuman Revenge that ever cruel Man took. And not ſatisfy'd with this, caſting himſelf upon the dead Body of the Duke he cut off the Head, and crowning it in Deriſion with a Crown of Paper, he preſented it to the Queen, who poorly and ungenerouſly made her ſelf merry with that gaſtly and bloody Spectacle. This was the fatal End of the famous Richard, who contrary to all Oaths and other Obligations, had caus'd infinite Miſchiefs to the Engliſh Nation; of whom it was ſaid by the Duke of Somerſet his former Antagoniſt, That if he had not learn'd to play the King by his Regency in France, he had never forgot to obey as a Subject in England. The Earl of Salisbury, here taken Priſoner, was with other Priſoners beheaded at Pontfract, and their Heads together with the Duke's ſet upon the Gates of York; while the Victors triumph'd and rejoic'd, who not many Days after bewail'd their own Calamity, as did the Queen, or ſhar'd in the like Fortune, as did the Lord Clifford.

His ignominious Treatment.

Ibid. The Earl of Marche, Son and Heir to the deceas'd Duke of York, hearing of this tragical Adventure, with a Mind full of Grief and Revenge, and an Army of twenty three thouſand Men, reſolv'd to march againſt the Queen. But he found more immediate Imployment; for being inform'd that Jaſper Tudor Earl of Pembroke, half Brother to King Henry, and James Butler Earl of Ormond and Wiltſhire, had with them a great Force of Welſh and Iriſh to intercept his March; this youthful and valiant Man, whoſe amiable Preſence and Behaviour render'd him gracious to the People, eſpecially to the Female Sex, reſolv'd firſt to try his Fortune againſt thoſe Earls. He therefore ſuddenly turn'd back from Shrewsbury, and at a Place call'd Mortimer's Croſs near Ludlow, he engag'd the Enemy on Candlemaſs-Day. In the ſame Morning, we are told there appear'd three Suns in the Heav'ns, that ſuddenly join'd in one; which fortunate Omen exceedingly fir'd the Earl of Marche, and was judg'd to be the Reaſon why he us'd for his Badge, or Royal Device, the Sun in his full Brightneſs. The Armies maintain'd the Fight with great Fury; but at length the Earl of Marche obtain'd a compleat Victory, with the Deaths of three thouſand eight hundred of his Enemies; the Earls of Pembroke and Wiltſhire ſaving themſelves by Flight. But Sir Owen Tudor, Father to the Earl of Pembroke, and Husband to King Henry the Fifth's Queen, with ſeveral other Priſoners of Note were beheaded at Hereford, as a Sacrifice to the Manes of his Father the Duke of York.

The fifth Battel at Mortimer's Croſs.

Holling. Stow. &c. The Queen on the other Side being incourag'd by her late Victory, after ſhe had ſetled her Affairs in the North, march'd towards London with an Army conſiſting of Scotch, Welſh and Iriſh as well as Engliſh. But when her Soldiers were once South of Trent, as if that River was the utmoſt Limits of their good Behaviour, they proceeded to ravage the Country after a barbarous manner. Advancing near to St. Albans, they were inform'd that the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Warwick, with the King in Perſon, were prepar'd to give them Battel; whereupon they haſten'd to march through the Town. But being not ſuffer'd to paſs, they furiouſly attack'd their Enemies in the Field call'd Bernard-Heath; where perceiving the main Battel to ſtand ſtill and not to advance, as it was manag'd by the Treachery of Lovelace, who with the Kentiſh Men had the Command of it, they ſoon caus'd the Southern Men to betake themſelves to flight; upon which the reſt, doubtful of each others Fidelity, made the beſt of their Way. The Lords about the King's Perſon, perceiving the Danger, withdrew themſelves; only the Lord Bonvile coming in a complimental manner to the King, and declaring his Affection to his Majeſty, was unfortunately importun'd by him, together with Sir Thomas Kyriel a Kentiſh Knight, to ſtay with him; he paſſing his Royal Word that their Stay ſhould be no Injury to them. Upon which Promiſe they ſtaid, but to their Ruin; for the Queen hearing how the Commons had beheaded Baron Thorp at High-Gate, without conſidering her Husband's Word, in Revenge caus'd both their Heads to be taken off at St. Albans. So that there were ſlain in this Battel about twenty three thouſand Men, but none of any Note or Name, but only Sir John Gray, who the ſame Day was Knighted, with twelve others, at the Village of Colney. This Battel was the ſixth fought in theſe unhappy Civil Wars, and the ſecond at St. Albans; it being upon Shrove-Tueſday the ſeventeenth of February.

The King ſet at Liberty.

And now the King was advis'd to ſend a Meſſenger to the Victors to let them know, That he would gladly come to them, if it might be done with Safety and Conveniency; upon which the Earl of Northumberland appointed ſeveral Lords to attend him to the Lord Clifford's Tent, where the Queen and the young Prince met him with extraordinary Joy. But it was now obſerv'd, as if it were in the Deſtiny of King Henry, that tho' he was the moſt Pious Prince in his Age, yet no Enterprize of War did ever proſper where he was preſent; which ſhews that Human Proſperity is not inſeparable to Piety. At the Queen's Requeſt the King honour'd thirty Gentlemen with Knighthood, who the Day before had fought againſt that Part of the Army where he was: The young Prince, now eight Years of Age, was alſo Knighted. After which they went to the Monaſtery, where they were receiv'd with Anthems, and likewiſe a humble Petition to be protected from the Outrages of the looſe Soldiers; which was promis'd, and Proclamation made accordingly, but to ſmall Effect, for the Northern Men alledg'd, That by Agreement they were to have all the Spoil in every Place after they had paſs'd the Trent, and ſo acted like lawleſs People, to the great Damage, or rather Ruin of the King's Affairs. For about this Time the Queen ſent Commands to the Lord Mayor of London to ſend her in Proviſions for her Men, which he obey'd; but the People oppos'd him, and ſtopp'd the Carts at the City Gates: Which ſhews the Error that deludes ſome Princes, when they promiſe themſelves Obedience from a diſſatisfy'd People, and who without Fear of Puniſhment have already begun to diſobey. The Magiſtrate laid open all the Miſchiefs that might enſue, but could not prevail; for ſtill they cry'd out the more, That the City had no Occaſion to relieve them that came with a Deſign to pillage it. This Diſobedience grew yet more obſtinate by reaſon of an inſolent Troop of Horſe, who at the ſame Time came from St. Albans to pillage the Suburbs; and many of them haſtening to Cripple-Gate, where the Carts were ſtopp'd, and endeavouring to enter, they were beaten back, and three of them ſlain, to the great Concern of the wiſer ſort; for it was fear'd that the Queen being in Arms, and ſo many ways offended, would rigorouſly reſent it. The Mayor ſent to excuſe himſelf to the Council reſiding at Barnet, and the Dutcheſs of Bedford accompany'd by the Lady Scales and ſome Prelates, went to the Queen to pacifie her. They perſuaded her that ſome Lords might be ſent, with four hundred armed Men, who riding about the Streets might appeaſe the Tumult, and that part of the Aldermen ſhould come to meet her at Barnet, to bring her and the King peaceably into the City.

The People againſt him.

Ibid.

But all theſe hopeful Deſigns ſuddenly vaniſh'd at the News of the Defeat of the Earls of Pembroke and Wiltſhire, and that the Earls of Marche and Warwick were join'd, and marching towards London, with a Force not eaſily to be reſiſted. This ſo terrify'd the Queen, that ſhe ſuddenly return'd towards the Northern Parts, where ſhe had moſt Friends; impolitickly leaving ſome Marks of Severity and Cruelty behind her. The Earl of Marche on the contrary, who for his amiable Qualifications was in every Man's Mouth and Affections, hearing of the Queen's Retreat, march'd directly to London, where, upon the twenty eighth Day of February, he was receiv'd with the univerſal Applauſes of the People. On Sunday the ſecond of March, the Earl of Warwick, a zealous Friend to the Earl of Marche, muſter'd all his Army in St. John's Fields, and having drawn them in a large Ring, and read aloud to them the Agreement of the laſt Parliament, and then demanded, Whether they would have King Henry, who had violated that Agreement, to reign over them? They all cry'd out, No, no! Then he ask'd them, Whether they would have the Earl of Marche, who according to the ſame Agreement ought to be King, to reign over them? They with a great Clamour anſwer'd Yea, yea! Upon which ſome Commanders, and others of the City repair'd to the Earl of Marche at Baynard's Caſtle, to acquaint him with what had paſs'd; who at firſt ſeem'd to excuſe himſelf, as unable to execute ſo great a Charge: But being animated by the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhops of London and Exeter, and the Earl of Warwick, he at laſt conſented to take it upon him. On the next Morning he went in Proceſſion to St. Paul's Cathedral; and after Te Deum ſung, he was in great State convey'd to Weſtminſter. There ſeated in the moſt conſpicuous Place of the great Hall, with the Scepter of St. Edward in his Hand, he made a Declaration of his double Title to the Crown: Firſt, By Deſcent, as Heir to the third Son of King Edward the Third: Secondly, By Authority of Parliament, which upon the Examination of the Duke of York*'s Title, had conferr'd the Crown immediately on him and his Heirs, when* Henry the Sixth ſhould make Forfeiture of it, by Death, Reſignation, or Breach of that Agreement there ſolemnly ſworn by them. And that this Agreement was broken, the Slaughter of the Duke of York at the Battel of Wakefield, did ſadly manifeſt. Nevertheleſs he proteſted himſelf ready to give up the Juſtice of his Claim, rather than enter upon it without their free Vote. At which, with loud Applauſes, all cry'd, King Edward, King Edward! tranſported when they found their Voices were requir'd to confirm him King, who had declar'd he would not receive that Title without their Suffrage. The Formality of this ſecond Election thus paſt, he went in Proceſſion to the Abby Church; whence after much Solemnity, and Homage from the Nobility preſent, he return'd by Water to the Biſhop of London's Palace, and was immediately proclaim'd King throughout the City by the Name of Edward the Fourth. This was done upon the fourth Day of March, after King Henry, now near forty Years of Age, had paſs'd over an unfortunate and inglorious Reign of thirty eight Years, ſix Months and four Days.

He is proclaim'd King.

Here in the Courſe of all Writers ends the Reign of King Henry the Sixth, of whom it is obſerv'd, That never any came to be King ſo ſoon after his Birth, nor ceas'd to be King ſo long before his Death; the former being but eight Months, and the latter twelve Years. It has alſo been truly obſerv'd, That all the Sons of King Edward the Third, as well as himſelf; all the Sons of John of Gaunt, and all the Sons of Henry the Fourth, were compleat Hero's, Men the moſt renown'd in their Age for Perſonal Strength, Courage and Bravery: But when this Heroical Diſpoſition was at the Height in Henry the Fifth, how it came to degenerate in Henry the Sixth, is attributed to his Mother, who tho' a Woman of a noble Spirit, yet being deſcended from a crazy Father, it was no Wonder if ſhe prov'd the Mother of a crazy Iſſue. Yet as to his Perſon he was comely and well proportion'd, and had Virtues ſufficient to make a Saint; no King ever ſhowing more Piety and Devotion than himſelf. He had one Imunity peculiar to himſelf, that no Man could ever be reveng'd on him, becauſe he never offer'd any Man an Injury. He was ſo chaſte and modeſt, that when in a publick Mask ſome Ladies preſented themſelves before him with their Breaſts uncover'd, he immediately roſe up, and exclaim'd againſt their Behaviour: So merciful, that when he ſaw the Quarters of a Traitor over Cripple-Gate, he caus'd them to be taken down, declaring, He would have no Chriſtian ſo cruelly treated for his ſake: So free from Swearing, that he never us'd any Aſſeveration but Forſooth and Verily: So patient, that to one who ſtruck him when he was taken Priſoner, he only ſaid, You wrong your ſelf more than me, to ſtrike the Lord's Anointed: So devout, that on the chief Holy Days, he us'd to wear Sack-Cloath next his Skin: And ſo innocent in general, that his Confeſſor declar'd, That for ten Years Space he never found any

His Character.

any thing he had ſaid or done, for which he might juſtly enjoin him Penance. And herein conſiſted his Happineſs, that he was the only Prince perhaps in the World that never diſtinguiſh'd between Adverſity and Proſperity; being ſo intent upon his Devotion, as to think nothing Adverſity that did not interrupt that. But this brought him under the ſole Power of others, and made him fitter for a Prieſt than a King; and had his Virtues been as uſeful to the Publick, as thoſe of his pious Father, neither the Duke of York, nor his Son durſt have conteſted with him for his Kingdom. Not to exclude Providence, the Peoples Inclinations was then the only thing which took the Kingdom from one, and gave it to the other; which may teach Princes that long Poſſeſſion, without the Practice of Princely Actions, is not ſufficient for their Conſervation. In him was confirm'd that wiſe Sentence, Wo to that Nation whoſe King is a Child, and rather ſhows it means in Government more than in Years: For as long as he continu'd a Child in Years, his Kingdoms flouriſh'd by the Care of his Uncles; but when he ceas'd to be ſo in Years, and continu'd to be ſo in Government, all Things ran to ruin both in France and England; and a great Part of his Time was a Reign of Diſgrace, Miſery and Blood. And notwithſtanding his extraordinary Piety, his manifeſt Breach of Faith to the Earl of Armagnack ought not to paſs uncenſur'd by a Chriſtian Hiſtorian; and the great Raleigh obſerves, that as he refus'd the Daughter of that Prince, by which he might have defended his Inheritance in France, and marry'd the Daughter of Anjou, by which he loſt all that he had in that Country; ſo in condeſcending to the unworthy Death of his Uncle of Gloceſter, the main Pillar of the Houſe of Lancaſter, he drew on himſelf and his Kingdom the greateſt Loſs and Diſhonour, that ever it ſuſtain'd ſince the Norman Conqueſts.

Matters of Note in his Reign.

Notwithſtanding this Reign was both troubleſom and calamitous, it was remarkable for many pious and charitable Foundations, and for ſeveral eminent and worthy Men. The King himſelf founded two famous Colleges, the one in Cambridge called the College Royal or Kings-College, and the other at Eaton near Windſor; to the Maintenance of which he gave three thouſand four hundred Pounds per Annum; and the glorious Chappel of the former ſhews of what wonderful Magnificence the whole ſhould have been, had the Founder reign'd to finiſh it. In the twenty eighth Year of this Reign Queen Margaret began the Foundation of Queens-College in Cambridge. Three Colleges in Oxford were alſo founded in this Reign, All-Souls, Bernard and Magdalen; the two firſt by Henry Chichely Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and the latter by William of Wamfleet Biſhop of Wincheſter; as alſo the famous Divinity School by Humphry Duke of Gloceſter. There were many other Foundations and Buildings made in other Places, as the College of Tatſhall in Lincolnſhire by Ralph Lord Cromwell; Leaden-Hall in London by Simon Eyre Mayor; the Standard in Cheapſide, &c. As to Men of Valour, we have already taken notice of the chief, ſuch as the Duke of Bedford, the Earl of Salisbury, the Lord Talbot, the Earl of Warwick, and others; ſo that it may be ſaid, as there was never a more Heroical King of England than Henry the Fifth, ſo never any King had more Heroical Subjects than Henry the Sixth, who had been train'd under his Father and Grand-father. As to Men of Learning, they are too numerous to be particulariz'd; we ſhall only mention John Leland the Elder, who wrote divers Treatiſes for Inſtruction of Gramarians; Peter Baſſet, Eſq; one of the Privy-Chamber to Henry the Fifth, whoſe Life he wrote; Thomas Walſingham, Thomas Radburn, John Capgrave, and John Wethamſted, all Writers of ſome Parts of the Engliſh Hiſtory; John Lydgate, a Monk of Bury and celebrated Poet; Richard and Robert Flemming, Thomas Dando, and Robert Bale.

I. IN the midſt of the Miſeries of an unfortunate Nation, we are now arriv'd at the Hiſtory of the Second, yet neareſt great Branch of the Plantagenets, that ſat upon the Engliſh Throne. And from the fourth Day of March, in the Year 1461, according to the common Computation in thoſe Days, commenc'd the Reign of King Edward the Fourth, who was then about twenty Years of Age, in the prime of his Youth and Beauty, and whoſe charming Looks and Behaviour render'd him the Object of all Peoples Love and Affection. Yet great Numbers were ſtill intire Friends to the depos'd King Henry, who was now with his Queen raiſing a powerful Army in the North; and not a few in London it ſelf, as King Edward's Jealouſie gave him cauſe to ſuſpect: Of whom one Walker a ſubſtantial Citizen and a Grocer was an unhappy Proof, who only for Words ſpoken concerning his own Son, That he would make him Heir to the Crown, meaning the Sign of the Crown in Cheapſide, was on the eighth Day of this King's Reign apprehended, and beheaded in Smithfield. And tho' the Words only contain'd an unſeaſonable Jeſt, and no real Treaſon; yet it being a Time when the Crown lay at Stake, the Law was ſtretch'd, and ſomewhat more, to remove the Man that ſpoke 'em. This King Edward's ſevere Beginning.

This ſevere Beginning caus'd many to believe, that they had injur'd themſelves in wronging King Henry; which Opinion was more confirm'd by Edward's retaining a large Sum of Mony borrow'd of the Staplers-Merchants, and diſburs'd in his Affairs, the Reſtitution of which he utterly deny'd with an angry Command to ſurceaſe their Demands.

Oppoſitions in the North. And now hearing how King Henry was belov'd in the North, and what Numbers were gather'd to recover him the Crown, upon the twelfth Day of March he with a compleat Army ſet out from London, accompany'd with his two Brothers, and many other Noblemen. Then marching towards Pontfract in Yorkſhire, he there appointed the Lord Fitzwater to keep the Paſſage of Ferribridge, omitting no Directions of a worthy Commander. King Henry, tho' no ways warlike, thought it beſt Policy to employ ſuch Commanders whom the Thirſt of Revenge had anima ted againſt the Houſe of York; ſuch were the Duke of Somerſet, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, whoſe Fathers had been ſlain in the firſt Battel of St. Albans: Which laſt, tho' in Degree the leaſt Man, yet ſought to raiſe his Fame with the firſt; and therefore to leave no Enterprize unattempted, he ſo ſuddenly attack'd the Party appointed for Ferribridge, that he not only defeated the Men, but alſo ſlew the Lord Fitzwater, with the Baſtard of Salisbury, and many others, before they well knew whence the Diſturbance aroſe. The Noiſe of this Defeat came firſt to the Ears of the ſtout Earl of Warwick, who too much tranſported at the evil Fate of the firſt Attempt, rod almoſt breathleſs to King Edward, and killing his Horſe in his Preſence, he cry'd out, God have Mercy upon the Souls of thoſe, who for your ſake have already loſt their Lives! Let him fly that will fly. Then kiſſing the Hilts of his Sword, he ſaid, By this Croſs, I will ſtand by him that ſtands by me. The valiant Lord Fauconbridge, fearing that this Beginning ſhould prove dangerous, ſoon got over the River at Caſtleford, three Miles from Ferribridge, deſigning to ſurround the late Victors; which Clifford perceiving, ſought to avoid; and whether out of Haſte or Heat, he put off his Garget, when ſuddenly an Arrow without a Head, ſhot from an unknown Hand, pierc'd through his Throat, ſtuck in his Neck, and put a Period to his Life. A Death too honourable for him; ſince the innocent Blood of the Earl of Rutland requir'd one foreſeen, painful and cruel. But his Son met with the Puniſhment he eſcap'd; who being ſav'd by a poor Shepherd, liv'd a Beggar during three Reigns, 'till he was reſtor'd by King Henry the Seventh. Ibid.

The eventh Battel between the Houſe of Lancaſter and York, at Towton.

The next Day, more fatal for England's Blood, being Palm-Sunday, early in the Morning both Armies came in ſight of each other; a dreadful Meeting, which like the Soul and Body never parts but by Death. The Field was between Caxton and Towton, from the latter of which this Battel afterwards took its Name. Upon a full Survey of King Henry's Army, ſo formidable for Numbers, Proclamation was made in King Edward's Camp, That whoever fear'd to fight might immediately depart, but if any remaining Soldier ſhould endeavour to fly, he ſhould be ſlain by his next Fellow, who ſhould receive a great Reward. And further it was proclaim'd, That no Quarter ſhould be given, nor Priſoner taken. A neceſſary Cruelty, and not to be avoided without Hazard of King Edward's Ruin; in regard the common Soldiers, in Hopes of Spoil or Ranſom, might be wanting in their Duty. About nine in the Morning both Armies drew near; ſixty thouſand for King Henry, then in York, and for King Edward ſcarce forty thouſand; only the Preſence and Courage of the latter made an Equality. The experienc'd Lord Fauconbridge, to whom the Van was committed, immediately before the Battel, commanded his Archers, as ſoon as they had ſhot their firſt Flight, to fall ſome Steps back, and make a Stand; by which they might avoid their Enemies Arrows. Which Stratagem had its deſign'd Succeſs; for the Northern Men with a ſudden Fury anſwer'd the Onſet, and having empty'd their Quivers, haſten'd to a cloſe Battel: But the Arrows they had diſcharg'd, not having reach'd their Adverſaries, turn'd Holling. Habing.

now to their Annoiance and Diſtraction, and ſo far gaul'd them by the Splinters ſticking in the Ground, that they were forc'd to a confus'd Stop. In this Trouble the Southern Men ſhot another Flight; and the Wind conſpiring with their Policy, blew a Storm of Hail and Snow in their Faces; ſo that the Vantguard, led by the Earl of Northumberland and Andrew Trollop, gave back. Yet the Main Battel did not ſtir with this Motion; but as if the Enemy had gain'd no Advantage, continu'd with the firſt Conſtancy.

Ibid. For ten Hours together the Victory hung in Suſpence; equal Courage on both Sides; equal Hopes in the good, and equal Deſpair in the bad Succeſs; which occaſion'd ſo much Obſtinacy and Cruelty in the Battel. But at length, after a moſt pitious Slaughter, the Northern Men began to hope for Safety only in Flight; nor did they yield to the prevailing Fortune of the Enemy, 'till their Courages were diſmay'd with the Sight of ſo many eminent Men ſlain before their Eyes. For the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmorland, the Lords Beaumont, D'acres, Gray, Scales and Wells, with many others of greateſt Reputation for their Rank and Courage, had already fallen; and in their Deaths taught the Survivors what to expect. The Dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, ſeeing all Things deſperate, the greater Part of the Army ſlain, the reſt broken and flying, poſted to York to carry the fatal News to the unfortunate King Henry; whoſe Virtue ſtill had a Patience greater than his Ruin. In no Battel ſince the Conqueſt was ever ſhed ſo much Engliſh Blood; ſo that the Fields were not only diſmally ſtain'd, but the Rivers alſo ran red for a great Diſtance: For in this and the preceding Day were ſlain no leſs than thirty ſix thouſand ſeven hundred Perſons; all of one Nation, many near in Alliance, ſome in Blood, fatally divided by Faction, yet all animated by the ſame Zeal to maintain their Prince's Right: Which being ſo difficult to determine nicely, doubtleſs it made the Conteſt on both Sides, how ruinous ſoever to their Families, not unſafe to their Conſciences. And it is worthy of Obſervation, that in this long and cruel Conflict between the two Royal Families, never any Stranger of Note was preſent at their Battels; as if the Engliſh had diſdain'd to conquer or periſh by any other Weapons than their own.

The Yorkiſts prevail.

The Greatneſs of the Bloodſhed and Victory.

Holling. &c. After this great Victory King Edward rode to York, from whence King Henry was fled, where he was receiv'd with the utmoſt Solemnity; and firſt he caus'd the Heads of his Father, the Earl of Salisbury, and other of his Friends, to be taken from the Gates and bury'd with their Bodies: And then he caus'd the Earl of Devonſhire, and three others, to be beheaded, and to have their Heads put on the ſame Places. In the mean time the unfortunate King Henry haſten'd with his Wife and Son to the Town of Berwick; and leaving the Duke of Somerſet in that Place, he went into Scotland, begging the Counſel and Aſſiſtance of the young King of that Nation. He was receiv'd with all Humanity, and had Proviſion made for him of a certain Penſion by the King of the Scots, who likewiſe agreed that the Princeſs Margaret his Siſter ſhould marry to Prince Edward, Son to King Henry, tho' this Marriage was never after conſummated. And Henry to requite theſe Civilities, did more than he would in Time of Proſperity, and gave up the Town of Berwick to King James; a Place very advantagious to the Scots, and long deſired by them. The Queen his Wife went with her Son into France, to procure Aſſiſtance from her Father Reyner, Duke of Anjou; and ſhe obtain'd alſo of King Lewis of France free Acceſs for as many Engliſh as were of her ſide, and Baniſhment for thoſe of the contrary Party; Matters of no great Conſequence. And thus we find the unfortunate King Henry, after above thirty eight Years Reign, not only to have been driven from his Throne and Crown, but alſo out of all his Dominions.

King Henry flies into Scotland.

Hall. Holling. In the Interim King Edward, with as glorious a Triumph and dilated Joy as Victory could beget, march'd towards London, where the Citizens, who were deeply intereſted in his Fortune, receiv'd him with great Splendor and Magnificence. And on the twenty eighth Day of June he was with great Solemnity crown'd at Weſtminſter, where in St. Peter's Church it was the next Day again ſolemnly ſet on his Head, and the third ſo crown'd he came to St. Paul's Cathedral, and there was cens'd with the extraordinary Applauſe of the People. That no Circumſtance of Soveraignty might be wanting, a Parliament was ſummon'd to meet in November; by which his Title to the Crown was confirm'd, King Henry and his Son diſinherited, his Friends rewarded, and his Enemies puniſh'd. And tho' private Reſpects were his chief Buſineſs, deſiring to diſanul all Acts made in Prejudice of the Houſe of York and its Adherents, yet his outward Pretenſions were the Safety and Quiet of the Realm. For he publickly profeſs'd that his only Care was to have ſuch wholſom Laws enacted, as might redreſs Diſorders crept into the State, by the free Liberty given to Rapines in the former Troubles. By which Appearance of earneſt Care for quieting a diſturb'd Republick, he gain'd Authority among the Wiſe, and founded a Belief in all, that his Government in Peace would be as fortunate as his Proceedings in War. Having by his Wiſdom and Care thus won the Opinion of the Generality, he proceeded to confer his Favours on particular Perſons whom Blood and Service had render'd dear to him. He created his two Brothers, George and Richard, Dukes; the Elder of Clarence, and the Younger of Gloceſter. He made the Lord Nevill, Brother to the Earl of Warwick, Vicount Montague; Henry Bourchier, Brother to the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, Earl of Eſſex; and the Lord Fauconbridge, Earl of Kent; giving others the Title of Barons, and honouring many with that of Knighthood. The Concluſion of this great Aſſembly was with ſeveral Puniſhments: For John Earl of Oxford, Aubery Vere his Son, Sir John Tiddenham Knight, William Tyrrel and Walter Montgomery Eſquires, were without Anſwer convicted of Treaſon, and beheaded: A formidable Proceeding, and too much manifeſting the Actions of a Conqueror.

A. D. 1462. Reg. 2.

Affairs thus happily ſetled for King Edward's Intereſt, to check the Inſults of tranſmarine Neighbours, who had thrown Injuries on the Nation when weaken'd with Diſcords, the new-created Earls of Eſſex and Kent, with the Lord Audley, were ſent with ten thouſand Soldiers to ſcour the narrow Seas; who firſt landing in Bretaign, took the Town of Conquet, and afterwards in the Iſle of Ree, pillag'd that little Country, and return'd with Victory. By which Enterprize, tho' of no ſignal Conſequence to his Affairs, yet King Edward let the French know how unſafe it was to irritate the Engliſh when govern'd by an active Prince, who might hereafter appear in Perſon, for the Recovery of thoſe Provinces, which nothing but the Nation's Diſſentions could have loſt; and likewiſe ſtruck ſome Terror into all foreign States which ſhould adhere to King Henry, who both in Courage and Fortune was ſo far his Inferior. And now was the Proſperity of Edward in ſo much Splendor, and ſo dark a Cloud hung over the Houſe of Lancaſter, that Henry Duke of Somerſet, and Sir Ralph Piercy forſook the Ruins of that Family they had ſo long endeavour'd to ſupport. The Submiſſion of two ſuch Perſons of Intereſt and Power, was as pleaſing to King Edward as a Victory; and they by his Favour were immediately reſtor'd to full Poſſeſſion both of Honour and Eſtate; and the ſame Grace was promis'd to any others, whom their Example ſhould perſuade.

A. D. 1463. Reg. 3.

Yet did not the indefatigable Queen loſe any Part of her Spirit or Endeavours; but in France us'd all Means and Methods to gain Succours towards the Reſtitution of her Husband. At length, having obtain'd an inconſiderable Number of Frenchmen, ſhe paſs'd over with them to Scotland, and from thence with the Shew of a great Enterprize, ſhe ſail'd for England; and touching upon the Bay of Tinmouth, out of ſome peculiar Apprehenſions, ſhe and her French put back to Sea, where ſuch a ſudden Tempeſt overtook them, that had not the Queen in a ſmall Veſſel got into Berwick, ſhe had loſt her Life, or fallen into her Enemies Hands. Her French Forces, by the Baſtard Ogle and other other Friends of King Edward, were driven into Holy-Iſland, where many were ſlain, and four hundred put to their Ranſoms. This feeble French Enterprize, tho' it enervated the Minds of many, yet it no ways daunted the Courage of the Queen, whoſe chief Hopes were founded upon the Scotch Valour. So leaving her Son Edward in Berwick for Safety, ſhe with the King her Huſband and a Scotch Army furiouſly enter'd into Northumberland, took the Caſtle of Bamburgh, and ſo paſs'd into the Biſhoprick of Durham, their Forces daily increaſing by the Confluence of ſuch Engliſh as favour'd King Henry. Among theſe the Duke of Somerſet, and Sir Ralph Piercy, with other of King Henry's Friends, revolted from King Edward, and came over to this Army. But many others came over in Hopes of Spoil; for his Army pillag'd and burnt Towns, and deſtroy'd Fields whereſoever they came.

Hall. Fabian. Holling. King Edward hearing of theſe Commotions in the North, made Preparations both by Sea and Land, and with his two Brothers and many Noblemen march'd to the City of York: From whence he ſent the new Viſcount Montague with a conſiderable Party to ſecure the Loyalty of the Northumbrians; who paſſing forwards, at a Place call'd Hegley-Moor, he was ſuddenly attack'd by the Lords Hungerford and Roos, and Sir Ralph Piercy. But Montague bravely ſtood the Aſſault, and in the firſt Encounter repuls'd the Lords, and at length ſlew the ſaid Piercy, who would not be driven from the Field, but in dying cry'd out, I have ſav'd the Bird in my Boſom, meaning his Oath made to King Henry. Montague finding Fortune thus proſperous, advanc'd forwards; and learning by his Spies that Henry's Army lay incamp'd in a fair Plain call'd Livels near Hexham, he haſten'd his March, and ſo valiantly attack'd their Camp, that after a great Slaughter, he totally defeated their Army, with the Loſs of two thouſand Men. The unfortunate King Henry fled into Scotland; but the Duke of Somerſet, the Lords Roos, Mollins and Hungerford, with other Perſons of Note, as unfortunately fell into the Hands of their Enemies, and were afterwards, according to the uſual Proceedings of theſe miſerable Times, beheaded in cold Blood. Sir Ralph Gray was firſt ſolemnly degraded from his Honour of Knighthood, and then led to Execution. Thus was the white Roſe in every Place dy'd red with the Blood of the Nobility; and the red Roſe turn'd pale with Horror to view the Calamities occaſion'd by this Diſſention.

Ibid. King Edward having with a little Water extinguiſh'd a Flame which was like to have ſet all England on Fire, fortify'd all the Frontiers, and built Forts upon ſuch Parts of the Sea as were fitteſt for Landing; he threaten'd heavy Puniſhments againſt any who ſhould favour or harbour King Henry, Queen Margaret, or any of their Adherents. He us'd the like Care in other Places of his Kingdom, eſpecially in the Southern Parts, where Landing was eaſieſt for ſuch as ſhould come from Normandy. In the Rooms of the Earls of Northumberland and Pembroke, who were fled with Henry, he created John Nevill Viſcount Montague Earl of the former, and William Herbert Earl of the latter. But the former being afterwards reſtor'd, Nevill gave up the Title, and was rewarded with that of a Marqueſs. In the mean Time King Henry, hurry'd on by his own Fate, paſs'd into England in diſguis'd Apparel; where in a ſhort Time he was betray'd, while he ſate at Dinner in Waddington Hall, from whence he was carry'd to London after a diſgraceful manner, with his Legs bound under the Horſe's Belly. Here, with Doctor Manning Dean of Windſor, he was arreſted by the Earl of Warwick, his gilt Spurs taken off, and he committed cloſe Priſoner to the Tower of London. A ſudden and ſtrange Alteration of Eſtate, when he that was once the moſt potent Monarch for Dominions that ever England had, was not now Maſter of a ſingle Spot of Ground, nor Owner of his Liberty. So various are the Changes and Fortunes of this tranſitory Life; which appear'd further from his diſtreſſed and diſconſolate Queen, who with her Son was driven once again to fly for Shelter into France.

II. The Impriſonment of King Henry, the Abſence of his Queen and Son, with the Deaths, Flight and Baniſhment of the chief of their Party, for a long Time ſecur'd King Edward in his Throne. This Calm afforded him Occaſion of reforming many Diſorders in the Publick, to which the late Troubles had given Birth. For ſeveral Days together he ſate publickly with his Judges in Weſtminſter-Hall, on the King's-Bench, to acquaint himſelf with the Orders and Proceedings of the Court, either at Bench or Bar. He likewiſe order'd the Officers of the Exechequer to take more moderate Fees, and to be more intentive of their Duties, for the Benefit of the Subject, than their own Profit; and not under Colour of preſerving the King's Revenues, to inrich themſelves and oppreſs the Nation. And to ſhew his Liberality and Gratitude to thoſe who had ſerv'd him, he diſtributed the confiſcated Goods of the late Delinquents to as many as had merited Reward; in which he dealt ſo wiſely, that none were diſſatisfy'd. Then to gain the Love of all Men, he ſhew'd himſelf more familiar both with the Nobility and Commonalty, than as ſome thought was convenient either for his State or Dignity. To his Affability he added Clemency, and pardon'd all thoſe who in what manner ſoever had formerly oppos'd his Greatneſs, provided they would abandon all who perſiſted in their Averſeneſs to him: By which means he won ſuch an Opinion of the People, that afterwards, by their Aſſiſtance, he ſurmounted Difficulties which otherwiſe would have been inſuperable. The Laws of the Realm he in part reform'd, and in part augmented; and the Coin both of Gold and Silver he new invented and divided; for the Gold he nam'd Royals and Nobles, and the Silver he call'd Groats and Half-Groats. He ordain'd penal Statutes againſt exceſſive Pride in Apparel, particularly againſt long pick'd Shoes then uſually worn, which grew to that Extream, that the Pikes in the Toes were turn'd upwards, and with Silver Chains or Silk Laces ty'd to the Knees. But among many good Proviſions one prov'd injurious; for concluding a League with the Kings of Caſtile and Arragon in Spain, he granted them Liberty to tranſport certain Numbers of Coteſwold Sheep, which ſo much increas'd, that it afterwards prov'd a great Hinderance to the Engliſh Merchants in the Sale of their Woollen Cloths in the Levant Seas.

His Ordinances.

The publick Affairs being thus eſtabliſh'd, King Edward deſcended to what more particularly concern'd himſelf; and that was to provide a Queen, by whom he might have Iſſue and a ſufficient Alliance againſt the Power of King Henry. Three Marriages were propos'd to him; Margaret Siſter to James King of Scotland; Iſabel Siſter to Henry King of Caſtile, and Bona Daughter to the Duke of Savoy, and Siſter to the preſent Queen of France. The two former were ſet aſide for particular Reaſons, and the laſt approv'd of in Council; and none was thought more fit to ſollicit this Affair than the mighty Earl of Warwick, a Man eſteem'd as a King in Power and Revenues, and exceeding all in Magnificence and Hoſpitality; in whoſe Houſe at London ſix Oxen were ſpent every Day, and moſt Taverns in the City were full of his Meat and Proviſions. This Earl in great State arriv'd at Tours, and his Meſſage known, was accordingly entertain'd in the French Court, where he wrought the Queen her ſelf to be the chiefeſt Agent, who ingag'd her Siſter Bona with recommending the State and Stile of a Magnificent Queen, and her Husband Lewis with the Aſſurance of a Wiſe and Potent Ally; a Subject ſufficiently pleaſing to this ſoft-natur'd Prince. In a ſhort Time all Parties were fully ſatisfy'd, and the Earl of Warwick diſmiſs'd with no ſmall Compliments; and the Earl of Damp-Martin was to paſs into England for the final Concluſion.

But while the Earl of Warwick highly valu'd himſelf for his Succeſs abroad, King Edward's Affection was working another Way at home. Lady Elizabeth Gray, Daughter to the Dutcheſs, and Widow of Sir John Gray, ſlain on King Henry's Behalf at the Battel of St. Albans. The King could deny no Requeſt made by ſuch an eloquent Tongue, and conquering Beauty; and immediately himſelf became as earneſt in ſolliciting her, but in a more unlawful Suit. But ſhe arm'd her ſelf with a Modeſty ſufficient to deſtroy the moſt violent Batteries of Luſt; and tho' ſhe was on all Sides attack'd by the moſt inſinuating Temptations, ſhe repuls'd her Enemy ſo nobly, that he offer'd to parly upon honourable Terms. For when the King perceiv'd her adorn'd with Chaſtity ſtrong enough to reſiſt him, who ſcarce ever fail'd in ſuch Attempts, he became enamour'd on the Beauty of her Mind, and concluded that her Virtue was Dowry enough to marry her to the higheſt Monarch upon Earth. The Reaſons of State were directly againſt this Marriage, which ſhew'd the Danger of exaſperating ſo potent an Allie as the French King, and ſo dangerous a Subject as the Earl of Warwick, as likewiſe the Inconveniencies of raiſing a Widow to his Bed, who could bring nothing but Poverty and an unprovided Iſſue; who if not advanc'd would be a Scorn to his Children, and if otherwiſe a Charge to his Exchequer, and an Envy to the Nobility. Yet the charming Object, and his unbounded Paſſion prevail'd ſo far, that notwithſtanding the Dutcheſs of York his Mother moſt violently oppos'd him, by throwing the higheſt Calumnies upon the Lady Gray, and alledging a Pre-contract with the Lady Lucy, he broke through all Difficulties, and marry'd her privately. Not long after, upon the twenty ſixth of Day of May, he crown'd her Queen with the uſual Solemnities. Her Mother was Jaquellin Daughter to Peter of Luxemburg Earl of St. Paul, and Dutcheſs to John Duke of Bedford Regent of France; after whoſe Death ſhe marry'd to Sir Richard Woodville Knight, and among others bore him this celebrated Lady.

He marries her.

Holling. &c.

None were pleas'd with this Match, the Nobility leſs than the Commonalty; their Grandeur being obſcur'd by the ſudden Splendor of the Queen's Relations: Her Father was created Earl of Rivers, and ſhortly after made High-Conſtable of England: Her Brother Anthony was enrich'd by the Marriage of the Daughter and Heir of the Lord Scales, which Title was likewiſe conferr'd upon him: Her Son Thomas Gray, whom ſhe had by her former Husband, afterwards marry'd the Daughter of the Lord Harrington, and was created Marqueſs of Dorſet. Hiſtorians obſerve many Calamities that were caus'd by this Marriage; as the Deaths of innumerable Engliſh Men, King Edward's Expulſion from his Dominions, his Children declar'd ſpurious, and murder'd, and the Queen's Houſe extirpated. All which begun from the proud Earl of Warwick, who being by this deceiv'd and wounded in his Reputation, parted from France with ſuch furious Reſentments, as he could not wholly conceal from the French King. Being return'd into England, he ſo behav'd himſelf with King Edward, that he ſeem'd not at all diſoblig'd; while the preſent Injury reviv'd the Remembrance of many formerly receiv'd. He ſaw how the King apprehended his Greatneſs, and grew jealous of his Power; that his Deſign was to depreſs him, when himſelf was better eſtabliſh'd; that he thought himſelf no King, while Men judg'd him as neceſſary to the Conſervation of the State, as he was in the obtaining of it; and that he ſought all Occaſions to bereave him of Mens good Opinions. All which caus'd him to believe that he was ſent into France for the ſame purpoſe. To which ſome add, that King Edward had provok'd him by attempting the Chaſtity of his Daughter or Neice; thereby endeavouring to diſhonour the Family of his Kinſman, Servant and Benefactor. Theſe Conſiderations join'd together, begot in him ſuch a Hatred that all England, France and Flanders could never extinguiſh; ſo that he reſolv'd to depoſe him, and reinthrone King Henry, as ſoon as a fit Occaſion ſhould preſent it ſelf. In order to which, by the King's leave he retir'd to Warwick, under a Pretence of Indiſpoſition of Health; yet the King made ſome Diſcovery of his Diſcontents, but not ſufficient for his own Security; for he thought him not ſo able to drive him from, as to lift him into a Throne.

King Edward's Alliances.

In the following Year the Queen was deliver'd of a Daughter, named Elizabeth, who afterwards put a happy Period to the Civil Wars, by marrying with King Henry the Seventh. In which Year King Edward concluded a Treaty of Alliance with the Kings of Caſtile and Arragon, who upon Occaſion might by way of Diverſion aſſiſt him in Gaſcony and Languedock; and likewiſe for the ſame Reſpect, he concluded a Truce with Scotland for fifteen Years. But the Alliance of the old Duke of Burgundy was that which moſt avail'd him, and which re-eſtabliſh'd him in his Kingdom when he had loſt it. This Prince had a Son, Charles the Count Caralois, who by two ſeveral Wives having but one Daughter, his Father deſir'd to marry him a third Time, hoping to ſecure the Succeſſion by Iſſue Male. He bethought himſelf of Margaret, Siſter to King Edward, a Princeſs of admirable Beauty, and endu'd with a Spirit not uſual to her Sex; but her being of the Houſe of York made him ſtagger in his Reſolutions, becauſe he was nearly related to the Houſe of Lancaſter. Yet ſince he could make no Alliance more formidable to France, or more advantagious to the Low-Countries, he ſent over Anthony the Eldeſt of his Natural Sons, commonly call'd the Baſtard of Burgundy, with ſome others, as Ambaſſadors into England for this Purpoſe. He came with a pompous Retinue of four hundred Horſe, with rich Liveries, and richer Furniture; and was graciouſly receiv'd by King Edward. The Affair being propos'd in Council, none withſtood it but the diſoblig'd Earl of Warwick; for forming the Rebellion he had formerly deſign'd, he conceiv'd the Match would be injurious to King Lewis, on whom he intended to rely, and beneficial to King Edward, whom he intended to deſtroy. But he having but a ſingle Vote, the Ambaſſador's Requeſt was granted, and King Edward promis'd Amity to the Friends of Burgundy, and threaten'd Enmity to his Adverſaries. He preſented his Siſter to the Lord Anthony, and the other Ambaſſadors, who kiſs'd her Hand, as their Princeſs, and preſented her with many rich Jewels, which ſhe accepted with Terms of Gratitude both to her Father-in-Law and Husband. The Entertainments made upon this Occaſion were great and magnificent; and Challenges at Tilt paſs'd between Anthony and the Lord Scales, Brother to the Queen, and between his Followers and the Engliſh Gentry. In the midſt of theſe Rejoycings, News was brought of the Duke of Burgundy's Death, which much afflicted the Lord Anthony; ſo taking leave of the King, with rich Preſents he paſs'd over into Brabant, and made ſuch a Relation of the Princeſs to the new Duke his half Brother, as abundantly ſatisfy'd him; who in the following Year deſir'd King Edward to ſend her over to him, according to the Articles of the Contract; which accordingly was perform'd. After a ſolemn and magnificent Departure, ſhe took Shipping at Dover, attended by five hundred Horſe, and accompany'd by her two elder Siſters the Dutcheſs of Exeter and Suffolk. She landed at Sluce, and went from thence to Bourges, where the Marriage was conſummated.

A. D. 1468. Reg. 8.

The high Earl of Warwick's Reſentments againſt King Edward ſtill daily encreaſing, he reſolv'd immediately to perform what he had long deſign'd; and becauſe dangerous Reſolutions are not to be undertaken without great Supports, he judg'd the Aſſiſtance of his two own Brothers moſt proper, the Arch-Biſhop of York and the Marqueſs Montague. Diſcourſing with them of the Reaſons that mov'd him to this Undertaking, he made an odious Parallel between Henry and Edward, magnifying the Gratitude and Goodneſs of the Former, and aggravating the Ingratitude and Wickedneſs of the Latter, Who when their Family had been foremoſt to ſpend their Lives and Eſtates in the Service of his Father and himſelf, he had not recompenc'd them according to their uncommon Deſerts; and durſt ſtill upbraid them with his being the Raiſer of their Family, when next to Heav'n they ought their chiefeſt Honour to King Henry: That not contented to viliſie them, he had endeavour'd to diſgrace them in a moſt tender Point, by attempting to violate the Honour of a Daughter of their their Family. That he had thrown ſuch an Affront upon him relation to the Match with the Lady Bona, as he would not have done to the moſt deſpicable of his Subjects; and that he no ways excus'd it, but paſs'd it over in Silence, not conſidering that a Man's Honour was more dear to him than his Life. Since therefore he had acted ſo contrary to Juſtice and Gratitude, his Reſolution was to uſe all Means to take that Crown from him, which he had plac'd on his Head, and put it again upon Henry, a good and lawful King. That ſince they were Sharers in the Injuries, they ought to be ſo in the Revenge; which might eaſily be effected, if they would be as vigorous and as hearty, as many of the chief Nobility of the Nation, as alſo ſeveral foreign Princes. This unexpected Propoſition ſurpriz'd the two Brothers, who ſeem'd averſe to a Compliance. But the Arch-Biſhop after long Diſputes giving way, the Marqueſs with much Difficulty ſuffer'd himſelf to be perſuaded, but ſtill with great Unwillingneſs. Which Ambiguity was the Ruin of them all; for being not able to deny his Brother, nor to betray his Prince, he did amiſs on both Sides: He aſſiſted Edward by not cordially aſſiſting his Brother, and betray'd his Brother by not reſolutely betraying Edward.

His two Brothers join with him.

Ibid. The Earl of Warwick having thus laid the Ground-work of his ruinous Building, he purſu'd the Fabrick with the King's ſecond Brother the Duke of Clarence, who being then a Male-content, he reſolv'd to ſound the Bottom of his Inclinations. But he partly anticipated the Earl's Complaints by exclaiming againſt the King his Brother, That he was in his own Nature diſobliging and ungrateful, and chiefly to ſuch as had moſt oblig'd him: That ſince he had no Eſteem for his own Brothers, much leſs would he ſhow any to his other Friends; but more valu'd his Wife's Blood, than his own. That he had diſpoſed of three of the richeſt Heireſſes of the Nation to her Son, her Brother, and the Lord Haſtings, three upſtart Lords; and that without any Regard to his own Brothers. Continuing ſuch-like angry and threatning Diſcourſe, he gave the Earl Occaſion to lay himſelf open to him, and to offer his Daughter to him with a Portion equivalent to thoſe he had nam'd, with innumerable other Promiſes and Proſpects. The Duke at this Time blinded with Paſſion and Reſentment, contrary to all Reaſon and Policy, join'd with the ambitious Earl in a Deſign which might eaſily and naturally prove the Ruin of them both. The Order they took was to retire themſelves to Calais, and that the Arch-Biſhop of York and the Marqueſs Montague ſhould privately procure ſome Inſurrection in the North of England, and give the Occaſion of the War, while they being beyond Sea, might not be thought the Authors of it. Being thus repair'd to Calais, and having ſworn by the Holy Sacrament to all Things agreed between them, the Duke upon the foreſaid Promiſes and Expectations marry'd the Earl's Daughter.

He gains the Duke of Clarence to his Party.

Holling. &c. The two Brothers being gone to York, of which one was Arch-Biſhop, and the other Preſident, fail'd not to put in Execution what was agreed among themſelves. The firſt Occaſion of Arms was rais'd from the Abuſe of a Charity in an Hoſpital dedicated to St. Leonard in the City of York, whoſe Revenue conſiſted chiefly of Corn, which ſeveral factious Perſons alledg'd was miſapply'd, and given from the Poor to the Rich. To redreſs which Grievance, one Robert Huldern enter'd into Action, and with fifteen thouſand ſtrong attempted the City of York, where the Marqueſs Montague was Preſident for King Edward, who with a ſelect Body of Men iſſu'd out againſt the Enemy, repuls'd them, and ſtruck off the Head of their Captain before the Gates of the City: But whether he did this in Policy to gain Credit with the King, or elſe in Duty or Irreſolution, as not throughly moulded to this Commotion, is uncertain. But however the Rebels were no ways diſcourag'd at Huldern's Death, but became more reſolute and vigorous in purſuing what they had begun. To which end they choſe themſelves two Commanders of greater Note, and of eminent Calling, which were Henry, Son and Heir to the Lord Fitz-hugh, and Sir Henry ry Nevill, Son and Heir to the Lord Latimer, the one being Nephew and the other Couſin-German to the Earl of Warwick. Theſe being but young, and not fully experienc'd in Arms, choſe for their Conductor Sir John Conyers, a Knight of ſuch Conduct and Valour as was ſcarcely to be found in all the North; who deſigning to ſtrike at the Head, determin'd to march directly for London, proclaiming in his Paſſage, That Edward was neither a juſt Prince to God, nor a profitable King to the Nation.

King Edward's Preparations.

King Edward hearing of theſe Northern Proceedings, and that his own Brother and Warwick were preparing againſt him, ſent for the Lord Herbert, whom he had created Earl of Pembroke, to be General in the North; who joyfully undertook the Service, partly to deſerve the King's Favour, and partly in Revenge to the Earl of Warwick, who had hinder'd his Son from marrying with a rich Heireſs. So taking with him his Brother Sir Richard Herbert, a valiant Gentleman, and ſix or ſeven thouſand well arm'd Welſhmen, he advanc'd forwards, and was join'd by the Lord Stafford with eight hundred Archers. Underſtanding that the Northern Army was near Northampton, he march'd that Way; and deſiring to know their Number and Order, Sir Richard Herbert offer'd to make the Diſcovery. He with two thouſand Welſh Horſe took Shelter in a Wood, by which they were to paſs; and having view'd them, and deſirous to return with the Relation to his Brother, he could not with-hold his Men from charging them on the Rere; which marching in good Order, as expecting ſuch an Attack, fac'd about, and fighting valiantly, ſlew many of them, took many Priſoners, and diſpers'd the reſt, now too late ſorry that they had not obey'd their Leader. Ibid.

King Edward underſtanding this ill Beginning, muſter'd his Subjects on every ſide, deſigning to ingage with the Northern Forces in Perſon; and the Earl of Warwick, as vigorous on the other Side, gather'd his Friends to encounter with Pembroke and the Welſh. But before any Supplies came to either of them, Fortune brought the two Armies together upon a fair Plain call'd Danes-More near the Town of Hedgecot, within three Miles of Banbury. The Earl of Pembroke and the Lord Stafford were lodg'd in Banbury; where to avoid Diſputes, they agreed each of them to take ſuch Lodgings as Chance ſhould preſent them. Stafford being lodg'd to his Satisfaction, the Earl, forgetting his Agreement, and uſing Authority, oblig'd him to give Place and remove; which he unwillingly obey'd, becauſe by this he was to quit the Company of a fair Gentlewoman in the ſame Place. However to ſhow his Reſentment, he baſely abandon'd the Town with all his Men, and left the Earl deſtitute of the Archers, who were the moſt neceſſary Part of the Army; which ſtill did not diſcourage the Earl, who reſolv'd to ſuffer any Miſchief rather than retreat. Early in the Morning the Lord Latimer's Son Sir Henry Nevill, one of the Northern Leaders, thinking he had been too idle, went forth to skirmiſh, being attended by a Company of light Horſe; but preſſing on too eagerly, he was taken Priſoner, and ſoon after put to Death in cool Blood; his Youth, Nobility and Valour not being ſufficient to ſave him. This Act of Cruelty highly incens'd the Northern People, who reſolving to revenge his Death, let fly their Arrows with their utmoſt Fury, and ſoon forc'd their Adverſaries to come to a general Battel, which was very ſharp and bloody. The Earl of Pembroke, who fought with Diſadvantage, thought it not ſufficient to execute the Part of a Commander, but alſo of a common Soldier; while his Brother Sir Richard Herbert, hurry'd on with a prodigious Impetuoſity, ſo behav'd himſelf, that the true Story of his Valour is not to be exceeded in fabulous Romances: For forcing his Way through the Enemies Troops with his devouring Sword, he twice paſs'd the Length of their Army, returning to his own Men, if not untouch'd, yet without any mortal Wound: Occaſion'd, as it was believ'd, by his uncommon Worth, which being admir'd by all who ſaw it, by joining Delight with Danger, and Wonder with Delight, reſtrain'd the Hands of all Men from hurting hurting him. The Victory ſeem'd wholly on his Side, 'till John Clapham, a Servant to the Earl of Warwick, coming in with a few freſh Soldiers, and crying out A Warwick, A Warwick! ſo much terrify'd the Welſh, that believing Warwick was arriv'd with all his Forces, they betook themſelves to Flight, leaving a bloody Field, cover'd with five thouſand ſlain upon the Spot. The Lancaſtrians prevail.

Ibid. This Battel, like the reſt of thoſe in theſe miſerable Times, was ſucceeded by ſomething more dreadful and ſhocking than War it ſelf; which was the ſedate Execution of many great and worthy Men. For the Earl of Pembroke, with Sir Richard his Brother, and many other Gentlemen of Note were taken Priſoners, and without any Trial at Law beheaded at Banbury. The Earl who was appointed to ſuffer firſt, pathetically addreſſing himſelf to Coniers and Clapham, who ſat as Judges, petition'd them in Behalf of his Brother; alledging his Youth and graceful Perſon anſwerable to his martial Mind; that his Valour, even by themſelves admir'd, might one Day be ſerviceable to his Country. But the Death of Henry Nevill had ſo far exaſperated them, that it occaſion'd not only the Execution of theſe two, but alſo of many others; a deplorable Tragedy repreſented by ſo many worthy Men. Their Cruelties did not ceaſe here; for thoſe of Northampton having choſen one Robert of Riddiſdale for their Commander, and joining certain others with them, they ſurpriz'd the Earl of Rivers, Father to the Queen, and his Son John, in his Manſion-Houſe of Grafton, brought them to Northampton, and without any Proceſs of Law beheaded them: That deformed Body hark'ning to no Arguments but thoſe of Blood and Fury. An envy'd Life and a cruel Death was the Sum of all thoſe Favours which Fortune conferr'd upon this Earl, who eſteem'd himſelf ſo happy in his Marriage with the Duke of Bedford's Widow, and in that of his Daughter's with the preſent King. For as his Aſcent to theſe extraordinary Heights was ever view'd with malignant Eyes, ſo his Deſcent was ruinous and fatal; not any one of his ſeven Sons leaving behind him Iſſue to perpetuate his Name; ſome of them likewiſe coming to violent Ends. A Misfortune either ſeldom hap'ning, or not obſerv'd in meaner Families. As to the Lord Stafford, the Cauſe of this Overthrow, he met with a deſerved Puniſhment from King Edward's Party; for by diligent Enquiry being found in Devonſhire, he loſt his Head at Bridgewater without any Proceſs. Great Severities.

Halling. Habing. In the mean Time the Victors were retir'd to Warwick, where the Earl of that Name was arriv'd with a great Body of armed Men; and underſtanding that King Edward was marching towards him, he gave Advice of it to the Duke of Clarence, who immediately join'd him with a conſiderable Force. They were ready to come to Battel with all Speed, according to the uſual Cuſtom of the Engliſh, had not ſome great Perſons, deſirous of Peace and the publick Good, interpos'd to find ſome Way of Accommodation. This Negotiation made King Edward ſo careleſs, that confidently truſting to a Peace, he neglected all the Duties of military Diſcipline, and began in his Camp to taſte the Pleaſures of a Court; while Warwick, more wary than he, being certify'd by his Spies of the Negligence of the Guards and all the reſt, who behav'd themſelves as if they had no Enemies, ſet upon the King by Night, and without any Reſiſtance took him Priſoner. Thus was King Edward betray'd into the Hands of an inſulting Enemy, who in the moſt inſolent Terms upbraided his Priſoner with Ingratitude to his great Merits; and boaſted It was now both in his Power and Reſolution to plain that Mountain he had rais'd, and to elivate the Vally of King Henry's Fortunes to the Throne he once poſſeſs'd: And immediately ſent away the King Priſoner to Middleham Caſtle in Yorkſhire, there to be kept by the Arch-Biſhop of York his Brother. But as through Negligence he fell into this Condition, ſo by good Fortune he freed himſelf from it; making uſe of his wonted Affability, by which he caus'd the Arch-Biſhop to treat him like a King, not a Priſoner, allowing him not only the Liberty of the Caſtle, but the Freedom to hunt, ſetting but a ſmall Guard upon him, who either could not Warwick takes King Edward Priſoner.

or would not ſecure him. For Edward having ſent to Sir William Stanley and Sir Thomas Burgh his faithful Friends, to come with a ſelect Body of Men to reſcue him; they ſucceſsfully perform'd the Service, whilſt he was a hunting, meeting with no Reſiſtance from the Guards, who were either too weak, or elſe, which is more probable, were brib'd to this Behaviour. The Earl of Warwick hearing of this Eſcape, was at firſt diſtracted with a thouſand Imaginations; but finding no Remedy, made uſe of Neceſſity, and gave it out That himſelf had ſo caus'd it, having the Power to make and unmake Kings at his Pleaſure.

He makes his Eſcape.

King Edward immediately repair'd to York, where he was receiv'd with great Honour and Satisfaction, which made him reaſonably hope for a further Supply of Men and other Neceſſaries; but failing in that Point, after a ſhort Stay, fearing the Arch-Biſhop's Purſuit, he with a ſmall Train poſted to Lancaſter, where he found the Lord Haſtings his Chamberlain well ſtrengthen'd for his Convoy. His Spirits then reviv'd, and his Train daily increaſing, with ſpeedy Journies he got to London; where all his Studies and Conſultations were, how to be reveng'd on theſe diſloyal Lords, his Brother Clarence and the Earl of Warwick: And they on the other ſide, enrag'd at the Arch-Biſhop's Folly and Neglect, ſought Means to increaſe their Party and Intereſt againſt the King. The miſerable Nation thus torn by theſe unnatural Diviſions, and no Eſtate ſure to enjoy what was their own, the Nobility again began to ſollicit both Parties to an Accommodation. To that end having firſt obtain'd Liberty to ride freely without Moleſtation, and ſo effectually laid open the State of the Land, whoſe Ruin was become ſo imminent by theſe inteſtine Wars, that the Natives languiſh'd, Foreigners rejoic'd, and God in his Diſpleaſure had made the Engliſh in an unnatural Rage turn their Swords into their own Bowels, they at length ſo far prevail'd, that the Duke and Earl upon perfect Confidence came to London, accompany'd with ſmall Numbers in reſpect to their great Danger.

A Parly between King Edward and the Earl of Warwick.

Here falling into a formal Conference with Edward at Weſtminſter, he ſeverely tax'd them with Diſloyalty, and they him with Ingratitude; ſo that their Reſentments were nothing appeas'd, but much more exaſperated; upon which with angry Words they departed, the King to Canterbury, and they again to Warwick.

A. D. 1470. Reg. 10.

The inrag'd Earl of Warwick now caus'd new Commotions to be rais'd in Lincolnſhire, under the Guidance of Sir Robert Wells, an expert Soldier, and Son to the Lord Wells, who with thirty thouſand Men in Arms diſturb'd the Country, and in every Place proclaim'd King Henry; and at length encamping not far from Stamford, he there reſolv'd to wait for the Approach of his Oppoſers. King Edward hearing of this Inſurrection, ſent for the Lord Wells his Father, and getting him into his Poſſeſſion, commanded him to write to his Son to deſiſt; and then marching towards Stamford, he took this Lord in his Company, hoping that the Son would not bear Arms againſt his own Father in the Field. But whatever he wrot, or the King conceiv'd, Sir Robert proceeded in his former Deſigns; which ſo inrag'd King Edward, that he beheaded the Lord Wells, with Sir Thomas Dymock who had marry'd his Daughter, tho' he had given them his Promiſe for their Lives and Safeties. An Action barbarous and unfaithful! the Report of which generally clouded the Reputation of King Edward; but in Sir Robert Wells it begot nothing but Fury and Revenge; who without ſtaying for Warwick, who was preparing for his Aſſiſtance, ſet furiouſly upon King Edward and his Army near Stamford, where between both Parties was fought a moſt terrible bloody Battel. At length Sir Robert was taken Priſoner, with Sir Thomas Deland and others, which ſo diſcourag'd the Lincolnſhire Men, that throwing off their Coats they all fled; upon which Account it was afterwards call'd The Battel of Looſe-Coat Field, in which were ſlain at leaſt ten thouſand Men. After which Victory King Edward, proceeding in the uſual Practice of theſe calamitous Times, commanded Wells and many others of Note to be put to Death, as the chief Cauſers of theſe dangerous Commotions.

Comines. &c. This untimely Conflict and Overthrow drove Clarence and Warwick to the laſt Extremity, who being unprovided to encounter King Edward's Forces, gave way to Neceſſity, and from Dartmouth embark'd themſelves and their Ladies, both to apply themſelves to King Lewis, no Friend to Edward, and to ſecure themſelves in Calais, where Warwick was Governor These caſting Anchor before the Town, and giving Notice that they were ready to land, the Lord Vauclere, a Gaſcoign whom Warwick had made his Deputy, to their great Surprize diſcharg'd ſome Canon againſt them, and let them know that they ſhould not enter there. In the mean Time the Dutcheſs of Clarence fell in Labour, and on Shipboard was deliver'd of a Son, which Child Vauclere would hardly ſuffer to be baptiz'd in the Town, nor without much Entreaty permit two Flaggons of Wine to be convey'd to the Dutcheſs in the Haven. For which Uſage and Service King Edward by his Letters Patents made him chief Governor of Calais, and diſcharg'd the Earl as a Rebel and Traitor. The Duke of Burgundy, who hated Warwick for hindering his Marriage, was alſo ſo well ſatisfy'd with Vauclere, that he ſent Thanks to him with a Promiſe of an annual Penſion of a thouſand Crowns, if he would be true and faithful to King Edward, as he had already ſhown himſelf. But tho' Vauclere gave both his Word and his Oath to be faithful to King Edward, he privately ſent Word to Warwick of the Danger he would meet from the Duke of Burgundy, and from Duras the King's Admiral, ſo that to land there would turn to his final Confuſion. His Advice was therefore that he ſhould haſten into France, where the King was his particular Friend, but as for the Town of Calais he wiſh'd him to take no Thought, but promis'd to give him a good Account of it, when Time ſhould ſerve. Upon this Advice he ſail'd towards Dieppe in Normandy, and in his Paſſage took ſeveral Ships belonging to the Duke of Burgundy, and gain'd a conſiderable Treaſure towards his preſent Occaſions. Arriving at Dieppe, by the Command of King Lewis he was receiv'd with great Reſpect, and after that by him met at Amboiſe; where cauſing him to be provided with all Neceſſaries, he promis'd him his beſt Aſſiſtance, and caus'd many Ships to be fitted out for him, well furniſh'd with Soldiers and Mariners. And this he did the ſooner, becauſe the Duke of Burgundy had threaten'd him, if he aſſiſted Warwick, or any other againſt his Wife's Brother King Edward. King Henry's Queen Margaret came to meet him as ſoon as he heard of his Arrival, and with her the Earls of Pembroke and Oxford, the laſt of whom had lately eſcap'd out of Priſon in England. King Lewis to have the ſtronger Obligation, caus'd Queen Margaret's Son Prince Edward to marry with Anne the Earl of Warwick's ſecond Daughter; ſo that Warwick took for his Son-in-Law the Son of him whom he formerly depos'd, that he might now depoſe him who he had plac'd in his Room. Upon this Marriage, Warwick and the Duke of Clarence took an Oath never to put a Period to the War, 'till King Henry or his Son Edward ſhould recover his Kingdom; and Queen Margaret promis'd to make them two Governors of the Nation, 'till her Son ſhould be of full Age.

Clarence and Warwick leave the Nation.

They are receiv'd by the French King.

They make new Alliances.

Ibid. King Edward, in the midſt of his Pleaſures, hearing of this Confederacy againſt him, began to rouze himſelf, and deal more ſeverely with thoſe of the Lancaſtrian Faction; ſo that many of them daily took Sanctuary, or yielded themſelves to his Mercy: Among whom the Marqueſs Montague, Brother to the Earl of Warwick was one, who with fair Promiſes was receiv'd into Favour. But while both Parties were making their Preparations, a ſubtle and ingenious Gentlewoman was ſent over to France, who under Colour of viſiting the Dutcheſs of Clarence, might prevail upon her Husband. Being arriv'd at Calais, ſhe impos'd upon Vauclere by making him believe that Affairs were near to an Accommodation, and that King Edward had ſent her over for that purpoſe; which caus'd him freely to give her a ſafe Conduct. Having gain'd Acceſs ceſs to the Duke of Clarence, the Secret to be deliver'd was to counſel him not to cauſe the Deſtruction of his own Family, by again ſetting up the Houſe of Lancaſter, but to remember their ancient Hatred and Diviſion; adding, That he might well aſſure himſelf that the Earl of Warwick, having marry'd his Daughter to the Prince of Wales, and already done Homage to him, would by all poſſible Methods ſeek to make him King; not only to the Ruin of the King his Brother's Intereſt, but alſo to his own. This Gentlewoman ſo wiſely executed the Charge committed to her, that ſhe won over the Duke of Clarence, who promis'd to revolt to King Edward, immediately after his Return into England: Which ſhows of what little Efficacy Oaths and Alliance are, when a powerful Intereſt comes in place. She was a Perſon nicely adviſ'd, and of few Words, and by reaſon of her Sex had leave granted to paſs to her Miſtreſs, when a Man would have been refus'd; and notwithſtanding the profound Cunning of Vauclere, ſhe went beyond him, and was the ſole Manager of an Enterprize, which at length ruin'd Warwick and his whole Faction.

Who prevails with him to quit Warwick's Intereſt.

And now all Things being in Readineſs, as Ships, Men and Mony, ſupply'd by the French King, the Admiral of France was ſent to ſecure them from the Duke of Burgundy's Fleet, which with great Numbers and Forces lay in the Mouth of the Seyne, to fight with Warwick, when ever he began to ſet Sail. But here Providence gave a remarkable Turn to King Edward's Affairs, and ſent ſuch a Storm againſt the Duke's Fleet, the Night before the deſign'd Expedition, as deſtroy'd ſeveral of them, and diſpers'd the reſt, ſome into Scotland, and ſome into Denmark. Shortly after the Engliſh ſet Sail with a fair Wind and a calm Sea, and landed at Dartmouth, from whence they had been driven into France almoſt ſix Months before. King Edward relying upon Burgundy abroad, and imagining all to be Friends who flatter'd him at home, by Day gave himſelf up to Hunting and Hawking, and at Nights to Dancings and amorous Addreſſes to fair Ladies; little regarding the Approach of them, who deſign'd to deſtroy all his Pleaſures. For Warwick being landed, proclaim'd King Henry, commanding all from ſixteen to ſixty, upon the ſevereſt Penalties to take Arms againſt Edward Duke of York, the moſt unjuſt Uſurper of King Henry's rightful Crown; and it was almoſt incredible to ſee the Confluence of them who came daily in to him, and who not long before applauded and approv'd of none but King Edward. Thus marching towards London, his Numbers continually encreas'd; which the youthful and vigorous King ſeem'd little to regard; but conceiving he had now Warwick in a Snare, wrote to the Duke of Burgundy to ſecure the Seas againſt his Retreat, and to the Lords of England to attend him in his Wars. But moſt of them neglected his Commands, and very few repair'd to him; which ſoon gave him ſuch a Sight of his Danger, that with his Brother of Gloceſter, the Lords Haſtings and Scales, he ſuddenly retir'd from London, and haſten'd towards Nottingham, there to determine what Methods to follow.

Nor was the Marqueſs Montague the ſame Perſon he lately ſhow'd himſelf, who having gather'd ſix thouſand Men in the Name of King Edward, and brought them near Nottingham, ſuddenly drew back his Forces, alledging, That Edward was ungrateful, and regardleſs of his Friends, of whom himſelf was an Example, who having ſerved him in many bloody Battels, was only rewarded with the bare Title of Marqueſs, without any Maintenance at all: And therefore he had juſt Cauſe never more to draw his Sword in his Quarrel, and thoſe who did would receive no better Reward than himſelf. Theſe and the like Allegations being divulg'd among the rude Multitude, it caus'd a further Change in their Inclinations and Affections; in every Street Bonfires were made, made, in every Church Bells rung, Pſalms and Songs were ſung at every Meeting, and every Man ſhouted King Henry, King Henry! whoſe Eccho likewiſe redoubled a Warwick, a Warwick! And indeed all ſo applauded the preſent Face of Affairs, that King Edward finding no Place of Safety, he went with ſome Danger to Lynn, where he found two Holland Ships and one Engliſh; where he imbark'd himſelf with ſeven hundred Men, without the leaſt manner of Baggage or Mony. In his Paſſage he was encounter'd by eight Eaſterling Ships, ſo that with great Difficulty he eſcap'd to Alchemar in Holland, belonging to the Duke of Burgundy; where having no Mony to pay for his Waſtage, he gave the Captain a rich Veſtment lin'd with Sables, promiſing not to forget his Civility, and to ſatisfie him better afterwards. A ſtrange Change of Fortune happening in a few Hours to ſuch a Prince merely out of Remiſsneſs and Careleſsneſs; who loſt a Kingdom without one Blow given, and was conſtrain'd to fly to a Prince, whoſe Preſence alone upbraided him with his Negligence, Luſt and Male-Adminiſtration.

He leaves England, and flies to the Duke of Burgundy.

Holling. In theſe Times of Miſery, Queen Elizabeth, the Original of theſe Alterations, ſeeing her ſelf deſtitute and abandon'd, took Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, where with a ſmall Attendance ſhe was deliver'd of a Son nam'd Edward; he who a ſhort Space after his Father's Death, was the Fifth King of that Name, who ſimpathiz'd in Birth, Fate and Death with his Couſin the Son of the Dutcheſs of Clarence born on Ship-board before Calais. Many of her beſt Friends likewiſe betook themſelves to ſeveral Sanctuaries, who afterwards prov'd highly ſerviceable at Edward's Return. The Kentiſh Men, prone to Inſurrections, finding that one King was fled, and the other in Priſon, came to London, and pillag'd the Suburbs, and deſign'd to have enter'd the City, had not the Earl of Warwick diverted them, who coming there, puniſh'd the Accomplices of the Inſurrection; which Piece of Juſtice added much to his Reputation and the Peoples Love. This great Earl, accompany'd with his Brother the Arch-Biſhop of York, the Prior of St. John's, the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Baſtard Fauconbridge, the Lord Stanley, and other Gentlemen, ſome for Love, ſome for Fear, and ſome to gaze at a changeable World, upon the ſixth Day of October enter'd the Tower of London, where King Henry had been detain'd Priſoner about ſeven Years, and there again nominated him for their lawful King. Immediately they convey'd him roab'd in a long blue Velvet Gown through the City to the Biſhop's Palace, where a pompous Court was kept 'till the thirteenth of the ſame Month; upon which Day he went in Proceſſion crown'd to the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, the Earl of Warwick bearing his Train, and the Earl of Oxford his Sword, the People crying out God ſave King Henry! forgetting that not long before they had pray'd for Edward againſt him. Thus was the Crown plac'd ſometimes upon Henry, and ſometimes upon Edward, according to the Power of the prevailing Party.

Ibid. In King Henry's Name a Parliament met at Weſtminſter upon the twenty ſixth Day of November; in which Edward was declar'd a Traitor to his Country, and an Uſurper of the Crown, his Eſtate confiſcated, all Statutes made in his Name and by his Authority annull'd, the Crowns of England and France confirm'd upon Henry, and the Heirs Male of his Body, and for want of ſuch, upon the Duke of Clarence, and his Heirs Male, who hereafter was to be acknowledg'd the next Heir to his Father Richard Duke of York; and Edward, for his Crimes committed, depriv'd of his Birthright, and all other Advantages attending it. The Earls of Pembroke and Oxford were reſtor'd to their Blood, Dignities and Eſtates; and the Marqueſs Montague was receiv'd into Favour, and his Fault pardon'd, ſince his Revolt from Edward was the chief Cauſe of his deſerting the Kingdom. Thoſe who ſided with him were depriv'd of their Honours, Titles and Faculties; and ſuch puniſh'd as in this Conteſt had taken up Arms againſt King Henry. Worceſter, and Lord Deputy of Ireland for Edward, being found in a Hollow Tree near Huntington, was brought to London and beheaded on Tower-Hill. Finally the Government of the King and Kingdom was committed to the great Earl of Warwick and his Son-in-Law the Duke of Clarence: So that King Henry, who ſcarce ever poſſeſs'd more than the Name of a King, ſeem'd not ſo much to be ſet at Liberty, as to have his Keepers chang'd, and his Priſon enlarg'd.

About this Time Jaſper Earl of Pembroke, going into Wales to view his Land in Pembrokeſhire, found there the Lord Henry, Son to Margaret, the only Daughter and Heir to John Beaufort the firſt Duke of Somerſet, not then full ten Years of Age, kept in ſome meaſure like a Priſoner, yet honourably educated by the Lady Herbert. This remarkable Youth was brought by him to London, and preſented to King Henry; who after he had ſeriouſly fix'd his Eyes upon him, ſolemnly ſpoke thus to the Lords about him, Lo this is the Perſon to whom, after all our violent Struggles, both we and our Adverſaries muſt at laſt ſubmit. Which afterwards happening, confirm'd the Opinion that was held of his uncommon Sanctity, ſince by the Spirit of Prophecy he foreſaw the Succeſſion of King Henry the Seventh, when at that Time many of both Houſes were alive to precede him. Holling. &c.

A. D. 1470. Reg. 10.

III. While all Things in England happily ſucceeded for King Henry's Intereſt, his Rival Edward was uſing all poſſible Endeavours to recover his Kingdom by the Aſſiſtance of his Brother the Duke of Burgundy. Before his Landing in Holland that Duke was inform'd that he was dead, which was no unpleaſing News to him, being biaſs'd by his ancient Inclination to the Houſe of Lancaſter; and tho' Warwick's Power did much diſturb him, never expecting to gain him, yet he hop'd ſtrongly to oppoſe him, by Means of the two Dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, who had been maintain'd by him in Time of their Diſtreſs. But hearing of Edward's Arrival in Holland, he was at firſt confounded, for to aſſiſt him openly would draw on him the Enmity of King Henry; nor could he in Honour deny him Succours, ſince his Wife was the other's own Siſter. However to prevent all Relief, Warwick's firſt Deſigns were to divert the Duke of Burgundy, juſtly conceiving that while he was buſied with the Arms of France in Picardy, and thoſe of England near Calais, Danger would oblige him to look wholly to his own Affairs, without concerning himſelf with thoſe of other Men. Accordingly he ſent a Body of Men to Calais, to make Inroads into the Parts about Bouloign, which were with all dutiful Reſpect receiv'd by Vauclere; which freed him from all Suſpicion of being inclin'd to the contrary Party. For as ſoon as the News of Henry's Reeſtabliſhment arriv'd at Calais, every one there took upon him the Earl of Warwick's Enſigns and Impreſs, which was a Ragged Staff made of Gold, Silver, Silk or Cloath, according to the Condition of him that wore it. And Vauclere was the firſt who did ſo. Still the Duke of Burgundy knew not that Calais was at Warwick's Command; but building much upon Vauclere's former Uſage towards Warwick, and his accepting a Penſion from himſelf, he ſent the famous Hiſtorian Philip Comines to ſee what he had to rely on. Upon his Arrival, he ſoon found his Labour uſeleſs; for all he met wore the Earl's Colours; the Gate of his own Lodgings and Chamber-Door were mark'd with the White-Croſs; and Songs were every where ſung of the ſtrict Amity between King Lewis and Warwick. This alter'd Comines's Meaſures, and caus'd him to aſſure Vauclere, That the Duke of Burgundy had made no Perſonal Alliance with Edward; ſince the Articles of the Contract only mention'd England and the King thereof; that therefore the Amity between England and Burgundy ſhould ſtill continue the ſame, the Name of Henry being put in inſtead of Edward. The Duke was not diſpleas'd at this Agreement, tho' it was not altogether to his Deſire; for by this he might ſecretly act as he pleas'd, while he was free from being ſuſpected by King Henry's Party. In the mean Time Edward Comines. &c.

ward us'd all poſſible Arguments and Perſuaſions to his Brother Burgundy, which at firſt were but coldly entertain'd by him; for the Dukes of Somerſet and Exeter had ſhown him what was owing to his Birth, he himſelf coming from the Houſe of Lancaſter, and had promis'd what he could deſire againſt Warwick, to whom they were both irreconcilable Enemies. Edward was not pleas'd to be nouriſh'd with Hopes, while his Brother made him believe that his Diſſembling was neceſſary for them both; for himſelf, becauſe he was not to fight with two Kingdoms at the ſame Time; and for his Brother, becauſe Opportunity might render his Succour more effectual.

Comines. Holling. &c. At length, Edward reſolving not to bear any longer Delays, the Duke caus'd four Ships to be made ready for him at Vere in Holland, which being a free Port, the Ships might ſeem to be ſet out by Edward himſelf; and hir'd fourteen more for him of the Eaſterlings, bargaining that they ſhould tranſport him into England, and ſerve him fifteen Days after his Landing. He alſo caus'd fifty thouſand Florins to be ſecretly deliver'd to him, and that this Aid might not ſeem to be given by him, he by Proclamation forbad all Men to aſſiſt Edward; by which he freed himſelf from giving Suſpicion to England, and whatever the Succeſs was, he remain'd Friends to both Sides. And now the Seaſon ſerving, King Edward being two thouſand ſtrong, beſides his Mariners, took Shipping for his former Kingdom of England, attempting firſt to land in Norfolk; but theſe Coaſts being ſtrongly guarded, he hover'd more Northwards, and entring Humber, landed at Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire; the ſame Place where King Henry the Fourth landed, when he came to deprive Richard the Second of the Crown, and uſurp it to himſelf. Then imitating the ſame Perſon, but much more his own Father, who upon the like Occaſion thrice forſwore himſelf, he laid aſide all Claim to the Crown, and by Oath declar'd he came only to recover his Inheritance, the Dutchy of York. He ſhew'd the rude Multitude, that flock'd in to his Army, the Letters and Seal of the Earl of Northumberland, which as he affirm'd, and caus'd them to believe, was ſent for his ſafe Conduct to enjoy the ſame; and in every Place where he came, he proclaim'd King Henry himſelf, wearing an Eſtrich Feather, his Son Prince Edward's Livery. In the Practice of theſe popular and plauſible Pretenſions he approach'd the City of York, which was prepar'd to oppoſe him; but by his inſinuating Behaviour and Affability towards the Magiſtrates, he obtain'd leave to enter upon his ancient Patrimony, upon Condition he ſwore to two Particulars; Firſt that he would treat the Citizens according to his proffer'd Articles, and Secondly that he would be faithful to all King Henry's Commands. To both which he ſolemnly ſwore; but immediately after broke the Firſt by ſeizing the City into his own Hands, and ſoon after the latter by reaſſuming his former Title to the Crown. In which may be obſerv'd both the Forbearance and Juſtice of Heav'n; the one in not immediately puniſhing him, the other in extending the Puniſhment to his Family; manifeſting, that the deferring of Vengeance is oftentimes the rendring of it more ſignal.

Holling. &c The Earl of Warwick, now hearing that Edward was landed, before he had march'd many Miles, ſent ſtrict Commands to his Brother the Marqueſs Montague, then reſiding at Pontfract with an Army ſufficient to ſecure thoſe Parts, that he ſhould not ſuffer his Entrance into York; whilſt himſelf was preparing what Forces he could procure to join him. But whether the Marqueſs purpoſely conniv'd, or rather wholly ſhut his Eyes, it is certain he made no haſte to intercept his Paſſage to York; nor indeed did he give him any Impediment, when ſhortly after he in a more hoſtile Manner march'd from thence towards Nottingham, paſſing quietly near Pontfract through the Midſt of his Enemies: Which incourag'd many to favour his Deſigns, juſtly believing that Montague was either a real Friend, or afraid to meet with ſuch a powerful Enemy. At Nottingham Edward was proclaim'd King, contrary to the Tenure of his firſt Pretenſions, and his Oath at York. People flock'd to him every ry Hour; and thus without Fear he paſs'd on to Leiceſter, that he might approach his Enemy who lay then at Warwick, under the Command of the Earl of that Name, accompany'd with the Earl of Oxford, reſolving either to give him Battel, or elſe to find Means to join with his Brother the Duke of Clarence. The Earl was not well ſatisfy'd with the Marqueſs his Brother, who by not oppoſing him had incourag'd and ſtrengthen'd the Enemy: He levy'd Soldiers with all Speed that he might come to Battel, and ſent to the Duke of Clarence to haſten his March towards him; but apprehending the Danger of his temporizing, he reſolv'd to fight alone himſelf with thoſe Troops he had, and with this Deſign repair'd to Coventry. Edward, who ſoon after his Departure from Warwick came thither, follow'd him the ſame Way; which much perplex'd the Earl, who was ſure of nothing but Battel, his Safety depending much upon the Will of Fortune, ſince he had reaſon to fear that both his Son-in-Law and Brother were corrupted. Having intrench'd himſelf, he waited the Arrival of the Duke of Clarence, who he underſtood was not far diſtant. In the mean Time Edward broke up his Camp, as if he deſign'd to give his Brother Clarence Battel by himſelf, and drew up in Battalia before him. But as ſoon as they were in Sight of each other, the Duke of Gloceſter ran into Clarence's Camp, without ſo much as demanding the uſual ſafe Conduct, and they ſeem'd to treat of what long before they had concluded between themſelves. Peace was immediately publiſh'd, and Edward proclaim'd King, and the two Brothers joyfully embrac'd each other, as tho' there had never been any Conteſt between them.

The Duke of Clarence comes over to him.

The Duke of Clarence immediately ſent Meſſengers to excuſe his Proceedings to the Earl of Warwick, offering him alſo very honourable and advantagious Conditions with the King his Brother, if he would ſubmit, and prevent the Effuſion of ſo much Blood. But Warwick had a Spirit too ſtubborn to incline to any Conditions but thoſe of his own propoſing, much leſs from One who had directly betray'd him; therefore with Indignation he rejected all Offers of Courteſie, and ſpoke thus to the Meſſengers, Go tell your Maſter, I had rather be an Earl, and like my ſelf, than a falſe and perjur'd Duke; and before I falſifie my Oath, like him, I will lay down my Life at my Enemies Feet, which I doubt not but will be dearly purchas'd. This bold Reſolution caus'd Edward to be more wary, and to reſolve firſt to ſecure Henry, and gain the City of London; whoſe Citizens hearing of his Approach, and the Encreaſe of his Army, and conſidering that Henry was unable to oppoſe him, they thought it moſt ſafe to ſail with the faireſt Wind, therefore ſet open their Gates, and with publick Applauſe cry'd out King Edward! Upon which the Duke of Somerſet and others, left to attend the innocent King Henry, fled from the City; ſo that Henry was abandon'd, void of Help, Dexterity or Reſolution. And Edward entring ſix Months after the Loſs of his Kingdom, put Henry again into the ſame Priſon, from whence he had been taken by the Earl of Warwick, in which, if unmoleſted, he might have been more happy, according to his Inclinations, than at Liberty and Governing among ſo many Viciſſitudes of Fortune, above which his Piety had already ſet him. Edward in a publick Oration commended thoſe Citizens who had been loyal to him, but ſo ſeverely threaten'd ſuch Merchants and others as had aſſiſted King Henry with Monies, that he made the reſt to tremble. But he who had not his Equal in captivating Mens Minds, after he had held them in a long and dreadful Suſpence, encourag'd them by expreſſing his laſt Words with as much Clemency, as he had done his former with Terror: Which not being procur'd by the Importunity of Officers, or Supplications, but from his own meer Motion, did ſo win the Hearts of thoſe that were diſintereſted, that for the future they did that out of Love, which formerly nothing but Fear could have produc'd. And it is probable that it was his inſinuating Behaviour that gave him ſuch an eaſie Entrance into London. Tho' Comines alledges three Reaſons, of which the Reader muſt be be left to judge: First the Gentlemen that were in the Sanctuaries, and the young Prince lately born: Secondly Edward's great Debts in the City, which gain'd him the Merchants good Wishes, since the Payment of his Debts depended upon his Success: Thirdly the Love of many of the chief Citizens Wives, who having been familiar with him, drew their Husbands and Friends to favour him.

Hall. Holling. Habing. So soon as Edward had setled his Affairs in London, he led forth his Army to oppose the Earl of Warwick, who having re-united his scatter'd Forces, by easie Marches was come to St. Albans; in hopes that his Reputation among the Inhabitants of London would draw over many to his Side, or at least so divide them as to render them of little Advantage to his Enemy. But Edward jealous of their Levity, which he had often found, interpos'd his Army between the City and the Earl of Warwick, to cut off all Means of Communication and Intelligence; and that the Presence of King Henry might occasion no Disturbance in London, he took him into his Camp; by which the poor distressed King, whatever Side prevail'd, was morally certain of Destruction. King Edward encamp'd upon Gladmore near Barnet; his Van was commanded by the Duke of Glocester, the Rere by the Lord Hastings, and the main Battel by himself. On the other Side the Earl of Warwick with great Resolution prepar'd his Forces; the right Wing consisting of Horse he committed to the Earl of Oxford, with whom was join'd the Marques Montague; the Left to the Duke of Exeter, and the main Battel, compos'd of Bills and Bows, to the Duke of Somerset. He himself with invincible Courage gave Directions in every Quarter; and when he had survey'd his whole Army, and lik'd both their Order and Behaviour, he sent away his Horse, resolving to fight on Foot, and try the utmost of his Fortune, prefixing in his Thoughts no Medium between Death and Victory. Then he affectionately embrac'd all his great Commanders, in each of whom appear'd a Resolution equal to the Cause; and having by many Protestations declar'd their sincere Faith and Forwardness to the present Service, every Man betook himself to his respective Charge.

Hall. Fabian. Holling. &c. It was Easter Sunday in the Morning, a Day remarkable for that it was stain'd with so much Blood, when both Armies approach'd each other for Battel. That for King Edward took Courage from the Justice of their Cause, and the Fortune of their Prince: That for the Earl, from the mighty Valour of their Commander, and from the Piety of him for whose Redemption they now hazarded their Lives. Both fought for their Kings, both Kings having been crown'd, and acknowledg'd by several Parliaments; and indeed the Question was so nice and subtle, that even among Divines it had continu'd long, and at that Day remain'd not absolutely decided. No wonder then if the common Soldiers on both Sides had the same Assurance of Truth, and with equal Justice began a Battel which was one of the fiercest that had ever been fought by inrag'd Men; the Kingdom and Life being the Question on one Side, and Life and the Kingdom on the other. For six Hours the Victory continu'd doubtful, tho' it often tended to the Earl of Warwick's Side; 'till at length Error alone brought Disorder upon his Army, and that a final Overthrow. For the Earl of Oxford giving his Men a Star with Streams for his Device, rais'd a Mistake in the Army that they were Part of the Enemy whose Badge was the Sun, which was occasion'd by the Mistiness of the Weather: Wherefore when they were successfully pressing forwards, they were thought to be King Edward's Men flying, which caus'd their own main Battel to attack them fiercely on the Back. Upon which Error, Oxford suspecting Treason in Warwick, immediately fled with eight hundred Men; and King Edward with certain fresh Troops in Reserve soon took the Advantage of this Disorder, and forc'd them all to shrink back. Warwick us'd all Methods both of Language and Example; but when nothing could prevail he furiously rush'd into the thickest of his Enemies, hoping either that his Men would bravely follow, or that Death would prevent to the Misery of a Defeat. Montague seeing to what Danger his Brother was reduc'd, ran violently in to his Reſcue; and both ſoon oppreſs'd with Numbers fell, and with them the Spirit of the whole Army. In their Deaths they both clear'd thoſe Calumnies with which they were blemiſh'd; Warwick with having a ſwift Horſe in Readineſs for Flight; and Montague with holding Intelligence with King Edward. Soon after their Fall, King Edward obtain'd a compleat Victory with the Death of ten thouſand of his Adverſaries, and fifteen hundred of his own Men; among whom were none of Note, beſides Sir Humphry Bourchier, Son to the Lord Barnes. The Duke of Somerſet and Earl of Oxford fled towards Scotland; but fearing Danger by the Length of the Way, they repair'd to Wales to find out the Earl of Pembroke. The Duke of Exeter, who was left half ſlain among the dead Bodies, with great Difficulty eſcap'd, and took Sanctuary in Weſtminſter. The great Slaughter of the common People is attributed to this: That whereas Edward in his other Battels was wont to cry out Kill the Lords and Commanders, and ſpare the reſt; he acted contrary at this Time, being highly offended that they more eſteem'd the Earl of Warwick than himſelf.

This was the End of the mighty Warwick's worldly Glory, the greateſt and buſieſt Subject of theſe Times, whoſe Ambition was to make and unmake Kings; and it could not be expected, that ſuch a ſtormy Life ſhould be concluded by a calmer Death. His Ruin took its Riſe from his Father, who being Couſin-German to Henry the Fifth, forſook his Reſpect to Conſanguinity, for that of Affinity with Richard Duke of York, who marry'd his Siſter Cicily Mother to the preſent King Edward. Treading in his Father's Steps, by which he ruin'd innocent King Henry, he proceeded like an indiſcreet Builder, ſo delighted to pull down and ſet up, that at length Part of the Frame he had erected himſelf, fell upon him and cruſh'd him to Death. When by the moſt powerful Engines of Policy and Valour he had rais'd up his Thoughts to the Higheſt, by making himſelf King in Authority, and cauſing the Crown to be entail'd upon the two Princes who had marry'd his Daughters, Providence in one Overthrow ruin'd him, and permitted his Sons-in-Law with their Wives not long after to be extinguiſh'd by ſtrange Deaths, none anſwering his Hopes but the younger Daughter, and that prepoſterouſly to his Deſign. For ſhe indeed by marrying the Duke of Gloceſter, the Murderer of her Husband Prince Edward, became Queen to an Uſurper; and ſoon after by Poiſon, as it was juſtly believ'd, put a Period to her Glory. His Grandchildren by the Duke of Clarence, who arriv'd to any Age, dy'd by the Ax upon a Scaffold; and all that Greatneſs he ſo violently labour'd to confirm in his Poſterity, by unnatural Deaths was reduc'd to nothing. His Brother Montague was unhappily involv'd in the ſame Ruins; and both were thought ſo conſiderable in the Eye of the Nation, that when King Edward return'd triumphantly into London, he caus'd their dead Bodies to be expos'd three Days together to all Comers, that every one might be ſatisfy'd in the Reality of their Deaths. rity of the War, and they would ſuſtain the Charge and Burden of it, by whoſe Power and Valour they did not doubt but to abate the Pride of Edward the Uſurper; who holding himſelf ſecure, began to relapſe into his former Negligence. To theſe Reſolutions the warlike Queen conſented, and us'd all Diligence in her Proceedings; when conſidering what Methods to follow, her Care was moſt fix'd upon the Life and Safety of her Son: And therefore, as well for their Advantage, as for the reſtraining of the Yorkiſts, ſhe thought it beſt to ſend him back again into France; from whence he might ſupply them with new Forces, or at leaſt over-awe Edward from tyrannizing too far. But on the contrary the Lords alledg'd, that Prince Edward, being the ſole Hopes of the Lancaſtrians, ought to be preſent in the Field, the Sight of whom would add Courage to his own Soldiers, and cauſe many of the contrary Side to come over to him. Which Opinion prevailing, every Perſon departed to make what Preparations he could, and the Queen with her French repair'd to Bath, where the Duke of Somerſet and the Earl of Devonſhire were high in Reputation, and by whoſe Authority new Forces daily came in to the Prince's Service.

King Edward had hardly Time to breath after the Battel at Barnet when he heard Queen Margaret was landed, and of the Confluence of People out of Cornwall, Devonſhire and the Weſtern Parts, which hourly flew to her Aſſiſtance: Wherefore committing King Henry and George Arch-Biſhop of York to the Tower, with a ſelect Company of Men he march'd out to meet them, deſigning to deſtroy thoſe many Springs before they could have time to join in the Body of a River which might prove dangerous to his Safety. Therefore from Windſor, Abington, Chicheſter and Malmesbury he continu'd his Progreſs, ſeeking out and urging his Enemies to Battel: But the Queen and her Forces fearing to continue in Bath, remov'd to Briſtol, to Berkley, to Gloceſter, and at laſt to Tewkesbury; where the Duke of Somerſet encamp'd his Forces, without ſtaying for the Earl of Pembroke's Arrival. the Earl of Devonshire, the Lord Wenlock, Sir John Delves, Sir Edward Hampden, Sir Robert Whittingham, and Sir John Lewkener, with no less than three thousand Men besides. This was the twelfth Battel fought between the Houses of Lancaster and York, and the sixth and last that was fought in King Edward's Reign; in which, or soon after, both the Queen and her Son Prince Edward were taken Prisoners. But the Duke of Somerset, the Prior of St. John's, with many Knights and Esquires took Sanctuary in the Abby, and other Places in the Town; notwithstanding which, they were violently taken out and arraign'd before the Duke of Gloceſter, who that Day sate Constable of England, where they were without Mercy or Regard to Blood condemn'd to Death, which they immediately suffer'd upon a Scaffold erected in the Town. With these Lords dy'd twelve worthy Knights, besides others of inferior Note. By this Violation of the Sanctuary King Edward made good the Opinion the World had before conceiv'd of him; that Religion could never so far prevail upon his Conscience as to be any Bar either to his Pleasures or Revenge.

King Henry's Son brought before King Edward,

Young Prince Edward fell into the Hands of Sir Richard Crofts, who intended to have conceal'd him; but King Edward having promis'd a Pension of a hundred Pounds per Annum to whosoever should bring him alive or dead, and Life to the Prince if he was not already dead; Crofts believing he would not falsifie his Promise, presented him to him. King Edward fixing his Eyes upon him, and admiring the Sweetness of his Youth and Disposition, demanded of him, How he durst come with flying Colours into his Kingdom, and raise his People against him? To which he couragiously answer'd, That he came to recover his Father's Kingdom, his proper and natural Inheritance, descended to him by several Generations. King Edward highly offended at these Words, thrust him disdainfully away with his Gantlet, and some say struck him on the Mouth: Upon which Incouragement the Dukes of Clarence and Gloceſter, the Marquess Dorset and the Lord Hastings, seiz'd suddenly upon the Prince, and with their Poniards most barbarously murder'd him; contrary to the Laws of God, Nature and Nations, whose Blood was afterwards reveng'd upon every one of them in particular. His Body was bury'd without any Solemnity among other poor and mean Persons in the Church of the Monastery of the Black-Friars in Tewksbury. Hall. &c.

and murder'd in his Presence.

Shortly after this last Battel, King Edward had notice that the Northern Men were in Arms, and design'd to hazard themselves for the Queen's Liberty; upon which he march'd towards Coventry with such a Power, that they were soon discourag'd, and came thronging in to offer him Subjection. Yet all the Lancastrians were not so determin'd, but rather design'd once more to try whether Fortune would favour them. They had one fit Instrument to promote the Enterprize, the Bastard Fauconbridge, Son to the Earl of Kent, a great Supporter of King Edward's Interest. However this Son, being a Man of a turbulent Spirit, and bold and active, the Earl of Warwick had made him his Admiral to secure the narrow Seas against King Edward's Power; which Office he executed beyond his Commission, and became a Terror to all Merchants. Having got three hundred Male-contents from Calais, he resolv'd to try his Fortunes at Land; and putting in at Dover, great Numbers of loose Persons, most of them the Dregs of former Rebellions, daily repair'd to him, so that his Forces came to be seventeen thousand strong. With these he march'd to London, and in a hostile Manner demanded Admission into the City, and the Releasement of King Henry out of Prison; but was resisted by the Mayor and Citizens on one side, and the Lieutenant of the Tower on the other. Upon which he brought up his Shipping to St. Catharine's, and leaving in them Men sufficient to receive the Booty brought, with the rest he march'd to Kingston Bridge; promising his Soldiers by the way, to give them the Plundering of Westminster for their Dinners, and of the Suburbs of London for their Suppers, but London it self should be their Breakfast the next Morning. But being disappointed Holling. &c. at Kingſton, and hearing of King Edward's March towards London, he turn'd back to Southwark; when to open his Way into London, he caus'd the Bridge to be fir'd; and three thouſand of his Men being by his Veſſels ſent over the Thames, divided themſelves into two Parties, one attempting to enter at Algate, and the other at Biſhopſgate. Both theſe they ſet on fire, ſo that the City was in three Places both fir'd and aſſaulted at the ſame Time; but by the Care and Valour of ſome Noblemen and Citizens, the bold Fauconbridge was at laſt driven to his Ships with the Loſs of ſeven hundred of his Men; and not long after his Forces were diſpers'd, and himſelf beheaded. He is repuls'd.

Hall. Holling. &c. On the twenty firſt Day of May, King Edward with the chief Lords of England, and a Body of thirty thouſand Men came to London, where he was triumphantly receiv'd, which he as gratefully requited, giving the Order of Knighthood to the Mayor and ſome others who had bravely repuls'd the late Rebels, commending both the Valour and Loyalty, and promiſing to reward the meaneſt of his good Citizens Loves with ample Satisfaction, as ſoon as the Common-wealth had recover'd its former Quiet. In the mean Time the cruel Duke of Gloceſter took an Occaſion to viſit King Henry in the Tower, where obſerving his unmov'd Behaviour, either out of Pity of his unbounded Injuries, or of Envy at his unparallel'd Patience, or out of Jealouſie of the Life of one idoliz'd by many Thouſands in the Nation, he ſtabb'd him to the Heart with his own Hands, or at leaſt commanded it to be done in his own Preſence. The Body of this murder'd King was with Guards, and ſome ſhow of Funeral Rites, brought into St. Paul's Church, where with the Face uncover'd it was expos'd to the Curioſity of every Eye; for the King was reſolv'd rather to endure the Scandal of his Murther, than to hazard the Queſtion of his Life. Here it bled again afreſh, and became a melancholy Spectacle to moſt of the Beholders. From thence it was carry'd to the Black-Friars Church, where being laid bare-fac'd, it bled as before, to the great Amazement of the ſorrowful Spectators; who look'd upon it as a miraculous way of demanding Juſtice from Heaven, when it was not to be had on Earth. At length it was put into a Boat, without Prieſt, Clerk, Torch or Taper, Singing or Saying, and was ferry'd into the Abby of Chertſey in Surry, and there without any Pomp interr'd.

King Henry murder'd in the Tower.

Thus dy'd the juſt and innocent King in near the Fiftieth Year of his Age, who had been proclaim'd in the Cradle, crown'd in his Infancy, and again at more Age in the City of Paris, living in all Piety, and loving his Subjects, and reigning thirty eight Years, was in that Time toſs'd with infinite Variety and Mutations: For he was twice impriſon'd and depriv'd of his Crown, betray'd, ſmitten, and wounded, and in all things became a memorable Example of Fortune's Inconſtancy. His diſconſolate Wife Margaret, who twenty ſix Years before, had with the utmoſt Pomp and Magnificence been crown'd Queen of England, and had rul'd over all, was now become a poor Priſoner in Want and Diſtreſs, and wore out her Time in Tears and Lamentations: Which being known to Duke Reyner her Father, he afterwards offer'd Terms of Ranſom to King Edward, which prov'd ſo burthenſom to that Prince, that he was conſtrain'd to pawn and ſell the greateſt Part of his Dominions to purchaſe her Liberty: So that the beſt of her future Condition was only the Return of a miſerable Daughter to an indigent Father. Her Marriage with King Henry was both contrary to Policy and Juſtice on his Side; and as ſoon as ſhe found her Husband's Weakneſs, ſhe us'd all Machinations to reduce him to her ſole Command, with the Deſtruction of his moſt faithful Friends; ſo that ſhe was both unfortunate to her ſelf, and ruinous to the Kingdom. Her proſperous Fortune preſents her in her worſt Colours, a factious, buſie and imperious Queen; her Adverſe in the Beſt, an induſtrious Woman to recover what her Folly had loſt, an excellent Wife, and indulgent Mother; ſo that had ſhe never acted but when Misfortunes had compell'd her, ſhe had been rank'd among the beſt Examples of her Sex. Her Life was the Diſcourſe of the preſent and ſuc-

A. D. 1472. Reg. 12.

IV. The victorious Edward being thus ſucceſsful, and having deſtroy'd the very Root of the Lancaſtrian Party, he proceeded to ſettle the Nation, and to lop off all ſuch Branches as might diſturb the Peace of that, or his own Security. And firſt, under a Pretence of Treaſon, he ſecur'd the Arch-Biſhop of York Brother to the late Earl of Warwick, and ſeiz'd all his Goods, Lands and Lordſhips, and got Poſſeſſion of his rich Plate and Jewels, of which one in his Miter was of ſuch a Value, that the King caus'd it to be ſet in his own Crown. After this he ſent him over to the Caſtle of Guiſnes, where he continu'd a Priſoner, with leſs courteous Uſage than himſelf had ſhown to King Edward when he was his Priſoner. In which Times of Fear and Danger, Jaſper Earl of Pembroke, with his Nephew young Henry Earl of Richmond, fled into Bretaign, where they were honourably receiv'd and entertain'd by the Duke of that Province. Their Eſcape created ſuch a Jealouſie in King Edward, that he offer'd large Sums of Mony to that Duke, if he would deliver them up to his Power: To which the Duke reply'd, That he could not in Honour deliver up thoſe diſtreſſed Princes that had implor'd his Protection; but for his ſake, he would take ſuch Care of them, that he ſhould have no Cauſe of Apprehenſions from them: And to that End he remov'd their own Servants from them, and appointed Bretaigns to attend upon them. John Earl of Oxford, after Barnet Field, for a while ſecur'd himſelf in St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall, but afterwards yielding himſelf to King Edward, had his Life pardon'd: But yet he was ſent over Sea to the Caſtle of Hammes, where for the Space of twelve Years, 'till the Death of King Richard the Third, he was kept a cloſe Priſoner. His Counteſs, who was Siſter to the late Earl of Warwick, was never permitted to come to him, nor had any Thing allow'd for her Subſiſtance, but was compell'd to live upon the Charities of others, and what ſhe could get by her Needle or other Work. But ſtill more deplorable was the Condition of Henry Holland, Duke of Exeter and Earl of Huntington, who after he had made ſo mighty a Figure for many Years, was reduc'd to ſuch Wants, as may be an Example to all Men of the Uncertainty of Secular Grandeur. For Comines tells us, That he himſelf ſaw the Duke of Exeter running bare-leg'd after the Duke of Burgundy's Train, begging his Bread for God's ſake; but he declar'd not his Name, being neareſt of the Houſe of Lancaſter, and Brother-in-Law to King Edward himſelf; but afterwards his Quality being known, Burgundy gave him a ſmall Penſion to maintain him. Not long after he was found dead upon the Shore of Dover, quite ſtripp'd and naked; but how he came by that Death, no Diſcovery could be made.

The Misfortunes of great Perſons.

A. D. 1473. Reg. 13.

All Things being brought to a reaſonable Quietneſs, and Edward reigning without any Competitor or dangerous Diſturber, caus'd a Parliament to be aſſembled at Weſtminſter, in which he re-eſtabliſh'd thoſe Acts which King Henry had abrogated, and annull'd thoſe that were made againſt his Friends and Favourites, at the ſame Time pardoning all former Offences. During this Seſſion the Duke of Burgundy ſent his Ambaſſadors to King Edward, deſiring his Aſſiſtance againſt the French King, which was the more readily heard and granted, as well for the Favours receiv'd of the Duke, in the Time of his Neceſſities, as for his Reſentment againſt Lewis, who had furniſh'd Warwick to diſpoſſeſs him of his Crown. And indeed this was a Spark that would probably ſet the Engliſh Hearts on Fire to recover France, which was loſt by Henry the laſt King. But Mony being wanting for ſo great an Enterprize, the King having expended what had been given him the laſt Year, he proceeded to a new Invention, which was to cauſe a Liſt to be made of the richeſt and ableſt Men of the Kingdom; who being ſummon'd before him, he by his inſinuating Arts of Perſuaſion ſo far prevail'd vail'd upon them, as they all willingly ſuffer'd themſelves to be aſſeſs'd; ſome to gratifie him, ſome for Example, and ſome for Fear. By this Means he rais'd vaſt Sums of Mony, which he call'd by the new Name of Benevolence; in the raiſing of which, we are told of a rich old Widow, who being by the King courteouſly demanded what ſhe would contribute upon ſuch an urgent Occaſion, ſhe anſwer'd, For your Majeſty's Royal and Amiable Countenance I will contribute twenty Pounds Sterling. This Anſwer and Gift ſo pleas'd the King; that he teſtify'd his Gratitude by giving her a hearty Kiſs; which ſo tranſported the Gentlewoman, that ſhe immediately doubled her Sum, and added twenty Pounds more. By which ſlight Paſſage, a Judgment is eaſie to be made of the King's Temper; either of it ſelf full of Humanity, or without Difficulty bending to the loweſt Courteſie, when it any ways concern'd the Advancement of his Profit.

Comines. &c. All Things being in a Readineſs, King Edward repair'd to Dover, and there embark'd himſelf for Calais with an Army more formidable than any that hitherto had invaded France: For he had almoſt all the Nobility and Gentry of the Nation, fifteen hundred Men at Arms compleatly accouter'd, fifteen thouſand Archers on Horſeback, beſides a great Number of Footmen, Pioneers and others; which was the more ſurprizing and remarkable, becauſe ſo much Blood and Mony had been ſpent in the late Civil Wars. This Army was about twenty Days in paſſing between Dover and Calais; but before their Landing, King Edward ſent a Letter of Defiance to the French King, in which he demanded no leſs than the whole Realm of France, threatning if he refus'd to invade his Dominions with Fire and Sword. King Lewis receiving the Letter, which Comines ſays was excellently well penn'd, he privately conferr'd with the Herald that brought it, and in Subſtance return'd this Anſwer: It is far better and wiſer for the new King your Maſter to truſt us an old Adverſary, than to rely upon two ſuch new Deceivers as the Duke of Burgundy and the Earl of St. Paul will prove, if he complies with them: And ſo commend me to your Maſter. Which the Herald promiſing to do, he was graciouſly diſmiſs'd with an honourable Reward of three hundred Crowns, and thirty Ells of Crimſon Velvet, with a Promiſe of greater Acknowledgments, if a Peace was concluded; as alſo with a Preſent of a ſtately Horſe, a wild Boar and a Wolf for King Edward.

Ibid. And now to make good the French King's Allegation to the Herald, the Duke of Burgundy, who had promis'd upon the Word of a Prince to bring to Calais two thouſand Lances, and four thouſand Light-Horſe, fail'd to come. Upon which the Lord Scales was ſent by King Edward to the Duke, to remind him of his Agreement, and to haſten his Arrival with his promis'd Forces. But his Journey was to no great Effect, only occaſioning the Duke with a ſmall Troop of Horſe to come to the King, formally to excuſe himſelf for his Backwardneſs; alledging this Reaſon, that having been employ'd in the Siege of Nuz, he could not leave the Place without infinite Diſgrace, if either Compoſition or Submiſſion were enforc'd; for that Reaſon he was compell'd too much to treſpaſs upon his Patience by the Obſtinacy of the Beſieg'd; but promis'd to ſupply all Defects, both with his Preſence and Power, and that with all Speed. The Earl of St. Paul likewiſe by his Letter perſuaded King Edward to proceed in the Enterprize, and not to doubt of any Accommodations both from the Duke and himſelf. Upon this Aſſurance and Incouragement King Edward advanc'd forwards, but in his Paſſage found no Performance of Promiſes, either from one or the other; for the Duke did not accommodate his Soldiers at Peronne with Victuals or Lodging, as was requiſite and expected; and the Earl inſtead of ſurrendring up St. Quintin's according to Agreement, ſally'd out upon ſuch as were ſent from King Edward to take Poſſeſſion, and play'd upon them with the Canon of the Town. This caus'd King Edward to ſuſpect the Truth of the French King's Character of the Duke and Earl; and from thence-thenceforward ſtood upon his own Guard, giving no further Credit to their Proteſtations: Which being reſented by the Duke of Burgundy, he pretended extraordinary Occaſions, and promiſing a ſpeedy Return with his Forces, he took his leave and departed, which did not a little encreaſe the King of England's Suſpicions.

The French King having Intelligence of the Duke of Burgundy's Departure, and foreſeeing the Danger if they ſhould unite their Powers, he reſolv'd with himſelf to make a Trial to mediate a Peace in the Duke's Abſence; and yet to treat in ſuch a Manner, that if it took not Effect, he might diſclaim the Knowledge of the Overture. Whereupon he privately diſpatch'd a Meſſenger, in Appearance a Herald, but in Reality a Perſon of no Office or Eſtimation, and not known to any of the King's Houſhold, but to Villiers the Maſter of the Horſe, who only was acquainted with the Project and Party. This counterfit Purſivant at Arms, cloath'd with a Trumpet's Banner-roll, addreſs'd himſelf to the King of England, and upon Admiſſion into his Preſence, he firſt ſhew'd the great Deſire the King his Maſter had for Peace, whoſe Amity for England he had ever eſteem'd; excuſing his Reception of the Earl of Warwick with the Neceſſity of the Times, whom he aſſiſted not againſt King Edward but the Duke of Burgundy, who had drawn the Engliſh to theſe exceſſive Charges only to repair his own broken Fortunes, and to make a good Compoſition for himſelf. Laſtly, he deſir'd that the King of England would grant a ſafe Conduct to the Ambaſſadors of the French King his Maſter, who ſhould fully inform his Majeſty, and give his ſafe Conduct for a further Conference in theſe Affairs. This Meſſage being deliver'd in a ſubmiſſive Tone, expreſſing much Humility, and ever yielding to the King's Greatneſs of Spirit and the Nation's Glory, together with a Promiſe of ſuch Conditions as ſhould be honourable and profitable, begot a favourable Audience. And many of the great Lords, who had plentiful Revenues at home, were as ready as the King to harken to Peace, and forſake unneceſſary Dangers abroad. Nor did the greateſt Stateſmen diſlike a Treaty, conſidering that almoſt all the Engliſh Wars in France had rather purchas'd Fame than Treaſure to the Kingdom; and when the Soldiers return'd home, their Scars were uſually greater than their Spoils. Upon theſe Conſiderations King Edward granted a ſafe Conduct, and ſent with this Meſſenger an Engliſh Herald, to receive the like and other Aſſignments from the French King.

Ibid.

But when the Duke of Burgundy underſtood that a Peace was negotiating between the two Kings, he in haſte poſted to the Engliſh Camp, attended only by ſixteen Horſemen. The Diſtraction of his Look and Geſtures expreſs'd the Wildneſs of his Thoughts; ſo that the whole Army diſcover'd his Diſcontent before he declar'd it. At his firſt Appearance before King Edward, he broke into a moſt paſſionate fierce Language, upbraiding him with inglorious Sloth, and the indefatigable Courage of the former Kings of England, upon whoſe Attempts ever attended the nobleſt Victories. He made a ſcornful Repetition of the Mirth his Enemies would make at his Return, as if he had come over with ſuch a numerous Army, Merchant-like to traffick for a little Mony; and the deſpicable Appearance of his People, when they ſaw the mighty Conqueſts their Contributions had procur'd. King Edward charg'd him with Neglect and other Miſcarriages, and the Earl of St. Paul's with ſomething worſe; and when he intimated that he and the Duke would ſtill be included in the Peace, Burgundy diſdainfully rejected it; proteſting the Love he bore to the Engliſh Name, not Care of his own Safety, had inclin'd him to this Enterprize. And to ſhow how little Dependancy his Fortune had on any other, and how without any Mediation he was able to make his own Peace, he vow'd to conclude none with France, 'till the Engliſh Forces had been three Months retir'd. After he had thrown out theſe diſorder'd Speeches, in much Diſcontent he left King Edward; who not a little admir'd to hear himſelf ſo diſdainfully treated, having rarely rarely been accuſtomed to any Language, but what was ſoften'd and poliſh'd by Compliment and Flattery.

Comines, &c. The Peace being reſolv'd between the two Kings of England and France, the Place appointed for Conference was near Amiens; and the Parties aſſign'd from the French, were the Baſtard of Bourbon, Admiral of France, the Lord St. Pierre, and the Biſhop of Eureux. For the Engliſh, were the Lord Howard, Sir Thomas St. Leger, and Doctor Morton Lord Chancellor of England. All theſe meeting, they ſoon concluded a Peace, the Subſtance of which Articles were as following: 'That the French King ſhould immediately pay to the King 'of England ſeventy five thouſand Crowns of the Sun; and annually fifty thou- 'ſand Crowns at London during King Edward's Life. That Charles the Dau- 'phine ſhould marry the Lady Elizabeth, eldeſt Daughter to King Edward, 'and they two to have for their Maintenance the whole Dukedom of Gaſcony, 'or elſe fifty thouſand Crowns yearly to be paid in the Tower of London for 'the Space of nine Years; and at the End of that Term the Dauphine and his 'Lady was to have Gaſcony, of the Charge of which the French King was to 'be acquitted. That the Lord Howard and Sir John Cheyney Maſter of the 'Horſe, ſhould remain in Hoſtage 'till the Engliſh Army had quitted France, 'and a general Peace for nine Years concluded; in which the Dukes of Bur- 'gundy and Bretaign were alſo to be included, if they thought fit. This was ſo acceptable to the French King, that he gave great Preſents of Plate, Mony and Jewels to the Engliſh; and beſides he made moſt magnificent Entertainments for all of that Nation at the City of Amiens, of which Comines gives us a very particular Account. The Duke of Gloceſter ſolely oppos'd this Agreement, as not honourable, or rather not ſuiting with his Deſigns; however it met with no great Delay: And to compleat all, it was agreed that the two Kings ſhould have a perſonal Enterview at Picquigny, a Town three Miles from Amiens, ſeated in a Bottom upon the River Somme. Over this River a ſtrong Bridge was purpoſely built, and in the midſt of it a Grate made with Croſs Barrs, no wider than was ſufficient for Men to thruſt in their Arms; cover'd with Boards above to avoid the Rain, and the Bridge ſo broad, that twelve might ſtand in a Rank on both Sides.

A Peace concluded.

Ibid. The Day approach'd, and the two Kings repair'd to the Place in great Splendor; he of France came firſt to the Grate, accompany'd with twelve Perſons, according to Appointment; of whom John Duke of Bourbon, the Cardinal his Brother, and Comines Lord of Argenton, were the Principal. King Edward enter'd the Bridge on the other End, with his Brother the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Haſtings his Chamberlain, and the Lord Chancellor with eight more; being himſelf glorioufly adorn'd with Cloth of Gold, and wearing a black Velvet Cap richly beſet with Diamonds. Comines ſays that his very Preſence ſpoke him a King; and that both gracefully approaching the Grate, with a reverend Bow and Bending of the Knee, the two Monarchs embrac'd through the Partition with mutual Courteſie. Lewis firſt broke Silence, and declar'd, That he never coveted any Sight ſo much as This; and that he bleſs'd God who had brought them together to ſo glorious an End. After this the Biſhop of Ely, who was Chancellor of England, made an eloquent and learned Oration; and then read the Articles of Peace, and demanded of the two Kings whether they were done with their full Conſents. Which being acknowledg'd, each of them laying one Hand upon the Miſſal, and the other upon the Holy-Croſs, took their ſolemn Oaths to obſerve the ſame. And then falling into a more familiar Converſation, Lewis with a pleaſanter Air told King Edward, That he would one Day invite him to Paris to viſit and court the fair Ladies of that City; and if he ſhould chance to make any falſe Steps with them, he would aſſign the Cardinal of Bourbon for his Confeſſor; by which he at once handſomly touch'd upon the Infirmities of both Perſons. After ſome Compliments, and more private Diſcourſes, both Kings parted with great Satisfaction; only Lewis began to be under ſome Fears that Edward's Curioſity might carry him to Paris, the Delicacies of which City had invited too many Engliſh Princes before.

Many of King Edward's Servants were diſpleas'd with this Agreement, believing he had not conſulted his own Honour; particularly one of them nam'd Lewis de Bretailles, who being with Comines, and demanded by him in how many Battels Edward had been preſent, he anſwer'd In nine, and was victorious in all, but in this you have made him loſe, for his Return into England without Fighting or Danger, will redound more to his Diſhonour, than all his Victories have done to his Honour. Lewis being inform'd of this Anſwer, ſwore according to his Cuſtom That this Man's Mouth muſt of neceſſity be bridled; and immediately caus'd him to be ſent for to dine with him, making great Offers to draw him to his Service; which being refus'd, he gave him a thouſand Crowns, with particular Promiſes to him and his Relations, if he would cultivate the Amity between England and France. Such Artifices was Lewis oblig'd to uſe; and there were few Engliſh Lords, great in the Opinion of the State, but ſhar'd proportionably of his Bounty; even the ſcrupulous Duke of Gloceſter return'd not home without a large Preſent both of Plate and Horſes. The Affection of the Lords was generally bought up, according to the ordinary Courſe in Markets; as they were worth more in King Edward's Eſtimation, ſo was their Price rais'd. The principal Men of Name who were in Penſion, were the Lord Haſtings, the Lord Howard, Sir John Cheyney, Sir Anthony St. Leger, and Sir Thomas Montgomery. Among theſe, beſides the preſent Gifts, he annually diſtributed ſixteen thouſand Crowns, and exacted from every Man an Acquittance; which none refus'd to give but the Lord Haſtings, who declar'd His Hand ſhould not be ſeen among the King's Accounts at Paris; but ſtill receiv'd the Penſion, which without that Formality was continu'd. At what rate King Lewis valu'd his Amity with England is eaſily to be judg'd by his profuſe Liberality; but how lawful it was in the Receivers, we will not ſtrictly determine. For tho' in this King's Reign, as likewiſe in that of Henry the Seventh, many of the great Counſellors were in Penſion to Lewis and his Son Charles, yet it is hard to judge how it could agree with their Dignity; it being beneath a noble Mind to owe any Revenues to a Prince, whoſe Safety muſt never be in the firſt Place of their Care.

King Edward returns into England.

King Edward having receiv'd the Mony agreed by Articles, and given his Hoſtages, march'd to Calais in order to paſs over into England. It ſeem'd very ſtrange to many, that after he had enter'd France with the nobleſt Army that any King of England had before, ſo ſmall a Sum ſhould cauſe him to return. Writers have had different Apprehenſions as to this Matter; but after all, conſidering King Edward's former Condition and Circumſtances, it was thought Wiſdom in him, after he had been fail'd by the Duke of Burgundy, deluded by the Earl of St. Paul, allur'd by Lewis with Monies, Penſions, and chiefly with the Promiſe of ſo honourable and advantagious a Match, to withdraw himſelf; avoiding thereby ſuch Snares into which the Contingencies of War might throw him, as well at home as abroad. And ſuch the Generality of his Friends accounted it; and when he return'd to London, he was receiv'd with the Acclamations and Triumphs of a Conqueror.

A. D. 1475. Reg. 15.

V. The Remainder of this Reign, which continu'd about ſeven Years longer, was without any extraordinary Actions, and for the moſt part calm and undiſturb'd. The King enjoy'd his Dominions without any Moleſtation from Foreign Enemies by means of the late Treaty with France: Burgundy's Enmity did no ways trouble him, which was ſoon diverted another Way, to the Loſs of that Prince's Life: Scotland was in a ſafe Condition, by reaſon of the Truce, the Quality of her preſent Government, and the Want of Incouragement from France: And at home he found himſelf freed from all dangerous Oppoſers, Hall. Holling. &c.

Oppoſers, who were come to their Ends either from the Sword in the Field, or the Ax on the Scaffold; of neither of which he was ſparing. The Life of young Henry Earl of Richmond now in Bretaign, was what alone could give him real Trouble: He could not poſſibly live at Eaſe, and attend ſuch Pleaſures to which he was naturally addicted, ſo long as this Worm did gnaw upon his Heart; that Earl being the only Relict of the Houſe of Lancaſter, who might probably deprive him of his Quiet and Kingdom, if he was not remov'd out of the World. In order to this he ſent Doctor Stillington and others, Ambaſſadors to the Duke of Bretaign, with large Sums and fair Promiſes, That he deſign'd to marry his eldeſt Daughter Elizabeth to the Earl of Richmond, by which all unhappy Cauſes of Diſſentions might be intirely extinguiſh'd. The Ambaſſadors ſo far prevail'd upon the Duke, that he deliver'd the Earl to them, who conducted him to St. Malo's; where while they ſtay'd for a fair Wind, the young Earl, by the ſubtle Contrivances of Peter Landoes the Duke's Treaſurer, who had not been well gratify'd by the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, made his Eſcape, and fled to a Sanctuary; from whence neither Intreaties nor Promiſes could allure him. Nevertheleſs upon Landoes's Promiſe that he ſhould be ſafely kept and confin'd to that Place, the Ambaſſadors return'd home, and acquainted King Edward with the Duke of Bretaign's Courteſie in delivering him, and their own Negligence in ſuffering him to eſcape; affording no other Satisfaction than Landoes's Promiſes. King Edward diſſembled his Concern, and the better to ſecure his Family, he created his eldeſt Son Edward Prince of Wales, &c. and his Second Son Duke of York; giving the Order of Knighthood to the Son and Heir of the Earl of Lincoln, and many others. He alſo created twenty four Knights of the Bath, of whom Brian Chief-Juſtice, and Littleton a Judge of the Common-Pleas were two.

but to no purpoſe.

Holling. Stow. Moore.

King Edward being now in a great meaſure free from all Apprehenſions of Danger, the better to give Luſtre to that Peace he had ſetled, began to addict himſelf to a profuſe Hoſpitality; a way of Greatneſs in which the Monarchs of England have in all Ages exceeded the other Princes of Europe. And upon all ſolemn Times, when Ceſſation from Labour licens'd the Vulgar to admire the glorious Outſide of a State, he ſhew'd a particular Grandeur to the Eye, by preſenting as well martial Exerciſes in Juſts, Tiltings, Tournaments, and the like, as the ſofter Entertainments of Wit and Ingenuity. Never any Prince was more familiar with his Subjects than King Edward; for now all Things ſucceeding without Interruption, he ſet his Heart upon Pleaſures, which had hitherto been afflicted with continual Troubles; and frequently laying aſide the State of a Prince, he often would freely converſe with the inferior Part of his People. At Windſor he ſent for the Mayor and Aldermen of London, with others, upon no other Occaſion than to hunt in his Company; and himſelf to eat, drink and be merry with them. As alſo another Time he did the like at Waltham, where he gave them a moſt friendly and familiar Entertainment, and ſent to their Wives two Harts, ſix Bucks, and a Tun of Wine; which gain'd a nearer Affection than many greater Favours. He was wont often to court and converſe with beautiful Women, which Fault by King Lewis was noted and prevented as to the French Ladies; but in England he ſeem'd to take his full Scope of Liberty: For beſides the Lady Lucy, formerly mention'd, and ſome others, by whom he had Iſſue, he kept three Concubines, who, according to his own Words, all excell'd in very different Qualifications; One the merrieſt, another the wiſeſt, and the third the holieſt Harlot in the Kingdom, as one whom no Man could get out of the Church, unleſs it were to his Bed. The merrieſt was Jane Shore, Wife to a Citizen of London, in whom he took extraordinary Pleaſure; the other two were greater Perſons, but in their Humility were content to be nameleſs, and to forbear the Praiſe of thoſe Properties.

ther the Duke of Clarence, a Prince of greater Spirit than did become a Brother and a Subject. As his Ruin was long design'd, so there were three Things that concur'd to the bringing it about; the King's Suspicion, the Queen's Hatred, and his own Mismanagement; which latter would not have effected it without the other two. His former Rebellion and Alliance with the Earl of Warwick were Faults long forgiven; yet still there remain'd a Fear that these old Inclinations, laid aside for a present Advantage, might be reassum'd; especially when he had the Pretence of an Agreement in Parliament, that he should succeed to the Crown, upon the Failure of King Henry's Heirs. This Consideration wounded the Queen to the Soul; she thought that if her Husband dy'd first, her Children would never succeed their Father; and she was confirm'd in this Opinion by the Rumor of a Prophecy, That G should be the first Letter of his Name that succeeded King Edward; and this Duke's Name being George, it was thought he should be the Murderer of Edward's Sons, which Gloceſter afterwards really was. To these, other Reasons were added which render'd the former more suspicious; his attempting to marry Mary only Daughter to the late Duke of Burgundy; in which the Queen oppos'd him, endeavouring to have marry'd her to her Brother the Earl of Rivers; so that their Disgusts and the King's Jealousies were continually augmented. But the Imputations which gave some Colour to the Justification of his Condemnation, were, That he caus'd a Report to be rais'd among the People that Thomas Burdet was unjustly put to Death, who had lately been executed only for wishing in a Passion that the Horns of a Deer had been in the King's Belly: That the King us'd Negromancy and Poison, to bring such as he hated to their Ends; That Edward was illegitimate, and not begotten by the Duke of York; That he had procur'd many to swear to him and his Heirs, without reserving due Obedience to his Brother; and That he had pretended to the Crown by Virtue of the Contract made with Henry the Sixth.

Accusations against him.

A. D. 1478. Reg. 18.

These several Accusations were brought publickly upon the Stage, and into open Parliament, where he was found guilty, and sent close Prisoner to the Tower of London. Here upon the eleventh of March he was secretly put to Death; the manner, as it is generally receiv'd, was by thrusting his Head into a Butt of Malmesey Wine, by which he was suffocated. His Body was first expos'd, and then bury'd at Tewkesbury in Gloceſterſhire, by that of his Dutchess Isabel Countess of Warwick, who being with Child, dy'd of Poison not long before. The Death of this Prince, which may modestly be accounted the Vengeance of Heav'n, every where begot an extraordinary Censure; the unnatural Severity taking away all Excuse from those who most favour'd the King. It was generally condemn'd, both in regard of the Manner, it being prodigious to be drown'd without Water upon dry Land; and of the Quality of the Person, he being the first Brother to any King of England that ever was attainted. King Edward, who had consented to it, was afterwards so afflicted with the Remembrance of it, that when any su'd for the Life of a condemn'd Man, he usually cry'd out, Oh unfortunate Brother, who had no Man to intercede for him! This Prince left Issue behind him, Edward Earl of Warwick, and Margaret afterwards Countess of Salisbury, both Infants, and Followers of their Father's Misfortunes; He a continual Prisoner, at twenty four Years of Age, beheaded under Henry the Seventh; and She, at sixty two, lost hers in the Reign of Henry the Eighth, which put a full Period to the famous Name of the Plantagenets. The same Year in which the Duke of Clarence was murder'd, the Nation was punish'd with such a raging Pestilence, that the Sword in fifteen Years before devour'd not so many as this did in four Months.

He is drowned in a Butt of Malmesey.

The Misfortunes of his Family.

A. D. 1479. Reg. 19.

After the Death of the Duke of Clarence, King Edward soon began to give another Face to his Temper and Disposition; and from being affable and liberal, he became austere and covetous, to the great Wonder and Dissatisfaction of his People. For whereas the Laws of England granted many Things in Favour of of their Kings, which the Kings themſelves ſeldom put in Execution, as being too full of Rigour; he by virtue of thoſe Laws took ſuch Penalties as they who were rich incurr'd for want of punctual Obſervance of them; and making no Difference in reſpect of Blood, Quality or Title, he made all ſorts of Men apprehend that he would become formidable to the whole Nation: For having abated the Courage of other Men by his Brother's Death, there were none that dar'd contradict him. But the greedy heaping up of Mony was ſo much the more monſtrous to him, becauſe it was contrary to his natural Temper; ſo that ſuch a Change ſeem'd to foreſhew approaching Death. In theſe Times Ambaſſadors were frequently ſent from England to France, and from France to England; the Former, that according to their Obligation, the French might ſend for the contracted Lady Elizabeth Daughter to King Edward; and the Latter to excuſe their Delays, charging it upon the Wars of Burgundy and the Low-Countries, in which all the chief Men in the Kingdom being employ'd, ſhe could not be ſent for in a manner becoming the Dignity and Greatneſs of both the Crowns. So as he who earneſtly deſires a Thing, is by nothing more eaſily deceiv'd than by the Confirmation of new Promiſes; Edward was eaſie to believe, and Lewis made Advantage of his Falſhood, and brought about his Purpoſes of marrying his Son another Way; which if he had carry'd more openly, he could not have effected them. And King Edward being grown groſs in Body, and more unactive in Mind, ſeem'd to reſt ſatisfy'd with the Fame of his former Victories, and the preſent Enjoyment of his annual Tribute from France, which was duely paid into his Exchequer. So that they are not much miſtaken who ſay that the Engliſh have generally won more Honour by Fighting than by Treaties.

A. D. 1480. Reg. 20. His Miſtakes.

In theſe Times, James the Third of that Name, King of Scotland, ſent his Ambaſſadors into England, to move and treat of a Marriage between the Lady Cicely, King Edward's ſecond Daughter, and his eldeſt Son James Prince of Scotland. King Edward and his Council thinking this Affinity might be both honourable and profitable for England, did not only readily grant his Suit, but alſo furniſh'd him with certain Sums of Mony, that the Marriage ſhould not hereafter be interrupted; upon this Condition, that if the intended Marriage ſhould by any Accident be broken off, either on the Scotch or Engliſh Side, that then the Provoſt and Merchants of Edinburgh ſhould be bound for the Repayment of the Mony. All Hiſtories repreſent King James as a Man much addicted to his own Will, and to deſpiſe the good Advice of his ancient Nobility, and his grave and faithful Counſellors; and that none might reprehend his Actions, he entertain'd and preferr'd Men of mean Birth and worſe Conditions; by whoſe evil Counſel he ſo afflicted his Nobility with Exactions and Impriſonments, and ſome with Death, that divers of them choſe a voluntary Exile and liv'd in foreign Countries. Others he himſelf baniſh'd, particularly his ſecond Brother Alexander Duke of Albany, who was entertain'd by King Edward; and moreover caus'd the Veins of John his third Brother to be open'd, ſo that he bled to Death. Beſides this his Carriage towards his Brothers, Friends and Nobility, by the Inſtigation of the French King, who repin'd at this laſt League and Alliance, he neglected his Promiſe and Affinity made with King Edward, and caus'd an Army to be rais'd in order to invade the Kingdom of England. And relying upon his own Valour and the Aſſiſtance of France, he ſent a peremptory Meſſage to King Edward, That he ſhould not dare to aid his Siſter the Dutcheſs of Burgundy againſt King Lewis, who was the Scots Ally; and alſo with Threats of War he commanded him to deliver to his Ambaſſadors the Duke of Albany, then reſiding in the Engliſh Court; and laſtly to make full Satisfaction for all Damages done upon the Scotch Borders.

King Edward not a little inrag'd at theſe falſe and diſhonourable Dealings, even in the Winter Seaſon muſter'd his Men, prepar'd his Artillery, and fitted out his Navy, that nothing might be wanting in the following Spring: Which was no no ſooner advanc'd, but he appointed for his Lieutenant his Brother Richard Duke of Gloceſter, who with the Earl of Northumberland, the Lords Stanley, Lovell, Greiſtock and others, with the Duke of Albany himſelf, march'd into the North with an Army of above twenty thouſand ſtrong. And firſt Gloceſter beſieg'd the important Town of Berwick, and then marching forwards with great Terror and Devaſtations, he enter'd the chief City Edinburgh, urging King James to perform his Covenants concerning the Marriage between Prince James his Son and the Lady Cicely, before agreed upon, and threatning Ruin and Deſtruction, if the Match was not conſummated. The Scotch Nobility reflecting upon their own imminent Danger, put to Death the King's wicked Counſellors, ordain'd the Duke of Albany Vicegerent of Scotland, and promis'd to repay the Mony receiv'd according to Covenants. After which, with the Surrender of the ſtrong Town of Berwick, which had been out of the Engliſh Poſſeſſion for twenty one Years, a general Peace was concluded between the two Nations. Whereupon not long after, Garter King at Arms was ſent into Scotland, with a formal Inſtrument in Writing to the Provoſt and Burgeſſes of Edinburgh, who had undertaken to disburſe the Mony, to ſignifie King Edward's Mind touching the Marriage intended, and to demand the ſaid Sum by a fix'd Day, which was accordingly repaid.

A Peace concluded.

A. D. 1483. Reg. 23.

As King Edward was greatly diſappointed in the Marriage of his ſecond Daughter to Scotland, ſo he met with a greater as to that of his eldeſt Daughter to France. For the French King finding the Daughter of Auſtria more proper for his Son's preſent Intereſt, deluded Edward with Shows of firm Faith, 'till he had effected his Purpoſe. The naming of this ſounded ſo harſhly in King Edward's Ears, that he would never ſuffer that String to be touch'd in his Preſence, but ever believ'd that the French deſign'd honourably, tho' the Truth of their Deſigns was confirm'd by the Duke of Auſtria's Ambaſſadors reſiding in England. Yet ſtill Edward would not ſo much as entertain a Suſpicion againſt the French King, and therefore ſuffer'd him to incroach upon thoſe Parts of Picardy that join'd to Calais, and to gain Time 'till it was paſt recalling. For then the Lord Howard returning from France, confidently told him, That he was preſent, and ſaw the Lady Margaret of Auſtria, Daughter to Duke Maximilian, Son to the Emperor Frederick, receiv'd into France with great Pomp and Splendor, and at Ambois contracted and eſpous'd to the Dauphine. The King became ſo nicely ſenſible of this Abuſe, that he immediately reſolv'd upon a Revenge; and every one with Chearfulneſs provided for War, the Clergy ſupplying in Monies what they could not do in Perſon. But while he was paſſionately endeavouring to call Lewis to an Account for his Crimes, he was ſummon'd by Death to give a full Account of all his own. Being ſeiz'd by a melancholy Fit, or as others ſay a Surfeit, and finding little Hopes of Recovery, he began to conſider the Vanity of all his Victories, which he had purchas'd with the Expence of ſo much Engliſh Blood; and to reflect upon the deceitful Beauty of his ſenſual Pleaſures, which now appear'd with all the Marks of Horror and Deformity. Then cauſing his Lords, which were then numerous in Court, to be ſent for, he upon his Bed pathetically recommended to them the Care of the young Princes his Sons; ſhewing them, That they being ſo young they ſtood in need of extraordinary Counſellors, which in the Diſtraction of private Contentions could hardly be found: That they having all a Relation to him, ſome by Blood, ſome by Affinity, all by Love and Duty, they were to join in a reciprocal Affection to each other, that the Conformity of their Minds might beget the like in their Actions, and in their Ends neceſſarily conducing to the Service of an Infant King, and the general Good of the Kingdom. Then reminding them of the innumerable Evils ariſing from Civil Wars and Diſſentions, he heartily begg'd of God that out of his particular Goodneſs no ſuch might hereafter happen; but as this Favour was never to be expected without the forgetting of paſt Injuries, it caus'd him in the Name of the ſame ſame God, and as the laſt Comfort he ſhould receive, to deſire of them all a ſincere Forgiveneſs of any Injuries done by him. All that were preſent fell into Tears; and thoſe who had born greateſt Hatred freely ſhook Hands in Token of their laſt Obedience to the dying King; who being pleas'd with theſe outward Expreſſions of Love, ſoon after expired in the forty ſecond Year of his Age, upon the ninth Day of April, after a tumultuous, great and various Reign of twenty two Years one Month, and five Days. His Death.

Sandford. The Manner of his Interment was thus: Firſt, the Corps was cover'd from the Navel to the Knees, and ſo laid naked upon a Board for ten or twelve Hours, to be view'd by all the Lords in London, as well as the Lord Mayor and his Brethren; and then he was ſeared. The next Day he was brought into St. Stephen's Chappel, where three Maſſes were ſung over him in the Morning, and Dirige and Commendam in the Afternoon; at Night he was well watch'd by the Nobles and his Servants. In this manner he reſted eight Days, and on the ninth was convey'd to Weſtminſter Abby, born by ſeveral Knights and Eſquires, cover'd over by a large black Cloath of Gold, with a Croſs of Cloth of Silver, and above that a rich Canopy of Cloth Imperial fring'd with Gold and black Silk, born by four Knights, having at the Corners four Banners born by four other Knights, the firſt of the Trinity, the ſecond of our Lady, the third of St. George, and the fourth of St. Edward. The Lord Howard bore the King's Banner before the Body, and the Officers of Arms about him on every Side. In the Herſe in Weſtminſter Abby, above the Body and Cloath of Gold, was a Perſonage in the Similitude of a King, in Royal Robes, and a Crown on his Head, a Scepter in one Hand, and a gilt Ball of Silver on the other, with a Croſs patee. After many Solemnities perform'd, the Body was plac'd in a Chariot drawn by ſix Horſes, and ſo with great Pomp went to Charing-croſs, where the Chariot was cens'd, and from thence to Syon, and ſo to Eaton, where it was met by the Proceſſion of Windſor. At the Caſtle Gate the Arch-Biſhop of York and the Biſhop of Wincheſter cenſed the Corps; and from thence they paſs'd to the new Church, where in the Quire was appointed an admirable wrought Herſe, being that Night watch'd by many Nobles and Eſquires of the Body, and was there bury'd with all Solemnities befitting ſo great and victorious a King. His Interment.

To ſay ſomething of his Perſon and Character, Comines tells us That he was the goodlieſt Gentleman that ever his Eyes beheld, tall of Stature, fair of Complexion, and of a moſt noble Preſence; yet too much inclining to Fat and Groſsneſs in his latter Days. Yet the Gifts of his Mind ſeem'd to ſtrive for Priority with thoſe of his Body, having a moſt couragious Heart, and a magnanimous Diſpoſition, being politick in Counſel, witty in Converſation, and in Adverſity undaunted. In Battel he was bold and adventurous, being preſent in nine ſeveral Engagements, in which to his great Renown he always fought on Foot, and was ever victorious. He was far from being proud, yet very ambitious; and to gain his Ends, no Man was Maſter of more inſinuating Methods than himſelf. In the midſt of all his ſhining Qualifications he could ſet no Bounds to his Luſt or his Ambition, in both of which he was remarkably puniſh'd. As to the former, it was obſerv'd that never Man was fram'd by Nature more apt to the Exerciſe of it, and whom amorous Courtſhip did leſs misbecome: Yet this Sin, tho' black in the Eye of Heav'n, by Politicians is too often excus'd in a Prince, as not generally injurious to his Subjects. But notwithſtanding that Opinion, beſides the fatal Example, if we obſerve the Revolution of Kingdoms, we find no Iniquity in Princes ſo commonly puniſh'd: The Diſhonour of one Lady abus'd often cauſes the Diſgrace of ſeveral Families, and mighty Factions joining for Revenge; for no Injuries like theſe are ſo cruel to human Nature, and with ſo little Patience diſſembled. For this King Edward was peculiarly puniſh'd in his Sons, who were both depriv'd of all Things by their unnatural Uncle; His Perſon and Character.

Uncle; and there was ſo much Appearance of Right in that Uſurper, by their Father's Incontinency, that even an Act of Parliament was made to baſtardize them both. As to his Ambition, tho' according to the exact Rules of lineal Succeſſion he had the neareſt Right to the Crown, yet conſidering the innumerable Perjuries, Treaſons, Bloodſheds, and other Calamities that brought him and ſecur'd him in the Throne, his and his Father's Actions were leſs juſtifiable than thoſe of many real Uſurpers: And all thoſe Victories he obtain'd, were againſt his own Nation, and his greateſt Adverſaries were in Conſanguinity with him; ſo that he may more properly be ſaid to have let himſelf Blood, than his Enemies; or rather for the Preſervation of his own Body, to have cut off his principal and moſt neceſſary Limbs. The Hand of Heav'n lay heavy upon his Generation, and notwithſtanding all his Succeſs he was deſcended from a moſt unfortunate Family, he being the only Male of all his Houſe, except a Child of Richard the Third, that dy'd a natural Death, after it claim'd the Crown. His Grand-Father the Earl of Cambridge was beheaded at Southampton; the Duke of York his Father ſlain before Sandall; of his three Brothers, the Earl of Rutland was ſlain in cold Blood, the Duke of Clarence drown'd in a Butt of Malmeſey, and the Duke of Gloceſter, after he had ſtrangled his Nephews, loſt his Kingdom and Life in Battel. So that we meet with no Tragedy, whether true or fabulous, where we find ſo many various and cruel Deaths as in this Family. Beſides two Sons, King Edward left ſeven Daughters; of whom Elizabeth the Eldeſt met with good Fortune, and was marry'd to King Henry the Seventh: Cicely was marry'd to Vicount Wells, and after that to another, but had Iſſue by neither: Anne marry'd to Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, whoſe Children dy'd all young: Bridget was a Nun in Dartford: Mary promis'd to the King of Denmark, but dy'd before Marriage: Margaret dy'd young: Catharine was marry'd to William Courtney Earl of Devonſhire, and he had Edward Earl of Devonſhire, who dy'd without Iſſue in Padua in the Year 1556.

The Miſfortunes of his Family.

Learned Men. In this Reign flouriſh'd ſeveral Men eminent for Arts and Learning, as well as Valour, as Thomas Littleton a famous Judge of the Common Pleas, who brought a great Part of the Law into Method which before was confus'dly diſpers'd: John Forteſcue a Judge, and Chancellor of England, who was famous for underſtanding the Laws and Conſtitution of England: John Harding and William Caxton, both Writers of the Engliſh Hiſtory: Scogan a learned Gentleman, and a Student of Oxford, who for his pleaſant Wit and jocular Conceits was call'd to Court. And that which now began to give new Incouragement to Learning was the famous Art of Printing, which was firſt found out in Germany by John Gutterberghen about the Year 1440, or ſomewhat later, and was brought into England by William Caxton, a Mercer of London, and probably the ſame with the Hiſtorian, who firſt practis'd the ſame in the Abby of Weſtminſter, Anno Dom. 1571, and the eleventh of this Reign.

SECT II.

The Hiſtory of King EDWARD the Fifth.

Containing two Months, and twelve Days.

I. KING Edward the Fourth left two Sons behind him, Edward Prince of Wales, twelve Years and five Months old, and Richard Duke of York, about nine Years of Age. The firſt of theſe by all Writers is call'd by the Name of King Edward the Fifth, as being lawful and rightful Heir to the Crown of England, and was accordingly proclaim'd King. But if we conſider the Nature of his Reign, it may rather be call'd an Inter-regnum, or perhaps more properly the Tyranny of Richard the Third, who from the Death of King Edward the Fourth, both rul'd as a King, and rag'd as a Tyrant. Of this Man, who was now Duke of Gloceſter, we are told ſtrange Stories, as to his monſtrous Birth, his deformed Perſon, and his barbarous Diſpoſition; of all which we have not ſo much Certainty, as that his Ambition had long prompted him to uſurp the Crown of England. This was in part diſcover'd by means of one Miſtlebroke, who in the ſame Night that King Edward dy'd, haſtily went to one of the Duke's Friends in the City call'd Potter, and rouſing him out of his Bed, declar'd that King Edward was departed. To whom the other with great Satisfaction reply'd, Then will my Maſter the Duke of Gloceſter be King. This ſoon appear'd in the Event; tho' at that Time the Duke was in the North of England; for which Reaſon the Lord Haſtings, then Lord Chamberlain, ſent an immediate Expreſs to him of the King his Brother's Death; acquainting him withal, that he had committed the young King, the Queen, and his other Children, to his Care and Government; and likewiſe putting him in mind, how neceſſary it was for him ſpeedily to repair to London. But the Duke of Gloceſter needed no Spur to ſet him forwards, who was already in a full Career; and as he had long projected how he might attain to the Crown, he now found the Way more open than ever. A. D. 1483. Reg. 0. Young Edward proclaim'd King

More. Young Prince Edward, now call'd King, was at Ludlow in Shropſhire when his Father dy'd, where he had liv'd for a conſiderable Space, in Order to awe the Welſh. Here he had many of his Mother's Relations about him; but Sir Anthony Woodvile the Lord Rivers was appointed his chief Counſellor and Director. This placing ſo many of the Queen's Friends about the young Prince was thought to be good Policy in her; but the Duke of Gloceſter turn'd it to their Deſtruction, and upon that Ground laid the Foundation of all his unhappy Fabrick. For whomſoever he found either diſpleas'd at them, or Friends to himſelf, he diſcover'd his Thoughts to them, ſome by Words, and ſome by Writings and ſecret Meſſengers, That it was not to be ſuffer'd either in Reaſon or Policy, that the young King their Maſter ſhould be in the Hands and Cuſtody of his Mother's Relations, ſequeſter'd in a manner from their Company and Attendance, who were far ſuperior to them both in Birth and Merits. With theſe and the like Inſinuations, he ſoon ſet ſeveral on Fire who were but too apt to kindle into a Flame; eſpecially the Duke of Buckingham, and the Lord Chamberlain Haſtings, both of great Power and Authority. Theſe two, not having ſo much Affection for each other, as Hatred to the Queen's Party, agreed in this Point with the Duke of Gloceſter, That they would intirely remove from the King's Society all his Mother's Friends, under the Name of Enemies to the Publick. This firſt Step gain'd, the Duke of Gloceſter, underſtanding that the Lords then about the King deſign'd to bring him to be crown'd at London, accompany'd with ſuch a Power of their Friends, that it would be difficult for him to effect his Purpoſe, without ſuch Numbers as would raiſe the Appearance of a Rebellion; The Duke of Gloceſter deſigns to uſurp the Crown. His Policy.

lion; he therefore ſecretly and by various Methods caus'd the Queen to be perſuaded That if her Son came to London with ſuch a numerous Retinue it would cauſe many Miſchiefs, and adminiſter Matter of Suſpicion and Jealouſies to ſeveral who were but lately reconcil'd. Upon this the Queen ignorantly in all Haſte ſent to her Son, and her Brother; earneſtly requiring them, for ſome Cauſes known to her ſelf, to diſmiſs their Guard; which was the ſooner obey'd, becauſe the Duke of Gloceſter himſelf, and other Lords of his Party, wrot to the King ſo reverently, and the reſt ſo lovingly, that without any great Suſpicion the King mov'd forwards with an inconſiderable Train.

He goes to meet young Edward at Northampton.

This ſecond Work effected, Gloceſter, Buckingham, and ſeveral Lords, reſolv'd to meet the King in his Paſſage; and coming to Northampton, where the King was arriv'd, pretending it was incommodious for ſo many to lodge in the ſame Place, they caus'd the King to go to Stony-Stratford, twelve Miles further. But the two Dukes ſtay'd behind; and under Pretence of Honour kept the Earl Rivers with them, and feaſted him with ſuch Demonſtrations of Joy, and ſo unuſual, that if Opinion had not blinded him, he might have eaſily diſcover'd the Deceit. Upon his going to his Lodgings, the two Dukes caus'd the Keys of the Gates to be brought to them, to ſecure any from going out; and ſpending the greateſt part of the Night in Counſel and Advice, early in the Morning they ſent to all the neighbouring Villages where their Servants were billetted, ordering them to be ready on Horſeback, and ſecure the Way to Stony-Stratford from all Paſſengers going thither. A ſtrange Diligence, which yet wrought no Impreſſion in ſuch as obſerv'd it; believing it to be done that none might come to the King before themſelves. But Rivers was of another Opinion, and after ſeveral Conjectures, he reſolv'd to go himſelf, and diſcover the Bottom of the Deſign; but upon his firſt Appearance, they roughly charg'd him with endeavouring to keep them from the King and ruin them, which he ſhould not be able to effect; and tumultuouſly interrupting him when he was making a Reply, they committed him to the Cuſtody of ſome of their own Servants. Then haſtning to Stony-Stratford, they found the King juſt mounting his Horſe, to whom they addreſs'd themſelves with the utmoſt Reverence, and he as lovingly receiv'd them, without conceiving their Deſigns. Then coming up to the Lord Richard Gray, Brother to the Marqueſs Dorſet, and half-Brother to the King, they immediately accus'd him of joining with his Brother the Marqueſs and his Uncle Rivers to get the Government of the King and Kingdom into their own Hands, and ſowing Diviſions among the Nobility: In order to which the Marqueſs had taken out of the Tower of London all the Royal Treaſure, and had ſent Men to Sea for dangerous Deſigns. To which the young King calmly made Anſwer, That for what concern'd the Marqueſs, he was ignorant, becauſe of his Abſence; but for his Uncle Rivers and his Brother Richard, he was ſure they could not be guilty, becauſe they had always been in his Company. To this Buckingham reply'd, His Majeſty was deceiv'd; that their Deſigns were conceal'd from him; and that they did not deſerve to be excus'd by ſo good a Prince. And immediately they arreſted the Lord Richard, with Sir Thomas Vaughan and Sir Richard Hawte in the King's Preſence; and the King inſtead of going forwards was brought back with his Company to Northampton. Such of his Attendants as Gloceſter durſt not truſt were remov'd, and others put in their Place; at which the poor King could not refrain from Tears; having only the Name of a King, and wanting Age and Power to defend himſelf, as well as his Kindred and Servants. And that Diſſimulation might not be wanting, even where there was no Occaſion, the Duke of Gloceſter the next Day ſent a Diſh of Meat from his own Table to the Earl Rivers, deſiring him to be at Eaſe, for all ſhould be well with him. The Earl handſomly baulking the former Injury, return'd Thanks for the Honour done to him, and deſir'd the Meſſenger that he would carry it to his Nephew Richard, For he being young, and unaccuſtom'd to Adverſity, ſtood more in need of this Favour. This feign'd Courteſie was like the Lightning that foreruns Thunders; for after many Change of Priſons, they were all brought to Pontfract, and afterwards loſt their Heads.

The News of theſe Tranſactions was brought to the Queen in the Night, who immediately gueſs'd at the Duke's Deſign: She too late repented the Counſel given to her Brother to disband his Forces; and apparently ſaw her own Danger, but much more that of her ſecond Son the Duke of York, and her Daughters. At the ſame Hour ſhe fled with her Children from her Palace, and took Sanctuary in Weſtminſter, to the great Compaſſion of all that ſaw ſo much Hurry and Precipitation at that unſeaſonable Time. The Lord Haſtings had receiv'd the like Advice, but with contrary Sentiments: He could but rejoice at the Queen's Sufferings; but loving King Edward and his Children, he after Midnight diſpatch'd a Gentleman to the Arch-Biſhop of York, Lord-Chancellor of England, who with Difficulty being brought in, acquainted him with what had been done to the young King and his Friends; not concealing the Queen's flying to Sanctuary, but at the ſame Time aſſuring him, All would be well. The Arch-Biſhop haſtily anſwer'd, Be it as well as it will, it will never be ſo well as we have ſeen it; and as ſoon as the Gentleman departed he aroſe from his Bed, and cauſing all his Family to do the ſame, and to arm themſelves, he took the Great Seal, and went with them to the Queen. There he found nothing but Haſte and Confuſion, People juſtling each other, ſome carrying in Goods, others going out to fetch more; and Sighs and Lamentations every where. The Queen her ſelf was ſeated by her Children in the moſt diſconſolate Manner upon the Ground; whom the Chancellor comforted with ſuch Reaſons as Hope then could ſuggeſt, acquainting her with what the Chamberlain Haſtings had let him know; conceiving that he who had been oblig'd to the late King would join with his Children and Family. But the Queen loathing to hear that Name, reply'd That he was the Man that endeavour'd the utter Extirpation of her Blood. The Arch-Biſhop not able to diſſuade her from that Opinion, diſcourſing from the leaſt Dangers to the greateſt, aſſur'd her That if any other King ſhould be crown'd but her eldeſt Son, they would crown the Duke of York, who was now in her Poſſeſſion: Upon which he deliver'd to her the Great Seal of England, for the Uſe and Benefit of that Son, and ſo departed about Day-light, not then weighing the Importance of this Delivery, nor how prejudicial it might be to him. But being return'd home, and ſeeing from his Window the Thames cover'd with Boats fill'd with Gloceſter's Servants, watching if any went by Water to Sanctuary; and hearing that there were Tumults and Cabals in the City, Lords and others appearing in Arms, he conſider'd that he had been too raſh in parting with the Great Seal to the Queen, who could reap no Advantage by it; and thereupon privately ſent for it again, and after that carry'd it, according to Cuſtom, openly in the Sight of all Men.

The Queen-Mother takes Sanctuary.

The Arch-Biſhop of York comforts her.

In the mean Time the Commotions in the City encreas'd; moſt believing that the Proceedings at Northampton were caus'd to hinder the Coronation, and more Troubles might have follow'd, had not the Lord Haſtings at a publick Aſſembly aſſur'd them, That Rivers, Gray and the reſt were impriſon'd for certain Conſpiracies againſt the Dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham, as would appear by due Proceſs of Law. That no Doubt was to be made of the Duke of Gloceſter, ſince he had always continu'd faithful to the King; but to ſuſpect it might prove of dangerous Conſequence, and if they did not lay down their Arms with the ſame Facility they had taken them up. This Aſſurance quieted the greateſt Part of the People, eſpecially when they underſtood the King was coming, attended by the Duke his Uncle with all manner of Reſpect; as alſo that among Rivers's Carriages certain Barrels full of Arms were found; which tho' not much regarded by the wiſer Sort, yet Gloceſter's Adherents inſiſting much upon it, it rais'd Doubts in ſome who otherwiſe would not have been perſuaded to it. The King, met by the Lord Mayor of London, the Sheriffs and Aldermen, all in Scarlet, accompany'd with five hundred Citizens on Horſeback, cloath'd all in Purple, enter'd the City the fourth Day of May, in the firſt and laſt Year of his Reign. The ſubtle Duke of Gloceſter ſhew'd ſuch Appearance of Reverence and Affection to the King his Nephew, that he chang'd their former Suſpicions into a high Eſteem for him. Inſomuch that when a Protector was to be choſen in Council, as was uſual in the Minority of Kings, he without any Contradiction was nominated for the Perſon; not only as a Relation and a Friend, but as moſt loyal, affectionate, and fitteſt for that great Charge. At this Council many were remov'd from their Offices; particularly the Arch-Biſhop of York, and not without ſharp Reproof for having left the Great Seal with the Queen. He was ſucceeded by Doctor Ruſſel Biſhop of Lincoln, a Man wiſe and experienc'd, and one of the moſt learned in the Nation. Divers Lords and Knights were appointed to fill up Vacancies; but the Lord Chamberlain and ſome others ſtill retain'd their Places.

The Duke of Gloceſter made Protector of the Land.

II. The Duke of Gloceſter, now Protector, having gain'd ſo much Advantage, reſolv'd to proceed to the utmoſt; but his main Difficulty was that he could not free himſelf from one Brother without the other; and if the Elder was deſtroy'd, the Duke of York the Younger would ſtill ſucceed. In this he was to uſe his beſt Policy; for the Queen being ſuſpicious of him, and the young Duke in a Place not to be violated, he could reach him only by Deceit or Sacrilege. Therefore at the next Meeting of the Lords in Council he repreſented the Queen as highly culpable in detaining the Duke of York in Sanctuary, when the Honour, the Health and Conveniency of the King his Brother requir'd his Preſence and Company with him in his Palace. After ſome further Allegations and Aggravations, he declar'd, That the Coronation could not be compleated without Scandal, while the Duke of York, who was to be next the King in that Solemnity, continu'd in a Sanctuary, a Shelter only for Criminals and Delinquents; affording Matter to the common People to judge according to their Ignorance, and to Foreign Princes according to the Appearance of falſe Suppoſitions; which muſt redound to the Diſhonour and Prejudice of them all. Therefore in his Opinion, ſome Perſon ſhould be ſent to the Queen, whom ſhe did not miſtruſt, yet ſuch as would be zealous of the Honour of the King and Council, who might rectifie her, and let her know what Injury ſhe did to all. And if this did not prevail, the Duke of York ought by regal Power to be taken from his Priſon, and brought to the King his Brother. He propos'd the Cardinal Arch-Biſhop of York for this Deſign, remitting himſelf to their Pleaſure, if they ſhould not approve of him, from which he profeſs'd he would not diſſent. They all commended his Opinion, and agreed with him, that if the Duke was not remov'd, Inconveniencies might enſue. But the Cardinal, with ſome Eccleſiaſticks there preſent, was of another Opinion, ſo far as related to taking him by Force, alledging, That the Sanctity of the Place was inviolable upon many Accounts; but he hop'd that Force would be needleſs, ſince the Queen in Reaſon would deliver him up; which if ſhe ſhould not do, the Fault was not to be attributed to her, nor him: Not to him, becauſe he would not be failing in his Duty; nor to her, ſhe being excuſable in reſpect of her Maternal Affection, and the Weakneſs of her Sex. But the Duke of Buckingham not approving theſe Circumſpections, with an Oath cry'd out, That the Queen well knew ſhe had no Cauſe of Fear; that her Fears were merely fictitious, and of Malice; and if ſhe would be believ'd becauſe her Kindred were hated according to their Deſerts, ſhe ſhould diſtinguiſh between thoſe who were of Kin to her, and thoſe ſo to the Royal Blood. That her Kindred had given Cauſe for Hatred, as ſhe her ſelf had done through her own Malignity; but in her extending it to the Duke of York, the Diſtribution was too large and odious. That he likewiſe had the Honour to be of Kin to him, nor would he in his Zeal for his Service give way to any Perſon, no not to his own Mother; who ſince ſhe deſir'd to keep him, not without Danger and Scandal, his Opinion was that he ought to be taken from thence. Then he diſcours'd largely of the Uſe and Abuſe of Sanctuaries, concluding That the Duke of York was incapable of the Uſe of them, and it was no Abuſe to take any Perſon from thence when it was with a Deſign to do him good. All the Council joining with him in this Opinion, it was reſolv'd That if the Cardinal could not prevail with his Perſuaſions, he ſhould be taken by Force, and brought to them. This being concluded, they all remov'd to the Star-Chamber, as the neareſt Place, there to expect what would be the Iſſue.

Ibid. The Cardinal went with ſeveral Lords, either becauſe the Protector would not truſt a Matter of that Weight to a ſingle Man, or becauſe the Appearance of ſo many might make the Queen perceive it was not he alone that deſir'd the Delivery of her Son, and that ſhe might ſee her Danger if ſhe refus'd. The Cardinal firſt told her, That he was ſent by the Protector and the Privy-Council to let her know how much her detaining of the Duke of York in that Place had given Offence to them and others; as if one Brother liv'd in Danger, and could not be preſerv'd but by the other's Life. Therefore they deſir'd and expected to have the Duke ſet at Liberty, and to have him brought to his Brother, where he might live anſwerable to his Condition and Quality. After further Diſcourſe, finding her altogether averſe to any Compliance, he proceeded to Perſuaſions and Arguments drawn from Nature and Affection, as well as Prudence and Policy, and to inform her, That ſhe neither ought nor could keep him in Sanctuary, and that taking of him by Force would be no Violation of it. To all theſe ſhe gave diſtinct and rational Anſwers, and began freely to declare the Apprehenſions ſhe had from the Protector; which became uneaſie to the Cardinal who had a better Opinion of him. So that growing warm, in ſome Paſſion he told her, He was not come to argue with her, but to demand the Duke; and if ſhe would deliver him up, he would pawn both his Body and Soul for his Safety. If ſhe refus'd, he would leave her to her ſelf, finding her fix'd in a Belief that they all wanted Underſtanding or Fidelity; the former, in being ſo dull as not to perceive the Protector's Deſigns, and the latter, in procuring her Son to be deliver'd into the Hands of one who would deſtroy him.

He perſuades her to deliver up her Son.

The poor Queen was now reduc'd to great Perplexities, haſtily weighing within her ſelf the divers Hazards ſhe ran whether ſhe deliver'd him or not. By delivering him, ſhe conſider'd the Miſchiefs that might happen both to him and his Brother: In detaining him, ſhe fear'd that the Protector would immediately come in Perſon and take him; and ſhe wanted Time to provide againſt this; many Things were requir'd in ſending him elſewhere, none of which were like to ſucceed. And not having thought of it before, ſhe knew not whether to ſend him; ſhe had not appointed People to conduct him; ſhe had not Time enough to keep the Secret undiſcover'd, and him from being intercepted. Finding the Miſchief greater in letting him go by Force, than by Choice, ſhe began to hope her Suſpicions might be falſe: She did not doubt the Cardinal's good Intentions, nor yet theirs who were with him; ſhe was ſatisfy'd they were not corrupted, but not ſure they might not be deceiv'd; therefore her appearing to believe them would oblige them. Wherefore taking the young Duke by the Hand in the Preſence of all ſhe ſpoke thus, My Lord, and all my Lords; I am neither ſo unthinking as to doubt your Underſtanding, nor ſo ſuſpicious as to miſtruſt your Fidelity; of which I deſign to make you ſuch a Proof, that if either were wanting in you, would bring me to infinite Sorrow, the Realm to incurable Damage, and you all to indelable Reproach. For I here preſent to you the Perſon, whom I doubt not but I could have kept beyond Oppoſition; tho' at the ſame Time I am ſure there are ſome ſuch mortal Enemies to my Blood, that if they thought there was any of it in their own Bodies, they they would open their Veins to let it out. We have alſo Experience that the Thirſt of Government knows no Kindred; and if Brothers have not been ſpar'd, much leſs ſhall Nephews eſcape. Each of my dear Children is the other's Defence, while they are aſunder, and each of their Lives lye in the other's Body: Notwithſtanding this moſt tender Point, I here reſign one into your Hands, and the other in him, that I may at all Times redemand them of you both before God and all the World. Then aſſuring them of her Confidence in their Abilities and Loyalty, ſhe concluded thus, One Thing I conjure you, by the Truſt his Father ever had of you, and by the Truſt I now put into your Hands, that as far as you think my Fears too great, you would be as cautious that your own be not too ſmall. After which, turning to the young Duke, with the moſt ardent Affection ſhe cry'd, Farewel my dear ſweet Son, the Lord be thy Protector! let me kiſs thee now, leſt I never kiſs thee more. Then with Kiſſes, Bleſſings, and a mingling of Tears, ſhe deliver'd him to the Lords; who immediately brought him to the Star-Chamber, where with longing Expectations, and the kindeſt Careſſes he was receiv'd by his Uncle. He brought him to the King his Brother, who was lodg'd in the Biſhop's Palace near St. Paul's; from whence, with great Pomp and Shew of Honour, they were both convey'd to the fatal Tower, from whence they never departed.

The King and him convey'd to the Tower.

III. The Protector having gain'd ſuch a ſignal Advantage, ſtill wanted the Aſſiſtance of ſome particular Men, eſpecially the Duke of Buckingham, who 'till now probably did not know the Bottom of his Deſigns. There were great Inducements for him to join with the Protector; particularly he had ſo offended the young King in impriſoning his Relations, that in due Time he could expect nothing leſs than a ſevere Revenge, whether he liv'd, or they eſcap'd. The Protector had provided himſelf of a Guard, and arm'd himſelf while no Man thought of it; truſting the Management of his Affairs to none but thoſe whoſe Fortunes totally depended upon him. He ſet Spies about Buckingham, thinking it impoſſible he ſhould be equally wicked with himſelf, not having the like Deſigns; and was reſolv'd, if he found him defective, to be his immediate Ruin. He made uſe of his moſt profeſs'd Friends; and no Wonder if they were Traitors, ſince the Conformity of evil Inclinations had caus'd the Friendſhips between them and their Maſter. Yet had not Buckingham join'd heartily, but upon very advantagious Conditions; for when he oblig'd himſelf to make the Protector King, the other oblig'd himſelf to take the Duke's Daughter in Marriage to his only Son, promiſing with this the Earldom of Hartford, claim'd by him as his Inheritance; which being deny'd him by the late King was the firſt Cauſe of his Defection, by that revenging himſelf upon his Children. Moreover of his free Motion he promis'd him a great Part of the Treaſure left by King Edward, together with a large Proportion of the Wardrobe. Theſe Things being fix'd, they erected a new Council, conſiſting of the greateſt Men, to treat of Matters belonging to the Coronation, that they and the People at preſent might be amus'd with a Belief of the Reality of it; and to that End they commanded the abſent Lords to repair to London, and aſſiſt at the Solemnity. Beſides this they had a private Council conſiſting of certain ſelect Perſons, who treated of the Means how to bring the Protector to the Throne; ſo that while both the Arch-Biſhops, the Biſhop of Ely, the Lords Stanley and Haſtings, with others, were buſying themſelves about an unneceſſary Ceremony to eſtabliſh a lawful King, they treated how to eſtabliſh in his Place an unlawful Tyrant and Uſurper. The firſt Council was compos'd of many of the beſt Rank. The ſecond of few, and thoſe of the worſt Condition; but the Protector's Dealings not being eaſily penetrated, the People began to murmur, tho' they could not gueſs at the real Miſchief intended. It was impoſſible from ſo many Circumſtances and vain Delays as were by this Council propos'd to the other, but Jealouſies would ariſe. All which were encreas'd by the Protector's taking from from the Tower all the King's Servants, and placing his own in their Room; ſo that the King was ſoon left deſtitute of all Manner of Company, Magnificene and Regal Splendor; all which were in reality convey'd over to the Houſe and Perſon of the Protector.

Ibid. Among thoſe who were admitted into the ſecret Council there was one Cateſby, a Man well skill'd in the Laws of the Land; who being imploy'd by the Lord Chamberlain Haſtings in all his Affairs, and by his Favour advanc'd in the Court, had won ſuch Credit with all Men, eſpecially in Leiceſterſhire, where the ſaid Lord was very powerful, as nothing was tranſacted without him: So that being a Creature of his, and by his Means highly in favour, the Chamberlain thought he would never fail to inform him of any thing of moment done in that Council, eſpecially if it might be prejudicial to him. But Gratitude having forſaken him who had loſt all Loyalty, he was the Original of many enſuing Evils. For the Lord Stanley juſtly doubting this Cabinet Council, had endeavour'd to croſs it, by the Favour and Aſſiſtance of many who likewiſe fear'd it, had not the Lord Chamberlain prevented him, relying wholly upon Catesby's Fidelity. The Protector naturally lov'd the Chamberlain, he having always been his Friend, and one from whom he had receiv'd Kindneſſes, in the King his Brother's Time; nor had he reſolv'd upon his Ruin, had he not fear'd to have met with Oppoſition, if he ſhould diſcover his Secrets to him. He therefore imploy'd Catesby to uſe his utmoſt Endeavours to bring him intirely to his Side. But Catesby either perform'd it not at all, or if he did, he gave the Protector ſuch a ſiniſter Account, that changing his Love into Hatred, he reſolv'd to have his Life; yet treating him with his uſual Confidence, he by that gain'd two Advantages. He caus'd him to be ſlower in executing ſuch Reſolutions as he might have done againſt him; and he the more dextrouſly brought about his own Deſigns to the other's Ruin, while he leaſt thought of it. Inſomuch that when the Chamberlain acquainted Catesby with the Jealouſies this ſecret Council had rais'd in many, thinking to gain from him ſome Aſſurance, he not only gave him no Satisfaction, but perſuaded the Protector to diſpatch him as ſoon as he could, as if his Life was fatal to his Deſigns. An Advice politickly taken by the Protector, tho' not given out of Zeal to his Service, as it ſeem'd to be; but that by his Death Catesby might enter into the plenary Authority, which the Chamberlain ſolely had in his Country.

A Deſign againſt the Lord Haſtings.

The Protector having fix'd his Reſolution, upon the thirteenth Day of June, three Hours before Noon, he came into the Tower to the Lords in Council, who were ſetling the approaching Coronation. At his firſt Entrance he civilly ſaluted all the Lords preſent, excuſing himſelf for coming ſo late; and diverting his Diſcourſe he deſir'd the Biſhop of Ely to ſend for a Diſh of Strawberries from his Garden at Holborn, ſaying he had never eaten better. The Biſhop taking it for a Favour, immediately ſent for them; while he ſoon after riſing up, deſir'd the Lords to diſpence with his Abſence for a ſhort Space. Within leſs than an Hour he return'd with ſuch a ſevere and fierce Countenance as made them all amaz'd; and being ſate down, with angry Eyes, and frowning Looks, and biting his Lips, he for a while kept Silence. At laſt he demanded of them, What Puniſhment they deſerv'd who had plotted his Deſtruction, who was next in Blood to the King, and by Office his and the Kingdom's Protector? This Queſtion ſtartled the Council, not knowing for whom it was intended, tho' each was ſatisfy'd with his own Innocence. The Chamberlain finding all ſilent, very readily made Anſwer, That they ought without Exception to be puniſh'd as Traitors. To which the reſt aſſenting, the Protector ſaid, It was his Brother's Wife, and others with her; at which thoſe who favour'd the Queen were much concern'd. But the Chamberlain, who fear'd it was ſome of his own Friends, was overjoy'd when he heard the Queen nam'd; tho' he was ill pleas'd, that he was not before made privy to this Matter, as he had been to the taking off her Relations, who were by his own Conſent before appointed pointed to be beheaded at Pontfract this very Day; little imagining that his own Execution ſhould be the ſame Day at London. The Protector continuing his Complaints, ſtripp'd his Arm bare, and ſhow'd it to be dry'd and wither'd, very unlike the other, declaring That the Queen and Shore's Wife, her Counſellor and Coadjutor in this Wickedneſs, had by their Sorceries and Witchcraft thus waſted his Fleſh. The Lords, who knew this Arm had never been otherwiſe, immediately conceiv'd he had now ſome impious Deſign; eſpecially ſince it was ſo improbable that the Queen ſhould aſſociate with Shore's Wife, whom ſhe moſt hated, as the Concubine moſt doated on by her Husband. The Chamberlain had unfortunately and fooliſhly given the Protector this Advantage by taking this Woman, whom he had long lov'd, and keeping her for his own Miſtreſs; therefore with ſome Extenuation he anſwer'd, If they have been thus guilty, they deſerve heinous Puniſhment. At which the Protector cry'd What, doſt thou anſwer me with Ifs and Ands? I tell thee they are thus guilty, and that I'll make good on thy Body, Traitor. Then giving a great Blow upon the Table, as an appointed Signal, a Cry of Treaſon was heard from without, the Door was forc'd open, and the Chamber immediately fill'd with armed Men; and one of them ſtriking at the Lord Stanley, had undoubtedly cleft his Head, had he not haſtily ſhrunk beneath the Table, yet not ſo ſuddenly but he receiv'd a terrible Wound. Immediately the Protector arreſted the Chamberlain by the Name of Traitor; and being by him in all Humbleneſs demanded whether he ſpoke to him or no; he reply'd, Yes, to thee, Traitor. And ſecuring all the reſt in other Rooms, the Protector ſwore by St. Paul, That he would not dine before he ſaw his Head taken off. It avail'd nothing to ask Queſtions and beg for Mercy, but heavily taking the next Prieſt that was ready, he made a ſhort Confeſſion, ſince a longer would not be permitted; and being led to the Green before the Tower Chappel, he had his Head ſtruck off upon a Log of Timber; being afterwards bury'd at Windſor, near King Edward's Tomb.

and then cuts off his Head.

Beſides a remarkable Dream of the Lord Stanley, which occaſion'd his Adviſing him to fly from Danger, and other ominous Preſages of this ſudden Execution, we may well take notice of a particular Paſſage that happen'd the Morning before he went to Council. Being come to the Tower, he met a Purſivant near the Place where he was beheaded; and recollecting that he had met him in that very Place, when by Procurement of the Earl of Rivers he formerly was made Priſoner for a ſhort Space, and much doubted his Life; he ask'd him Whether he remember'd that he had met him in that Place, at a Time when he was in great Danger? The Purſivant reply'd, Yes, my Lord, I well remember it; but, Thanks to Heav'n, the Authors got no Advantage, nor you no Damage. The Chamberlain knowing that Rivers and the reſt were that Day to loſe their Heads, with a chearful Air anſwer'd, You would ſay more, if you knew as much as I do: I never was ſo afraid as then; but Times are happily chang'd, and my Enemies are now as much in Danger as I was before, as you will ſoon know; ſo that I never was more joyful and ſecure than at preſent. Now this Lord having formerly imbru'd his Hands in the innocent Blood of King Henry's Son Prince Edward, and lately by his Advice join'd to the taking off the Heads of Rivers and others without any Proceſs upon this very Day, the Vengeance of Heav'n became more conſpicuous and ſignal in his own extraordinary Execution. So that the great Ralegh upon this Occaſion declares, 'That a greater Judgment of God, than this upon Haſtings, 'he had never obſerv'd in any Story. And we may truly obſerve, that ſcarcely any State Homicide ever eſcapes a natural and proper temporal Puniſhment, either in his Perſon or Family.

the greatneſs of their Surpriſe and Danger, as having no Time to procure better. And after having inſiſted upon the Mercy of Heav'n in their Eſcape from the Treaſon of Haſtings and others, a Herald of Arms was diſpatch'd into the City with a formal Proclamation in the King's Name, implying, 'That the 'Lord Haſtings and ſome others had conſpir'd the ſame Day to have ſlain the 'Lord Protector and the Duke of Buckingham as they ſat in Council; and af- 'ter that to have aſſum'd the Government of the King and Kingdom at their 'own Pleaſures; inſiſting likewiſe upon many Crimes of the Lord Haſtings, 'as well as thoſe of Shore's Wife. This Proclamation, which was publiſh'd within two Hours after the Lord Chamberlain's Execution, was ſo curiouſly indicted, ſo long, and ſo fairly ingroſs'd on Parchment, that the weakeſt Perſon alive might perceive it was prepar'd before: Which occaſion'd various Diſcourſes, ſome venturing to ſay It was writ by the Spirit of Prophecy. The Protector having accus'd Shore's Wife, as an Acceſſary and Adviſer, ſent the Sheriffs of London to her Houſe, and caus'd her to be plunder'd of all her Eſtate, which was above three thouſand Marks, not out of Avarice, but Malice and Deſign; and then being impriſon'd, ſhe was charg'd with many treaſonable, as well as improbable Practices, tho' ſhe was convicted of none but Incontinency, which ſhe did not deny. For this laſt Crime, the Protector deliver'd her over to the Biſhop of London, to do Penance after the moſt publick Manner; which ſhe did the following Sunday, being led in ſolemn Proceſſion, with a Wax Taper in her Hand, and the Croſs born before her: In which Action, tho' ſhe was deſtitute of all manner of Ornament, yet ſhe appear'd ſo lovely and decent, that, her Bluſhes adding to her Beauty, all the Spectators did not only blame the Severity, but were charm'd with her comely Aſpect, which was the Cauſe of their Compaſſion, as well as her own Ignominy. This remarkable Woman was well born, and civilly educated; but her Ruin was her being unequally marry'd as to Years, which made it eaſie for King Edward to win her, and to break through all the Obligations of Duty. Beſides her extraordinary Beauty, Wit, Eloquence and good Humour, ſhe had ſome Qualifications not uſual to Perſons of her Life and Converſation; as particularly ſhe ſeem'd to be born to do Good, and no Harm to any one: She reſtor'd many who had unjuſtly fallen from the King's Favour, and caus'd many confiſcated Eſtates to be return'd without any Degree of Avarice. She was more deſirous to oblige others, than to inrich her ſelf; deſiring rather to do good Turns than to receive them; always affable, never inſolent; and all her Ambition was to be eſteem'd. Yet now being reduc'd to Poverty, and afterwards to old Age, her Beauty quite loſt, and her numerous good Turns as much fotgotten, ſhe was forc'd to beg of thoſe, who if they had not formerly begg'd of her, might have been greater Beggars than her ſelf.

The Protector's Vindication.

Jane Shore does Penance.

Her Character.

The Protector had given Orders, that on the ſame Day in which the Lord Chamberlain was beheaded at London, the Earl Rivers and Lord Gray, the one Brother the other Son to the Queen, ſhould loſe their Heads at Pontfract; and the two Knights, ſeiz'd with them at Northampton, bore them Company in the Puniſhment. The Execution was committed to the Care of Sir Richard Ratcliff, a Favourite of the Protector's, and privy to all his Deſigns; who being of a fierce and mercileſs Temper, was judg'd moſt proper to manage ſuch an odious Affair. He caus'd them to be brought out of Priſon, and being expos'd to publick View as Traitors, they were beheaded without any manner of Proceſs or Juſtice. He would not ſuffer them to ſpeak, leſt their Innocence being made known, and commiſerated, might make the Author of this Tyranny more deteſtable. Thus theſe unfortunate Men ſuffer'd without being guilty of any Crime in this Reign; but ſo far as they might contribute to the Injuſtice and Bloodſhed committed againſt the laſt King Henry, and his Family, it was more the Hand of Heav'n than the Puniſhment of Men.

The Earl of Rivers and others beheaded at Pontfract.

IV. The Protector had now remov'd all Obſtacles, and hop'd ſhortly to compleat his Deſign; but as the Succeſs of Things cannot be repreſented upon a Theatre without the Concourſe of ſeveral Perſonages requiſite to the Compoſure of the Plot, ſo it was neceſſary for him to make uſe of many others to the forming of this Treaſon. Among the reſt Sir Edmund Shaw Lord Mayor of London, his Brother John Shaw, and Pinker, Provincial of the Auguſtine Friars, were ſome. The firſt was to draw the City to the Protector's Will, and to ſuppreſs Tumults; the other two were Doctors of Divinity, and by the People eſteem'd famous Preachers, and were choſen to give Authority and Fervor, as is uſual in ſuch like Actions. The Knot of this Buſineſs lay in finding out ſpecious Pretexts to exclude the Heirs of Edward the Fourth; for which purpoſe they were to inſiſt upon two in a ſpecial Manner, The firſt was, That King Edward and the Duke of Clarence were both the Iſſue of Adultery; that they were not Sons to the Duke of York, whoſe only legitimate Heir the Protector was. The ſecond was, That Edward's Children were not only ſpurious upon that Account, but as born in an illegitimate Marriage, he being firſt ingag'd to the Lady Lucy before he marry'd their Mother: For both which Reaſons the Protector muſt be the only true Heir to the Crown. Thoſe Preachers were to make theſe two Points the Subject of their Sermons; but becauſe the firſt was horribly ſcandalous, and highly reflecting upon the whole Houſe of York, and the Protector's Mother in particular; they reſolv'd not to treat of it in downright Terms, but by oblique Inſinuation: But in the ſecond Point they were to be open and barefac'd without Reſerve. Pinker was appointed to preach at the Spittal, and Shaw at Paul's-Croſs; but the former loſt his Voice, ſo that he was forc'd to leave off in the Midſt of his Diſcourſe. Shaw took for his Subject this Sentence out of the Wiſdom of Solomon, Baſtard Plants ſhall take no deep Root; and after many Proofs of his Poſition, and an odious Diſcourſe againſt the Legitimacy of King Edward's Family, he proceeded to make a long Panegyrick upon the Protector, declaring him to be the only Image of his Father, for Valour and all other good Qualifications. It was alſo further deſign'd, that when he enter'd into this Encomium, the Protector ſhould appear, that the People might think the Preacher inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt, and be ready to cry King Richard! But the Protector coming ſomewhat too late, Shaw in a diſorderly manner reaſſum'd his Subject, and carry'd it on after ſuch a fulſom way before his Face, that the People were amaz'd at his nauſeous Flattery, and ſtood like Statues. So that both the Protector and Preacher being utterly out of Countenance, the one return'd confus'd to his Palace, and the other to his Houſe, where underſtanding by his Friends how much he was condemn'd, he a few Days after dy'd out of Grief and Shame.

The Protector's laſt Projects.

The Protector, reſolving not to be diſcourag'd at this Failure, upon Tueſday following he ſent the Duke of Buckingham, accompany'd with many Lords and Gentlemen, to the Mayor and Aldermen of London, with whom were likewiſe the Common Council of the City, commanded purpoſely to attend at Guild-Hall. Here the Duke, who wanted neither Parts nor Aſſurance, made a long, plauſible and artificial Speech to the whole Aſſembly, highly aggravating all the Miſmanagements, Cruelties and Calamities of the laſt Reign, in order to bring an Odium upon King Edward's Poſterity; inſiſting upon Shaw's Sermon, as a clear Proof of the Illegitimacy of his Children; and that the Protector was the only undoubted Heir to the Crown; in which the Lords of the Kingdom were ſo well ſatisfy'd, that they agreed to accept of him for their King; and now himſelf was come to acquaint them with it, and to require their Conſents. Having ended his ſtudy'd Oration, and expecting the Applauſes of the People that they ſhould cry King Richard! he was amaz'd to find the contrary; and drawing near to the Lord Mayor, who was to have prepar'd them for it, it, he as'd the Reaſon of their Reſerv'dneſs and Silence. Who not knowing what to ſay, anſwer'd, That he thought he was not well underſtood. Upon which the Duke in a louder Tone, and plainer Words, repeated all that he had ſaid before; but ſtill to no better Effect. Then the Duke whiſpering with the Mayor, it was judg'd that the Citizens being us'd to have ſuch Motions made to them by their Recorder, they would better hear it from him; and thereupon the Recorder was commanded to move the ſame Matter to them. But the Recorder, being lately come into the Place, and miſliking the Task, unwillingly repeated the Subſtance of the Duke's Speech, but carefully avoided any Addition of his own, that they might not believe his Vote went with it. The People ſtood ſtill more unmov'd than ever; at which the Duke told the Mayor, That he never met with ſuch an obſtinate Silence. Then ſtanding up a third Time he ſaid, He was come thither to perſuade them to concur in an Affair, where their Aſſiſtance perhaps would not be neceſſary; for the Nobility and Commons of the other Provinces would do it without them: But bearing a particular Affection to that noble City, he deſir'd that they might have the firſt Share of the Honour: Therefore he deſir'd them to declare, whether in Conformity with the reſt of the Kingdom, they would nominate the preſent Protector for their King. At which Words the People began to whiſper among themſelves ſecretly; but their Voice was neither diſtinct nor loud, 'till at laſt in the lower End of the Hall, ſome Servants belonging to the Protector and the Duke, with ſome Prentices gotten into the Croud, began to cry aloud King Richard, King Richard! and threw up their Hats for Joy; tho' the Citizens turning about kept their former Silence. The Duke wiſely making uſe of this Diſorder, declar'd He was tranſported to find ſuch Unanimity in their Voices for making that noble Prince their King; with which he would acquaint him, ſo as to make it turn to their Advantage, deſiring them to be ready the next Morning to go with him to the Protector, in order to perſuade him to comply with a Matter, ſo much deſir'd by them and the whole Kingdom. Upon this the Aſſembly was diſſolv'd, and moſt departed with a melancholy Countenance, and a more melancholy Heart. His Succeſs.

The next Morning the Lord Mayor aſſembled the Aldermen and Common-Council-Men of the City, and repair'd with them to Baynard's Caſtle in Thames-ſtreet, where the Protector then lodg'd; and there according to Appointment the Duke of Buckingham came accompany'd with a great Number of Lords, Knights and Gentlemen; who ſent a Meſſage to the Protector, That an Aſſembly of honourable Perſons were come to wait upon his Grace in a Matter of great Importance. The Protector ſeem'd amaz'd, and unwilling to appear before ſuch Numbers, unleſs he firſt knew the Deſign of their coming; which feign'd Ignorance Buckingham ſoon turn'd to the Advantage of the Protector's Honour and Integrity. He ſent a ſecond Meſſage, That the Buſineſs was not to be imparted to any but himſelf, and in ſuch a humble and ſubmiſſive way, as might have wrought Belief in any one who had really doubted. At length the Protector appear'd, in a Gallery above, with a Biſhop on each Side of him, as if he was ſtill apprehenſive of the worſt. The Duke of Buckingham, making a low Reverence, begg'd two Things of his Grace, The one, that he would permit him to make a humble Supplication to him; the other, that he would pardon him, in caſe it ſhould prove unacceptable to him: For tho' he aim'd at nothing but his Honour, and the Good of the Kingdom, yet he fear'd his Modeſty might take it contrary to their Intentions. The Protector anſwer'd, He was ſo aſſur'd of their Integrity, that he hop'd they would propoſe nothing that would diſpleaſe him, and ſo granted the Leave and Pardon they demanded. Buckingham, after a long Digreſſion of the Kingdom's Grievances, ſaid, That they were expreſly come to Petition him, that conſidering the illegitimate Birth of King Edward's Children, he would in Commiſeration of the Neceſſities of the Publick, vouchſafe, together with the Government of the Kingdom, to accept He with the Citizens petitions the Protector to accept of the Crown.

accept of the Crown, to the Honour of God and Safety of the Realm; reſting aſſur'd that never any People would think themſelves more happy than under his plenary Protection. The Protector, as if offended at his Requeſt, with an angry Look anſwer'd, That tho' there was much Truth in what he ſaid, yet his Love to his Brother Edward, his Affection to his Children, and the Regard to his own Honour, would not permit him to accept of ſuch a Burthen: For it was to be fear'd, that ſhould he depoſe his Nephews and make himſelf King, the Ignorant and Malignant would accuſe him to all the Princes of the World, as if it did not proceed from his own juſt Right, the Importunity of the People, and the Neceſſities of the Nation, but purely from his own Ambition. Yet notwithſtanding, he did not only pardon them, but return them Thanks, ſince he conceiv'd it proceeded from their Love and Affection; which he deſir'd might be turn'd to their King, whom he with his Perſon and beſt Advice would ſerve; hoping ſo to ſettle the Affairs of the Kingdom, that they ſhould have nothing to deſire; as he had already given ſome Proof, notwithſtanding the Malice of ſome, which had been rather ſuppreſs'd by Divine Providence than by Human Wiſdom.

The Protector's Anſwer.

This Anſwer being given, the Duke of Buckingham ſtepp'd aſide, as if he conſulted with the Noblemen, the Lord Mayor and the reſt; which being done, he again deſir'd Pardon; and having obtain'd it, he with a more exalted Voice declar'd, That the Kingdom was abſolutely reſolv'd not to permit Edward's Children to reign; not ſo much becauſe they had proceeded beyond all Hopes of Pardon, as becauſe the publick Good requir'd it: That therefore he beſeech'd him to accept of the Crown, which if he deny'd, they ſhould be compell'd to offer it to one who would not refuſe it. The Protector, affrighted, as it were, at theſe Threats, expreſs'd much Concern, That they ſhould have ſo hard an Opinion of his Brother's Iſſue: He own'd he could not govern or reign without their Affections: Therefore ſince it was their Reſolution, and there was none to whom the Crown did of Right belong beſides himſelf; and that to his natural and legal Titles, they had added that of Election, the moſt valuable of all others; he yielded to their Intreaties and Requeſts, by taking upon him from that Time forwards the State and Regal Preheminence of the two Kingdoms of England and France; the former to be govern'd and defended by him and his Heirs, and the latter by God's Aſſiſtance and their Valour to be ſubdu'd, and for ever eſtabliſh'd in due Obedience to the Realm of England, of whoſe Grandeur and Honour he was ſo ambitious, that he deſir'd God to continue him no longer upon Earth than his Life might be ſerviceable to that End. At this they all cry'd out King Richard, King Richard! and the Lords went up to him to kiſs his Hand, while the People departing, talk'd diverſely of the Matter, every one as his Fancy guided him. They were diſpleas'd at nothing more than the counterfeit Management of the Buſineſs, which tho' it had been plotted and reſolv'd before, there had been us'd ſo many Stage-like Actions, as if it had never been conceiv'd 'till then; and as if choice had been made of the Spectators as of the moſt ſenſeleſs and ſtupid People of the Land.

He complies.

Here all Hiſtorians conclude the imaginary Reign of King Edward the Fifth, which ended upon the eighteenth Day of June 1483, after it had continu'd only two Months and twelve Days, he being at that Time twelve Years and about ſeven Months old.

The End of King Edward's Reign.

SECT.

The Reign of King RICHARD the Third.

Containing 2 Years, 2 Months, and 4 Days.

Mart. &c. I. Richard Duke of Gloceſter was the eighth and youngeſt Son of Richard Duke of York and Cecily Nevil his Wife, and was now leſs than thirty Years of Age when the Crown was thus tumultuouſly conferr'd upon him, which in a ſhort Time was more legally offer'd him in Parliament, with all the Marks of the vileſt Flattery. Being proclaim'd King upon the twenty ſecond Day of June, believing to eſtabliſh his Tyranny by reſting it upon unaccuſtom'd Circumſtances, he went into Weſtminſter-Hall, ſate down in the King's Bench, where in doubtful Caſes the Kings of England anciently us'd to ſit, and where he avow'd his Acceptance of the Crown; which he expreſs'd in a formal Oration, and ſo well compos'd, that thoſe who had not known him, would have believ'd England had never been bleſs'd with ſo good a King. And to begin himſelf with a pretended Clemency, he pronounc'd Pardon of all Offences committed againſt him; for Confirmation of which he ſent for one Fogge who had taken Sanctuary, and whom he mortally hated, and in the Sight of all the People took him by the Hand, and aſſur'd him of his future Love and Affection. By which Act he made a great Impreſſion upon the common Sort, but thoſe who were better adviſ'd took it for Artifice and Diſſimulation. In his Return to the Palace, he courteouſly ſaluted ſuch as he knew had no Affection for him, thinking by this ſervile Flattery to inſinuate into their Minds, and to eſtabliſh his Government. Yet ſtill he durſt not rely upon his preſent Fortune, but ſecur'd his Coronation with an unuſual Appearance of Forces, cauſing five thouſand Men to come from the North, where he was moſt favour'd, to aſſiſt at the Solemnity. Theſe Northern Men appear'd ſo ill cloath'd and accouter'd, that they became the Subject of Mens Deriſion; and it was believ'd that if he ſhould have Occaſion to uſe them, they would not have ſerv'd his Purpoſe; and that it was neither thoſe nor greater Forces, but a meer Fatality had precipitated the Nation into ſuch a miſerable Subjection.

He ſtrengthens himſelf.

Ibid. Nothing now was wanting to his full Poſſeſſion of the Crown, but the Ceremony of his Coronation, for which all Things were ready, as having been before prepar'd for that of his Nephew. Two Days before he went with his Wife and young Son to the Tower; where he created the Lord Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, and Thomas Howard his Son Earl of Surry; he made William Barkley Earl of Nottingham, and the Lord Francis Lovell Vicount and Lord Chamberlain, and likewiſe made ſeventeen Knights of the Bath. The Arch-Biſhop of York, the Lord Stanley, and the Biſhop of Ely had been Priſoners in the Tower ever ſince the Lord Haſtings loſt his Head: He ſet the firſt at Liberty, finding himſelf peaceably poſſeſs'd of the Kingdom, which otherwiſe he would not have done; for being an honeſt Man he would never have conſented to the depoſing of the true King: He freed the ſecond out of Fear; for his Son the Lord Strange was raiſing great Forces in Lancaſhire, ſo that it was neceſſary to appeaſe him. But he did not ſet the Biſhop of Ely at Liberty, who was a faithful Servant to King Edward the Fourth; for he was ſure he would never comply with his Childrens Deprivation, nor his unjuſt Uſurpations; of which he had made trial in the Councils held in the Tower, while by oblique means he was carrying on that Deſign. This celebrated Biſhop, Morton by Name, was of no great Birth; but having liv'd long in high Repute in Oxford, he was taken from thence, only a Doctor, and made a Privy-Counſellor by Henry the Sixth: Edward knowing his Integrity, kept him ſtill in that Condition, and choſe him at his Death to be one of his Executors.

He makes new Titles.

tors. Richard therefore fearing him, would have kept him ſtill in Priſon, had not the Univerſity of Oxford interceded for his Enlargement; ſo being deſirous to oblige that Body, he was content to remove him from the Tower, as being too publick a Priſon: But that he might not give him his full Liberty, he committed him to the Cuſtody of the Duke of Buckingham, who ſent him to a Caſtle of his in Brecknockſhire in Wales, where they jointly laid the firſt Ground-Work of Richard's Fall.

The following Day, with mighty Pomp and ſplendid Attendance of Noblemen, Richard rod through the City of London, having three Dukes, nine Earls, two Vicounts, twenty Barons, and ſeventy eight Knights, all moſt richly adorn'd. Among whom the proud Duke of Buckingham far exceeded the reſt in Appearance, having the Capariſons of his Horſe ſo charg'd with embroider'd Works of Gold, that it was born up by Footmen after an extraordinary manner. In the following Day, which was the Sixth of July, Richard with Anne his Wife was crowned at Weſtminſter with more than uſual Solemnity, as may be ſeen in Hall, Grafton, and others. His Wife was Daughter to the great Earl of Warwick, who had made and unmade two preceding Kings, and Widow to Prince Edward, Son to Henry the Sixth; to whom ſhe was marry'd, when Edward the Fourth's Ruin was determin'd in France. So being deſtin'd to be a Queen, it was her ill Fortune to be marry'd to one who had been the Author both of her Husband's and Father's Death. The Solemnity being ended, King Richard diſmiſs'd all the Lords that they might return to their own Houſes; recommending to ſuch as were in Office, the due Adminiſtration of Juſtice without Extortion or Injury, the Execution of the Laws, and Liberty of the Subject; as being deſirous to have nothing ill done but by himſelf. He diſmiſs'd not the Lord Stanley, 'till ſuch Time as the Lord Strange his Son had disbanded the Forces he had rais'd. He alſo diſmiſs'd the five thouſand he had caus'd to come from the North both with Promiſes and Rewards; upon which they departed ſo well pleas'd, that becoming thereupon inſolent and tumultuous, they forc'd him to go in Perſon into thoſe Parts, to appeaſe the Diſturbances they had rais'd, which could not be effected without the Death of many of them. About this Time he ſent to Lewis the Eleventh, King of France, concerning the Continuance of the League made with his Brother Edward, demanding the Tribute then ſetled; but his Ambaſſador arriving after the Death of his two Nephews, Lewis would not afford him Audience, judging his Friendſhip unworthy of any Human Correſpondence.

His Coronation.

He ſends Ambaſſadors to France.

In what concern'd their Deaths, he demean'd himſelf with great Caution. He firſt withdrew himſelf to Gloceſter, the Place of his former Patrimony and Title; his Conſcience not permitting him to ſtay in the Place where his Cruelty was to ſurpaſs that of all other Tyrants. He might have kept them Priſoners without any Danger, ſince they had no material Supporters; but he not accounting himſelf a King, while they were alive, ſent his truſty Servant John Green with Letters to Sir Robert Brakenbury, Conſtable of the Tower, commanding him to put them to Death; who, abhorring the Act, return'd Anſwer, He would rather die than obey that Command. Richard at this being highly diſſatisfy'd, and ſtill reſtleſs, his Page who uſually lay in his Chamber, deſir'd his Majeſty That he would be pleas'd to acquaint him with the Reaſon of his Diſquiet. To whom he reply'd, He was miſerable, in not having a Man he could truſt; that his Service was ungratefully deny'd by thoſe, who for what they had receiv'd ought to think themſelves happy when bleſt with an Occaſion of ſerving him. The Page immediately judg'd the Cauſe to be of a deſperate Nature, ſince any one durſt decline it; and calling a Gentleman to mind who lay in the Ante-Chamber, he nam'd him to the King, aſſuring him There was nothing ſo dangerous or difficult, which he would not undertake. His Name was James Tirrel, a Man who might have deſerv'd a good Character, had he not been corrupted by diſhoneſt Ambition: He had left no Methods thods untry'd to gain Preferment in Court; but was diſcontented by being held back by Richard Ratcliffe and William Catesby, who govern'd the King, and fear'd a third Perſon, who if he ſurpaſs'd them in Audacity, might ſurpaſs them in Fortune, and throw them from the Favour they poſſeſs'd. This Page was a Friend of his, and knowing his Diſcontents, thinking to do him a good Office, he propos'd him to King Richard; who being then warm with the Imagination, roſe out of his Bed to make Trial of him, awoke him, and acquainted him with what he deſir'd, urging him to a Compliance. This ambitious Man immediately undertook the execrable Deſign; and was next Day diſpatcht with Letters to Brakenbury, in which he was commanded to deliver up the Keys of the Tower for one Night to this Tirrel, that he might exactly perform his Orders: All which was punctually obey'd by the Conſtable.

James Tirrel employ'd in it.

The two innocent Youths had been more ſtrictly kept after their Uncle had quitted the Title of Protector, and aſſum'd that of King: They were not only debarr'd Viſits, but had their Servants taken from them, and others unknown to them appointed to attend them, rather in the Place of Guardians than Servants. Edward the Eldeſt was fully ſenſible he was no longer King, and that his Uncle was crown'd; and when the News was brought to him, he ſhew'd no Regard to the Loſs of his Crown, but with a tender Sigh ſaid, I wiſh my Uncle would let me enjoy my Life, tho' I loſe all beſides. After this Time he never put off his Cloaths, or ever went out of his Chamber; but being with his Brother full of melancholy Apprehenſions, he kept his Room 'till the Arrival of this miſerable Night. Of the four that attended him, Tirrel choſe Miles Foreſt, a Man from his Youth brought up in Blood, to whom he join'd for his Companion John Dighton, the Groom of his Stable, a ſtrong Man and fit for his Deſign. He caus'd them to go at Midnight into the Chamber where they ſlept; and there wrapping them up in their Bed-Cloaths, they ſtopp'd their Mouths with the Bolſter and Pillows, and ſo ſtifled them. The Buſineſs was ſoon diſpatch'd; and Tirrel immediately bury'd them under a Heap of Stones near the Stairs Bottom: Which being done he took Horſe, and acquainted King Richard with what had paſs'd, which ſo pleas'd him, that 'tis ſaid he gave him the Honour of Knighthood. But being inform'd in what obſcure Place the Bodies lay, he gave Command for their better Interment; whereupon a Prieſt belonging to Sir Robert Brakenbury removing them, and dying ſhortly after, it could never be known whither they were carry'd. 'Till in King Charles the Second's Reign, Ann. 1674, ſome Perſons, who were employ'd in Rebuilding ſeveral Offices in the Tower, and to clear the white Tower from all contiguous Edifices, as they dug down the Stairs leading from the King's Lodgings to the Chappel in the ſame Tower, diſcover'd a wooden Cheſt ten Foot in the Ground, in which they found the Bones of two Striplings, and from the Proportion judg'd to have been in their Ages they were concluded to be the Relicks of thoſe Royal Brothers, whereof one was about thirteen and the other eleven Years of Age. The Circumſtances from Story being fully conſider'd, upon good Preſumption that theſe were the Bones of the ſaid Princes, King Charles commanded them to be put into a Marble Urn, and depoſited among the Relicks of the Royal Family in Weſtminſter Abby.

Their Bones diſcover'd in the Reign of King Charles the Second.

Both the Contrivers and Actors in this horrible Villany met with Rewards ſuitable to their Deſerts in no long Time after. King Richard himſelf, beſides his laſt Misfortunes, was both outwardly and inwardly tormented with Fears and Agonies; and according to the Relation of ſome moſt intimate with him, he after this execrable Fact enjoy'd not one Hour of Quiet: His Countenance was changed, his Eyes diſtracted and ghaſtly; he wore Coats of Mail underneath his Cloaths, and had almoſt always his Hand upon his Dagger ready to ſtrike, as if others were ſtriking at him. He ſpent whole Nights without Sleep; and if by chance he got a little Reſt, he waken'd with fearful Dreams, which forc'd him to quit his Bed, and ſo walk'd up and down his Room full of prodigious Fears. The other two, tho' they eſcap'd human Juſtice, yet they were purſu'd by Divine Vengeance: For Miles Foreſt dy'd miſerably, having almoſt all his Members rotted and cut off: Dighton liv'd in daily Expectation of an ignominious End, and continu'd at Calais no leſs diſdain'd and hated, than pointed at by all Men.

King Richard crown'd a ſecond time at York.

A. D. 1484. Reg. 1.

II. King Richard had now a more unqueſtionable Title to the Crown than ever, but ſtill further to ſecure it, he firſt caus'd himſelf to be crown'd a ſecond Time in the City of York with extraordinary Magnificence, and inveſted his Son Edward in the Principality of Wales. Then, having made many good Ordinances worthy of a better Man, he procur'd a Parliament who declar'd and adjudg'd the Marriage between his Brother and the Lady Gray to be unlawful, by reaſon of a prior Contract, and their Children to be illegitimate and uncapable of the Crown. But before theſe Projects were compleated, beſides his continual Anxiety, he ſoon found himſelf diſappointed, firſt by the untimely Death of his Son, and then by the Revolt of his principal Supporter the Duke of Buckingham. The Cauſe of this laſt is not fully known; but it is ſuppos'd to ariſe from the Claim Buckingham had to the Duke of Hertford's Lands; and he having done ſuch Services to King Richard, he concluded that he could deny him nothing. But theſe Lands having fallen from the Houſe of Lancaſter, and being now annexed to the Crown, the King fear'd that if the Duke were poſſeſs'd of them, his Thoughts might ſoon exceed the Condition of a Subject. Inſomuch that when Buckingham demanded them, he receiv'd ſuch a threatning and ſcornful Reply, that he could not bear it, but feign'd himſelf ſick that he might not attend at the Coronation; ſo that Richard ſent him Word That if he would not come, he would force him to be brought thither. At which he appear'd in that magnificent Manner before recited; but with ſuch Diſſatisfaction, that he was not able to behold the Crown upon Richard's Head. However it was, Pride and Diſcontent ſoon widen'd the Breach; and having retir'd himſelf to his Caſtle at Brecknock in Wales, he there compleated his Reſolutions by the Council and Incouragement of his Priſoner Doctor Morton Biſhop of Ely.

Moore. Buck.

The Duke of Buckingham diſcontented.

Here Sir Thomas Moore gives us the Particulars of a long and ſecret Debate between the Duke and this politick Prelate, which probably he learnt from the Biſhop's own Mouth. In which Conference, the Biſhop, after many Heſitations and Soundings of the Duke's Intentions, freely inveigh'd againſt the numerous Crimes and Enormities of the preſent King Richard, and laſtly urg'd the Duke, as being of the Houſe of Lancaſter, to take upon him the Title of King, and aſſume the Crown of England, to the Security of the Nation. On the other Side the Duke made a plauſible Apology for all the Aſſiſtances he had given to the preſent Uſurper, declaring that he had once an Intention to aſſume the Crown; but upon Reconſideration, he found the Earl of Richmond to be the neareſt Heir of the Houſe of Lancaſter, and the propereſt Perſon; who if he marry'd the Lady Elizabeth, eldeſt Daughter to King Edward the Fourth, and the neareſt Heir of the Houſe of York, he might both deſtroy King Richard, and put a full Period to all the Troubles and Calamities of the Nation. This Concluſion was highly pleaſing to the Biſhop of Ely, who conſulting with the Duke where firſt to begin, it was reſolv'd immediately to treat with the Counteſs of Richmond, it being neceſſary firſt to know from her the Intentions of the Earl her Son, who was then in Bretaign. In order to this, the Biſhop offer'd to bring one Reynold Gray, a domeſtick Servant to the Counteſs, a wiſe and diſcreet Man, and well verſt in the Negotiation of great Affairs; and accordingly he wrot to him to come to Brecknock about a Buſineſs nearly concerning his Miſtreſs. Being arriv'd, the Inſtructions he receiv'd were theſe, 'That conſidering the Kingdom could not be reduc'd to Quiet, but by advan-'cing the Earl of Richmond to the Crown, and uniting the two Houſes of Lan-'caſter and York by Marriage; that the Counteſs of Richmond ſhould treat of 'that

'that Matter with Queen Elizabeth, and having obtain'd her eldeſt Daughter, 'ſhe ſhould ſend into Bretaign to her Son; who if he promis'd to marry her 'whenever he was crown'd, they ingag'd by joining the Forces of the Factions 'to make him King. Bray being diſpatch'd away with this Embaſſie, the Biſhop likewiſe took Leave of the Duke, who was extreamly unwilling to part with ſuch a wiſe Counſellor. However he reſolv'd to depart; and while the Duke fed him with Hopes, under Pretence of raiſing Men for his Journey, he ſtole away diſguis'd, and getting fortunately to Ely, he provided himſelf with Mony, and paſs'd over into Flanders, where he became more ſerviceable in this Matter than he could have been in England. Yet his Departure prov'd fatal to the Duke, for wanting his Advice, and meeting with unexpected Accidents, it caus'd his final Ruin.

The Duke of Buckingham and Biſhop of Ely mutually engage to advance the Earl of Richmond.

Ibid. In the mean Time Bray acquainted his Lady with the whole Affair, who immediately approv'd of it; but the Queen being ſtill in Sanctuary, the Counteſs thought it not proper to go in Perſon, therefore ſhe ſent her Phyſician Lewis, a learned Welſhman, who had a ſpecious Pretence of viſiting a Perſon not well in Health. Having gain'd Acceſs, and being well known to her, he handſomly open'd the Cauſe, as a Matter not digeſted and concluded, but as an Opinion of his own, not hard to be effected if ſhe would approve of it. The Queen well underſtood him, and was rightly ſenſible that if the Earl of Richmond was marry'd to her eldeſt Daughter, it might naturally produce the greateſt of all human Felicities to her Family; therefore ſhe promis'd if that could be effected, to aſſiſt by any Methods towards the Deſtruction of the Uſurper. The Phyſician having inform'd his Miſtreſs of the Queen's Intentions, ſhe immediately proceeded with all Vigour; and Bray ſecretly treated with ſuch as he knew faithful and fit for a Matter of ſuch Importance; while the Queen negotiated with all thoſe who hated King Richard, and wiſh'd for nothing more than an Opportunity of ſerving her. Thoſe employ'd for the Counteſs, beſides Bray and the Phyſician, were Sir Giles Aubery, Sir John Cheiny, Sir Richard Guilford, Thomas Ramney, and Hugh Conway. This laſt being ſent by the Counteſs to her Son with a conſiderable Sum of Mony, he took his Way by Plimouth through Cornwall; while Thomas Ramney was ſent through Kent, that if one ſhould unfortunately miſcarry, the other might effect the Work; but both were ſo ſucceſsful, that they did not differ many Hours in their Meeting at Bretaign. Their Embaſſie to the Earl was, 'That he was ſent for as 'King, nominated by the great Men, and deſir'd by all; That the Marriage 'was agreed by the Queen and the Duke of Buckingham; That he ſhould come 'with all Expedition and land in Wales, where he ſhould find Friends and Aſ'ſiſtance ſufficient for his Purpoſe. The Earl, form'd by Nature for a Throne, communicated the Affair to the Duke of Bretaign, who notwithſtanding King Richard's Threats and Promiſes, had given him his Liberty, and now generouſly conſented to befriend him in this nice Conjuncture. So that confident of good Succeſs, the Earl ſent Conway and Ramney back to his Mother, with Anſwer That he accepted of the Invitation, and that as ſoon as he could provide Neceſſaries he would come for England; in the mean Time Order might be taken for the Affairs there, that he might find the leſs Impediments at his Arrival. Upon this Meſſage, his Adherents took Courage, and began their Preparations; they ſent into convenient Places Perſons fit to make them good, and diſpos'd ſeveral Commanders in other Parts, that they might be ready upon all Occaſions. Others privately ſollicited the People to prepare them for an Inſurrection; and the Biſhop of Ely wrot from Flanders to ſuch as he knew hated King Richard, promoting the Buſineſs by the ſole Authority of his Letters.

His Anſwer.

Tho' this Deſign was carry'd on with the utmoſt Caution and Secrecy, yet it could not be long conceal'd from the Jealouſies of the politick King; who placing his Spies in all Parts, betook himſelf to Arms; and ſoon concluding the Duke of Buckingham to be the prime Mover, he was of opinion that the main Proviſions were to be made againſt him. But firſt he reſolv'd to try him with Offers, which if rejected, then to proceed to the ſevereſt Methods: Accordingly he ſent an expreſs Meſſenger to him with Letters full of Courteſie and the greateſt Promiſes; but the larger they were, they became ſo much the more ſuſpicious. He well knew the King's Temper, and that he had proceeded in the ſame manner with all thoſe he deſir'd to abuſe; therefore he deſir'd to be excuſed coming to him, alledging a great Indiſpoſition and Unfitneſs to travel. Richard not at all ſatisfy'd, wrot to him in contrary Terms, commanding him to appear immediately before him; to which the Duke, laying aſide all Artifices, gave Anſwer to the Meſſenger, That he would not come to One whom he accounted his mortal Enemy. Thus without further Diſſimulation they prepar'd for War; and the Rumour of it caus'd the Marqueſs Dorſet, Son to the Queen-Dowager to quit his Sanctuary, and to go and raiſe Forces in Yorkſhire; in Devonſhire and Cornwall Sir Edward Courtney, and his Brother the Biſhop of Exeter did the ſame; and Sir Richard Guilford, aſſiſted by many other Gentlemen, began the War in Kent. King Richard was not taken altogether unprovided; but uſing all Diligence he march'd towards Salisbury, while the Duke of Buckingham with an Army of Welſhmen advanced towards Gloceſter, there to paſs the Severn, and join with the two Courtneys and the reſt of their Adherents; which if effected, the King probably had been ruin'd. But here Providence, that deſign'd to puniſh the Duke for all his Crimes, interpos'd, and ſent ſuch a Deluge of Rain, that the Severn was not only impaſſable, but Men, Women and Children were carry'd away in their Beds by the Violence of it, and the Tops of Mountains were cover'd with Waters. This Flood continuing for ten Days, the Duke was forc'd to ſtay, while his Soldiers almoſt drown'd with Rain, famiſh'd for want of Victuals, and having no Pay, took a Reſolution to disband of themſelves; which they did, notwithſtanding all the Authority and Perſuaſions of the Duke to the contrary. Being all diſpers'd, and the Duke abandon'd, he retir'd near Shrewsbury to the Houſe of one Humphry Baniſter, a Servant of his, who being highly oblig'd to him upon all Accounts, he concluded he might remain in Safety, 'till ſuch Time as he could either gather new Forces, or paſs over into Bretaign to the Earl of Richmond.

Both Parties take Arms.

The Duke of Buckingham's Men disband.

The Disbanding of the Duke's Army being publiſh'd abroad, and it not being known whether he was alive or dead, ſuch Fear poſſeſs'd thoſe of Kent, Devonſhire and Cornwall, that laying down their Arms, they fled ſome into Sanctuaries, and others beyond the Seas, and moſt of the chief of them particularly into Bretaign. King Richard hearing of the Welſhmens Retreat, the Duke's Flight, and the reſt of the Conſpirators Deſign to ſave themſelves, he immediately ſent to all the Ports, and order'd all Paſſengers of any ſort to be ſtopp'd; making Proclamation, That whoever ſhould diſcover or deliver up the Duke of Buckingham into his Hands, if he were under the Villenage, he ſhould be enfranchis'd; and if otherwiſe, together with a general Pardon he ſhould have a thouſand Pounds ready Mony given him. Together with this he made ſtrong Preparations at Sea, being aſſur'd by Sir Thomas Hutton, who had been Ambaſſador in Bretaign, that the Earl of Richmond was certainly to be aſſiſted by that Duke both with Men and Mony; he therefore ſent many Ships to the Coaſt of Bretaign, with Intention either to fight him, or hinder him from landing on the Engliſh Shore. In other Parts he left no Place unguarded, and none were permitted to land or take Shipping without the moſt diligent Search, that ſome News might be had of the Duke of Buckingham. Baniſter, into whoſe Hands the Duke had truſted his Life, hearing of the Proclamations and promis'd Rewards, out of Fear or Avarice, diſcover'd where he was to the Sheriff of Shropſhire; who coming to Baniſter's Houſe, found the Duke in the Habit of a Day-Labourer digging in a Garden; in which Apparel he was ſent well guarded to Shrewsbury, where King Richard then reſided. He deny'd not the Conſpiracy, hoping by his free Confeſſion to have gain'd Admittance into the King's King's Preſence; ſome think with an Intention to have begg'd for Mercy, others to have kill'd the King with a Dagger which he wore underneath his Cloaths. But ſtern Richard not ſuffering him to be brought to him, he was on the firſt Day of November beheaded in the Market-Place, without any manner of Proceſs, and after the ſame Manner he had caus'd many others to ſuffer. Here Sir Thomas Moore takes notice of the Puniſhments which God ſent upon Baniſter and all his Family afterwards; but the Vengeance of Heav'n was more conſpicuous againſt the Duke, who now juſtly fell into the Hands of a Tyrant, whom contrary to all Juſtice he had rais'd into the Throne. The Duke was in his Death accompany'd by ſeveral others, particularly Sir George Brown, Sir Roger Clifford, and Sir Thomas Saintlieger, who was the laſt Husband to the Dutcheſs of Exeter the King's Siſter. and beheaded.

Moore. III. During theſe Tranſactions at home, the Earl of Richmond, aſſiſted by the Duke of Bretaign, had got together five thouſand Men, and forty furniſh'd Ships, in which he embark'd for England. But in the next Night he met with a dreadful Storm, which diſpers'd all his Ships, and threw him ſingly upon the Coaſt of Dorſetſhire near the Town of Poole; where he found the Shore all cover'd with Men to prevent his Landing. Here he caſt Anchor, expecting the Arrival of his other Ships; and then ſent a Boat near the Shore to diſcover whether they were Friends or not. Being come within Hearing, thoſe on the Shore ſaid, They were ſent to conduct them to the Duke of Buckingham, who lay with a great Army not far diſtant, expecting the Landing of the Earl of Richmond, who might eaſily ruin King Richard, now abandon'd by moſt Men. But the Earl ſoon diſcover'd this Deceit, and deſparing to meet with the reſt of the Fleet, he put to Sea and landed in Normandy, from whence he diſpatch'd a Gentleman to Charles the preſent King of France to deſire a ſafe Conduct into Bretaign; and he commiſerating the Earl's Misfortunes, did not only grant that, but alſo a conſiderable Sum of Mony. Being arriv'd in Bretaign, and his Ships return'd, he then learnt the ill Succeſs of his Affairs in England, how the Duke of Buckingham was executed, and the Queen's Son the Marqueſs Dorſet, with the reſt of his Companions, were come into Bretaign, which extreamly dejected him; yet he was comforted at the Arrival of his Friends, promiſing himſelf ſome Advantage from their Safeties. Here they again all reſolv'd to proceed in their firſt Deſign, and to make the Earl King, upon Condition he marry'd the Princeſs Elizabeth Daughter to Edward the Fourth. All this was ſworn to in the Cathedral Church of Rennes; where likewiſe the Marqueſs with all the reſt did Homage to the Earl, as their actual King. The Earl fail'd not to acquaint the Duke of Bretaign with all theſe Proceedings, and the Greatneſs of the Cauſe he undertook; and that he greatly ſtood in need of another Fleet and Supplies of Mony: To all which the Duke generouſly harkned and condeſcended. The Earl of Richmond's Fleet diſpers'd at Sea.

Ibid. In the mean Time the Tyrant Richard proceeded with great Severity, and put many ſuſpected Perſons to Death; and being return'd to London, he call'd a Parliament, in which the Earl of Richmond and thoſe that had fled to him were declar'd Enemies to the Kingdom, and their Eſtates confiſcated. Tho' theſe Confiſcations amounted to large Sums, yet they were inſufficient for his Purpoſes, and did not hinder him from laying inſufferable Taxes upon his Subjects. Fearing to provoke the People too much, he was content to keep the Earl of Richmond's Mother only as a Priſoner, while the Lord Stanley her Husband paſs'd without any great Suſpicion. But for William Collingburn, who had been High Sheriff of Wiltſhire and Dorſetſhire, he caus'd him to be executed for writing this Rhime, The Cat, the Rat, and Lovell the Dog, do govern England under a Hog; alluding to Catesby, Ratcliff, and the Lord Lovell, who gave the Dog for his Arms, as Richard did the Boar for his; being all three prime Favourites. Then to keep himſelf ſecure from foreign Diſturbances, The Earl and his Adherents declar'd publick Enemies in Parliament.

Truce with Scotland.

Richard ſent Commiſſioners to treat with the King of Scotland, with whom he made a Truce for three Years, each of them to keep what they poſſeſs'd, only the Caſtle of Dunbarre was to be reſtor'd to the Scots. And that he might have a double Tie upon them, he concluded a Marriage between the Duke of Rothſay Heir of Scotland, and his Neece Anne of Poole, Daughter to his Siſter Anne and John Duke of Suffolk. All theſe Precautions could not free his diſtracted Mind from thoſe Furies which had brought Hell into his Conſcience; and tho' Buckingham and many others were dead and baniſh'd, yet he could have no Peace or Security; his heinous Crimes, the Peoples Hatred, and the Earl of Richmond would not ſuffer him to enjoy an Hour's Reſt. He again endeavour'd to get the Earl into his Poſſeſſion, and loaded his Ambaſſadors with large Sums of Mony and other Gifts to preſent to the Duke of Bretaign; alſo offering him Richmondſhire, all the Earl's Revenues, and all the Eſtates of thoſe that had fled to him. But the Ambaſſadors could not have Acceſs to the Duke, being come when he was under a delirious Fit; whereupon they made their Addreſſes to Peter Landois, who had Power to diſpoſe of the Prince and State as he pleas'd. Theſe large Offers had ſuch Effects upon his baſe Mind, that he was ready to comply with them, but not in the manner they were propos'd; for he demanded Richmondſhire for himſelf; upon which Meſſengers were ſeveral Times diſpatch'd into England, which Delay of Time prov'd the Earl's Security. For theſe Deſigns being diſcover'd in England, and to the Biſhop of Ely in Flanders, that Prelate immediately gave notice to the Earl, adviſing him to fly with all Speed, or he would fall into the Enemy's Hands.

The Earl of Richmond in great Danger.

The Earl receiv'd this Advice at Vennes, from whence he immediately ſent for a ſafe Conduct from the French King, which being obtain'd, he left many Engliſhmen behind him, and with only five Followers in a Diſguiſe, fled out of Bretaign into Anjou ſo fortunately, that one Hour's Delay might have been his Ruin. The Duke of Bretaign having recover'd his perfect Senſes, was highly diſpleas'd at the vile Proceedings of Landois; and commanded that all the Engliſh might have Permiſſion to go to their Maſter, and their Charges honourably born by the Publick. He alſo ſent the Mony he had promis'd to the Earl by Edward Woodvile and Edward Poinings, two Engliſh Gentlemen; for which the Earl to ſhew his Gratitude declar'd, That he could never be at Reſt, 'till Fortune had afforded him Means in ſome ſort to requite his infinite Obligations to the Duke, by whoſe Favour only he now liv'd. The King of France was then at Langres, where the Earl repair'd to him, inform'd him of the Reaſon of his Flight from Bretaign, and begg'd his Aſſiſtance in this extraordinary Cauſe; which was not hard to obtain from ſo generous a Prince, againſt one whoſe Name began to be odious in all Nations. King Charles promis'd to aſſiſt him, and brought him on his Way to Montargis, treating the Lords that attended him with Hoſpitality becoming a King. While thus he was ordering his Affairs, Fortune, the better to incourage him, ſent him a Man forgotten, and in effect thought dead; John Vere Earl of Oxford, who had been impriſon'd in Hammes Caſtle by King Edward the Fourth not long after the Battel of Barnet. This Nobleman had ſo far prevail'd with Sir James Blunt Captain of that Caſtle, and Sir John Forteſcue Porter of Calais, that he did not only obtain his Liberty, but procur'd them to forſake their Commands, and go along with him under the Conduct of the Earl of Richmond. But Blunt having left his Lady and all his Goods in Hammes, he compleatly fortify'd it, and encreas'd his Garriſon, that if it ſhould be beſieg'd, they might defend themſelves 'till Fortune turn'd againſt King Richard. King Charles being return'd to Paris, the Earl's Retinue increas'd; all that were fled from England, as well as the Engliſh in thoſe Parts, either as Scholars in the Univerſities, or returning from their Travels, flock'd to him: Among whom was one Richard Fox a ſecular Prieſt, a Man of excellent Parts, who was ſhortly after advanc'd to great Places and Dignities.

King

King Richard all this Time was not wanting to himſelf; his Thoughts were bent upon his own Preſervation, and the Security of the Crown which he unworthily wore: And tho' he ſaw Heav'n and Earth conſpiring againſt him, yet he thought by his own Subtlety to make his Party good againſt both. But underſtanding the Earl's Flight out of Bretaign he ſtood amaz'd, and concluded that his main Remedy was to break the deſign'd Match between the Earl and his Neece Elizabeth. But barely to break it was not thought ſufficient; therefore he reſolv'd to break into the Laws of Nature, and marry his own Neece, whom formerly he had declar'd Illegitimate, and Inceſt would ſerve but as a Laurel to crown his other Abominations. His Conſcience was now ſo hardned, that he reſolv'd upon three Things, Deceit, Murder and Inceſt; the former, with Allurements and fair Promiſes was to mollifie the Queen Mother, and to make way for the other two, the Murder of his Wife, and the Marriage with his Neece. To effect all this, he choſe Perſons fit for his Purpoſe, who in the moſt obliging manner made plauſible Excuſes to the Queen Mother for all that was paſt, pretending That his Majeſty was ſenſibly afflicted for his dear Neeces, that they ſhould make themſelves voluntary Priſoners, and miſtruſt the natural Affection of an Uncle, who like a Father thought of nothing but their Happineſs: That his great Deſire was to treat them according to their Birth, to have them to Court, and to provide them with worthy Husbands; and whenever the Death of his Wife ſhould happen (which muſt neceſſarily be in a ſhort Time, by reaſon of ſome extraordinary Indiſpoſitions) his Reſolution was to make the Princeſs Elizabeth his Queen; and would likewiſe prefer the Marqueſs Dorſet to the moſt honourable and profitable Places in the Nation, if he would leave the Earl of Richmond and return to England. Theſe and many other Things, being dreſs'd up in all the Advantages of Honour and Profit, the Queen, through an unconſtancy of Reſolution, too often charg'd upon her Sex, at the firſt Onſet began to melt, and at the ſecond to yield to the King's Propoſals; at once forgetting the Murder of her two Sons, the Infamy thrown upon her Husband and ſelf by the preſent Poſſeſſor; and what was moſt material, the Oath that ſhe had given to the Counteſs of Richmond concerning the Marriage of her Daughter. Ambition ſo far prevail'd as to make her faulty to her own Honour, the Safety of her Daughters, the Generoſity of her paſt Actions, and her own Conſcience; ſo that nothing was thought equivalent to the Perſuaſions of her mortal Enemy. And thus abus'd, ſhe diſpatch'd a Meſſenger to her Son Dorſet, then in France, commanding him to leave the Earl and come for England; declaring, That all paſt Injuries were forgotten, and were to be repair'd with Honours and Preferments; and that King Richard deſir'd nothing more than to give him full Satisfaction. And being thus reconcil'd to the King, they all remov'd out of their Sanctuary, and the young Princeſſes were convey'd to Court with extraordinary Solemnity.

who quits her Sanctuary.

Richard having obtain'd the firſt of his three Deſigns, proceeded towards the ſecond, which would be imperfect without the third, and the third impoſſible without the ſecond. He could not marry his Neece unleſs his Wife was dead; upon this therefore he wholly bent his Thoughts. He conſider'd that to put her to a violent Death would too much alienate his Peoples Affections, which he ſometimes could and had gain'd by his hypocritical Proceedings. For this he hit upon a Method unknown to common Sinners; That Grief, Melancholy and Fear might jointly produce that Effect with the Appearances of Nature, which neither Sword nor Poiſon could do without Scandal. He forbore her Bed, and refus'd to ſpeak to her, denying her both his Society and his Preſence: He began to bewail his ill Fortune in having a Wife that was now barren; and made known his great Affliction to the Arch-Biſhop of York, whom he had ſet at Liberty, not doubting but he would declare it to his Wife, and hoping it might work the deſir'd Effect. The Arch-Biſhop, who was a wiſe Man, and well acquainted with the King's Diſpoſition, ſpoke of it to ſome of his intimate Friends, Friends, judging the unfortunate Lady's Life to be of no long Continuance. Shortly after the King caus'd it to be reported that ſhe was dead, that whenever her Death ſhould happen, it might appear leſs ſurpriſing, and likewiſe caus'd this Rumour to be brought to her own Ears; that every thing might add to her Grief, or at leaſt take off the Horror of the Fact. The Queen, who was of a ſoft and tender Diſpoſition, and not able to ſtand againſt the Power of ſo many Machinations, was extreamly confounded and diſpirited; well knowing that a dreadful Tempeſt muſt needs follow ſuch portentous Thunderings. She ran with great Eagerneſs to him to know wherein ſhe had ſo highly offended him, as that he thought her not only worthy of Hatred, which was apparently ſeen, but of the Puniſhment that was to befal her, the World judging her to be dead already. His Anſwer was pleaſant in Words, but ſevere in Senſe, mingled with Smiles, which gave her more Cauſe of Suſpicion than Comfort. She re-ceed towards the third, the Marriage of his Neece; but he was ſoon ſo interrupted and almoſt confounded with the Publick Affairs, that he could never bring it to Effect. He found many of the Prime Nobility fled into France to the Earl of Richmond, and ſaw himſelf ſo nauſeous to the People, that they were ready to vomit him out. He began now alſo to have greater Jealouſies againſt the Lord Stanley than any other Nobleman; ſo that when that Lord deſir'd leave to return to his Country Houſe, under Pretence of ſome Domeſtick Affairs, he would not permit him 'till he had left his eldeſt Son George Stanley in Court, as an Hoſtage for his Father's Loyalty. Underſtanding of Blunt's Revolt, and the Earl of Oxford's Eſcape from Hammes Caſtle, he order'd the Garriſon of Calais to beſiege and reduce that Place; which was done with a Succeſs greater than was expected. This inconſiderable Advantage, and ſome falſe Repreſentations of the Weakneſs of the Earl of Richmond, and the Backwardneſs of the French King to aſſiſt him, prov'd a vaſt Diſadvantage to King Richard, who being both puff'd up and deluded, recall'd his Ships and diſbanded his Army; judging that the Nobility inhabiting the Maritine Parts, eſpecially thoſe of Wales, were ſufficient to oppoſe any Deſcent his Enemy could make.

the Court of France, that caus'd the Marqueſs Dorſet ſecretly to fly from him; which might have been of great Damage to him, had he not been happily ſtopt in his Journey. Theſe Things made the Earl more diligent; and finding that Delays might be the Loſs or Ruin of his Friends, he judg'd it neceſſary to attempt that with a Few which he could not with Many. He borrow'd Mony of the King and many others, leaving the Marqueſs Dorſet and Sir John Bourchier as Hoſtages; and having gather'd ſome Men, he repair'd to Roan, there waiting for the Ships from Harfleur that were to tranſport his Forces. Here he was inform'd of the Death of King Richard's Queen, and of his Reſolution to marry his Neece, who by her Mother was promis'd to him. This extreamly diſcourag'd him and his Followers; who after a new Conſultation judg'd it a raſh Reſolution to undertake ſo dangerous an Enterprize with a Handful of Men; therefore they reſolv'd not to ſtir 'till they had receiv'd new Advices from England, and could gain over Sir Walter Herbert, a Gentleman of great Family and Power in Wales. But the Earl about the ſame Time receiving an Account that Sir Rice ap Thomas and Captain Savage, two Men of great Note in Wales, would declare for him, and that Reynold Bray had large Sums in Poſſeſſion to pay the Soldiers; he at length took Shipping on the fifteenth Day of of Auguſt, with a few Veſſels, and two thouſand Soldiers. After ſeven Days he landed at Milford-Haven in Wales; from whence paſſing on to Dale, he march'd to Weſt-Hereford, where he was receiv'd with all Satisfaction by the Inhabitants. Here he was diſcourag'd with the falſe News that Thomas and Savage had declar'd for King Richard, and ſoon after as much incourag'd by Arnold Butler, that the Inhabitants of Pembrokeſhire had join'd with his Uncle Jaſper Earl of Pembroke, their natural Lord; which caus'd him to march on to Cardigan, his Camp encreaſing every Hour. Here he heard News that Sir Walter Herbert was at Caermarthen with a Deſign to oppoſe him; but he ſoon underſtood by his Scouts that there was no Enemy to be ſeen, the Country being open and free for his March. This Satisfaction was augmented by the coming in of Richard Griffith and John Morgan, with a good Body of Men. Yet the Earl ſeeing himſelf reduc'd to the Neceſſity of meeting with Victory or Ruin, and that without further Aſſiſtance he could not ſubſiſt long, he wrote to his Mother, and the Lord Stanley with others, That being by their Advice arriv'd in England, it was their Aſſiſtance that muſt ſupport him; for having but few Men, one Defeat would be his Ruin: That Temporizing would now be fatal; and if Diſſimulation was once advantagious, it would be now pernicious, and diſcourage all his real Friends. This Diſpatch being ſent away by a faithful Servant, he took his March towards Shrewsbury, and met with Rice ap Thomas, who with a conſiderable Number of Welſhmen ſwore Fealty to him, the Earl having promis'd to make him Preſident of Wales, as ſoon as he ſhould be King. At Shrewsbury he receiv'd an Anſwer from his Mother and others, according to his Deſire. From thence he paſs'd on to Newport, where Sir Gilbert Talbot with two thouſand Men came to meet him; as likewiſe did Sir William Stanley at Stafford, where he made ſome Stay to refreſh his People. After this he came to Litchfield, and was receiv'd by the Inhabitants as their lawful Prince. The Lord Stanley had been there two Days before with his Soldiers, and was remov'd from thence to make Way for the Earl, that he might not be ſeen in his Company; being extreamly cautious by reaſon of his Son's being an Hoſtage with King Richard, and ſo hourly in Danger of his Life.

The Earl lands in Wales.

His Progreſs.

King Richard, being now at Nottingham, heard of the Earl's Arrival; but with ſuch a Relation of his inconſiderable Forces, that he had no Regard to him. But afterwards well conſidering the Conſequences, he began to change his Mind, and his Affairs appear'd to be in a Condition not to be truſted to other Mens Directions, by reaſon of the general Hatred of the Nation. Therefore making a Scrutiny of ſuch as were moſt intereſted in the Preſervation of his Perſon and Dignity, he choſe John Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Earl of Surry, giving them Commiſſion to gather together what Friends and Forces they could; and he gave order to Brakenbury the Lieutenant of the Tower to do the ſame, and bring as Companions Sir Thomas Bourcher and Sir Walter Hungerford; not that he expected any Service from them, but to prevent their Conſpiring againſt him. All theſe Precautions did not ſatisfie him, when he underſtood the Earl had paſs'd the Severn: He then began to miſtruſt his Affairs, and to complain of thoſe who had promis'd to defend that Paſſage; and now he found that his Buſineſs was not to be truſted to any third Party, and growing jealous of all Men, he went in Perſon at the Head of his Army to give his Enemy Battel, executing himſelf the Duty of a Serjeant-Major. He came by Night to Leiceſter upon a white Steed, ſurrounded by Guards and a great Number of Foot, with a wild Countenance, anſwerable to the Speeches he utter'd againſt ſuch as had abandon'd him, and diſown'd him for their King. The Earl hearing of his Approach, encamp'd near Tamworth, where he was met by Sir Thomas Bourcher and Sir Walter Hungerford, who fearing King Richard, had privately ſlipp'd from Brakenbury's Forces. From other Parts divers Men of Quality repair'd to him, who probably would have have been his Enemies, had not their Hatred to King Richard mov'd them to join with him: Only the Lord Stanley durſt not appear openly for him, by reaſon of his Son's being in Richard's Poſſeſſion. Both Sides were equally inclinable to fight, being mov'd by ſeveral Fears; Richard of being abandon'd, and the Earl of wanting Mony and other Neceſſaries. But Richard's Condition was apparently the worſe of the two, for Perſons daily deſerted from him; ſo that ſeeking out a fit Place for Battel, he encamp'd himſelf near a Village call'd Boſworth, not far from Leiceſter, where having refreſh'd his Men, he prepar'd to fight. Here we are told that the Night preceding the Battel, he in his Sleep had certain ſtrange and dreadful Apparitions that he believ'd to be Devils, which tormenting him, broke his Reſt, and left him in ſuch a Conſternation, that all that ſaw him were amaz'd.

The fatal Day being come which was to decide the Fortunes of a Kingdom, Richard drew out his Troops in ſuch a manner as might make the greateſt Appearance; committing the Van to the Duke of Norfolk, and commanding the ſecond Line himſelf, where were the choiceſt and beſt armed Men, being guarded on the Flanks by Horſe, and on the Front by Archers. But notwithſtanding all this Show his Numbers were but ſmall in reſpect of the Cauſe and Conſequence, yet ſtill much greater than the Earl had on the other Side. The Lord Stanley ſtood at a Diſtance almoſt between the two Armies with three thouſand Soldiers, affording Hopes and Fears to both Parties: For being deſir'd by the Earl that he would come and take care of the Ordering and Commanding his Men, his Anſwer was, That he might do that Office himſelf, he would come as he ſaw it convenient; and to Richard, who ſwore that if he did not come to him he would cut off his Son's Head before Dinner, he anſwer'd, Let him uſe his Pleaſure, for I have more Sons than he. This Ambiguity prov'd his Son's Security; for Richard having commanded he ſhould be beheaded, he ſuſpended the Order, not ſo much out of Pity as Fear that Stanley's Cloud which threaten'd a Tempeſt ſhould diſcharge all its Fury upon him when he moſt needed his Aſſiſtance. The Earl of Richmond, taking Courage from his Father-in-Law's Anſwer, drew up his Men, placing the Archers in the Front under the Conduct of the Earl of Oxford; he gave Sir Gilbert Talbot charge over the Right Wing, Sir John Savage commanded the Left, and he kept for himſelf and his Uncle the Earl of Pembroke a conſiderable Proportion of Horſe and a few Foot, as a Reſerve, with Intention to join with the Troops as Occaſion ſhould require, All his Forces exceeded not five thouſand Men, and when join'd with the Lord Stanley, they ſcarcely amounted to half the Number that King Richard had.

The thirteenth and laſt Battel, at Boſworth.

Both Armies being drawn up, King Richard on one Side, and the Earl on the other, made long Speeches to their Soldiers, which Sir Thomas Moore has recited at large. At the joining together of the two Armies, their ſeveral Inclinations were ſoon diſcern'd; thoſe of the King's Side fought faintly, and others withdrew themſelves out of the Camp. The King had commanded thoſe in whom he moſt confided, to take care that all might be carry'd on without Diſorder, and that they would advertiſe him of any Danger that ſhould appear: Theſe ſeeing that ſome were negligent, and others retiring, advis'd him to ſave himſelf, concluding he was betray'd. But the Divine Juſtice would not ſuffer him to harken to ſuch Advice, not even when the Victory appear'd evidently on his Adverſaries Side; for a fleet Horſe being preſented to him to further his Eſcape, he declar'd That Day ſhould either determine the War or his Life. Underſtanding ſoon after that the Earl was not far from him, guarded but with a few Men, he ſpurr'd on towards him, and knowing him by ſome Marks, he ran furiouſly at him with his Lance. The Earl was not diſpleas'd at the Encounter, judging it the true Way to decide their Conteſt; but he could not meet him directly, being hinder'd by ſome of his own Men. Richard being diſappointed, puſh'd againſt the great Standard, and ſlew Sir William Brandon the Standard-

Standard-Bearer; then advancing forwards, Sir John Cheney endeavouring to meet him, Richard bore him to the Ground, tho' he was a Man of great Strength and Valour. The Earl with his Sword in Hand ſtopp'd his Fury, at the very Inſtant when the Lord Stanley inveſting the King's Squadrons afforded Occaſion for as many to run away as thought fit. Richard perceiving this, left the Earl, and thruſt himſelf into the thickeſt of the Battel, either to reunite his Men, or to meet Death the ſooner, which laſt ſoon happen'd to him; for fighting valiantly, he fell with the Sword in his Hand all over cover'd with Blood: So that he is ſaid to have gain'd more Honour in theſe two Hours by his Death, than he had done all the Time of his Life. This happen'd on the twenty ſecond Day of Auguſt, in the Prime of his Years, after a deteſtable Reign of two Years, two Months, and four Days, His Body was carry'd to Leiceſter after a moſt ignominious Manner, like a ſlain Deer laid croſs a Horſe's Back, his Head and Arms hanging on one Side, his Legs on the other, ſcorn'd and ſtark naked, and beſmear'd with Blood, Dirt and Mire; and having lain two Days in this Manner, on the bare Earth, it was bury'd without any Solemnity or Funeral Rites. King Richard ſlain.

In this Battel were ſlain not much above a thouſand Men, among whom was the Duke of Norfolk and the Lord Ferrers. Sir William Catesby, who had betray'd the Lord Haſtings, was with ſome others beheaded at Leiceſter according to his Deſerts. This was the thirteenth and laſt Battel fought in the Civil Wars between the Houſe of Lancaſter and York, which had broken out about thirty Years before, fill'd the Nation with Blood and Deſolation, and taken away the Lives of near a hundred thouſand Men, and eighty Princes of the Blood, as Comines aſſures us. This prov'd the Ruin and Extirpation of the Males of both Families, and ſoon after put an End to the very Name of Plantagenet, which had continu'd near three hundred and fifty Years in Poſſeſſion of the Throne of England. As to the Houſe of York in particular, which in Strictneſs had the neareſt Right to the Crown, it was founded and rais'd upon ſuch Violations of the Laws of God and Man, that it could not laſt above twenty four Years; tho' it was ſupported by all the Powers of Human Strength and Policy. Richard may truly be ſaid to have deſcended from an unfortunate Houſe: The Earl of Cambridge his Grand-father was beheaded at Southampton; the Duke of York his Father ſlain before Sandal; of his three Brothers the Earl of Rutland was ſlain in cold Blood, the Duke of Clarence drown'd in a Butt of Malmeſey, and his two Nephews ſtrangled in their Beds: So that we can meet with no Tragedy, true or fabulous, where we find ſo many various and cruel Deaths as in this Family. Richard himſelf, whoſe Character we need not give, was reſerv'd for the laſt Stroke of the Divine Vengeance: Yet in theſe Proceedings of Providence we find that God, who is the Rewarder of Good in thouſands, is the Puniſher of Evil even in the third and fourth Generations, when ſome of the more immediate Actors eſcape in this World. It has been obſerv'd That in Richard the Second he puniſh'd the Death of Edward the Second; in Henry the Sixth and his Son, the Death of Richard the Second; in Edward the Fifth and his Brother, the Death of Henry the Sixth and his Son; and in Richard the Third the Death of Edward the Fifth and his Brother: And yet he was pleas'd to ſuffer thoſe to die in Peace which were the real Authors. Edward the Third, whoſe Mother's Crime gives ſome Aſperſion of Parricide; Henry the Fourth, who murther'd Richard the Second; and Edward the Fourth, who murther'd Henry the Sixth, remain'd all unpuniſh'd. But to Richard the Third, whoſe Crimes were beyond Example, he deny'd Life, and perhaps Repentance, his Inhumanity neither deſerving Succeſſor nor Pardon.

Henry Earl of Richmond enters upon the Throne.

I. UPON the Death of King Richard the Third, at the Battel of Boſworth, Henry Earl of Richmond, now about thirty Years of Age, both valiant and politick in all his Actions, directly enter'd upon the Crown of England; which he obtain'd more by Seiſure or Donation, than by any legal Inheritance. For having offer'd up his Thankſgivings for his Victory, granted the Spoils of the Field to his Soldiers, and honour'd many of them with Knighthood, they with great Acclamations cry'd out King Henry, King Henry! upon whose Forwardness the Lord Stanley took King Richard's Crown, and set it upon the Earl's Head, by that Ceremony confirming the Election of the People; from which Time commenc'd the Reign of the new King with full Success. But because so great a Revolution happen'd in the Kingdom, as to transfer the Crown from one Family to another, it will be very proper to take notice of the Geneology of this King, with his politick Claims and Pretensions.

His Pedigree. His Father Edmund of Hadham Earl of Richmond, was Son to Owen Tudor and Queen Catharine, Widow to King Henry the Fifth, whose Houses had no Affinity nor Relation to the House of Lancaster, or to the Crown of England. So that his Claims by Descent must proceed all from his Mother, the Lady Margaret, only Daughter to the first Duke of Somerset, and Grand-Child to John of Gaunt, Father to King Henry the Fourth; which Lady pretended that in Case the then present Succession should fail, she and her Son were to succeed, as rightly deseended from the said John, the Father of the House of Somerset, as well as Lancaster. But upon a strict Examination, it might easily be discover'd, that besides the Deficiencies in the House of Lancaster it self, the House of Somerset was destinct, and without those Pretensions the other had, as it thus appears. John Duke of Lancaster had three Wives, Blanche, Constance and Catharine, the last of whom was Mother to the House of Somerset; and the due Claims of his Children he had by them were not the same, in respect of the several Dowries, and different Qualities of the three Mothers. Blanche brought with her the Dutchy of Lancaster; Constance, the Pretences to the Kingdoms of Castile and Leon; and Catharine, nothing at all being but a meer waiting Woman to the above nam'd Blanche: So that if Henry the Fourth, and his Sisters born of Blanche, could not pretend to the Kingdoms of Castile and Leon, in prejudice to the Children of Constance; nor those Children to the Dukedom of Lancaster, in prejudice to Henry the Fourth and his Sisters; much less could the Children of Catharine have any Pretence at all, in prejudice to the Children by the two former Wives. And they were excludable with the greater Justice, because they were really Bastards, and with this aggravating Circumstance, on the Father's Side born in Adultery: And tho' after the Death of Constance, the Duke marry'd Chatharine, and had her Children made legitimate by Parliament; yet they not being of the whole Blood, the House of Somerset had nothing to do with the House of Lancaster, in what pertain'd to the Inheritance of the Crown. So that when Henry the Fourth was establish'd in the Throne by Authority of Parliament, and by the same Authority his Sons and their Defcendants declar'd his lawful Successors; no Mention was then made of his half Brothers, in case his Succession should fail, or such as should descend from them. So that strictly speaking, King Henry the Seventh had no rightful Pretensions to the Crown of England, not so much as the House of Lancaster had; but being Head of that Party, and endow'd with many excellent Qualifications, his great Success was owing to the Wickedness of King Richard, and his Promise to marry the Lady Elizabeth, the nearest Heir to the Kingdom. The Troubles that afterwards afflicted him, arose from hence; for he always shew'd himself but lukewarm in his Affections towards his Wife, being an irreconcileable Enemy to her Family; insomuch that having gain'd the Victory and destroy'd his Opposer, he positively resolv'd not to be King but by his own Title and Interest: He therefore deferr'd his Marriage and her Coronation, 'till such Time as being crown'd himself, and establish'd by Parliament, he had only accepted of the Title of Lancaster, as the first and chiefest Fundamental; and of the other two, those of Conquest and Marriage, but as Accidental, and as Supporters. All which was the less blameable, because it did not proceed so much from any Hatred to the House of York, as from the Love he bore to himself, and from a cautious Foresight: For a Report being rais'd that the young Duke of York had escap'd from his his deſign'd Murderers, his Claim by his Wife would have forbid him, if her Brother had been alive, who could not have been excluded but by the litigious Title of Lancaſter. And if this News were falſe, there ſtill remain'd other Scruples: As ſuppoſing ſhe ſhould die without Children, the bare Title of Marriage would not ſecure the Crown to him, which was to fall upon her Siſters; and if ſhe ſhould die with Children, the Crown would devolve upon them, to the Excluſion of himſelf. But if ſtill his Children and a Parliament ſhould be content to continue him in his Government, he knew there was a great Difference between reigning by Virtue of Birth and Law, by which he was oblig'd to no Man, and reigning by the Conſent of others, by which he was oblig'd to every Man. Then to make uſe of the Title of Conqueſt, was both odious and dangerous, which might alienate even thoſe that ſided with him. And tho' the Title of Lancaſter had been condemn'd in Parliament, and he himſelf arriv'd at the Crown not by the real Virtue of that, but that by marrying with the Princeſs Elizabeth, all Diſputes between the two Houſes might be ended; yet mov'd by the foreſaid Conſiderations, and not valuing probable Inconveniencies, he declar'd himſelf King by Virtue of his own Birth, without naming the Princeſs Elizabeth in any Degree: Being willing to run the greateſt Hazard, rather than be King by the Courteſie of his Wife, while ſhe ſhould live; by the Good-will of his Children, if ſhe ſhould firſt die; or by the Permiſſion of a Parliament, if he ſhould have no Iſſue by her.

Polydore. Holling. Bacon.

With theſe nice Precautions this politick Prince began his Reign upon the twenty ſecond Day of Auguſt: And underſtanding that the Princeſs Elizabeth, and Edward Plantagenet, Earl of Warwick and Son to the Duke of Clarence were in Sheriff-Hutton Caſtle in Yorkſhire, there kept by King Richard's Command; he order'd that the Princeſs ſhould be brought up to London to the Queen her Mother, whether ſhe was attended by ſeveral Lords and Ladies. But for the Earl of Warwick, he gave order that the Keeper of the Caſtle ſhould deliver him into the Cuſtody of Sir Robert Willoughby, to be by him brought Priſoner to the Tower of London; for tho' he was not fifteen Years of Age, yet he was a Perſon not thought fit to enjoy his Liberty in ſuch uncertain and litigious Times. The new King march'd from Leiceſter towards London, without any Oſtentation of Victory or Conqueſt: His Journey was peaceful; all Military Inſolencies were forbidden, and forborn: He paſs'd on more like an old than a new Soveraign, being receiv'd in all Places with the higheſt Acclamations of Joy. His taking up the Olive Branch, and laying aſide the Laurel, did highly incourage the People, who now promiſs'd themſelves that Quiet, which ſince Henry the Fourth's Time had only been enjoy'd by Intervals; being ſubject to ſo many Mutations, that the very Expectation and Apprehenſion of the enſuing Evils was as an intermitting Fever for the Space of fourſcore and ſix Years. In the like manner he made his Entrance into London: For tho' he was met by the Mayor, Magiſtrates and Citizens, and himſelf attended with many Noblemen and Gentlemen, yet diſpenſing with the Pomp uſually obſerv'd at the firſt Entrance of Kings into that City, he came in a cloſe Chariot; that it might not be imagin'd, that having recover'd his Country by the Favour of Arms, and gain'd his Crown by the Death of a King, he had any Deſign to triumph over the People. His Entry was upon Saturday, the Day of his Victory; which Day he always ſolemniz'd, as ever being the happieſt Day of the Week to him: He alighted out of his Chariot at St. Paul's Church; where he caus'd Te Deum to be ſung, and the Colours taken from the Enemy to be hung up. He pretended to no other Trophies; nor did he own this as the Effects of his own Valour, or from Fortune, but as from God, the only Fortune to which Sacrifice ought to be made. He made all Preparations for his Coronation; and becauſe it was ſaid he had given his Promiſe to marry the Lady Anne, Daughter and Heir to the Duke of Bretaign, which was by many believ'd to be true, he in an Aſſembly of the Chief Lords of of the Kingdom, call'd for that purpoſe, ratify'd his Promiſe to marry the Princeſs Elizabeth; by which he put a Stop to the Whiſpers and Jealouſies of many. Yet ſtill he referr'd the Conſummation, without regard to Obloquy, 'till being crown'd, and in Poſſeſſion of all by his own Title, he might avoid being call'd King in the Right of his Wife.

Not long after his Arrival at London, towards the End of September, both the City and the Kingdom was afflicted with a Diſeaſe hitherto unknown, call'd the Sweating Sickneſs; which was prodigious in its Nature, both as to the ſwiftneſs of its Courſe, and the mortal Effects it produc'd. But it laſted not much above a Month; ſo that it was no Hindrance to the King's Coronation, which was the laſt of October; nor to the holding of the Parliament, which begun ſeven Days after. In Order to the former, the King made his Entrance into the Tower on Simon and Jude's Eeve, and on the Feaſt Day made twelve Knights Bannerets. After which Jaſper Earl of Pembroke, the King's Uncle, was created Duke of Bedford; Thomas Lord Stanley, the King's Father-in-law, Earl of Darby; and Edward Courtney, Earl of Devonſhire. Two Days after he was crown'd in the Abby Church of Weſtminſter by Cardinal Bourchier, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with the accuſtom'd Solemnities, and joyful Acclamations both of the Nobility and People. Upon the ſame Day, as if the Crown upon his Head had infus'd Jealouſies into his Thoughts, for the Security of his Perſon he inſtituted a Guard of fifty Archers under a Captain to attend him, by the Name of Yeomen of the Guard. This being a new Thing in England, where the Kings were uſually guarded by the Laws and their Subjects Affections, to remove all cauſe of Suſpicions, he declar'd the Inſtitution to be perpetual; and that ſince the Kings of all other Nations had their Guards, Decency if not Neceſſity made the ſame requiſite here in England.

Holling. Baron.

He is crown'd King.

He inſtitutes a Guard.

Seven Days after a Parliament met, in which he annul'd all the Decrees for the Confiſcations of the Lives and Eſtates of ſuch as took part with him, and made the like Decree againſt the Principal of the other Side; and to remove all Jealouſies from the reſt, he granted out a general Pardon, which freed ſuch from Fear who had real Cauſe to be afraid. For having condemn'd thoſe whom he deſign'd not to pardon, it was a certain Sign he would pardon the reſt; ſo that quitting their Sanctuaries and Places of Retreat, they ſwore Fealty to him, and did their Homage anſwearable to the Tenure of the Declaration, and re-enter'd into their Poſſeſſions. Afterwards as concerning his Title, which was the cheifeſt Concernment, he govern'd himſelf by ſuch peculiar Caution and Management, that without ſo much as naming the Princeſs Elizabeth, he caus'd the Act that was made to contain a double Senſe: That the Inheritance of the Crown ſhould remain in him and his Children lawfully to be begotten, not declaring whether it was his by Nature, or by Conqueſt; he knowing that whatſoever Interpretation was made of it would turn to his Advantage. He avoided to preſcribe any Succeſſion in caſe he and thoſe that ſhould lawfully deſcend from him, ſhould fail, becauſe it ſhould not be thought to be alone purpoſely to exclude the Houſe of York; he therefore left the Deciſion of that to the Laws. He procur'd this Statute to be confirm'd by the Pope's Bull, with particular Mention, by way of Recital, of his other Titles, both of Deſcent and Conqueſt. He in the ſame Parliament conferr'd new Honours upon ſeveral: He created Monſieur de Chaudos, a Gentleman of Bretaign, Earl of Bath; Sir Giles Dawbeny was made Lord Dawbeny, and Sir Robert Willoughby Lord Brooke. He reſtor'd Edward Stafford, Eldeſt Son to the Duke of Buckingham, to his Blood, Dignity and Eſtate, and tho' his Confiſcation was great, yet his Father having been the firſt Promoter of his Riſe with his own Ruin, he reſtor'd all to his Son; which won him the Reputation of being generous and grateful. And tho' Kings ſeldom call'd Parliaments without deſiring ſome Aids, and cloſing ſome Acts of Grace, he would not make any ſuch Demand at this Time, as not having any Grace to confer proper to the Seaſon. For tho' the general Pardon was an Act of Grace, yet he would not pretend it to be ſuch, but rather a Correſpondency to the Satisfaction they had given him, in receiving him to be King by his own Title: Beſides, not having War with any at this Time, and having many Confiſcations fallen to him, he was willing to ſpare his Subjects Purſes.

Ibid. The Parliament being diſſolv'd, he did not forget that he had left the Marqueſs Dorſet and Sir John Bourchier as Pledges in France for thoſe Sums he borrow'd to pay the Force he brought into England. Being deſirous therefore upon this Occaſion to try the Inclinations of the Citizens, he commanded the Lord Treaſurer to require from the Lord Mayor of London that the City might lend him ſix thouſand Marks; and after ſeveral Conſultations, the Matter was decided by a Loan of two thouſand Pounds Sterling; which tho' it came ſhort of the Sum deſir'd, he receiv'd with Courteſie, and ſupply'd the Remainder out of his own Coffers, that the Hoſtages might be wholly at Liberty. He forgot not the Service done to him by John Morton Biſhop of Ely, and Richard Fox Biſhop of Exeter, for which he made them both of his Privy-Council, and gave to Morton the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, which fell vacant by the Death of Cardinal Bourchier: He made Fox Lord Privy-Seal, promoting him through ſeveral Biſhopricks to that of Wincheſter, the richeſt of all the reſt. And now having no Impediment to hinder the Performance of his Promiſe, upon the eighteenth Day of January the long expected and deſir'd Marriage, between him and the Princeſs Elizabeth was ſolemniz'd: Which Day of Marriage was celebrated with greater Triumph, and Demonſtrations of the Peoples over-flowing Joy, than the Day of his Entry or Coronation; which was rather noted than approv'd of by the King. For during the eighteen Years the Lady Elizabeth liv'd, he ſhew'd himſelf no very indulgent Husband towards her, tho' ſhe had all the Advantages of Beauty, Goodneſs and Fruitfulneſs. His Averſion towards the Houſe of York was too predominant in him, inſomuch that it found place, not only in his Wars and Councils, but alſo in his Chamber and Bed.

The King's Marriage with the Princeſs Elizabeth.

Holling. Bacon. Speed. II. All Things having ſucceeded thus happily, King Henry reaſonably imagin'd that now he ſhould meet with no more Oppoſitions: He was King by his own Title, in his own Right; he had marry'd the Heir to the Crown; and by his general Pardon and Reſtitution of Goods, he had reconcil'd ſuch as were his profeſs'd Enemies. Yet after all, the Northern People, ſtill bearing a Love to the Houſe of York, and to the late King Richard, he thought it proper for himſelf to go into thoſe Parts; hoping by his Preſence to cure their infatuated Imaginations. He kept his Eaſter at the City of Lincoln; where ſhortly after he underſtood that the Lord Lovel, and the two Brothers, Humphrey and Thomas Stafford had forſaken Sanctuary, but it was unknown to what Place they was retir'd: But arriving at York, he there underſtood that the Lord Lovel was not far from thence with a conſiderable Force; and that the Staffords having rais'd Men in Worceſterſhire, were marching towards York to attack him. This ſecond Information, tho' it did a little diſcompoſe him, yet he took it only for the Remainders of King Richard's expiring Party at Boſworth: But he was more at a loſs to find that he was amongſt a People that did not affect him, that join'd with the Houſe of York, and upon whom he could not ſafely rely. Amidſt theſe Difficulties, he muſter'd out of his Followers, Tenants and Dependants in whom he might confide, three thouſand fighting Men; which being ill arm'd, but well aſſur'd, were deliver'd to the Duke of Bedford; giving him for his Van-Guard a general Pardon, which like Cannon Shot was to ruin the Enemy at a Diſtance. This prov'd effectual: For the Duke coming in Sight of the Lord Lovel, and the Heralds having publiſh'd the Pardon, he was ſo confounded, that fearing both to be abandon'd, and to be deliver'd up Priſoner, he fled the ſame Night towards Lancaſter, and from thence to Flanders

It is quell'd Arms yielded themſelves to the Duke. Upon which thoſe who had join'd with the Staffords, having loſt their chief Hopes, deſpers'd themſelves into ſeveral Places; and the two Brothers got into the Sanctuary at Colnham near Abington, where they found not the Safety they imagin'd; for the Privilege of the Place not extending to the Security of Traitors, they were taken from thence, and the eldeſt executed, the younger finding Mercy. This Rebellion quieted, the Northern People ſettled, and the King return'd to London, in September following, the Queen was deliver'd of her firſt Son, whom the King nam'd Arthur, in Honour of the Britiſh Race from whom he was deſcended, and according to the Name of that ancient worthy King of the Britains; in whoſe Acts, beſides what is fabulous, there is Truth ſufficient to render him famous. This to the moſt fortunate King was a new Happineſs, to the Queen a great Matter of Joy, to the Church a Soveraign Delight, to the Court an exceeding Pleaſure, and in Sum to the whole Kingdom an incredible Satisfaction.

Prince Arthur born.

Notwitſtanding all this, ſhortly after there follow'd a ſtrange Accident of State, of which the Relations that remain to us are ſo naked, that they leave it ſcarce credible, not ſo much for the Nature of it, but for the Manner and Circumſtances of it, eſpecially in the Beginning. There liv'd in Oxford a Subtle aſpiring Prieſt nam'd Richard Simon, of mean Birth and tolerable Education; who ventur'd to undertake what a far greater Man durſt not have attempted. This Man took upon him to educate a young Lad, nam'd Lambert Symnel; who, tho' only the Son of a Baker, had ſo ſweet and ingenious a Countenance, as he might readily be thought one of the higheſt Quality. The preſaging Aſpect of this Youth firſt gave Simon an Occaſion to take Advantage of two Rumours then ſpread abroad by the Enemies of King Henry: The one, that the Duke of York, ſecond Son to King Edward the Fourth, was ſtill alive; the other, that King Henry was reſolv'd ſecretly to put the young Earl of Warwick to Death, who was Priſoner in the Tower. The firſt was divulg'd to raiſe and nouriſh the Hopes of the Male-contents; the ſecond to blow up Hatred againſt the King, as if equally cruel with his Predeceſſor, he was ready to treat the Earl of Warwick as Richard had treated his Nephews. Upon theſe Reports, Simon firſt deſign'd to make Lambert perſonate the Duke of York; but ſoon changing his Opinion, he judg'd it more advantagious to have him perſonate the Priſoner the Earl of Warwick; ſo that if his Endeavours ſhould ſucceed, and Lambert gain the Crown, he himſelf ſhould be rewarded with the chief Miter of England, and with the Government of King and Kingdom. Nor did he fear to meet with any fatal Obſtacles; ſince the Love to the Houſe of York, ſtill remaining in the Hearts of moſt Men, had occaſion'd a great Diſſatisfaction that the Princeſs Elizabeth, who had now born the King a Son, ſhould yet want the Ceremony of a Coronation. Reſolving upon the Affair, he proceeded to give proper Inſtructions to Lambert, in whom he met with an Aptneſs anſwerable to his Deſigns: But conſidering afterwards that his Pupil was to repreſent a Perſon not known to many, and unknown to himſelf, he judg'd it impracticable without the Aſſiſtance of ſome converſant in the Court, who might be inform'd by thoſe that had ſerv'd the Earl, of his particular Converſation, and of all things that had befallen him ſince King Edward's Death. None being fitter for ſuch an Office than the Queen Dowager, ſhe was conceiv'd to be the main Inſtructer; as having too great a Cauſe of Reſentment againſt King Henry, for ſo cooly treating her Daughter either as a Wife or a Queen. Not that ſhe was willing to make Lambert King, but to uſe him as an Inſtrument to depoſe her Son-in-law, and to ſubſtitue the Infant Prince Arthur in his Place; and if that fail'd, Warwick or Lincoln might ſucceed, who were both of the Houſe of York. That which confirm'd this Opinion was the King's confining of her afterwards, upon no weighty Pretence; thinking it expedient to puniſh her under the Colour of a ſmall known Crime, for one more hainous not fitting to be known.

The firſt Impoſtor ſet up Lambert Symnel.

The Queen Dowager favours him.

How-

Bacon. Bondi. However it was, Lambert aſſum'd the Geſtures and Behaviour of a great Perſonage, with ſuch a fortunate Exactneſs, as being join'd to his natural Sweetneſs, a true Prince could not be enrich'd with more real Perfections, than thoſe that appear'd to be true in him. The Reaſons that caus'd Simon to chuſe to have his Pupil perſonate the Son to the Duke of Clarence, rather than the young Duke of York, was, That when the Report was rais'd of his being eſcap'd out of the Tower, he obſerv'd ſo great a Joy in the People, that he judg'd it more proper for his Deſign, and that it would be eaſier to inſinuate a Deluſion in the Perſon of this Man, falſely ſuppos'd to have made an Eſcape, than in that other whoſe Eſcape would with more Difficulty be believ'd. Now to act the Comedy with Applauſe, he did not think England a fit Scene, a proportionable Diſtance being requir'd in Things of this Nature. He reſolv'd therefore to go over into Ireland, a Kingdom affectionate to the Houſe of York, and where King Henry had yet made no Alterations either in Dignity, Counſellor nor Officer; but the ſame commanded there as were plac'd by King Richard. All which made for Simon's Deſigns; who coming before Fitz-Gerald the Deputy, one well affected to the Houſe of York, preſented his pretended Prince to him, and Lambert acted his Part with ſo much Artifice, that the deluded Deputy believ'd him to be what his Maſters Speeches, and his ſtudy'd Nobility made him appear: Inſomuch that acquainting ſome of his trueſt Friends with this Secret, he found them and the People ſufficiently inclinable to a Revolution. They receiv'd this fancy'd Prince with great Honour; they gave him the Caſtle of Dublin for his Lodging; and ſhortly after proclaim'd him King, by the Name of Edward the Sixth. There was not any one Province that deny'd him Obedience, but all join'd in declaring War againſt King Henry; while on the other Side not one would draw a Sword in his Cauſe. But that Kingdom being bare of Mony and Arms, and meanly furniſh'd with Soldiers, they rely'd upon the Houſe of York's Friends in England, and Margaret Dutcheſs of Burgundy, to aſſiſt them with their Supplies; to whom they gave Intelligence that Edward Plantagenet was eſcap'd out of the Tower and come into Ireland, where he was proclaim'd King; that they deſign'd to bring him into England his hereditary Kingdom, if they would be ready to ſecure his Entrance, and that his Aunt of Burgundy would aſſiſt him with Mony, Soldiers and Commanders. This Dutcheſs Margaret was Siſter to King Edward the Fourth, and third Wife to Charles Duke of Burgundy, who after her Husband's Death took ſuch honourable Care of Mary, his only Heir and her Poſterity, that ſhe was in great Eſteem among the Flemings, who honour'd her as their natural reigning Princeſs. Her Husband had left her a plentiful Dowry; ſo that having no great Occaſion for Expences, ſhe might, by the Mony ſhe had been gathering ſo many Years, eaſily undertake this remarkable Affair. She therefore willingly hearkned to the Embaſſie; not that ſhe was wholly ignorant of the Impoſture; but that ſhe might have an Occaſion to moleſt King Henry and the Houſe of Lancaſter, againſt which ſhe had inſuperable Prejudices. The Marriage with her Neece, which ſhould have reconcil'd her to King Henry, did more incenſe her againſt him, ſince it eſtabliſh'd him in the Kingdom, and took it from her Houſe without Hopes of Recovery: For which Reaſon ſhe readily promis'd Aſſiſtance, and in due Time perform'd it.

Lambert goes into Ireland.

The Iriſh make him King.

Ibid. The King hearing of this Inſurrection in Ireland, was extreamly concern'd; being too late ſenſible that he had acted amiſs, in leaving that Nation under the Command of ſuch as depended upon his Predeceſſor. Hereupon he firſt call'd his Council together with great Secrecy; in which was propounded and concluded three Expedients: Firſt, That a general Pardon ſhould be proclaim'd to all who would diſcover their Crimes, and ſubmit by a Day prefix'd; which Pardon ſhould be deliver'd in ſuch a full and ample Manner, that no High-Treaſon, even againſt the King's own Perſon, ſhould be excepted. Which tho' it might ſeem ſtrange, yet it was not ſo to a wiſe King who knew the moſt imminent Dangers aroſe not from the leaſt Treaſons, but from the greateſt: And this was deſign'd chiefly to bring in Sir Thomas Broughton, a powerful Oppoſer, of dangerous Intereſt. Secondly, That Edward Earl of Warwick ſhould be taken out of the Tower, and ſhown publickly to the People, that they might be aſſur'd of his being alive; and that the ſuppos'd Earl in Ireland was a meer Chimæra, fram'd only to diſturb the State. Thirdly, That the Queen's Mother ſhould be confin'd to a Nunnery, and have all her Goods confiſcated; becauſe ſhe had promiſs'd the Princeſs Elizabeth to the preſent King, when he was in Bretaign, and contrary to Articles of Agreement had deliver'd her, and the reſt of her Siſters, up to King Richard. The Iſſue of theſe three Revolutions were, That as to the firſt, Sir Thomas Broughton did not anſwer Expectation: As to the ſecond, the Earl of Warwick was led in Proceſſion from the Tower to St. Paul's; being all the way diſcours'd withal by divers of the Nobility who knew him, eſpecially by ſuch of whom the King had any Suſpicion; that all might have full Conviction of his being alive. This prov'd ſucceſsful in England, but had no Effect in Ireland, where the Inhabitants turn'd the Impoſtor upon the King, and reported, That to defeat the true Inheriter, and to delude the World, he had dreſs'd up a Boy in the likeneſs of the Earl of Warwick, and ſhew'd him to the People, without ſparing to prophane the Solemn Ceremony of Proceſſion. The Reſolution concerning the Queen-Mother was what alone took effect, who was thruſt into the Monaſtery of Bermondſey, and had all her Eſtate ſeiz'd into the King's Hands; but not without great Scandal and Obloquy againſt the Severity of his Proceedings. This Lady may be plac'd amongſt the greateſt Examples of Fortune's Inconſtancy; who being indu'd with rare Qualities, was ruin'd by her Abuſe in the Choice; and as Wiſdom and Wylineſs have too near a Reſemblance, ſhe miſtook the latter for the former. From being Widow to a bare Knight, by an unreaſonable Riſe, and through a peculiar Breach of Faith, ſhe became Wife to a great King; who being fled away, depos'd and baniſh'd, ſhe was forc'd for the Secutity of her Perſon to take Sanctuary, where ſhe bore her unfortunate Son. Her Husband afterwards returning home victorious and triumphant, ſhe likewiſe ſhar'd in his good Fortune; but when he dy'd, ſhe was driven to the like Neceſſity of taking Sanctuary. Her Brother-in-law having uſurp'd the Kingdom from her Sons, declar'd them to be Baſtards, and barbarouſly murder'd them; and for her greater Affliction, her Brother and one of her former Sons, dy'd by the Hands of the Hangman; ſo that in leſs than three Months ſpace ſhe was diſmally wounded with the Deaths of three Sons and her Brother. Her eldeſt Daughter being marry'd to the preſent King, ſhe being mov'd by her Female Indignation to practice extravagent Chimæras, ſhe loſt her Honour, Eſtate and Liberty; and being abandon'd by her Friends, and not viſited by any, ſhe ſhortly after dy'd miſerably. She was buried by her Husband at Windſor; and it was ſhe that compleated the Foundation of Queen's-Colledge in Cambridge, which had been begun by Margaret Wife to King Henry the Seventh.

Her Death.

About this Time the Earl of Lincoln fled into Flanders, who was Son to John de la Pole Duke of Suffolk, and Elizabeth, eldeſt Siſter to the two Kings Edward and Richard. The latter had declar'd him Succeſſor, in Caſe he ſhould die without Children; which juſtly rais'd his Hopes, having a Wit and Courage capable of attempting the greateſt Enterprizes. His Deſigns which were born to the Ground by his Uncle's Death, and Henry's Acceſſion to the Crown, began to be reviv'd at this Iriſh News: For knowing the Falſhood of the pretended Plantagenet, he thought the Troubles likely to ariſe from thence, would bring him to what he deſir'd; for if Henry were once overcome, it would be eaſie for him to bear down the Impoſtor. The King had him oftentimes in his Thoughts; but the Earl of Warwick's Impriſonment, at which the People was offended, was the Reaſon why he did not confine him. Which if he had, it it would have encreas'd the Odium; and he hop'd that tho' he were at Liberty, he could not hurt him ſo long as the other was in Priſon. In which if he was deceiv'd, it turn'd not to his Prejudice; for Lincoln being fled by the Advice of Sir Thomas Broughton, he repair'd to the Dutcheſs, his Aunt, who after divers Conſultations ſent him into Ireland, accompany'd by the Lord Lovel and other Fugitives, with a Regiment of two thouſand ſelect Almains, commanded by Martin Swart a valiant Captain. She thought this ready Succour would produce many good Effects; as the confirming the Rebels in their Proceedings, the ſecuring of the counterfeit King in Poſſeſſion, and the encouraging of his Party in England towards the Ruin of King Henry: For the Pretended Edward the Sixth was to be ſupported, as long as Occaſion requir'd, but not yet to be caſhier'd; and the true Edward, in the Tower, to be put in his Place, contrary to the Earl of Lincoln's Expectations. King Henry underſtanding this Flight, was extreamly perplex'd; and found that the Dutcheſs having declar'd her ſelf in behalf of the Rebels, he muſt defend his Crown with the Sword. His firſt Care was to cauſe the Sea-Coaſts to be well guarded, that others might not follow Lincoln's Example: He rais'd a powerful Army, and devided it under two Generals, the Duke of Bedford and the Earl of Oxford; expecting to be attack'd at the ſame time both from Ireland and Flanders: And tho' he believ'd it would not be before the next Spring; yet he took a Journey almoſt in the midſt of Winter into Suffolk and Norfolk, to take Order for neceſſary Proviſions. And underſtanding by the way, that the Marqueſs Dorſet was coming to him, to clear himſelf of ſome Imputations charg'd upon him, he diſpatch'd the Earl of Oxford to meet him upon the Road, with Orders to carry him to the Tower, and to let him know, That it was not done for his Deſerts, or for any ill Opinion of the King's, but to free him from the Danger of being perſuaded to undertake any Thing to his Prejudice, deſiring him to take this Uſage patiently, and promiſing to make him honourable and ſatisfactory Reparation. The King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Norwich; and went from thence by way of Devotion to our Lady of Wolſingham, and from thence return'd by Cambridge to London.

Bacon. Biondi. The Earl of Lincoln's Arrival in Ireland, with ſo good a Force added to the Rebels Hopes: They were proud to ſee themſelves favour'd by the Dutcheſs, who had ſo readily aſſiſted 'em with Forces, and placed two ſuch Lords as Lincoln, and Lovel at the Head of them. At their Appearance, Lambert who was formerly proclaim'd King, had now the Ceremony of Coronation; and after ſome time ſpent in Conſultations, they all embark'd with great Numbers of the poorer ſort of Iriſhmen, better furniſh'd with Hopes than with Weapons. They landed at Fowdray in Lancaſhire, with Lambert clad in Royal Apparel; and were conducted by the Earl of Lincoln and Kildare, and Viſcount Lovel, follow'd by the Dutchmen under Colonel Swart. Sir Thomas Broughton met them at their Landing, but ſtill with a few Men: They march'd towards York, and paſſed in a peaceable manner, to ſhew that lawful Kings came to relieve, not oppreſs their Subjects. But ſhortly after their Hopes began to grow cool, when they ſaw not any come into them in their Solitary March; eſpecially ſince they had moſt reaſon to expect many to join with them in that Country which was ſo much inclin'd to the Houſe of York and King Richard. But Viſcount Lovel having found no Safety there, the Year before, they might believe they were not now likely to ſucceed better. Some were of Opinion, that the Alienation of theſe People proceeded from a Diſtaſte they took that two foreign Nations, the Dutch and Iriſh, ſhould pretend to preſent them with a King made by them: And tho' Henry the Fourth, Edward the Fourth, and the preſent King Henry had in like manner been preſented by Strangers, yet the caſe was different. The Firſt and the Laſt were call'd in by a Part of the Kingdom, to free them from the two Richards, the Second and the Third; the one by divers Reaſons more hated than the other; and Edward the Fourth came of himſelf, building upon the Love of the People. Neither had Henry the Seventh given any Occaſion of hatred, ſo as to cauſe him to be expell'd; rather the Opinion of his Worth, and his marrying with the Houſe of York, had eſtabliſh'd him. Moreover the Proceſſion was made to St. Paul's, wherein the true Plantagenet was expos'd to view, and had caus'd the People not to regard the Impeſtor.

The Earl of Lincoln being reduc'd to this Neceſſity, reſolv'd to hazard all upon the Iſſue of a Battel; and march'd towards Newark, with a Deſign firſt to make himſelf Maſter of that Place. In the mean time King Henry being arriv'd at Nottingham, a Council of War was held, in which it was debated whether it was better to protract time, or give Battel. The King was for the latter, being encourag'd by the Arrival of Six Thouſand fighting Men, moſt of them Volunteers, under the Command of the Earl of Shrewsbury and the Lord Strange. And that the Enemy might not take the Advantage of Newark, the King encamp'd himſelf between them and the Town. Lincoln ſeeing himſelf cloſely perſu'd, retir'd to a Village call'd Stroke, planting himſelf upon the Side of a Hill, from whence he deſcended as ſoon as the King preſented him Battel; which was valiantly fought on both Sides, but for the Manner and Particulars, we have but an imperfect Account tranſmitted to us. It is related that of the King's three Battalions only the Vant-guard fought, and the other two mo'vd not at all; which ſeems the more ſtrange, becauſe one half of the Vant-guard was cut in Pieces, and that the King ſhould purchaſe the Victory at ſo dear a Rate. All the chief of the Enemy were Slain, as Lincoln, Kildare, Lovel, Broughton, and Colonel Swart; great Slaughter was made of unarm'd Iriſhmen who mov'd not from the Poſture they had plac'd themſelves in the beginning of the Battel. The Conflict laſted three Hours, in which dy'd four Thouſand of the Enemy, and one half of the King's Vant-guard, but not one of Quality on the Kings Side. The King was troubled at the Death of the Earl of Lincoln, becauſe he was depriv'd of the Means of learning from him what Correſpondence the Dutcheſs Margaret had in England. Many Priſoners were taken, among whom was Lambert himſelf, otherwiſe call'd Edward the Sixth, and Simon his Tutor and Seducer. The King out of Generoſity would not take Lambert's Life, looking upon him as an Image moulded by the Hands of others; and likewiſe out of Wiſdom, thinking that if he ſuffer'd Death, he would be too ſoon forgotten; but being kept alive, he would be a continual Spectacle, and a kind of Remedy againſt the like Inchantments of the People for the future. His Puniſhment was the Kitchin, where he was put to the vileſt Imployments; his Scepter and Crown were turn'd to Spits and Fire-Forks: He continu'd in the Office of a Scullion, 'till by unknown Means he was preferr'd to be one of the Kings Falconers, in which Condition he dy'd, not giving any further Occaſion of Story. As to Simon, being a Prieſt, he was committed to a cloſe Priſon, and hear'd of no more.

He is made the King's Scullion.

After the Battel of Stoke, the King remov'd not from the Camp 'till he had given humble Thanks to God for the Victory; which he likewiſe did three Days ſucceſſively at Lincoln, with Proceſſions and other religious Ceremonies; and he ſent his Standard to our Lady's Church at Walſingham, whither it had been devoted. He caus'd ſome of the Priſoners to be put to Death; but ſince it would have been thought too great a Cruelty to puniſh ſo many for one Crime, he was willing to commute the Blood of their Veins for that of their Purſes, impoſing pecuniary Puniſhments upon many in Yorkſhire and other Parts, with which both he and they were ſatisfy'd. After that he went to Newcaſtle; from whence he ſent Ambaſſadors to James the Third King of Scotland, to treat and conclude a Peace with him; but that King, labouring under many Inconvenicies from diſcontented Subjects, he only obtain'd a Truce for ſeven Years; but with a Secret Promiſe of renewing it during both the Kings Lives. This Point being gain'd, King Henry return'd to London, where he enter'd in State, and in a triumphant Manner: And now being taught by the laſt Events, that his his Hatred to the Houſe of York had been the Cauſe of his former Troubles, he prepared for the Coronation of his Queen; which was perform'd with great Solemnity on the tweenty fifth Day of November, in the Third Year of his Reign, and two Years after his Marriage with her. Which ſtrange and unuſual Diſtance of Time, made it ſubject to every Perſon's Obſervation, that it was an Act againſt his Inclination, and forc'd upon him by Neceſſity and Reaſon of State. Soon after, to ſhew that all Suſpicions were over, and that the Impriſonment of the Marqueſs Dorſet, was more from the Danger of the Times than the Man, he ſet him at Liberty without Examination, or any other degrading Circumſtance. About the ſame time he diſpatch'd an Ambaſſador to Pope Innocent the Eighth, to inform him of his Marriage and Succeſs, to thank him for former Kindneſſes, and to offer himſelf and his Kingdom to be at his Service upon all neceſſary Occaſions. For which his Holineſs, by way of Correſpondency, gratify'd him, by moderating the Abuſes of Sanctuaries, and other privileg'd Places; and by ſending him a Bull, which prov'd a Check to Rebels and Traitors. In the ſame Year dy'd Thomas Bourchier Arch-biſhop of Canterbury; and the famous John Morton, Biſhop of Ely, ſucceeded in his Place, who was afterwards created Cardinal, and Lord-Chancellor of England.

III. Hitherto King Henry had been employ'd in ſetling his Affairs at home; but about this Time there broke out an Occaſion that caus'd him to look abroad, and harken to Foreign Affairs. Charles the Eighth, King of France, having by the Management and good Fortune of his two immediate Predeceſſors, receiv'd that Kingdom in a more flouriſhing and encreaſing Condition than it had been for many Years before, and recover'd the Provinces of Anjou, Normandy, Provence, and Burgundy; he now caſt his ambitious Eyes upon the Dukedom of Bretaign, reſolving to annex and unite that to the Monarchy of France, and ſo to bring it to its ancient Bounds and Limits. Many Circumſtances gave him Encouragement in this Attempt; as the Duke of Bretaign old, and fallen into a Lethargy, ſerv'd by mercinary Counſellers, Father only of two Daughters, the one ſickly and not like to live long; on the other Side, himſelf in the Flower of his Age, his Subjects well train'd for War, and now in Peace with all the neighbouring Princes. He was apprehenſive of no Diſturbance but from the King of England, who had been under great Obligations to the Duke of Bretaign, and whoſe Intereſt it was not to ſuffer Bretaign to be join'd to the Monarchy of France. Therefore he diſpatch'd Ambaſſadors to King Henry, who after ſeveral artificial Compliments repreſented to him, That their Maſter was enforc'd to enter into a juſt and neceſſary War with the Duke of Bretaign, who had receiv'd thoſe who were Traitors and declar'd Enemies to his Perſon and State; and ſuch as were of that Quality, as it was apparent they went not thither to protect their own Eſtates, but to invade his; among whom was the Duke of Orleans, the firſt Prince of the Blood, and the ſecond Perſon of France. Therefore the War was defenſive on his Side; that he perſu'd Rebels in a Prince's Country, who owing Homage to him ought not to receive them, and much leſs to join with them in the Conſpiracy. Then they proceeded to inſinuate, That if the Duke of Bretaign had formerly ſhown him Favour, he had deſtroy'd the Merit of it, ſince he fail'd on his part, ſo that he might have been utterly ruin'd and deliver'd up to King Richard: That their Maſter did not pretend to remind him of the Aſſiſtance and Favours receiv'd from him, which proceeded from meer Affection, and contrary to what Policy ſhould have perſuaded; ſince it had been more advantagious for him, that a Tyrant like Richard, ſhould have reign'd in England, than ſo virtuous a King as himſelf: That if he would rightly weigh both their Services, he would find that his proceeded from true Friendſhip, and the Duke's from Self-Intereſt: That he did not deſire a Requital of Aſſiſtance, knowing he was but newly poſſeſs'd of a Kingdom he had purchas'd with great Expence and Trouble;

An Embaſſy to King Henry.

ble; but only that he would ſtand Neuter: That he would not by aiding the Duke, hinder the juſt Progreſs of his Arms, in puniſhing of Rebels, and correcting him who contrary to all Law had receiv'd them. But touching the Myſtery of reuniting Bretaign to the Crown of France, either by War or Marriage with the Duke's Daughter, the Ambaſſadors carefully declin'd all Mention of it as what made moſt againſt them; but on the contrary declar'd the aſſur'd Purpoſe of their Maſter to marry, with the Daughter of Maximilian King of the Romans; and entertain'd the King with ſome wandering Diſcourſes of their King's Deſign to recover the Kingdom of Naples, by an Expedition in Perſon: All to remove the King from all Jealouſie of any Deſign upon Bretaign, otherwiſe than for ſuppreſſing ſome rebellious Subjects.

Which diſpleaſes King Henry.

King Henry was very uneaſie at this Embaſſie, and after Advice taken with his Council, he anſwer'd to this Effect, That the King of France and the Duke of Bretaign, were the two Perſons to whom he own'd the higheſt Obligations; therefore he ſhould think himſelf very unhappy, if the Conteſt ſhould ariſe to that Height as to hinder him from acquitting himſelf in Gratitude towards both; and that there was no Means for him, as a Chriſtian King and a common Friend, to ſatisfie all Obligations both to God and Man, but to offer himſelf for a Mediator of Peace between them: By which Courſe he doubted not but their King's Honour and Eſtate would be preſerv'd with more Safety and leſs Envy than by a War; and that he would ſpare no Coſt or Labour to effect it, tho' it were that of a Pilgrimage. Then letting them know that he would expreſs himſelf more fully by an Embaſſie, which he would ſpeedily diſpatch to the French King for that Purpoſe, he diſmis'd them with that Anſwer; carefully avoiding to underſtand any Thing touching the re-annexing of Bretaign, as the Ambaſſadors had avoided to mention it. He was ſenſible of the French King's Deſigns, and was reſolv'd to prevent it, even by Force of Arms, if Neceſſity ſo requir'd. But he fully believ'd that Fortune would not prove ſo favourable to Charles, but that he might have Time to negotiate this Affair, grounding his Confidence upon the great Oppoſitions he had; on the one Side Maximilian's Arrival, on the other the Forces of Bretaign, and the Orleanſts in the Bowels of his Kingdom ready to raiſe a Civil War; together with the Inconſtancy of his Youth, ſufficient to make him change his Mind, and the whole Courſe of his Affairs. Ibid.

He ſends an Embaſſie into France.

Upon theſe probable Suppoſitions he ſent over Chriſtopher Urſenick his Chaplain into France, giving him in Commiſſion, That if the French conſented to treat he ſhould immediately repair to the Duke of Bretaign, and conclude the Treaty on both Sides. Urſenick made Declaration to the French King, much to the Purpoſe of Henry's Anſwer to the French Ambaſſadors; tenderly inſtilling ſome Overture of receiving the Duke of Orleans into Favour, and ſome Conditions of Accommodation. But King Charles on the other Side proceeded with the utmoſt Art and Diſſimulation in the Treaty; deſigning only to gain time, and put off the Engliſh Succours under the Hopes of Peace, 'till he had got good Footing in Bretaign by Force of Arms. His Anſwer therefore to the Ambaſſador was, That he would put himſelf into King Henry's Hands, and make him Arbitrator of the Peace; and readily agreeing that he ſhould go directly into Bretaign, to ſignifie his Conſent, and to know the Duke's Intentions; well foreſeeing that the Duke of Orleans, who rul'd all in Bretaign, taking himſelf to be upon irreconcileable Terms with him, would admit of no Treaty of Peace. By which he ſhould not only veil over his Ambition, and win the Reputation of a juſt and moderate Prince; but alſo endear himſelf in the Affections of the King of England, as one who had committed all to his Will. Theſe Grounds being ſubtilly laid by the French King, all ſucceeded as was expected: For when Urſenick arriv'd at the Court of Bretaign, he found the Duke in no Capacity to treat with him, but all things were directed by the Duke of Orleans; who giving Audience to this Ambaſſador, return'd an Anſwer ſwer full of Reſentments: That the Duke of Bretaign having been an Hoſt, a Parent and a Protector, in time of greateſt Neceſſities, he might juſtly have expected from the renown'd King Henry a number of brave Troops for his Succours, rather than a vain Treaty for Peace. And if the King ſhould forget the Services done by the Duke; yet he well knew he would of his Wiſdom conſider of Futurity, how much it imported his own Safety and Reputation, not to ſuffer Bretaign to be ſwallow'd up by France, and ſo many good Ports and ſtrong Towns upon the Coaſts, to be in the Command of ſo potent a Neighbour, and ſo ancient an Enemy. And therefore he deſir'd the King to think on this Affair as his own; and with that broke off, and deny'd any further Conference for a Treaty.

Bacon. Urſenick firſt return'd to the French King, and related what had paſs'd to him; who finding Matters according to his Deſire, ſpeciouſly made Anſwer, That conſidering in whoſe Poſſeſſion the Duke of Bretaign was, there was no Hopes of Peace, but a mix'd Treaty of Force and Perſuaſion; and therefore he would proceed on the one, deſiring King Henry would not deſiſt from the other: But for his own Part, he faithfully promis'd to be ſtill in the King's Power to govern him in the Matter of Peace. This was accordingly repreſented by Urſenick at his Return, in ſuch a Manner, as if the Treaty was in no Degree deſperate, but rather waited for a more nice and proper Conjuncture. Whereupon there continually paſs'd Packets and Diſpatches between the two Kings concerning this Negotiation; from one out of Deſire, and the other of Diſſimulation. During this Intercourſe, the French King invaded Bretaign with a great Force, and laid cloſe Siege to the City of Nantes; and as one well vers'd in the worſt kind of Policy, the more he urg'd the Proſecution of the War, he at the ſame time did more urge the Solicitation of the Peace. Inſomuch that during the Siege of Nantes, after many Letters and particular Meſſages, the better to maintain his Diſſimulation, and to refreſh the Treaty, he ſent D'Aubigny, a Perſon of Quality to King Henry, earneſtly deſiring him to make an end of the Buſineſs depending. Which caus'd the King to ſend over three Commiſſioners, the Abbot of Abington, Sir Richard Tunſtall, and his Chaplain Urſenick formerly employ'd, to do their utmoſt Endeavours to perfect the Treaty and render it effectual.

The French King invades Bretaign.

Polydore. Hollingſhed, &c. During the Negotiation, the Lord Woodvile, Uncle to the Queen, a gallant Gentleman and ambitious of Honour, deſir'd leave to go and aſſiſt the Duke of Bretaign with a Troop of Volunteers, with whom he would ſteal over privately, ſo that the French King ſhould have no Occaſion to complain of any but himſelf. It is not known whether the King ſecretly conſented to it, but in publick he deny'd his Requeſt, commanding him not to depart from the Court. Notwithſtanding which, he went to the Iſle of Wight, where he was Governour, and there rais'd four hundred fighting Men, with whom he ſail'd into Bretaign; which caus'd ſuch an Alteration among ſome of the Courtiers of France; that the Engliſh Commiſſioners would have been roughly treated, had not King Charles, conſcious of his own Diſſimulation, and not fearing four hundred Men, prevented all ill Uſage to them and their Followers. The Comiſſioners now diſcovering that King's Deſign, returned into England, and acquainted King Henry, that all his Deſire of Peace was but counterfeit, the better to gain Time, and to make him loſe the Opportunity of hindering his Attempts upon Bretaign. Upon this King Henry call'd a Parliament; in which Supplies being granted, he rais'd Monies and muſter'd Soldiers; and to keep a Decency towards the French King, to whom he acknowledg'd himſelf oblig'd, he ſent a new Embaſſie to him to intimate the Decrees and Reſolutions of his Parliaments, and to reiterate his Motion, That the French would deſiſt from Hoſtilities; or if War muſt enſue, to take it as the Acts of his People, who being ſenſible of the Cauſe of the Bretaigns as their ancient Friends and Confederates, had ſent them Succours; further proteſting, that to preſerve all Treaties

The Lord Woodvile's Expedition into Bretaign.

King Henry ſends an Embaſſie into France,

Treaties and Laws of Friendſhip, he had limited his Force to proceed only in Aid of the Bretaigns, and not to War upon the French, otherwiſe than to maintain the Poſſeſſion of Bretaign. But before this formal Embaſſie could arrive, the Duke's Party had receiv'd a terrible Blow near the Town of St. Albine, where the Duke of Orleans and the Prince of Orange were taken Priſoners, ſix thouſand of the ſame Side ſlain, with the Lord Woodvile and almoſt all his Soldiers: The French loſt twelve hundred Men with their Leader James Galeot, a great Commander. King Henry underſtanding this Defeat, ſent over eight thouſand fighting Men into Bretaign, under the Conduct of the Lord Brook, who joining themſelves with the Duke's Forces, march'd towards the Enemy the French, who knowing they lov'd not to encamp themſelves, but to come to Battel, thought to cool their Ardor by entrenching their Army, and ſallying out with their Light-Horſe; which they did, but with more Loſs than Advantage, eſpecially from the Engliſh Archers. But during theſe Tranſactions, the Duke of Bretaign left the World; upon whoſe Death, the Principal Perſons of that Country, partly being bought, and partly through Faction, threw all Things into Confuſion; ſo that the Engliſh not finding Head nor Body with whom to join their Forces, and being juſtly jealous of their Friends, as well as in Danger from Enemies, and the Seaſon advancing, they return'd home five Months after their Landing. So that the Battel of St. Albine, the Death of the Duke, and the Retreat of the Engliſh Succours, were follow'd a ſhort time after by the Loſs of that Dukedom; which ſome accounted as a Blemiſh of King Henry's Judgment, but moſt as no more than a Misfortune of his Time. but to no Effect.

Tho' the temporary Fruit of the Parliament, in their Aſſiſtance given to Bretaign, did not proſper; yet the laſting Fruit of it, which was wiſe and good Laws, proſper'd for many Years, and moſt of them to this Day; particularly one that made it Capital for any Perſon to marry an Heireſs by Force. But in the raiſing the Subſides granted for the Expedition into Bretaign, great Diſturbances aroſe in Yorkſhire and the Biſhoprick of Durham; which two Counties poſſitively deny'd the Payment of any Tax. They alledg'd that they had ſuffer'd great Grievancies the laſt Years paſt, and were not able to bear any more; which Refuſal proceeded from the old Affection they bore to the Houſe of York, which with every Motion aroſe and floated with all other Conſiderations. The Commiſſioners for the aſſeſſing and collecting this Tax, wanting Means to enforce them, knew not how to proceed; for each of theſe two Counties had agreed in a direct Negative to the Act of Parliament. They went therefore to the King's Friend the Earl of Northumberland to conſult with him, who wrote to the King upon that Subject; and receiv'd Anſwer, That the Subſides being given by Parliament, and pay'd by all the reſt of the Kingdom, he was reſolv'd not to recede from one Peny of his Right. The Earl calling together the principal Gentlemen and Free-holders of the County, in an imperious Manner acquainted them with the King's Anſwer; which many believing to have been invented by his own Head, the meaner Sort of the People broke into his Houſe, and murder'd him, together with many of his Servants. And not reſting here, they choſe Sir John Eyremond for their Head, a factious Perſon, who hated King Henry; and being alſo animated by a baſe Perſon, nam'd John a Chamber, an Incendiary much eſteem'd by the Vulgar, they broke out into open Rebellion, and in the plaineſt Terms declar'd, They would go againſt King Henry, and fight with him for the Maintenance of their Liberties. Upon which the King commanded Thomas Earl of Surrey, whom he had lately releas'd out of the Tower, to march and reduce them; which he ſoon did by defeating them, and taking Chamber Priſoner. Eyremond fled into Flanders to the Dutcheſs of Burgundy; Chamber was hang'd upon a high Gallows at York, and ſome others of the principal of them were hang'd a little lower round about him.

Polydor. Rosm. Biondi. About the ſame Time that the King loſt ſo good a Servant, as the Earl of Northumberland, he likewiſe loſt a faithful Friend and Allie in James the Third King of Scotland; who was brought to a miſerable Period rather by evil Counſel, than evil Nature. He had naturally good Inclinations; but they were all poiſon'd by the Practice of a ſort of People, that has been ever ominous and contagious to all Princes: His Thirſt after abſolute Soveraignty was inſatiable; and he eſteem'd not his legal Authority, but ſought for what was not permitted by the Conſtitutions of his Kingdom; ſo that his Ruin aroſe from his hating the Liberty of ſuch as give him good Counſel; and loving Flattery in thoſe who adviſ'd him Ill. The Diſcontent and Hatred of many of his Nobility and People, breaking forth by Degrees into ſeditious Alterations at Court, this unfortunate Prince was at laſt deteſted by them; ſo that taking up Arms, and ſurpriſing the Perſon of Prince James his Son, partly by Force and partly by Threats, they compell'd him to head their Party. Whereupon King James made Application to the two Kings of England and France, and likewiſe to Pope Innocent the Eight; who highly reſented this Treatment, and might have ſuccour'd him in good Time, if he had had Patience to expect them in the Caſtle of Edingburgh, a Place ſufficently ſafe. But he judging Strivelin to be a more convenient Place to receive thoſe whom he expected from the Northern Parts of his Kingdom, was in marching thither at Bannock's Bourn engag'd and defeated: Whereupon retiring to a Water-Mill, in hopes of ſaving himſelf in certain Veſſels not far off, he was there miſerably ſlain; and James the Fourth his Son, by way of Pennance girt himſelf with a Chain of Iron, to which he added one Link every Year after as long as he liv'd. The Pope had diſpatch'd away Adrian de Corneto, upon this Occaſion for Scotland, a Man of noble Qualifications, who came to London two Days before the News of this unfortunate Accident. Deſigning to return, he was honourably entertain'd, and became in great Favour with King Henry, and no leſs Familiarity and Friendſhip with Morton the Chancellor. Inſomuch that the King, finding him agreable to his Inclinations, preferr'd him to the Biſhoprick of Hereford, and afterwards to Bath and Wells, and employ'd him in many of his Affairs of State, that had Relation to the Court of Rome. He was a Man of great Learning, Wiſdom and Dexterity in Buſineſs of State; and having not long after aſcended to the Degree of Cardinal, he greatfully paid the King, in his diligent and judicious Advertiſements of the Occurrances of Italy.

Troubles in Scotland.

James the Third ſlain.

Bacon. Biondi. In the latter End of the Fourth Year of this Reign the King again call'd a Parliament, more for the making of good Laws, than for the raiſing of any Subſides. This Prince was always a celebrated Law-giver; and among many good Laws in this Parliament, one was made to prevent Depopulations by Incloſures, with ſo much Care and Policy, that the military Power was thereby advanc'd, the middle Sort encourag'd, and the exorbitant Power of the Nobility in courſe diminiſh'd. Nor did the King in this Parliament throw off his Cares and Hopes concerning Bretaign, but thought to recover all by Policy, tho' his Arms had been unfortunate, and to deprive the French King of the Fruit of his Victory. The Sum of his Deſign was to encourage Maximilian King of the Romans to proceed in his Suit for the Marriage of Anne the Heireſs of Bretaign, and to aſſiſt him in the Conſummation of it. But Maximilian was then reduc'd to great Straits by a Rebellion of his Subjects in Flanders, who made him Priſoner in the Town of Bruges, and oblig'd him to ſwear to ſeveral unreaſonable Things. And tho' this Indignity was reſented by his Father the Emperor, yet it was never effectually reveng'd; but the Inhabitants were ſo exaſperated that the Lord Ravenſtien took Occaſion to join with the Lord Cordes Governour of Picardy, and to ſeize upon Ipres and Sluce, while the other beſieg'd the Town of Dixmude. King Henry not willing to break with France, nor yet to let Flanders be loſt, ſent over the Lord Morley with a thouſand Men to the Lord D'Aubigny, Governour of Calais, with ſecret Inſtructions to aſſiſt Maximilian, and to raiſe the Siege of Dixmude. This was ſo well obey'd, that to thoſe thouſand another thouſand being added, which he drew from the Garriſons of Guiſnes and Hammes, he paſs'd over the Water of Graveling by Night, and got into Newport; where augmenting his Forces by ſix hundred Germans, and led on by a truſty Guide into Dixmude, while the Enemy had no Suſpicion of it, he ſet upon them unawares, and was victorious, with the Slaughter of eight thouſand Men, and the gaining of all their Artillery and Baggage. The Engliſh only loſt about a hundred Men, and the Lord Morley himſelf; and the Lord D' Aubigny return'd to Calais, leaving his wounded Men with ſome Volunteers at Newport. The Lord Cordes being at Ipres with twenty thouſand Men, thinking to recover the Diſgrace at Dixmude, immediately inveſted Newport; and making a furious Attack upon it, he ſucceeded ſo far as to take the principal Fort or Tower, and to ſet up the French Standard upon it. Yet they were ſoon after beaten from it by the Engliſh and the Help of ſome freſh Succours of Archers, by good Fortune arriving at that Inſtant in the Haven of Newport: Which ſo diſcourag'd the Lord Cordes, that he immediately broke up the Siege and retir'd. By this Means Affairs became more exaſperated between the two Kings of England and France; and the more by the vain Words of the Lord Cordes, who declar'd himſelf an open Enemy to the Engliſh, beyond what belong'd to the preſent Service, making it a common Saying of his, That he could be content to lye ſeven Years in Hell, ſo he might win Calais from the Engliſh.

King Henry ſends Succours into Flanders, to the King of the Romans.

Their Succeſs.

A. D. 1490. Reg. 5. King Henry not ſatisfy'd in aſſiſting Maximilian with his Arms, endeavour'd to do the like by his Counſel; perſuading him to reſume the Marriage with the Heireſs of Bretaign. Which Maximilian accordingly perform'd, and ſo far prevail'd with the young Lady, and the principal Perſons about her, as the Marriage was conſummated by Proxy, with a Ceremony unknown in theſe Parts. For ſhe was not only publickly contracted, but ſtated as a Bride, and ſolemnly bedded; and whilſt ſhe lay in Bed, Maximilian's Ambaſſador came in, and in the Preſence of ſeveral of the Nobility, put his naked Leg between the Eſpouſal Sheets; that the Ceremony might be thought to amount to a Conſummation, and actual Knowledge. After which the publick Proclamations were made in the Names of 'Maximilian and Anne by the 'Grace of God, King and Queen of the Romans, Duke and Dutcheſs of 'Bretaign, &c. But Maximilian thinking himſelf ſecure, very imprudently neglected the Proſecution of this Affair, and proceeded to other Matters leſs material. In the mean Time, the French King, after a Conſultation with his Divines, proceeded more effectually, and by ſecret Inſtruments and ſubtle Agents of both Sexes about the young Lady, firſt ſought to remove the Point of Religion and Honour out of the Mind of the Lady her ſelf, in which there was a double Labour. For Maximilian was not only contracted to the Lady, but Maximilian's Daughter was likewiſe contracted to the French King. For the Contract with the French King, it was readily alledg'd that Maximilian's Daughter being under Years of Conſent, it was not obligatory, but diſſolvible at Pleaſure. But for the other Contract, the French King's Friends could only alledge, That it being done without the Conſent of her Soveraign Lord King Charles, whoſe Ward and Client ſhe was, it was ſufficient to vacate any Contract whatſoever, tho' it could not vacate a Marriage after Cohabitation and actual Conſummation. As for the Ceremonial Conſummation, they made Sport with it, and declar'd, That it was an Argument that Maximilian was a Widower and a cold Lover, who could content himſelf to be a Bridegroom by Deputy, puty, and would not take a ſmall Journey to put all out of Queſtion. So that the young Lady, wrought upon by theſe Reaſons, finely inſtill'd by the French King's Agents; and allur'd likewiſe by the Youth and Grandeur of the Monarch; and fearing to make her Country the Seat of a ruinous War, at length ſhe ſecretly yielded to accept of the French King for her Husband.

The French King breaks the Contract.

Ibid. But during this ſecret Treaty with the Lady, the better to ſecure it from Oppoſition and Interruption, King Charles had recourſe to his uſual Arts, and ſent a ſolemn Embaſſie to King Henry, to treat of a Peace and a League with him; joining it with an Article in the Nature of a Requeſt, That the French King, according to his Right of Soveraignty and Tutelage, might with the King of England's Leave diſpoſe of the Marriage of the young Dutcheſs of Bretaign, as he ſhould think good; offering by a Judicial Proceſs to make void the Marriage of Maximilian by Proxy. This was the Deſign and Subſtance of the Embaſſie, which was deliver'd in a long formal Oration, fill'd with Compliments and Artifice, and with amuſing Declarations of the French King's Deſigns of recovering the Kingdom of Naples, and conquering the Ottoman Empire. And the better to effect this Matter, the French King continu'd in his Court and Cuſtody the Daughter of Maximilian, who had formerly been ſent to him, to be bred and educated in France; and ſtill caus'd it to be reported, that he deſign'd to proceed in that Match. As for the Dutcheſs of Bretaign, he deſir'd only to preſerve the Right of Soveraignty, and give her in Marriage to ſome Allie, as might depend upon him. King Henry was much diſpleas'd at the Embaſſie, well perceiving the ambitious Deſigns of the French King, and that Bretaign would now be loſt. Therefore he reſolv'd to make uſe of that as a juſt Pretence for War, but at the ſame time not to diſcourage the other's Deſigns upon the Kingdom of Naples. His Anſwer deliver'd to the Ambaſſadors was full of Caution and Regard to the preſent Circumſtances; yet he directly renew'd his Claim to the Dominions of France, or at leaſt to ſuch a Tribute as might be proportionable to what he ought to hold in Poſſeſſion. The Ambaſſadors were ſurpriz'd at this Demand, and in ſome Heat declar'd, That their Maſter's Sword would be ſufficient to maintain his Scepter, and after ſome other Diſcourſes, they were all diſmis'd but one, and a new Embaſſie diſpatch'd from King Henry into France. All this prov'd of no Effect; for not long after, the King of France, breaking through all Difficulties, publickly marry'd Anne Dutcheſs of Bretaign, and took the Dukedom into his own Hands; having lately ſent home the Daughter of Maximilian. About the ſame Time was born the King's ſecond Son Henry, who afterwards reign'd by the Name of Henry the Eighth.

King Henry VIII born.

Bacon. Maximilian now perceiving that he was doubly defeated at one Blow, both as to the Marriage of his Daughter and his own, he loſt all Patience, and caſting off the Reſpect due to Princes, he fell to violent Invectives againſt the Perſon and Actions of the French King: Declaring him To be the moſt perfidious Perſon in the World, who had made a Marriage compounded between an Advoutry and a Rape; permitted by the juſt Judgment of Heaven, that the Nullity being apparent to the World, the Progeny of a Man ſo unworthy might not reign in France. And immediately he ſent Ambaſſadors both to King Henry and to Ferdinand King of Spain, to excite them to War, and to enter into a League offenſive againſt France, promiſing to concur with great Forces of his own. Upon which King Henry call'd a Parliament, and propos'd the War to the Nobility and Gentry, rouſing them by the Fame of the glorious Victories at Creſſy, Poictiers and Agencourt, and incouraging them to grant ſuitable Supplies for ſo great an Occaſion. This had its Effects, and the War with France was with much Chearfulneſs approv'd of in Parliament; which judg'd that the Honour of the King and Kingdom had ſuffer'd by the Loſs of Bretaign. But the King's Intentions were very different from what they appear'd: He knew that he could not rely upon the Forces of Maximilian, who was ſo weak of himhimſelf; nor upon thoſe of Ferdinand, who had exhauſted his Powers by the Wars of Granada. He alſo knew that France was now entire, and at Unity within it ſelf, and never ſo powerful for many Years before; and that it was now come to a Cuſtom of Encamping cautiouſly, and not to fight but with apparent Advantage, which would weary his People, weaken his Forces, and impoveriſh his Kingdom. Finding therefore theſe Inconveniencies and Difficulties, he projected for the gaining of two Points: The one how to make the War turn to his Profit, and the other how to recede from it with the Security of his Honour. For Profit it was to be made two Ways, upon his Subjects for the War, and upon his Enemies for a Peace: For the Point of Honour, he knew that as he could not truſt to the Aſſiſtance of Ferdinand and Maximilian; ſo the Impotence of one, and the double Proceedings of the other, would give him a fair Occaſion to accept of a Peace. Theſe Things he wiſely foreſaw, and did as artificially manage; by which every thing ſucceeded according to Expectation.

A Benevolence granted. The Parliament readily conſented that Commiſſioners ſhould go forth, for the gathering and levying a Benevolence from the more able Sort; which Tax, call'd Benevolence, was invented by Edward the Fourth, for which he ſuſtain'd much Envy, and was aboliſh'd in Parliament by Richard the Third to engratiate himſelf with the People. It was now reviv'd by this King, with the Conſent of Parliament, which was otherwiſe in King Edward's Time, and rais'd exceeding great Sums; inſomuch that the City of London contributed more than nine thouſand Pounds. In this Parliament Liberty was given for all Men to ſell or mortgage their Lands without Fines for Alienation, to furniſh themſelves with Mony for the War; which prov'd a great Step to the Diminution of the Eſtates and the exorbitant Power of the Nobility.

King Henry having got great Sums by the Means of Benevolences, in a ſhort Time rais'd a powerful Army; and knowing that King Charles had renew'd his ancient Confederacy with James the Fourth King of Scotland, he proclaim'd War againſt them both; but not without Suſpicion that Maximilian would fail him at his greateſt Need. For tho' his Wants and Weakneſſes were capable of Remedy, if he were ſuccour'd againſt his Subjects that moleſted him, yet his Nature was incapable of it. It was impoſſible for him to maintain ten thouſand Men for two Years, according to his Promiſe; tho' being inrag'd at his double Affront, he hop'd to raiſe ſomething out of nothing. But what ſtill weaken'd this Prince was the Rebellion of the Lord Raveſtein, who being ſupported by the French King, had poſſeſs'd himſelf of Gaunt and Bruges, the chief Cities of that Country; and then made himſelf Maſter of Sluce, and the two Caſtles that were its Security, ſeiz'd upon the Ships, and hinder'd the Commerce of the whole Country. The Duke of Saxony, Lieutenant to Maximilian ſoon found Means to inveſt Bruges and Sluce, but could not take the latter without Forces by Sea; wherefore he ſent News of his Wants to England.

The King of the Romans in Diſtreſs.

Succours ſent him by King Henry. King Henry being deſirous to ſupport Maximilian, ſent twelve Ships well furniſh'd with Men and Ammunition under the Command of Sir Edward Poynings; who having block'd up the Haven of Sluce, beſieg'd the Town by Sea, while the Duke did the like by Land, and play'd with his Cannon upon the two Caſtles in which the Preſervation of the Town conſiſted. They were valiantly defended for twenty Days, in which Space the Earl of Oxford's Brother was ſlain; and might have held out longer, had not the Beſiegers in the Night burnt the Bridge built between the two Caſtles, which forc'd them to ſurrender, together with the Town of Sluce. Bruges ſoon follow'd, which gave Occaſion for many others to do the like.

Polyd. Virg. Blondi. In the mean time King Henry paſt the Summer in ordering his Soldiers for his Expediton into France; and finding himſelf in a Readineſs, he ſent Sir John Riſley and Urſenick to Maximilian, to agree upon the Place for Meeting: But finding him utterly unprovided, they ſent ſecret Advice to the King, and waited for his further Commands. The King, who ſuſpected the ſame, prais'd their their Diſcretion, and commanded them to tarry 'till new Directions were ſent them, and to conceal that Prince's Weakneſs, that his Men might not be diſcourag'd. His Army was compos'd of twenty five thouſand Foot, and ſixteen hundred Horſe; the chief Nobility flocking to it, ſome to purchaſe Merit, and others to avoid Diſgrace in not following their King. He landed at Calais on the ſixth Day of October, which caus'd many to admire that he ſhould undertake ſo great a War at ſo late a Seaſon. But theſe Difficulties ſerv'd him to make his People believe what he never deſign'd; declaring That ſince he intended a reſolute War, 'till he had conquer'd France, the Seaſon was of no Importence, having Calais at his Command, from whence he might eaſily draw out his Army, in the Spring. As ſoon as he was landed, the Engliſh Ambaſſadors from Flanders certify'd him that there were no hopes of Aſſiſtance from Maximilian, who was altogether unprovided of Men and Mony. This was made known, and ſpread through the Army; and tho' the Engliſh were no ways diſcourag'd, yet it was a kind of Preparative to a Peace. To work the ſame Effect, there came Letters from the Lord Cordes, with an Overture for Peace in behalf of the French King; which contain'd ſuch Conditions, as it would have been unreaſonable not to have harken'd to it. From other Parts it was confirm'd that King Ferdinand had agreed with him, having receiv'd from him the County of Rouſſillon, without repaying the Mony for which it was mortgag'd to him: This made all Men ſee a Neceſſity of Peace. King Henry notwithſtanding, playing the Game with Art, deputed the Biſhop of Exeter and the Lord D' Aubigny to meet the Lord Cordes; while he, without Delay, on the nineteenth Day of October, went and inveſted the Town of Boloign, a Place well fortify'd and garriſon'd, and not to be taken without much Time and Blood.

Ibid. Boloign was beſieg'd near a Month without any memorable Action; and when all Things were ready for a general Aſſault, News was brought that a Peace was concluded, to the great Surprize of moſt of the Army, who had great Hopes of extraordinary Advantages. In effect it was rather a Bargain than a Treaty, in which King Henry was to receive from the French King ſeven hundred forty five thouſand Crowns at preſent, for the Charge of this Expedition; and twenty five thouſand Crowns yearly, for his Charges ſuſtain'd in the aſſiſting Bretaign. This Annuity was left ſomewhat indefinitely, when it ſhould determine or expire; which caus'd the Engliſh to eſteem it as a real Tribute, carry'd under fair Terms: For in Reality it was paid both to the King, and to his Son Henry the Eighth, longer than it could continue upon any Computation of Charges. The French King alſo aſſign'd great Penſions and rich Gifts for the preſent to all King Henry's principal Counſellors and Miniſters: Which whether the King permitted, to ſave his own Purſe from Rewards, or to communicate to them the Envy of this Treaty, was diverſly interpreted. For unqueſtionably the King had no Inclination to own this Peace; and therefore not long before the Concluſion, he ſecretly prevail'd with ſome of his chief Officers to adviſe him to a Peace under their Hands, in the Nature of a Petition. This Peace was pleaſing to both the Kings; but gave great Diſcontent to ſome of the Nobility, and principal Perſons of the Army, who had either ſold or engag'd their Eſtates, upon the Hopes of the War. They took the liberty to ſay, That the King valu'd not the plundering his Nobility and People, to feather himſelf: And ſome made Sport with what the King had ſaid in his Parliament, That when the War was once begun, he would make it pay it ſelf; declaring, The King hath literally kept his Promiſe. Having riſen from Boloign, at Calais he wrote to the Mayor and Aldermen of London, applauding the great Sums he had obtain'd; well knowing that the full Coffers of the King was always good News to the City. Upon the ſeventeenth Day of December, he arriv'd at Weſtminſter, where he kept his Chriſtmaſs.

In the ſame Year, the Kingdom of Granada in Spain, after a War of eight Years ſucceſſively, was entirely conquer'd by the Reduction of the Capital City; Bobadi- Boabdila the laſt of the Mooriſh Kings, having ſuſtain'd a Siege of eight Months, ſurrender'd it to Ferdinand and Iſabella; which gave an Occaſion of ſolemn Rejoycings in the City of London, and Cathedral of St. Paul's. Now as if every Thing had contributed to fill the Houſe of Spain with Honour and Riches, that they might transfer it to the Houſe of Auſtria, it happen'd almoſt at the ſame Time that Chriſtopher Columbus a Genoeſe diſcover'd the new World of America; which prov'd vaſtly advantagious to the Spaniſh Monarchy, and from its Riches obtain'd the Name of the Weſt-Indies.

A. D. 1492. Reg. 7/8.

IV. King Henry, having concluded all his Affairs with France, at the ſame time begun to be haunted with new Spectres rais'd by the Faſcinations of the Dutcheſs Margaret, who could never be at reſt 'till ſhe had produc'd a new Duke of York to embroil the Affairs of this King. This prov'd a more exquiſite Counterfeit than Lambert Symnel, more finely done, and own'd by greater Hands, the King of France and Scotland, as well as the Dutcheſs her ſelf. As for Lambert, his greateſt Excellency was his beautiful Preſence, and that he did not miſ-become his Robes; but this Youth exceeded all former Actors, and became one of the ſtrangeſt Examples of Perſonation, that ever was known in elder or later Times. The Dutcheſs Margaret had entertain'd an irreconcilable Hatred againſt Henry and the Houſe of Lancaſter, inſomuch that ſhe valu'd no Fraud nor Injuſtice, ſo ſhe might oppreſs it, tho' her own Neece was ſo nearly concern'd in the Happineſs of it. For which Reaſon ſhe had formerly favour'd Lambert, whom Simon had ſet up; but failing in that Deſign plotted by a Prieſt, ſhe reſvol'd to contrive one her ſelf, and to make ſo hard and intricate a Knot, as neither Henry's Wiſdom, nor Sword, ſhould be able to untie, or cut in ſunder. The Perſon ſhe deſign'd for this new Duke of York was a Youth of mean Extract, whoſe Father was a Jew, turn'd Chriſtian, nam'd John Osbeck dwelling at Tourney; 'till being neceſſitated by ſome Occaſions, he went with his Wife to London, where ſhe bore him this Son. There King Edward did the Child the Honour to be his God-Father, which caus'd many to believe he had ſome ſecret Intereſt in him; and ſome were of Opinion that he had really begotten him. He was nam'd Peter, which according to the Cuſtom of the Dutch Tongue, was converted to Perkin; and thoſe who did not firſt know him gave him the Sirname of Warbeck, ſo that that Name which aroſe firſt from Ignorance, was afterwards by Cuſtom continu'd to him. His Father returning to Flanders, afterwards ſent him to Antwerp, and from thence to other Parts of the World; ſo that at length his Travels and Converſation with divers Nations, did not only make him ſkilful in many Languages, but alſo adapted him to all Mens Humours and Cuſtoms.

His Birth and Education.

This Youth was accidentally preſented to the Dutcheſs, as moſt proper for her Deſigns, which gave her great Satisfaction; having all requiſite Qualifications, as Years, Beauty, Wit, Comlineſs, and Majeſty. She took an Affection to him for being God-Son to her Brother; and the more becauſe of his Beauty ſhe might judge him to be his natural Son: An Opinion which made her form and transform him with the greater Care and Diligence. She conſider'd of all that was to be inſtill'd into his Mind, or affix'd in his Actions: She omitted nothing that might make him exactly perſonate the deceas'd Duke of York; and decipher'd to him, as in ſo many Pictures, the Lineaments, Reſemblances and Behaviour of thoſe of the Blood Royal, as of the King, Queen, Prince and Princeſs; of the firſt he was to ſpeak as of his Father and Mother, of the reſt as his Brothers and Siſters. She bethought her ſelf what Queſtions might be ask'd him, and prepar'd him with ſuch Anſwers as might become his Years: She did the like concerning ſuch paſt Occurrences as might have fallen within his Knowledge, and forgot not the Particulars of the Sanctuary; how the Queen with the Duke of York fled thither; how he was taken from thence; how he was ſent with his Brother to the Tower; the manner of their living there; the Ser-Servants that attended them; their terrible Apprehenſions, and the Providential Manner of his Eſcape. She chiefly taught him how to counterfeit innate Nobility, in which he was ſo docible, that he thought himſelf the very Duke of York whom he perſonated; and ſhe ſo adapted the Places of his Peregrination to the Times, that when he ſhould diſcourſe of what had there hapned to him, he might readily be credited. And finding him of a miraculous Capacity, and a Penetration beyond his Years, ſhe took a particular Delight to inſtruct him, and was tranſported with the Image of her own forming. She continually kept him in her moſt private Receſſes, not truſting him to the Air, for the chief Part of this Myſtery was, to make the World believe ſhe had never ſeen him. When afterwards ſhe perceiv'd that King Henry ſo proceeded in the Affairs of Bretaign, as he muſt of Neceſſity break with France, ſhe thought it beſt to keep him no longer, but firſt to ſend him into Portugal, under the Conduct of an Engliſh Lady, where he continu'd almoſt a Year; all which was done, that when he was to appear in publick, it might be from a third Place. In Portugal he had Directions ſent him to paſs into Ireland; for Henry having declar'd War againſt France, it was judg'd a proper Time to moleſt him, and to begin this grand Metamorphoſis.

Ibid. According to Order, he went into Ireland, and made his Abode in Cork; where at his firſt Appearance, he was eſteem'd a Perſon of great Conſequence: For his graceful Demeanor, and his Plenty of Mony and other Things, were ſufficient to make the People miſtake one Thing for another. Having for a while kept them in Suſpence, by a ſort of Force, he acknowleg'd himſelf to be the Duke of York, who having eſcap'd out of the Tower, and paſs'd through various Fortunes, was come to that Kingdom, in Hopes that the Affection it had ever born to his Houſe, would now continue firm to him. King Henry at that Time was not paſs'd into France, but was making Preparations for that Expedition; ſo that the French King hearing of this Apparition in Ireland, thought it might make for his Advantage to have him with him; either to moleſt King Henry, if he continu'd in Hoſtility, or to make his Peace upon eaſier Terms. Accordingly he ſent one Stephen Frion, a Secretary which had revolted from King Henry together with another, as Ambaſſadors to Perkin, inviting him to come into France, and offering to aſſiſt him in the Regaining of England. An Invtation that blew up the extravagant Vanity of this Impoſtor for being choſen by the Dutcheſs of Burgundy, receiv'd by the Kingdom of Ireland, and incourag'd by ſo great a Monarch, he concluded that Fortune never undertook ſo vaſt a Buſineſs without finiſhing it. When he had acquainted his chief Friends in Ireland with this Invitation, and by that gain'd new Credit and Reputation, he went to France, where he was receiv'd by the King with all Honour due to the Duke of York: He call'd him by that Title; and accordingly furniſh'd him with Mony, Horſe and Servants, and with a Guard of Soldiers under the Command of the Lord Congreſhal: Sir George Nevil and Sir John Taylor, with above a hundred other Engliſh Men, waited continually upon him; and the Court to follow the Prince's Example, ſhew'd him the like Reſpect. All this was done out of Policy; for the French King muſt needs have more than a bare Gueſs that this Buſineſs was an Impoſture. His Glory was not long liv'd here, for the Difference being ended between the two Kings, it was neceſſary for him to remove. King Henry demanded to have him deliver'd into his Hands; but the other eſteeming it an unworthy Action, refus'd to do it; only he oblig'd him to depart his Kingdom. Perkin retir'd into Flanders, where the Dutcheſs and he acted their Parts with the utmoſt Exactneſs: He ſeem'd as if he had never been in that Country; and ſhe, as if ſhe had never ſeen him before: He pretended to fly thither as to a Sanctuary under the Protection of an Aunt, who ought to profeſs her ſelf his Mother: She feign'd great Fears of being deceiv'd, as being taught Caution by Lambert's Example; and that this might be a Counterfeit as well as he. She oftentimes ſent for him, pretending to make an exact Scrutiny; at firſt ſeeming very doubtful, afterwards not clearly ſatisfy'd, and then more inclining to believe well. At laſt ſhe broke out into an Admiration, and Thankſgiving to the Divine Providence, that had Commiſeration for innocent Blood, and had vouchſaf'd ſo miraculouſly to preſerve him. Then with extraordinary Paſſion ſhe call'd him Nephew, the Bud of the white Roſe, the Hope of the Houſe of York, and the Reſtorer of the Honour of England; and aſſign'd him a Guard of thirty Halberdiers. Now every one began to think him really him whom he perſonated; inſomuch that if he were reſpected in France as a foreign Prince, he was little leſs than worſhip'd in Flanders, by all that affected the Dutcheſs.

A. D. 1493. Reg. 8/9.

This News being brought into England, it was there greedily ſwallow'd by many: Paſſions and Fancies augmented this Belief in ſuch as were of that Faction, in thoſe who deſir'd Novelties, in ſuch as were diſcontented, and in many that were Lovers of Equity: For the Crown had neither belong'd to Henry nor his Wife, if her Brother had been alive. Hereupon aroſe Whiſperings, Liberty of Diſcourſe and Complaints: The preſent ill Government was in every Man's Mouth; the endleſs Impoſitions, the King's inſatiable Avarice, which was the Cauſe of a diſhonourable Peace, and the no leſs diſhonourable Loſs of Bretaign. The Nobility were diſoblig'd and diſguſted at the ſmall Account the King made of them; ſo that moſt Mens Imaginations met in the ſame Point, That God being a juſt Judge, had preſerv'd the true Heir ſo ſeat him again in his Throne, which had been twice uſurp'd from him. For Henry had no Right to it himſelf, and wav'd the Right of his Wife, that he might reign alone; therefore it was not to be admir'd, if after ſo much Injuſtice, God had rais'd up his Brother-in-Law to puniſh him. Nor did the Matter end only in Diſcourſe; for there were ſome Perſons of great Quality, who were reſolv'd to ſound the Bottom of it; among whom were the Lord Chamberlain Sir William Stanley, Brother to King Henry's Father-in-law, the Lord Fitzwater, Sir Simon Montfort, and Sir Thomas Thwaite. Theſe made choice of ſome Perſons of Note to ſend into Flanders, that upon their Relation, they might ground their Reſolutions; but of many, only two wou'd undertake a Buſineſs, which if fictious, might turn to their Ruin. Sir Robert Clifford and William Barley were the Two, both of good Families; who upon their Arrival at Flanders, were receiv'd with great Honour by the Dutcheſs: And having long diſcours'd with Clifford, that ſhe might underſtand the Intentions of thoſe that ſent them, ſhe brought him to a Sight of Perkin. After many Days Converſation with him, Clifford wrote back into England, That he was the real Duke of York, and that he knew his Perſon as well as he knew his own.

Various Cenſures in England.

Several of the Nobility ſend to inquire after Perkin.

The politick King on his Part was not aſleep; yet he thought if he begun to arm and levy Forces he ſhould immediately give too much Honour to the Idol. Neverthleſs he ſhut up the Ports, that no ſuſpected Perſons might paſs; and for the reſt he choſe to work by Countermine. He had two diſtinct Deſigns; the one to lay open the Abuſe, and the other to break the Knot of the Conſpirators. To detect the Abuſe, he had only two Ways; the firſt to ſatisfie the World that the Duke of York was really murder'd; and the other to prove, that whether he was dead or alive, Perkin was an Impoſtor. For the firſt he ſecur'd Sir James Tyrel, and his Servant John Dighton, the only two that remain'd alive of the four who were concern'd in the Murder; for Miles Foreſt, the ſecond who ſlew the Princes, and the Prieſt who bury'd them, were dead. They depos'd, That Tyrel ſaw them dead after they were ſmother'd; that he caus'd them to be bury'd underneath the Stairs, and cover'd them with a Stone; from whence, by King Richard's Order they were afterwards remov'd, and rebury'd by the Miniſters of the Tower, but in what Place they knew not. But the King not ſatisfy'd with theſe Teſtimonies, to divert the Danger, and ſatisfie the World, he proceeded to ſearch into Perkin's Condition and Deſcent. He employ'd certain ſelect Friends, and diſpers'd them throughout all Flanders: Thoſe

King Henry's politick Management.

Thoſe who were not to ſtay in any ſetled Place, were order'd diligently to enquire after his Birth, and to give him daily Advice of what they ſhould learn: The other, who were to reſide where he was, were to counterfeit themſelves Fugitives and Well-Wiſhers to his Party, and to profeſs that they were come to run the like Fortune with him. Theſe were more particularly to ſearch out the Deſigns and Correſpondencies; they were to grow familiar with Perkin's beſt Friends, and to inſinuate to them the Vanity of the Undertaking, in going to cope with a wiſe King, not to be beaten without extraordinary Forces; that the Dutcheſs's Favours were not anſwerable to their Occaſions; that they wanted Aid, and were not certain of what they preſum'd to be ſecure, which was the Aſſiſtance of the Party, and the Peoples Inclinations, both which were ineffectual. For ſuch accurate diligent Proviſion was made, that all Men would forbear to declare themſelves, unleſs they might be encourag'd by the Sight of a powerful Army, which the Duke of York could not ſhew them, tho' all Flanders were to declare for him. But their chief Care was to ſound Clifford by taſting him with fair Promiſes; for to win him over, was almoſt to gain the Cauſe, he being the Cabinet of ſecret Correſpondencies between Flanders and England. Nor did they find much Difficulty in effecting it; for being brought to the Knowledge of the Impoſtor, he was at length prevail'd upon with the Promiſes both of Pardon and Reward.

Ibid. In the mean Time, Henry, by a particular Caſt of Policy, caus'd all his Agents in Flanders to be excommunicated in St. Paul's, and declar'd his Enemies, that they might not be ſuſpected his Friends; nor did he forbear, contrary to the Rules of the Church, to ſollicit the Confeſſors of the greateſt Men, that he might learn how they were inclin'd. At length his Agents came to the perfect Knowledge of Perkin's Birth, Name, Sirname, Country, Employments, and Voyages, 'till he was chang'd into the Duke of York: They likewiſe won over Clifford, who gave them ſuch Proofs of his Repentance, as ſatisfy'd the King. Perkin's Genealogy was publiſh'd in the Court, and throughout the Kingdom; and Henry not thinking it fit that a Mechanick and Impoſtor ſhould with ſuch Oſtentation be protected in Flanders, he ſent Ambaſſadors to the Arch-Duke Philip, then a Child; deſiring, that after the Example of the King of France, the Impoſtor might be chac'd out of Flanders. The Anſwer given by the Miniſter of State was, That the Dutcheſs was abſolute in her own Territories, and they could not hinder her from acting as ſhe thought fit. King Henry was not ſatisfy'd with this Anſwer, as knowing her Power to be leſs than was repreſented: And having learn'd that ſhe had a mighty Intereſt in the Arch-Duke's Council, and finding that Perkin would ſtill be protected in Oppoſition to him, he immediately recall'd the Engliſh Merchants from Flanders, and baniſh'd the Flemiſh Merchants out of England, and remov'd the Staple of Cloath and Wooll from Antwerp to Calais, to the great Detriment of the Inhabitants of Flanders. Moreover upon Advertiſements from Clifford, the King impriſon'd the Lord Fitz-Water, Sir Simon Montfort, Sir Thomas Thwaites, William D'Aubigny, Robert Ratcliff, Thomas Creſſenor, Thomas Atwood, William Worſeley, Dean of Paul's, and certain Friars. Theſe were all arraign'd and convicted of High-Treaſon; for which Montfort, Ratcliff and D'Aubigny were beheaded; the Lord Fitz-Water being ſent Priſoner to Calais, by his endeavouring to eſcape, loſt both his Hopes and Life: The reſt were pardon'd; and the Lord-Chamberlain that Time was out of Policy left unmoleſted.

He diſcovers Perkin's Pedigree.

Several executed.

The King had created his ſecond Son Henry Duke of York in Weſtminſter, where, as it is uſual in ſuch Solemnities, divers Knights of the Bath were made. But hearing that Clifford was arriv'd in England, he withdrew himſelf to the Tower, there to examine him; that if he ſhould accuſe any of extraordinary Quality they might be impriſon'd without Noiſe or Obſtruction. Clifford being admitted into his Preſence, and having receiv'd Pardon upon his Knees, was commanded to declare what he knew of the Conſpiracy. He immediately accus'd the Lord-Chamberlain, Sir William Stanley; at whoſe Name all preſent were ſtartled, it being highly improbable that a Man of his Quality and Riches, a Favourite ſo near the King, and the chief Inſtrument in his gaining the Crown, ſhould be a Traitor. Whereupon being advis'd to reconſider what he ſaid, he without Heſitation or Change of Countenance, accus'd him as before; for which Reaſon Stanley was confin'd to his Chamber, and the next Day examin'd by the Council. He deny'd ſome few Circumſtances, but confeſs'd the main Crime; relying upon his former Actions and Merits, for which he erroniouſly preſum'd the King would pardon him. Tho' he had put the Crown upon his Head, yet his Endeavours to take it away, had wholly cancell'd that Obligation. However King Henry was very doubtful whether he ſhould take his Life or not: The Love and Reverence which he bore to his Father-in-law, pleaded for Clemency; but Example and the Condition of the Times urg'd for Severity. But if it be true what ſome Authors write, his Riches bore down the Balance; he being eſteem'd one of the moſt mony'd Men in England; for in his Caſtle of Holt were found forty thouſand Marks in ready Mony, beſides Jewels and Goods; and in Revenues in Land and Fee he had three thouſand Pounds a Year of old Rents, a conſiderable Eſtate in thoſe Days. However after ſix Weeks Diſtance of Time, which the King did honourably interpoſe, both to give Space to his Brother's Interceſſion, and to ſhew to the World that what he did was with Conflict and Reluctancy, he was arraign'd of High-Treaſon, condemn'd, and ſoon after beheaded. This was a remarkable Inſtance of the Fall of a mighty Favourite, which afforded Occaſion for Diverſity of Diſcourſes, and for ſome to treat King Henry's Memory with great Severity. We at this time are ignorant of the main Circumſtances of his Caſe, and the true Motives for the King's Proceedings; but what ſeems moſt probable is, that he thought his Merits beyond Reward, and therefore aſpir'd to a Greatneſs more than a Soveraign could bear. He was ſucceeded in his Place by Giles Lord Dawbeny, a Man of great Sufficiency and Valour, and the more becauſe he was gentle and moderate.

He is beheaded.

A. D. 1495. Reg. 10/11.

The Death of the Lord-Chamberlain threw the whole Court under Apprehenſions; one Man durſt not truſt another, and every one fear'd leſt his Friends might prove like Clifford. Yet ſuch was the Spirit of Detraction, that they made uſe of Pen and Paper to expreſs what they durſt not do with their Mouths: Swarms of Libels, thoſe Inſtruments of Sedition, were diſpers'd againſt the Council and the King himſelf; for which five mean Perſons were apprehended, and put to Death. Perkin's Party daily decreas'd; no Man durſt think any more of him, and but a very few tarry'd with him in Flanders; among whom Barley, Clifford's Companion, was principal, who notwithſtanding afterwards chang'd his Opinion, and together with his Pardon obtain'd Leave to return home. And now the King finding Ireland to be the Place of greateſt Danger, it was neceſſary for him to eſtabliſh an undoubted Authority in that Kingdom. He made Choice of two to ſerve him in two ſeveral Offices; the Prior of Langton with Title of Commiſſioner, to inſpect the civil Government of the Kingdom; and Sir Edward Poynings, who was to have Charge of the Militia, giving him many Soldiers, and a large Commiſſion, to which the Deputy the Earl of Kildare was ſubordinate. The Prior met with no Difficulty; the Laws being his Arms, and the peaceful People the Matter of his Juriſdiction; but Poynings, who was to deal with ſtubborn Men and Rebels, had not the like Fortune. For Ireland being full of Woods, Bogs and deſart Places, he ſpent much Time there to ſmall Purpoſe; killing and taking ſome few Priſoners, which made not much for the main Enterprize. So that being diſpleas'd with thoſe, who having no Intention to withſtand him, had no cauſe to fear him, he proceeded to accuſe the Earl of Kildare, as if he had ſecretly aſſiſted them. He therefore ſent him Priſoner into England, without any Proof againſt him beſides his own Suſpicion; and the Earl ſo fully juſtify'd himſelf, that he was declar'd declar'd Innocent, and re-eſtabliſh'd in his former Government. But if Poynings had no Succeſs with thoſe who withſtood him, yet he had ſuch good Fortune with the reſt, as to prevail with them in Parliament to allow of all Ordinances made in England 'till that Day, which formerly had no Force in that Kingdom. This memorable Act is call'd Poyning's Law, being made in the tenth Year of this Reign, and obſerv'd to this Day. Ireland eſtabliſh'd.

Holling. Bacon. &c. The ill Succeſs of the Conſpiracy did not ſo quell the Reſolutions of Perkin, but that he thought the Affections of his Party rather oppreſs'd than expir'd; and that a new Spirit would ſo revive them, that Henry ſhould find it difficult to ſuppreſs them. Thus flattering himſelf, he aſſembled certain Troops of Men of deſperate Fortunes, who for Debts or Miſdemeanors durſt not appear otherwiſe; and embarking them, he came to Anchor before Sandwich, landing ſome of his Men to learn News, and to diſcover how the People were in thoſe Parts affected, reporting that he had great Forces coming in a Fleet after him. The King at this time was gone his Progreſs, and was now with his Mother in her Houſe at Latham, whom he went to viſit; that by his repairing thither, the World might know that the Death of Sir William Stanley had not really Diſguſted his Father-in-law. Here he heard of Perkin's Arrival; by which he receiv'd the Advantage of the great Opinion of his People, who eſteem'd him a wiſe Prince, judging nothing had happen'd to him which he did not foreſee; and that his retiring into the Northern Parts was one of his Politick Fetches; for knowing he had left the South free from Danger, he deſign'd to allure Perkin to land, that he might be ſure not to eſcape. But however it was, at the firſt News he reſolv'd to return, and was not well pleas'd at the ſecond, which inform'd him that he was gone again; well perceiving that this Trouble might be of long Continuance. The Cauſe of Perkins's Departure aroſe from the Care of the Kentiſhmen, who had well obſerv'd the Condition of thoſe who had landed, and that there were but few Engiſh among them, and thoſe of no Worth or Conſideration; wherefore they adviſ'd with the chief of the County concerning their taking Arms; which being determin'd, they ſhew'd part of their Men upon the Sea-Shore, to invite him on land; and diſperſ'd the reſt, as if they were ready to run away. But Perkin ſoon perceiving their Deſign, would not ſtir out of his Ship; but ſuffer'd ſeveral of his Men to be cut in Pieces on the Shore, and a hundred and fifty to be taken Priſoners. All which were hang'd upon the Sea-Coaſts of Kent, Norfolk and Suſſex, for Sea-Marks or Light-Houſes, to teach Perkin's People to avoid the Coaſt. Shortly after the King returning to London, honour'd the Serjeant's Feaſt with the Preſence of himſelf and Queen; being a Prince ever ready to countenance the Profeſſors of the Law, after that declaring, That as he govern'd his Subjects by his Laws, ſo he govern'd his Laws by his Lawyers. In the ſame Year dy'd Cecily Nevil, Dutcheſs of York, Mother to King Edward the Fourth, in extream old Age; a Woman who had liv'd to ſee a numerous but a wretched Progeny, involv'd in Miſery and Blood; and to ſee three Princes of her Body crown'd, and four murder'd, beſides the many Executions of thoſe of her own Family, and the Infamy of being declar'd an Adultreſs by her own Son Richard: Afflictions that could ſcarcely happen to a Perſon leſs than her ſelf.

The Death of the old Dutcheſs of York.

Bacon. In the ſame Year, and eleventh of this Reign the King call'd a Parliament, where many Laws were made; the principal of which was the famous Statute of Submiſſion, which has been ſo much canvaſs'd of late Years. The Lord Bacon's Account of it is in theſe Words: It was a Law of a ſtrange Nature; rather Juſt than Legal, and more magnanimous than provident. This Law did Ordain, that no Perſon that did aſſiſt in Arms, or otherwiſe the King for the Time Being, ſhould after be impeach'd therefore, or attain'd, either by the Courſe of Law, or by Act of Parliament. But, if any ſuch Attainder did happen to be made, it ſhould be void and of none Effect; for that it was agreable to Reaſon of State, that the Subject ſhould not enquire of the Juſtneſs of the King's Title or Quarrel; and it was agreable to a good Conſcience, that, whatſoever the Fortune of the War were, the Subject ſhould not ſuffer for his Obedience. The Spirit of this Law was wonderful Pious and Noble; being like in Matter of War, unto the Spirit of David in Matter of Plague, who ſaid If I have ſinned, ſtrike me; but what have theſe Sheep done? Neither wanted this Law Parts of prudent and deep Foreſight: For, it did the better take away Occaſion, for the People to buſie themſelves, and pry into the King's Title; for that howſoever it fell, their Safety was already provided for. Beſides, it could not but greatly draw to him the Love and Hearts of the People, becauſe he ſeem'd more careful for them, than for himſelf. But yet it took off from his Party that great Tie and Spur of Neceſſity, to fight and go Victors out of the Field; conſidering their Fortunes were protected, whether they ſtood or run away.

In the mean Time Perkin being retir'd to Flanders to the Dutcheſs Margaret, it was judg'd neceſſary both by her and him, that he ſhould remove from thence, and proceed in the Work they had ſo unfortunately begun. This Reſolution was befriended by the Diſtaſte which Maimilian took at Henry, for taking the Commerce of England from their States; and by the like Diſguſt taken by the Frenck King, for his having lately enter'd into a League againſt him, as to his Affairs in Italy. Perkin therefore went firſt into Ireland; but Poyning's Care having prevented his Chief Expectations, he retir'd into Scotland, grounding his Hopes upon the natural Enmity between the two Kingdoms, and upon the Recommendation of King Charles and Maximilian. He had ſolemn Audience given him by James King of Scotland, in the Preſence of his chief Nobility; where his Majeſtick Looks, augmented by a moſt happy Demeanor, captivated the Minds and Opinions of all that heard him. With a graceful Aſſurance he told the King, That he was the unfortunate Richard Plantagenet, Son to King Edward the Fourth, who drawn by fraudulent Promiſes from the Boſom of his Mother, was brought to the Tower of London, there to be murder'd with his Brother Edward; but pity ariſing in the Breaſt of thoſe who executed that cruel Office, they were contented with the Death of the eldeſt Brother, and ſav'd him, giving him Life, Liberty, and Means to eſcape. Then he proceeded to recount the various Changes of Fortune that had attended his Fate; and to inſiſt upon the generous Incouragements he had receiv'd from foreign Princes, who were inſpir'd with a Spirit of Greatneſs and Piety; and likewiſe to enlarge upon the innumerable Acts of Injuſtice and Treachery contriv'd againſt him by Henry Tudor, the preſent Uſurper of the Engliſh Throne; whoſe various Methods to aſperſe him, and his inceſſant Labours to deſtroy him, were alone ſufficient to prove he was no Impoſtor. Therefore he had recourſe to the Arms of Scotland, whoſe King was of that Generoſity and Bravery, as not to refuſe the Supplications of a diſtreſſed Prince flying to him; eſpecially when he was ſure to meet with a Recompence anſwerable to the Greatneſs of the Favour. In ſumm, Perkin's Expreſſions, the Compaſſion of his Caſe, the Recommendation of ſo many Princes, and their ſecret Promiſes, or perhaps the Occaſion to begin a War with King Henry, mov'd King James to promiſe him his Aſſiſtance; which he readily effected, tho' many, who knew the Impoſture, diſſuaded him from it. And moreover he did not only appoint him an Attendance and Entertainment, anſwearable to his pretended Quality; but that it might be believ'd he took him for the real Duke of York, he gave him in Marriage his neareſt Kinſwoman the Lady Catharine Gordon, a young Virgin of admirable Beauty and Virtue.

A. D. 1496. Reg. 11/12.

Such Proviſions being made as the Enterprize requir'd, King James with a conſiderable Army enter'd Northumberland; where Perkin, under the Name of Richard Duke of York, the true and lawful Heir to the Crown of England, publiſh'd and diſpers'd a formal Declaration, the Subſtance of which was this: 'That being by the Grace of God, and Favour of James King of Scotland, enter'd Bacon. &c.

He enters England.

His Declaration.

'ter'd into the Kingdom of England, he declar'd his coming was not to make 'War upon his Subjects, but to free them from the Tyranny with which 'they were oppreſs'd. That tho' it was known the Crown belong'd to the Royal 'Houſe of York, of which there remain'd no other Pretender than himſelf, the 'only ſurviving Son of Edward the Fourth; yet Henry Tudor had uſurp'd the 'Crown from him, and by inhuman Methods deſign'd to deprive him of his 'Life, boaſting that he had eas'd the Nation of a Tyrant, when he had made 'himſelf a greater than the other. That Richard's Tyranny was the more ex-'cuſable, ſince his Nephews being ſuppos'd to be dead, he had ſome Pretence 'to give a Colour to it: The Difference between the two was, That Richard a 'true Plantagenet, had for his Arm the Honour of the Nation, and the Sub-'jects Tranquility; but Henry meanly born, without regard to either, had ſold 'the Kingdom's beſt Friends for ready Mony, made a diſhonourable Peace, and 'not only oppreſs'd the Subject, but unjuſtly put to Death the Lord Chamberlain, 'Stanley, and ſeveral others, who were ready to withſtand his Oppreſſions. Rich-'ard had been mov'd to Tyranny by Ambition, Henry by Avarice; Ambition 'had made uſe of cruel Means, but Avarice, not only of cruel, but bare extor-'ting Methods: His Cruelty appear'd not only from the Deaths of many, but 'by his Impriſonment of the Earl of Warwick, Son to the Duke of Clarence; 'his Baſeneſs and Extortion, by his intolerable Subſides, Taxes, and Impoſiti-'ons, under the Name of Benevolences, and by the Wars and Peace made only 'to heap up Treaſure. And becauſe his Uſurpation of the Crown had made 'him live in perputal Fear, not only of Men, but of Women, he had marry'd 'Ladies of the Royal Blood to Perſons of mean Condition; particularly a 'Siſter of himſelf the Duke of York, and a Siſter of his Couſin the Earl of War-'wick, that he might have leſs Reaſon to fear future Oppoſitions. Now as he 'came to free them from Violence by ſuch Forces as God ſhould give him, ſo 'by his plenary Regal Authority, he did at that preſent Time free them from 'all Grievances, by perpetually aboliſhing all that had hitherto been impos'd 'upon them, contrary to Law and Cuſtom: And that the good Will of his Sub-'jects might not be prejudic'd by the Law, for having illegally obey'd the Uſur-'per, he granted a general Pardon for all their Tranſgreſſions, upon Condition 'they ſubmit themſelves to him, and acknowledge him for their King; the moſt 'forward of whom ſhould enjoy the greateſt Marks of his Regal Favours. Next, 'he would maintain all that his Anceſtors, eſpecially what his Father Edward 'of glorious Memory, had ſworn to; which was the Preſervation of their Privi-'leges and Liberties, the Franchiſes of the Clergy, Nobility and People. Then 'he promis'd a Thouſand Pound in ready Mony, and a hundred Marks a Year of 'Inheritance, to whomſoever ſhould take or kill Henry Tudor. Laſtly he de-'clar'd that the King of the Scots aſſiſting of him was not done out of any Pact or 'Promiſe prejudicial to England, but meerly out of Generoſity and Juſtice; 'and whenever he had put him in Condition to defend himſelf by his Engliſh 'Subjects, he would return to Scotland, only with the Honour of having re-ſtor'd an injur'd Prince. This Declaration prov'd like Seed ſown on the Sands: It has no effect. Wherefore King James after he had long in vain expected ſome Commotion, he betook himſelf to plunder and deſtroy with as little Mercy as the Scots had wont to do in former Times. Having inrich'd his Soldiers he return'd back, hearing that great Forces were marching againſt him, knowing it would be dangerous for him to ſtay while he was incumber'd with the great Booty he took along with him.

Bacon. Biondi. At this time the Merchants were much diſcontented at the Breach of Commerce between England and Flanders; ſo that meeting with a fit Occaſion, they began to treat of it with their ſeveral Princes; ſince the reducing it to the former Condition would make for the Advantage of both Sides, therefore it was deſirable by both. The Arch-Duke was now ſenſible that Perkin was an Impoſtor, and that to favour him any longer would injure his Reputation, as it had had already leſſen'd his Revenues. Therefore being ready to comply, Commiſſioners were appointed on both Sides, who concluded a perfect Treaty both of Amity and Intercourſe, between King Henry and the Arch-Duke; containing Articles both of State, Commerce and Freedom of Fiſhing. To theſe Articles, was added an Inhibition of either Side to entertain the Rebels of either Country; in which Article the Territories of the Dutcheſs Margaret were expreſly nam'd, that Perkin's Adherents might not be ſhelter'd there. After the Intercourſe was thus reſtor'd, the Engliſh Merchants again repaired to their Manſion at Antwerp, where they were receiv'd with Proceſſion and great Joy. Having ſetled this Affair, the King call'd a Parliament, where he much aggravated the Malice and the diſhonourable Treatment of the King of the Scots, who under the Pretence of ſupporting one whom all had diſcarded, had turn'd his Arms upon unarmed and unprovided People, only to pillage and depopulate, contrary to the Laws both of War and Peace: Concluding that he could neither with the Honour, nor the Safety of his People, ſuffer theſe Injuries to paſs unreveng'd. The Parliament well underſtood him, and gave him a Subſidy, limited to the Sum of a hundred and twenty thouſand Pounds, beſides two fifteens. For his Wars were always to him, a Mine of peculiar Ore; Iron at the Top, and Gold and Silver at the Bottom.

A Treaty with Flanders.

A Subſidy granted againſt Scotland.

A. D. 1497. Reg. $\frac{12}{13}$. The King, tho' he avoided to fight with Enemies abroad, yet he was ſtill enforc'd to fight for his Mony with Rebels at home: For as ſoon as the Subſidy began to be levy'd in Cornwall, the Inhabitants exclaim'd againſt it as an unjuſt Exaction: And ſince the Scotch Commotion was ſo far from them, they thought only the neighbouring Counties were oblig'd to Contributions; as if when the Head akes, the Legs and Feet were unconcern'd, and might transfer their Duties to the Arms and Neck, as the neareſt Members. To make good this Inſurrection two numerous Heads appear'd; the one a Black-Smith or Farrier, call'd Michael Joſeph, and the other an Attorney nam'd Thomas Flammock, each of whom had their particular Ends: The Black-Smith was mov'd by Ambition, believing ſuch an Action would add Luſtre to his Memory, and that his clowniſh Loquacity would procure him the firſt Place among the People: The Attorney having gain'd Credit by his Profeſſion, had ſo far won upon their Opinions, as they believ'd the Refuſal of this Subſidy, and their Mutiny to be legal and meritorious. His Opinion was of ſufficient Authority to interpret the Power of the King and Parliament; he had inſtructed them that they were not oblig'd to the Payment of any Subſides for War with Scotland; that the Law had provided for it by Eſcuage and other Means, ſo that this Subſidy was invented to fleece the People. He therefore advis'd them to preſent a Petition to the King, who for the Example of others would certainly puniſh the Inventers of it; and they both offer'd themſelves to lead them on, 'till they ſhould find ſome Perſon of Quality, under whom they might ſerve. But as for Matter of Life, there was no Hazard at all, their Demand being ſo juſt, as it would be approv'd by all the other Counties; and ſince the publick good was conſulted, from which the King's particular Intereſt could not be ſeperated. Being thus incourag'd, they took up Arms; and becauſe they were not all provided with Bows and Arrows, they arm'd themſelves with ſuch Tools as belong'd to their ſeveral Trades. They enter'd by Somerſetſhire, and paſs'd through Devonſhire, without offering any Manner of Outrage; but coming to Taunton, they ſlew one of the Commiſſioners for the Subſidy, who had ſhew'd himſelf more active than the reſt. At Wells they met the Lord Audley, who hurry'd on by a fatal Diſcontent, ſubmitted to their General. They reſolv'd to march into Kent, out of an Opinion which Flammock had inſtill'd into 'em, That Kent had never been Conquer'd, but were the freeſt Part of England, and moſt likely to join with them. But upon their Arrival finding all Things to the contrary, ſome were amaz'd, and others enrag'd. The former wiſely drawing their Neck out of the Yoke, return'd home; the reſt paſſing forwards, thought thought that ſince they had met with no Oppoſition in ſo long a March, the King and the City would ſuffer them to make their own Conditions: And with this fooliſh Imagination they encamp'd themſelves within ſight of London, between Greenwich and Eltham.

They march into Kent.

The King was much concern'd at the firſt News of this Inſurrection, fearing leſt he ſhould have three Miſchiefs to encounter at once; the People of Cornwal, Perkin's ſecret Intelligence, and the War with Scotland. He took to his Arms as ſoon as the Parliament was ended, deſigning to march towards Scotland; but being diverted by the other Occaſion, he ſuſpended that Reſolution. And becauſe he had ſent the Lord Dawbeny with ſome Forces to the Borders of Scotland, he order'd him to return, to take ſuch Counſel as Neceſſity requir'd, and ſent the Earl of Surry in his Room, with Orders to defend the Country, in caſe the Scots ſhould fall in upon it. He mov'd not againſt the Rebels at the firſt News, according to his uſual Cuſtom; for the Country, not being endamag'd by them, did not require it; and he was confident that wanting Mony and Ammunition, they would disband of themſelves, as they had already begun to do, when they fail'd in their Hopes of the Kentiſh Men. But when he ſaw them encamp'd near London, he reſolv'd to attack them; and to free himſelf from all Hazards of Fortune, he divided his Forces, which far exceeded theirs, into three diſtinct Bodies: He aſſign'd the firſt to the Earls of Oxford, Eſſex and Suffolk; the ſecond to the Lord Chamberlain, and commanded the third himſelf. He appointed the firſt to place themſelves behind the Hill where the Rebels where encamp'd, and to ſecure all the Paſſages beſides that towards London, that being inclos'd like wild Beaſts in a Toil, they might not be able to eſcape. He order'd the Lord-Chamberlain to give them Battel in the Front, having aſſign'd him the beſt and moſt experienc'd Soldiers in the Army, as having the greateſt Dependance upon their Valour; and he himſelf ſtay'd with the third Body between London and them, to ſupply them, if it ſhould be needful, and to fight with ſuch as durſt march towards the City. In the mean time the Citizens were in a great Conſternation, which caus'd much Confuſion in the Streets, ſome running to the Walls, others to the River, without Order, or Knowledge what to do: For they could not believe but their coming from Cornwall, the utmoſt Bounds of England, muſt be with Intention to inrich themſelves by the Plunder of that opulent City; and they did not think that their quiet Paſſage through other Counties was to be taken as an Argument that they would do the like upon this Occaſion. But afterwards, underſtanding the good Order the King had taken, how that he had intereſted his own Perſon in the Danger; that the Enemy were to win three Battels, before they could come to the City; and that the Commanders were both faithful and valiant, they ſoon laid by their Fears.

London in a Conſternation.

Ibid. That the Rebels might be more unprovided, the King politickly caus'd it to be reported in the Army, that he would not fight 'till the Monday following: But towards the Saturday Evening, the Lord Dawbeny according to Order ſet upon ſome Troops, which were lodg'd upon the Side of the Hill; and tho' they valiantly reſiſted, yet being but few in Number, they could not make good their Station. They quitting their Poſts, it was eaſie for the King's Forces to mount the Hill, make themſelves Maſters of the Plain, and fall in with their main Body. Tho' they were taken unawares, and their Troops out of Order, they ſo well receiv'd the firſt Attack, as the Lord Dawbeny, fighting at the Head of his Men, and playing the part of a common Soldier, was taken Priſoner; but was ſoon after reſcued: For the Rebels being ill arm'd without Commanders, Artillery or Horſe, they cou'd not ſo far reſiſt, but that in a ſhort Time two thouſand of them were ſlain, and great Numbers taken Priſoners. The Lord Audely the General, and the two Seducers, the Attorney and the Black-Smith, baſely ſuffer'd themſeves to be taken alive. Three hundred of the King's Side were ſlain, and moſt of them by Arrows; for the Corniſh Men us'd very ſtrong Bows,

The Rebels defeated.

Bows, and Arrows of a Yard in Length. The King came to the Place, and made many Knights Bannerets, as he had done before, when he was encamp'd in St. George's Fields; and he gave the Goods of all the Priſoners to ſuch as had taken them. The Lord Audely was ignominiouſly led from Newgate to Tower-Hill, in a Paper Coat torn, and painted with his own Arms revers'd, and there beheaded. The Attorney and Black-Smith were brought to Tiburn, where they were hang'd, drawn and quarter'd; the Black-Smith not ceaſing to ſhew his Vanity and Vain-glory to the very laſt, not doubting But in future Times his Name would be memorable in Hiſtory. The King would not have their Quarters ſent into Cornwall, as it had been appointed; for, hearing they were not totally ſuppreſs'd, he thought it not Wiſdom to exaſperate them any further. All the reſt were pardon'd by Proclamation; ſo that, beſides the Blood ſhed in the Field, the King ſatisfy'd himſelf with the Lives of only three Offenders, for the Expiation of this dangerous Rebellion.

Only three executed.

The King of Scotland hearing of this Rebellion, took Advantage from it, and went to beſiege Norham Caſtle, waſting all the Country in his Paſſage. This Caſtle belong'd to Fox Biſhop of Durham, who foreſeeing it would be inveſted, had doubly furniſh'd it with all ſorts of Ammunition; cauſing the Herds of Cattle, and what elſe might be uſeful to the Enemy, to be withdrawn into the ſtrongeſt Receſſes. The Earl of Surry, who was ready upon all Occaſions in Yorkſhire, haſten'd thither, at the Head of a conſiderable Force. Which when King James underſtood, he withdrew himſelf, and was purſu'd by the Earl; who not able to overtake him, ſat down before Aton Caſtle, one of the ſtrongeſt Places between Edinburgh and Berwick, which he ſoon took. Not meeting with any Oppoſitions he return'd to Yorkſhire; theſe two Actions having produc'd no Matter of Note, but the Preſervation of one Caſtle, and the winning of another; not anſwerable to the Power of the Forces, the Heat of the Conteſt, nor the Greatneſs of the Expectation.

Some Action with Scotland.

About the ſame Time arriv'd Pedro D'Aiala, a celebrated Man, ſent Ambaſſador from Ferdinand and Iſabel, King and Queen of Spain. The outward Pretence of his Embaſſie, was to accommodate the Differences between the two Kings of England and Scotland; but the true Cauſe was to negotiate a Marriage between Catharine, their ſecond Daughter, and the young Prince Arthur. King Henry, who had a great Dexterity in getting ſuddenly into the Boſom of Ambaſſadors, readily embrac'd the outward Offer, being no ways inclinable to the unpofitable War with Scotland; by the Ceſſation of which, two great Advantages would redound to him: The one was the driving Perkin from that Kingdom, where he had his chief Support, and getting him into his own Hands; and the other, a peaceful Reign, freed from the continu'd Moleſtations of Impoſtors. So that agreeing with whatſoever D'Aiala ſhould propoſe, with the Preſervation of his Honour, he allow'd him to go into Scotland; where having projected the Affair, and by the Agreement of the Council perſuaded that King to harken to a Peace, he wrot to King Henry to ſend ſome diſcreet Man, who together with him might end the Buſineſs with the Commiſſioners of Scotland; which Commiſſion was given to Fox Biſhop of Durham, then reſiding at Norham. When they were met together in Jedworth they could not agree, by reaſon of many Difficulties that aroſe: Henry demanded to have Perkin deliver'd up to him; and James could not do it without great Aſperſion to his Honour: For tho' he knew him to be no better than a State-Juggler, yet having call'd him the Duke of York, made War in his Name, and marry'd him to a near Kinſwoman of his own, to deliver him up would injure his own Faith and Reputation. On Henry's Behalf, was likewiſe demanded Satisfaction for the Loſs he had ſuſtain'd, and the Reſtitution of ſuch Booty as had been taken from England; which was impoſſible to be had, it being diſpers'd among the Soldiers: King James had not ſufficient to give Satisfaction to the other; and it was much eaſier for one to ſuffer the Loſs, than for the other to repay it. But all all of them being met together with a Deſire of Peace, it was eaſie to find a Way to Accommodation; wherefore deferring the Treaty to another Seaſon, they agreed upon a Truce, upon Condition that Perkin ſhould be diſmiſs'd from Scotland. This being determin'd, King James call'd Perkin to him, and told him, That according to his Promiſe he had done what lay in his Power to ſerve him; then after as civil a Manner as the Subject would bear, he let him know, That the preſent State of Affairs requir'd him to retire from his Kingdom. Perkin caſting all his bad Succeſs upon the Averſeneſs of Fortune, aſſur'd the King he would never be unmindful of his Favours, and ſo embark'd himſelf, together with his Wife, and ſuch whoſe deſperate Condition had compell'd them to follow him, in three Ships which the King gave him, and ſail'd into Ireland; for he had no Hopes in Flanders, by reaſon of the new Alliance, between King Henry and the Arch-Duke.

A Truce concluded.

Perkin ſent from Scotland.

The Corniſh Men underſtanding that he was come into Ireland, petition'd him to come over to them, profeſſing their Obedience, their Lives and Fortunes, for the advancing his Pretenſions to the Crown. They who were taken Priſoners in the laſt Battel, having ranſom'd themſelves from their Captors at very ſmall Rates, were return'd home; interpreting the King's Clemency only as the Effects of Fear and Impotence. So running into new Imaginations, and believing that the other Counties would follow their Example, they receiv'd Perkin with great Applauſe; who landed there with four little Barks, in the Month of September, with only a hundred and forty Men. Three thouſand of the Corniſh preſented themſelves before him all arm'd in the Town of Bodmin; from whence he iſſu'd out a Declaration under the Name of Richard the Fourth, King of England, making large Promiſes for the Eaſe of the preſent Tyrannical Government. He had three chief Counſellors to attend him, a broken Mercer, a Taylor, and a Scrivener; which three, joining with the reſt, were of Opinion, That the firſt thing to be done, was to gain ſome good Town, which might make for his Safety and Reputation, and might encourage the reſt. They ſate down before Exeter, which being a great and rich City, the Hopes of Booty invited many others to come over to Perkin. They made ſpecious Promiſes to the Citizens; among which, one was That King Richard would make their City a new London, in Recompence of their Fidelity, and for being formoſt in acknowledging him for their King; but wanting Artillery to force them, bare Words were not ſufficient to perſuade them. The Citizens let down Meſſengers over the Walls, and ſent News of the Siege to the Court, deſiring immediate Succours; which being apprehended by Perkin, he us'd all Methods to make himſelf Maſter of the Place before Relief could arrive. He attack'd it by Scaling Ladders, and ſet fire to one of the Gates, endeavouring to enter both Ways; but the Walls being well defended, the Fire extinguiſh'd, and many of the Aſſailants ſlain, the Danger was ſoon over.

Holling. Bacon. Speed.

The King hearing of Perkin's Siege of Exeter, made Sport with it, and ſaid to thoſe about him, That the King of Rake-Hells was landed in the Weſt, and he now hop'd to have the Honour to ſee him, which he never yet could do. He was extreamly pleas'd, for now he ſeem'd to ſee the Bottom of his Peril, and as it were to hold his Enemy empounded within the Engliſh Ocean, it being a perpetual and noble Wiſh of his, That he might look his Dangers in the Face, and meet them in open Field. He ſuddenly diſpatch'd away Forces to relieve Exeter under the Conduct of the Lord Chamberlain, attended by the Lord Brook and Sir Rice ap Thomas; with Directions to declare that he was following in Perſon. But the Lords living in thoſe Parts, knowing that they ſhould do an acceptable Piece of Service, if they came unrequeſted into the Field, aſſembled many Troops: The Earl of Devonſhire, with his Son, and the chief Gentlemen of the County on the one Side; and the Earl of Buckingham on the other; ſo as being join'd together before the Chamberlain arriv'd, they advertis'd the King of what they had done, deſiring to receive his Commands.

Perkin underſtanding theſe Preparations, rais'd his Siege and march'd to Taunton, beginning to have one Eye upon the Crown, and the other upon the Sanctuary; tho' the Corniſh Men much encourag'd him, promiſing not to abandon him, while they had one Drop of Blood in their Bodies. But whether Fear or Wariness had taught him not to truſt ſuch Promiſes, he reſolv'd to retire; having about ſeven thouſand Men with him, and ſeeming however to be courageous: But forſaking all theſe the next Night, he fled with threeſcore and ten Horſe to Bewley, where he took Sanctuary, ſhowing his wonted Compaſſion, Not to be preſent when his Subjects Blood ſhould be ſpilt. The King hearing of his Flight, ſent five hundred Horſe after him, fearing he ſhould eſcape by Sea; but finding he had taken Sanctuary, they us'd no other Violence, but to keep a ſufficient Guard 'till they ſhould receive new Commands. The Troops remaining in Taunton yielded themſelves to the King's Mercy; who pardon'd them all, except a few of their Heads, who were put to Death. The King firſt ſent to St. Michael's Mount, where the Lady Gordon was left by her Huſband Perkin, whom in all Fortunes ſhe entirely lov'd, adding the Virtues of a Wife to thoſe of her Sex; and he ſent with the greater Diligence, as fearing ſhe might be with Child, by which the Buſineſs would not have ended in Perkin's Perſon. Being brought before the King, he receiv'd her not only with Compaſſion, but with Affection; a noble Pity giving more Impreſſion to her excellent Beauty and Demeanour. Wherefore comforting her, he ſent her to his Queen, and aſſign'd her an honourable Penſion, which ſhe enjoy'd during his Life, and many Years after. The Name of the White-roſe, which had been given to her Husband's falſe Title, was continu'd in common Speech to her real Beauty.

He flies and takes Sanctuary.

His Wife is taken.

The King made a ſolemn Entry into Exeter, where having thanked the Citizens for their Loyalty, he took off his Sword he wore, and gave it to the Mayor, with Power to have it always carry'd before him. He ſent expreſs Meſſengers to the Sanctuary to Perkin, with Promiſe of Pardon; who ſeeing himſelf deſtitute of all Hopes of Safety, yielded himſelf into their Hands, and was brought to the Court, but not to the King's Preſence, tho' oftentimes out of Curioſity, he would ſee him out of the Gallery Window. Divers Commiſſioners were nominated to proceed againſt ſuch as had join'd with Perkin, who were puniſh'd with Pecuniary Mulcts, which gave a general Satisfaction to the Nation. The Scorn and Mockery which Perkin receiv'd from the Courtiers, and from ſuch as ran to ſee him, as if he had been a Monſter, would have been a greater Puniſhment to a Man of Honour than a thouſand Deaths. When he came to London, he was led on Horſeback through all the City to the Tower, and from thence brought back to Weſtminſter; ſuffering by the Way all Kinds of opprobrious and injurious Language: For his greater Ignominy, they led another bound near to him, who was Farrier to the King's Stables, and then a chief Counſellor to Perkin, who being taken in the Habit of a Hermit, he was brought to London, and hang'd after he had accompany'd his new Maſter in this Proceſſion. Perkin upon Examination fully declar'd his whole Genealogy; his Father, Mother, Grand-fathers, Uncles, Couſins, their Imployments, and Countries; his Travels and Voyages, together with many other ſuperfluous Things: But concealing, or not committing to Writing, what was moſt eſſential, the ſeveral Practices of the Dutcheſs of Burgundy. He acknowledg'd his going into Portugal, but not that he was ſent by her; and in like manner he laid open his Voyage to Ireland. Whereupon the Confeſſion, being firſt written with his own Hand, and afterwards printed, did not fully ſatisfie the Peoples Curioſity; ſince they found the Name of the chief Actreſs in the Comedy purpoſely conceal'd. But the King would not any further exaſperate her; thinking it ſufficient Puniſhment for her to be ſo variouſly cenſur'd as ſhe was, together with her own Vexation, that her Inventions not ſucceeding ſhould be made evident to the World. Thus this famous Impoſtor fell into King Henry's Hands after he had tormented him by Intervals for about the Space of ſix Years.

He yields to the King.

He is led through London as a Spectacle.

V. King

V. King Henry having now ſurmounted the greateſt Obſtacles in his Reign, there ſoon after occurr'd a trifling and untoward Accident, that in length of Time produc'd great and happy Effects. The Caſtle of Norham is parted from the Borders of Scotland by the River Tweed; ſo that Neighbourhood having caus'd Converſation and Friendſhip between ſome young Men of England and Scotland, the latter us'd often to paſs the River, and come to drink and ſport with thoſe of Norham. The Soldiers of the Garriſon growing jealous of this Cuſtom, did not think their coming proceeded from Friendſhip, but out of a Deſire to know the Strength of the Fortifications; whereupon falling firſt to Words, and then to Blows, the Scotch-men by the Diſadvantage of the Place, and Inequality in Number, were hardly treated, and ſome of them ſlain. King James taking this as a Deſign to injure him, diſpatch'd away an expreſs Herald to complain; and in caſe King Henry would not give Satisfaction, to denounce War. The latter, regarding nothing ſo much as Peace, anſwer'd, That he was ſorry for the Accident, which was wholly unknown to him; that he would enquire after the Aggreſſors, and give them ſuch Puniſhment, as there ſhould be no Occaſion to break the Truce. But as time paſs'd on, and nothing was perform'd, James took it for Diſſimulation, and was more offended than formerly; and certainly great Miſchief might have enſu'd, had not the Biſhop of Durham, who was Lord of Norham, wiſely prevented it. For knowing that the Injury was done by his Men, he wrote in ſo ſubmiſſive a Manner to King James about it, as he reſted ſatisfy'd, and deſir'd the Biſhop to come to him, that they might treat upon the preſent Occaſion, and upon certain other Affairs that concern'd both the Kingdoms. The Biſhop acquainted King Henry with this, and obtain'd leave to go into Scotland; where meeting with King James at Melroſs, he return'd ſuch ſoft and modeſt Anſwers to him as ſoon brought him to a Reconciliation. After this the King more privately convers'd with him, and told him, That his Deſire was to have a firm and ſtrict Amity, and the only way to effect it was by King Henry's giving him for Wife his eldeſt Daughter Margaret; by which the Friendſhip between the two Nations would be perpetual: That this was the Reaſon why he deſir'd him to come into Scotland, hoping that by his Wiſdom he might bring the Affair to a happy Period. The Biſhop modeſtly anſwer'd, That he thought himſelf rather happy than worthy to be an Inſtrument in ſuch a Matter; but would do his beſt Endeavour. Therefore returning to England, he acquainted King Henry with the whole Deſign, which prov'd very acceptable to him. The Matter being long debated in Council, the Match was determin'd, provided a Peace might precede it; all which was effected, and a Peace concluded during the Lives of the two Kings, and for one Year after. But the Celebration of the Marriage was to be deferr'd, becauſe the Lady was not yet ten Years of Age. About the ſame time dy'd Charles the Eighth, King of France, whoſe Obſequies were with great Pomp celebrated in London by King Henry, who could not forget the Favours he had receiv'd from him.

But ſuch diligent Care was taken, that in a ſhort Time he was forc'd to return back, and throw himſelf into the Priory of Bethleem, which had the Privilege of Sanctuary. The Prior being a Man of Note and Eſteem, went to King Henry and begg'd of him the Life of Perkin, leaving him otherwiſe to the King's Diſcretion. Many adviſ'd his Majeſty to take him immediately and put him to Death; but the King, who had ſo great a Spirit as he could not hate any that he deſpis'd, only ſaid, Take out the Knave, and ſet him in the Stocks. And ſo promiſing the Priſoner his Life, he caus'd him to be brought out; and two Days after, upon a Scaffold erected in the Palace Court at Weſtminſter, he was fetter'd and ſet in the Stocks, for the whole Day. And the following Day, the like was done at the Croſs in Cheap-ſide; and in both Places he publickly read his Confeſſion, which he had formerly committed to Writing, that the World might be fully convinc'd of his being an open Impoſtor. He was again put into the Tower, but he could not hold from relapſing into his former Error: For growing intimate with four of his Keepers, who were Servants to Sir John Digby, Lieutenant of the Tower, and making them believe he was the true Duke of York, he ſo far prevail'd with them, as they perſuaded the Earl of Warwick to eſcape away with Perkin; which by their Help was to be effected by murdering the Lieutenant, and taking the Keys of the Tower. But this Conſpiracy was reveal'd in Time, and prevented; and in this again the Belief of the King's nice Wiſdom did raiſe a ſiniſter Opinion, that Perkin was but his Bait to enſnare the unfortunate Earl of Warwick. For the Inſtant while this Conſpiracy was operating, there broke forth another Counterfeit Earl of Warwick, a Cordwainer's Son nam'd Ralph Wilford; a young Man ſet up and inſtructed by an Auſtin Friar, call'd Patrick. But this being miſmanag'd by the over Zeal of the Friar, they were both apprehended; the young Man was executed, and the Friar condemn'd to perpetual Impriſonment. This Accident gave the King occaſion to ſend the true Earl of Warwick out of the World: Whereupon it was thought that Perkin's Flight, and his ſecond Endeavour to do the like, were wrought by his Artifice; he giving Way to the Firſt, that he might put Perkin to Death; and ſtirring the Second, to free himſelf from the Earl and Perkin together. But however it was, Perkin being convicted of this laſt Conſpiracy, and condemn'd to die, was hang'd at Tiburn; where he again openly read his Confeſſion, and affirm'd it upon his Death to be true. Here was the End of one of the longeſt Plays of that Kind that had been remember'd; and might perhaps have had a different Period, if he had not met with a King extraordinary wiſe, valiant and fortunate.

He forms a Conſpiracy.

He is hang'd at Tiburn.

Immediately after, the poor Earl of Warwick was arraign'd before the Earl of Oxford, as High-Steward of England, for conſpiring together with Perkin, againſt the State and Perſon of the King; and being prov'd guilty by his own Confeſſion, was ſhortly after beheaded upon Tower-Hill. This caus'd the King to be ſeverely cenſur'd, as having no Reaſon to condemn him: For having been Priſoner from the ninth Year of his Age 'till the twenty fourth, and always in fear of Death, he was kept in ſo great Ignorance, that he did not know a Duck from a Hen; and therefore ſo little capable of the Fault, that he was not capable of the Contrivance; and his Confeſſion of it was only in Hopes of a Pardon. King Henry endeavour'd to lay the Cauſe of his Death upon the King of Spain, ſhewing his Letters, in which he declar'd, He could not reſolve to marry his Daughter to Prince Arthur, ſince as long as the Earl of Warwick liv'd, he was not certain of the Kingdom's Succeſſion: Which might be a Reaſon of State, but not of Juſtice; inſomuch that God would not give a Bleſſing to that Match, of which the religious Princeſs Catharine was afterwards ſenſible. For Prince Arthur dying in a ſhort Time, and ſhe being divorc'd from King Henry after twenty Years Marriage, ſhe ſaid, It was no wonder if God had made her unfortunate in her Marriages, ſince they were ſeal'd with the Blood of the Earl of Warwick. This Earl was the laſt Heir Male of the Blood and Sirname of Plantagenet; whoſe Race, as it was a long Time glorious for giving renowned Kings to England, ſo in the latter End it became odious to God and Man, for the horrible Fewds, Murthers and Perjuries committed within it ſelf, which finally threw open all thoſe Fences, which the Poſſeſſion of Majeſty and Numeroſity of Iſſue had for ſome Ages caſt about it; letting in thereby the Surname of Tudor, being but two Deſcents Engliſh, and which after three Deſcents, and five Princes, did likewiſe wholly diſappear.

A. D. 1500. Reg. 15/16. The Nation being now freed from all civil Diſturbances, was afflicted by a great Plague, which rag'd ſo terribly in London, and other Parts of the Land, that it caus'd the King to go over to Calais, together with his Queen and Family.

mily. This being known to Arch-Duke Philip, he ſent Ambaſſadors to him to congratulate his Arrival, and to know if he would be pleas'd that he himſelf ſhould come and viſit him; upon Condition he might be receiv'd in ſome open Place; for which ſeveral ſpecious Reaſons were given. The Ambaſſadors were graciouſly receiv'd, the Condition was fairly interpreted, and St. Peter's Church not far from Calais appointed for the Place. As he was coming towards Calais, the King went out to meet him, when he ſuddenly alighted from his Horſe to hold the King's Stirrop, which the King would not permit; but affectionately embracing him, he led him to the Church appointed for the Parly. The Cauſes of the Arch-Duke's coming were two; his own good Nature, becauſe he or his Council had offended him by protecting an Impoſtor, ſo that he would omit nothing that might give the King Satisfaction: The other, was the Advice of his Father, and Father-in-law, who counſell'd him to eſtabliſh a ſtrict Amity with King Henry, for the Benefit of the Netherlands, and his own Safety againſt the Violences of France; but chiefly, becauſe both hating the new King Lewis, they hop'd for many Advantages by his Friendſhip. The Arch-Duke fail'd not to uſe all the Art he could, tho' by Nature he was not addicted to Diſſimulations; terming him His Father, Patron and Protector. The Matters concluded between them were the Confirmation of the former Treaties, and two reciprocal Marriages; the one of the Duke of York, the King's ſecond Son, with the Arch-Duke's Daughter; the other of Charles, the Arch-Duke's eldeſt Son, with Mary the King's ſecond Daughter: But all of them being either Children or Infants, theſe Marriages ſucceeded not, but evaporated through Time and Intereſt. The Arch-Duke was but juſt retir'd, when the King of France ſent the Governor of Picardy, and the Bailiff of Amiens to viſit King Henry, acquainting him with his Victories, together with his gaining

The King returns.

At the ſame Time Jaſper Pons, a learned and well-bred Man, came into England from Pope Alexander the Sixth, upon the Occaſion of the Year of Jubile; for ſince they only receiv'd the Benefit of it who went to Rome, he thought it fit to have it commuted for by remote Countries, where the Inhabitants could not make ſuch long Journeys: Inſomuch as they ſtaying at home, might receive the ſame Indulgences, if they would give a certain Sum of Mony to be employ'd againſt the Turks, whoſe Approaches Hungary, Germany and Italy did much apprehend. This Man ſo wiſely manag'd this Affair, that he obtain'd large Sums of Mony, without any Murmurings, but againſt the King's Perſon; who being too much given to extort from his People, it was thought he would not have permitted ſuch Sums to be rais'd, unleſs he himſelf had been a Sharer. However the Matter was propounded from the Pope in the publick Conſiſtory, in the Preſence of all the Ambaſſadors then reſident at Court, with a Deſign to invade the Turkiſh Dominions in three ſeveral Places; in Thrace, by the Hungarians, Bohemians and Polanders; in Greece, by the French and Spaniards; and at Conſtantinople by the Pope himſelf, accompany'd by the King of England and the State of Venice: And he ſent Nuntio's to all Princes, that they would join their Forces and Monies according to their Abilities, in ſo pious a Work. The Anſwer which the King gave to Pons was, That he was ready to accompany his Holyneſs, but the remote Diſtance of his Country would put him to double the Inconveniences with any others: That the Kings of France and Spain *were firſt to be made Friends, who were fitteſt to accompany him; which if it could not be effected, all other Deſigns would prove vain. claration, as ſuperficial as it was, gave the King that Reputation abroad, that not long after he was elected by the Knights of Rhodes, Protector of their Order; all Things contributing to honour a Prince, who had gain'd ſuch high Eſteem for his mighty Wiſdom and Abilities.

The Concluſion of the fifteenth Century.

This Century concluded with the Deaths of three great Prelates in England; Cardinal John Morton, Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury; Thomas Rotheram, Arch-Biſhop of York; and Thomas Langton, Biſhop of Wincheſter. The firſt was ſucceeded by Henry Dean, Biſhop of Salisbury; the ſecond by Thomas Savage, Biſhop of London; and the third by Richard Fox, Biſhop of Durham; all Men Eminent in their ſeveral Stations.

A. D. 1501. Reg. 16/17.

VI. This ſixteenth Centuary began with the famous Marriage between Prince Arthur and the Infanta Catharine of Spain, who was ſent over with the greateſt Pomp and Attendance; a Marriage that was ſeven Years in compleating, then ſolemniz'd with the utmoſt Splendor and Magnificence, and memorable for the wonderful Conſequence it produc'd many Years after. The Tedioufneſs of the Negotiation proceeded not only from the tender Years of the Perſons to be marry'd, but from the two Kings themſelves, who being both of great Policy and profound Judgment, ſtood long at a Diſtance viewing each others Fortunes and Succeſs; well knowing that the very Name of the Treaty gave a Reputation of a ſtrict Amity between them; which on both Sides ſerv'd to many Purpoſes, that their ſeveral Affairs requir'd, and yet they ſtill continu'd free. The Infanta had for her Portion two hundred thouſand Crowns, a noble Dowry in thoſe Days, without any Covenant of Reſtitution either to her ſelf or Family; and in lieu of that ſhe had ſet out for Jointure the third Part of the Principality of Wales, the Dukedom of Cornwall, and the Earldom of Cheſter; and if ſhe ſhould come to be Queen, ſhe was then to have as much as any other Queen of England ever had. This Lady was now eighteen Years of Age, and Prince Arthur above fifteen; yet notwithſtanding it prov'd a great Queſtion, and a Matter of Controverſie ſeveral Years after, whether ever he had Carnal Knowledge of her. In the Examination of which, a peculiar and material Paſſage was alleg'd, which tho' light, and diſagreeable to the Majeſty of Hiſtory, cannot fairly be omitted: That in the Morning after the Conſummation, Prince Arthur call'd for Drink, and finding the Gentleman who brought it to ſmile at the Paſſage as an unuſual Thing, he told him He had been in the middle of Spain, which was a hot Country, and his Journey had made him thirſty, and if he had been in ſo warm a Clime, he would have been drier than himſelf. However it was, this marry'd Couple liv'd not many Months together; for on the ſecond Day of April Prince Arthur dy'd at Ludlow Caſtle, where he kept his Court as Prince of Wales. There is little remaining of the Character of this Prince, but only that he was very ſtudious and learned, beyond his Years, and beyond the Cuſtom of great Princes. His Death was a great Trouble to the King; the Infanta was left as a Burden to him, and if his Son Prince Henry was to marry another Wife, he was to find out a ſecond Jointure, a Matter repugnant to the publick State, and his frugal Diſpoſition: Whereupon reſolving to marry him to the ſame Catharine, he wrote concerning that Affair both to Spain and Rome. King Ferdinand was ſatisfy'd; but he met with Difficulties in procuring a Diſpenſation from the Pope, and gaining his Son's Conſent, who tho' he was but twelve Years of Age, much oppos'd the Matter, but at length was contracted, and afterwards marry'd to her: And the ſecret Providence of God ordain'd that Marriage to be the Occaſion of mighty Events and Revolutions.

to King Edward the Fourth, and Richard the Third, he thought he might take an uncontroll'd Liberty under any King's Reign. He had kill'd a Man; and in ſuch a Manner, as the Circumſtances much aggravated the Crime. However King Henry granted him his Pardon; but ſo as he was oblig'd to paſs all the Courſe of Law, to appear before the Judges, and receive Sentence of Condemnation. This Manner of Proceeding was ſo ſenſible a Mortification to his high Spirit, that reputing the Favour as a Mark of Ignominy, he ſuddenly left the Nation, and went into Flanders to his Aunt, the Dutcheſs Margaret. At which, tho' the King was offended, yet he was reſolv'd to apply nothing but Lenitives, giving Order to his Agents in thoſe Parts to offer him Pardon and Incouragement, if he would return; knowing that Deſpair in baniſh'd Men begets Thoughts little ſerviceable to themſelves, and very troubleſom to others. It ſucceeded according to his Expectation: For the Dutcheſs, either becauſe ſhe found his Genius inferior to the King's, or being oblig'd by the Concealment of her Name in Perkin's publick Confeſſion, declin'd aſſiſting him; ſo that he return'd home, and was reconcil'd to the King. But arrogant and proud Diſpoſitions, ſuch as this unhappy Earl's, leading Men into Dangers and Difficulties, brought this Perſon at laſt to his Ruin, under King Henry the Eighth.

The fortunate Marriage of James King of Scotland with the Princeſs Margaret, which was treated of ſome Years paſt by the means of Biſhop Fox, was celebrated in the beginning of this Year; which together with the preceding Year, was remarkable for two Marriages, and two Deaths: For the Marriage of Prince Arthur and his Death, the preceding Year; and for the Marriage of the King of Scotland, and the Death of Queen Elizabeth this preſent Year; that noted Queen dy'd in Child-bed in the Tower, and the Child not long after. This Marriage was perform'd by Proxy, and publiſh'd in January at St. Paul's Croſs, when Te Deum was ſolemnly ſung. And certainly the wonderful Joy ſhown by the Citizens was more than could be expected, in a Caſe of ſo great and freſh Enmity between the Nations, eſpecially in London, which was ſufficiently diſtant from feeling any of the former Calamities of the War; therefore ſome have attributed it to a ſecret Inſtinct and Inſpiration, touching the Happineſs to enſue in future Ages. The Marriage in Auguſt following was conſummated at Edingburgh; the King bringing his Daughter as far as Colli-Weſton on the Way, and then conſigning her to the Attendance of the Earl of Northumberland, who with a noble Train of Lords and Ladies, brought her into Scotland to the King her Husband. The Portion given by King Henry was ten thouſand Pounds; and the Jointures and Advancement aſſur'd by the King of Scotland, was two thouſand Pounds a Year, after his Death, and one thouſand Pounds a Year in preſent, for the Lady's Allowance or Maintenance, to be ſet forth in Lands of the beſt and moſt certain Revenue. During this Treaty, the King remitting the Matter to the Council, ſome of the Table warily put the Queſtion, That ſuppoſing the King's two Sons ſhould die without Iſſue, that then the Kingdom of England would devolve to the King of Scotland, which might prejudice the Monarchy of England. To this Scruple the King made a ſort of a Prophetical Anſwer, That if ſuch a Caſe ſhould happen, Scotland would be but an Acceſſion to England, and not England to Scotland, becauſe the greater would certainly draw the leſs; which was a ſafer Union for England, than that of France. The Effect of this Marriage is thus deſcrib'd by the Biſhop of Roſs: 'There was a perfect Peace and ſincere Amity between the two 'Realms of England and Scotland for a long time after. And truly during the 'Life of King Henry, no Cauſe of Breach was given by either of the Princes, 'but they continu'd in great Love and Friendſhip, and mutual Society, con- 'tracting of Marriages, continual Interchange of Merchandize between the Sub- 'jects of both Kingdoms, as if they had been all under the Obedience of one 'Prince; where through Juſtice, Policy and Riches did flouriſh and abound 'through-

VII. King Henry, finding himself secur'd by the Amity of Scotland, strengthen'd by that of Spain, cherish'd by that of Burgundy, and all Domestick Disturbances extinguish'd, now more than ever indulg'd his avaricious Temper, by endeavouring to gather and heap up Treasure. And as Princes more easily find Instruments for their Will and Humour, than their Service and Honour, he had gotten two Persons proper for his Purpose, Richard Empson and Edmund Dudley, who became so excessive and burdensome, that the People esteem'd them as his Horse-Leeches and Shearers. Dudley was of a good Family, Eloquent, and one that could put odious Business into good Language; but Empson, who was the Son of a Mechanick, throwing off all Respect, always triumph'd upon the Fact perform'd. These two being Lawyers by Profession, and Privy-Counsellors by Authority, turn'd Law and Justice into Rapines and Extortions. Many Laws at that Time, either by Reason of the Civil Wars, or the Neglect of the Judges, were forgotten, or grown out of Use; and the Patrimony of the Crown, enjoy'd by many by Vertue of long Leases, being become almost as good as Fee-Simple, mov'd the King to examine them strictly; and these two, who were thought the best Practicers in the Law, were by him chosen for that Purpose, and full Authority given them. They rais'd up many Informers and Accusers; and the Accused being put in Prison, and there kept beyond the usual Time, they were compell'd to purchase their Liberties with large Sums of Mony. Others being cited by them, or their Delegates, were condemn'd, contrary to the Ordinary Course of Law; sometimes by false Witnesses, and other times by false Pretences, by which many rich Persons were impoverish'd. Such Judges, as, govern'd by Integrity, resisted their Wills, were either better taught by Imprisonments, or ruin'd by Amercements. Wards were not suffer'd to enter upon their Lands without vast Disbursements; and Laws which at several Times had been enacted more for Terror than Punishment, and some that had also been repealed, were without any Remission, rigorously put in Execution. These and many other Courses, fitter to be bury'd in silence than repeated, they had of preying upon the People, both for their Master's Advantage and their own; insomuch that they arriv'd at great Riches and Substance. In these Matters the King himself was too nearly concern'd to escape Censures and Reflections; and we have this peculiar Story remaining of his blameable Conduct. The King as he came to Henningham, a Castle belonging to the Earl of Oxford, who was a Principal Minister both in Peace and War, was there receiv'd and entertain'd with much Splendor and Magnificence: All that held Land by any Title of the Earl, came at that Time to give their Attendance; of which many were Gentlemen, and others Yeomen: They all wore the Earl's blue Liveries and his Feathers in their Hats; but the rest of their Apparel was according to every Man's Condition. When the King came forth, and found them orderly plac'd in two Rows in the great Hall, he having nicely observ'd them, ask'd the Earl, If they were all his Servants: The Earl with a Smile answer'd, They were his Tenants and Retainers, who upon this Occasion came to wait upon his Grace. The King having thank'd him for his good Entertainment, said, That the Report of his Hospitality came short of the Truth; but he could not suffer his Laws to be broken in his Presence, therefore his Attorny must talk with him about it. The Nobility were then restrain'd from giving above a certain Number of Liveries; so that the Earl was forc'd to compound for no less than fifteen thousand Marks. It is very probable that this unusual Action of the King's, whose Business was ever to depress the Nobility, might proceed as much from Policy as Avarice.

In

In the mean Time the Earl of Suffolk, either through Hatred or Diſcontent, or for the Debts he contracted at Prince Arthur's Marriage, fled a ſecond Time into Flanders with his Brother Richard; to the great Diſſatisfaction of the People, who reaſonably judg'd that ſome Diſorder would enſue. The King reſorting to his former Arts, immediately caus'd Sir Robert Curſon, Governor of the Caſtle of Hammes near Calais, to fly from his Poſt, and offer his Service and Aſſiſtance to the Earl. This Knight having inſinuated himſelf into the Earl's Secrets, and learning from him who his cheif Supporters were in England, he advertis'd the King of all with the utmoſt Secrecy; but ſtill maintian'd his own Credit and inward Truſt with the Earl. Upon his Advice the King attach'd William Courtney Earl of Devonſhire, who had marry'd the Lady Catharine Daughter to King Edward the Fourth, William De-la-Pole, Brother to the Earl of Suffolk, the Lord George Abergavenny, Sir James Tyrrell, Sir John Windham, and Sir Thomas Green. The Iſſue was, William Courtney was detain'd Priſoner during the King's Life; not ſo much out of Guilt, as his near Relation to the Houſe of York: De-la-Pole was likewiſe kept Priſoner, tho' more at large; Abergavenny and Green were ſet at Liberty, Tyrrell and Windham were beheaded, and the reſt of inferior Quality hang'd. This was that Tyrrell, who was concern'd in the Murder of Edward the Fifth and his Brother in the Tower; for whom ſo eaſie a Death was too ſmall a Puniſhment. Then to keep up Curſon's Credit in Flanders, and conceal his Intelligence in England, about the ſame time there was publiſh'd at St. Paul's Croſs the Pope's Bull of Excommunication and Execration againſt the Earl of Suffolk, and the ſaid Curſon, with ſome other Abettors of the Earl; in which it appears Heav'n was made too much to bow to Earth, and Religion to yield to Policy. But ſhortly Curſon, having perform'd his Buſineſs, return'd into England, where he gain'd as much the Favour of the King, as he did the Reproach of the People. His Departure extreamly abated the Courage of the Earl, who found he was betray'd: Therefore endeavouring to procure Help from foreign Princes, he went into Germany, and from thence into France: But his Labours proving vain, he return'd into Flanders under the Protection of Arch-Duke Philip, where he continu'd for about two Years.

Rapin. Stow. In a Parliament call'd this Year, where Dudley was choſen Speaker, ſeveral wiſe Laws were enacted; and there was alſo granted to the King a Subſidy both for the Temporalty and the Clergy. And yet notwithſtanding, before the Year was expir'd there went out Commiſſions for a general Benevolence, tho' there were no Wars, nor Fears of any. The ſame Year the City of London gave five thouſand Marks for Confirmation of their Liberties; a Thing more proper for the Beginnings of Kings Reigns, than the latter Ends. Neither was it a ſmall Advantage that the Mint gain'd upon the late Statute, by the Recoinage of Groats, and Half-Groats, ſince call'd Twelve-Pences and Six-Pences. As for the Mills of Empſon and Dudley, they ſtill did grind more than ever; ſo that it was ſurprizing to ſee what golden Showers did pour down at once upon the King's Treaſury: The laſt Payments of the Marriage Portion from Spain, the Subſidy, the Benevolence, the Recoinage, the Redemption of the City's Liberties, and the ſeveral Contingencies. He had now but one Son, and one Daughter unprovided for; he was wiſe, of an exalted Spirit, who needed not to make Riches his Glory; and he excell'd in many other Things; only Avarice ever finds in it ſelf Matter of Ambition. It ſeems he thought to leave his Son ſuch a Kingdom, and ſuch a Maſs of Treaſure, as he might chuſe his Greatneſs where he pleas'd. Then to add to his Honour and Fame, this Year Pope Julius ſent to him a Cap of Maintenance, and a Sword, as to a Defender of the Church; which Cap and Sword were receiv'd with many pompous Ceremonies.

Biondi. &c. But not long after the King was concern'd and perplex'd about the Death of the famous Iſabel Queen of Spain, and Mother to his Son's Wife; by reaſon of the exact Reſemblance that was in the Government of their Kingdoms, between Ferdinand and himſelf, both of them reigning in the Right of their Wives.

A. D. 1506. Reg. 21/22.

Wives. And tho' Henry had obtain'd his Kingdom under the Title of the Houſe of Lancaſter, won it by the Sword, and had it confirm'd both by Parliament and Pope, and tho' he had never admitted of his Wife's Right; yet he could not but be apprehenſive, That Ferdinand's quitting the Crown to his Daughter, might by Way of Example effect and prejudice his Cauſe, and make immediate Way for his Son Prince Henry. The Caſe was the ſame, and the foremention'd Securities were with many Men of no Weight, in Compariſon of Natural Extract. To determine this Matter with leaſt Oppoſition, Queen Iſabel left the Adminiſtration of the Kingdom to her Husband Ferdinand during his Life, tho' her Daughter Joan was immediate Heir. But this highly diſguſted the Arch-Duke Philip who had marry'd this Heir; for being become King of Spain in Right of his Wife, he thought he was injur'd, as being reputed unfit to govern without his Father-in-law's Aſſiſtance and Superintendency. To remedy this Grievance, before Ferdinand ſhould be ſetled in his pretended Adminiſtration, he took ſhipping with his Wife in January, when it was believ'd that he would never have taken a Voyage of that Nature. He had hardly left the Coaſt of Flanders, when taken by a ſudden Tempeſt, his Fleet was diſpers'd upon the Coaſt of England; ſo that he was forc'd to get on ſhore at Weymouth, contrary to the Advice of ſome with him. The great Number of his Ships had given Alarm to the Country, ſo that many Troops of armed Men haſten'd to Weymouth, not knowing but it might be ſome Enemy to invade the Nation. Sir Thomas Trenchard, and Sir John Carew, who were their Commanders, underſtanding the Cauſe of his Landing, deſir'd him to reſt himſelf in Sir Thomas's Houſe, 'till they could inform the King of his Arrival; to which he conſented, as knowing that otherwiſe they would not ſuffer him to depart. The King hearing of this, ſent the Lord Arundell by way of Compliment, to let him know that he himſelf would ſhortly come and give him a Viſit; but Philip fearing to loſe too much Time, reſolv'd to go himſelf to Henry, cauſing his Queen to come ſlowly after him. He was met ſix Miles from Windſor by Prince Henry, and one Mile from thence by the King, who receiv'd him with all the Terms of Honour and Friendſhip. He treated with them of the Marriage of their Children, and of his own Marriage with Margaret, the Dutcheſs Dowager of Savoy, Siſter to Philip: He renew'd all Confederacies made between them in the preceding Year, by the Name of Arch-Duke Philip, Duke of Burgundy, now by the Name of King of Spain. Theſe had better Succeſs for the Engliſh than the former, eſpecially in the Fiſhing Trade; at which the Flemmings were much offended. He with much Difficulty obtain'd the Perſon of the Earl of Suffolk, who liv'd under the Protection of Philip: Henry knew ſo well how to perſuade him, by paſſing his Royal Word he would not put him to Death, that Philip ſent for him into Flanders; the one deſiring to have him before the other departed, and the other not to depart 'till he was arriv'd, that it might be believ'd that he had been in a Manner compell'd to deliver him up. As ſoon as the Earl was arriv'd, and put in ſafe Cuſtody in the Tower, Philip departed well pleas'd from England, and was receiv'd in Spain without any manner of Reſiſtance, Ferdinand totally quitting the Government to him; which he enjoy'd but for a while, for he dy'd ſhortly after.

A. D. 1507. Reg. 22/23.

The Earl of Suffolk being in the Tower, and King Henry freed from all manner of Trouble and Moleſtation, he betook himſelf to Domeſtick Affairs, and ſent his Chaplain, the famous Thomas Wolſey, afterwards Cardinal, to the Emperor Maximilian, to treat of the Marriage with the forenam'd Dowager of Savoy. This Treaty in a great Meaſure prov'd the firſt Riſe of Wolſey, who perform'd the Journey and the whole Matter with ſuch Celerity of Diſpatch as was almoſt incredible; for which he receiv'd the King's particular Thanks, and Favour. This Marriage was never conſummated, by Reaſon of King Henry's Indiſpoſition of Health that ſhortly enſu'd; for he now began daily to decline and and draw towards his End: The Gout, a Diſeaſe more troubleſom than mortal, was the Forerunner of a Diſtillation, which falling upon his Lungs brought him into a kind of Conſumption, which he perceiving, he began to give himſelf totally to pious Works. For this Year he gave greater Alms than ever he did before, and diſcharg'd all Priſoners about the City, that lay for Fees or Debts under forty Shillings. He haſten'd his religious and charitable Foundations; He proceeds to Acts of Charity. and hearing alſo of the Outcries of his People againſt the Oppreſſions of Empſon and Dudley, with their Accomplicies, partly by devout People about him, and partly by publick Sermons, he began to be touch'd with great Remorſe and Compunction. Yet ſtill theſe two Devourers of the People, tho' they could not but hear of theſe Scruples in the King's Conſcience, as if the King's Soul and his Mony were lodg'd in ſeveral Offices, and the one never to interfere with the other, proceeded with as great a Rage as ever. Many for ſlight Cauſes were moleſted in their Eſtates, and in their Lives: One dy'd in Priſon before his Cauſe could be heard; another being in Priſon for denying to pay a Sum contrary to Law, was not let out 'till the next Reign, when Empſon was put in his Place.

Ibid. To make good the uſual Cuſtom of promiſing Obedience to new Popes, the King ſent Sir Gilbert Talbot, with two other Ambaſſadors, to Pope Julius the Second, which he had not formerly done, tho' he was elected ſome Years before. They urg'd much for the Canonization of King Henry the Sixth, but did not ſucceed; either becauſe the Pope held that Honour at an exceſſive Rate, or that he was willing to make a Diſtinction between Innocents and Saints. Being diſmiſs'd by the Pope, they carry'd the Garter, and all the Robes and Badges of of that Order to Guido Ubaldo, Duke of Urbin, who thankfully accepted of the Honour. This Year the King furniſh'd his Hoſpital in the Savoy, which had The King's laſt Acts. been a noted Palace of the Lancaſtrains; and likewiſe he founded three Monaſteries for the Conventual Friars of the Order of St. Francis, and three for the Obſervants of the ſame Order, in diſtinct Places. Beſides which, his pious Mother the Lady Margaret, Counteſs of Richmond, not long before this Time, founded two noble Colleges in the Univerſity of Cambridge, call'd Chriſt and St. John's. Theſe were ſpiritual Improvements and Advantages: But the laſt Act of State that concluded this King's Temporal Felicity, was the Agreement of a Glorious Match between his Daughter Mary, and Charles Prince of Spain, afterwards the great Emperor, both being of tender Years; which Treaty was perfected by Biſhop Fox, and other Commiſſioners at Calais, the Year before the King's Death. In which Alliance he took ſo much Satisfaction, that conſidering he was to have two Kings for his Sons-in-law, he declar'd That he thought he had built a Wall of Braſs about his Kingdom. So that now there was nothing to be added to this great King's Felicity, who had arriv'd at the Top of Human Glory, but a quiet and ſeaſonable Exit to ſecure him againſt any future Blows of Fortune.

A. D. 1508. Reg. 23 24.

And this prov'd his Fate; being foretold by a regular conſuming Sickneſs, A. D. which gave him full Time to provide againſt all the Terrors of his laſt Hour. He 1509. had liv'd almoſt all his Time in Troubles, but always with Succeſs and Victory: Reg. 24. He found a Kingdom involv'd in Civil Wars, he left it in a ſetled Peace. His Subjects, who were impoveriſh'd by the paſt Diſorders, were notwithſtanding his Taxations, by reaſon of his wiſe Government become rich; and he did not only free the Crown from all Debts, but left behind him in Richmond a vaſt His great Treaſure. Treaſure of a Milion and eight hundred thouſand Pounds Sterling; ſo that he was juſtly accounted the richeſt Prince in Europe. To crown all, in his laſt Year, as well as his firſt, he did an Act of Piety, worthy of Imitation; he granted a general Pardon, as expecting a ſecond Coronation in a better Kingdom; and did alſo declare by his Will, that Reſtitution ſhould be made of thoſe Sums, which had been unjuſtly taken by his Officers. And thus this Solomon of England, as he is call'd by ſome, dy'd at his Palace at Richmond, upon the His Death.

twenty ſecond Day of April, in the fifty third Year of his Age, after a moſt politick and fortunate Reign of twenty three Years and eight Months.

His Interment. The Manner of his Interment was thus: His Body was brought into the great Chamber, where reſting three Days, it had ſolemn Maſs and Dirige ſung by a Miter'd Biſhop; whence remov'd into the Hall, had there the ſame Service the like Space, as alſo in the Chappel for three Days longer; and in every Place a Herſe adorn'd with Banners, Eſcotcheons and Pendants, and with the Attendance of Mourners. From whence it was convey'd into a Chariot, cover'd with black Cloath of Gold, drawn by five noble Courſers cover'd with black Velvet, adorn'd with Eſcotcheons of fine Gold, with his Effigies over it, apparell'd in rich Robes, with the Crown on the Head, and Scepter and Globe in the Hands, environ'd with Banners of Arms of all his Dominions, Titles and Genealogies; a great Number of Prelates praying, with other Attendants before the Body, and nine Mourners and about ſix hundred Torches following it. In this Order it was met at St. George's Field by the Religious of all Sorts in and about the City, with the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Officers in Black; and was brought through London to St. Paul's, and plac'd in the Quire under a ſtately Herſe. Whence after a ſolemn Maſs, and Sermon preach'd by the Biſhop of Rocheſter, it was next Day with the ſame State convey'd to Weſtminſter, having the Royal Banner born on a Courſer trapped with the Arms of the Defunct, and there by ſix Lords taken out of the Chariot, and ſet under a moſt glorious Herſe full of Lights; the Repreſentation lying upon the Coffin upon a Pall of Gold, about which the Mourners being plac'd within the firſt Rail, Knights with Banners within the ſecond, and Officers of Arms without the ſame, Garter King of Arms cry'd aloud, For the Soul of the Noble King Henry the Seventh; when the Quire beginning Placebo, and ending at Dirige, clos'd the Solemnities of that Day. The next Day were three Maſſes ſolemnly ſung by Biſhops, at the laſt of which were offer'd the Banner and Courſer, Coat of Arms, Sword, Target and Helmet, the Nobility offering their rich Palls of Cloath of Gold, &c. And thus, the great Officers breaking their Staves, his Body was interr'd in his own magnificent Royal Chappel; in which a glorious Monument of Copper was erected for him, and finiſh'd by a Florentine at the Expence of a thouſand Pound; which is thus deſcrib'd by the Lord Bacon: He lyeth bury'd at Weſtminſter in one of the ſtatelieſt and daintieſt Monuments of Europe, both for the Chappel and the Sepulchre; ſo that he dwelleth more richly dead in the Monument of his Tomb, than he did alive in Richmond, or any of his Palaces.

Stanford, &c.

His Character, and Reign. To ſay ſomething of the Perſon and Character of this mighty Prince; he was of great Vigour and Strength of Body, lean, and of Stature taller than the common Sort; of a wonderful Beauty and fair Complexion; with a Countenance pleaſing and ſmiling, eſpecially in Converſation. Yet he had a high Spirit and haughty Courage, and govern'd without a Rival; not admitting any near or full Approach either to his Power, or to his Secrets, and all without any affected Oſtentation. He was a Man of wonderful Abilities, and had many excellent Qualifications; he was ſober, moderate, chaſte and pious, had a quick Wit, and a profound Penetration, which in all great Perils and Emergencies was ſupernatural, and in a manner divine. And indeed as to Wiſdom and Policy he ſeem'd to excel all Princes, always ſhewing in them ſomething admirable and ſurprizing; by which he ſurmounted infinite Difficulties, both before and after he came to the Crown, and brought Peace, Union and Tranquility to a Nation divided, diſtracted, and beſmear'd with Blood; gaining the full Poſſeſſion of a Throne by a Complication of all the Titles that ever made a Man King, as Inheritance, Marriage, Conqueſt, Uſurpation and Election, beſides the Pontifical Confirmation. Having obtain'd the Crown, he politickly took care to put gradual Stops to the Power of the Nobility, who had lately rais'd ſuch Storms in the Nation, which he perform'd by procuring three ſeveral Laws:

Laws: By one of which the Barons Lands were made alienable, which would cauſe them inſenſibly to divide and break in Pieces: By another he incourag'd Husbandry, aſcertaining Proportions of Land for Tillage; by which the Country Farmers, living more plentifully, would not ſo readily be ſeduc'd by their Lords to diſturb the publick Peace: By a third, Retainers were lopp'd off; ſo that the Nobility were ſtripp'd of their mighty Retinues, and could not eaſily compoſe a Cavalry, which was uſually made up of theſe Followers: By all which, the Balance of the Nation was gradually alter'd, and the Commons obtain'd a greater Power and Figure than ever they had before. As his Wiſdom was great, ſo he took care to be ſerv'd by the ableſt Men that could be found in the Nation, both as to War and Counſel; nor did he regard how ſubtle they were, for as to that he knew himſelf to have the maſter Reach. His Government and Power was extenſive and great, yet no King ever yielded more to his Parliaments, which ſtill made it greater, ſo that many foreign Princes either courted or dreaded it. Some reckon it among his principal Glories, that three Popes, Alexander the Sixth, Pius the Third, and Julius the Second, did in their ſeveral Times, with the Conſent of their Cardinals, elect him for Chief Defender of Chriſt's Church, before all other Chriſtian Princes. He always profeſs'd to love and ſeek Peace; and it was his uſual Preface to his Treaties, That when Chriſt came into the World, Peace was ſung, and when he went out of the World Peace was bequeath'd. Yet he is blam'd with making himſelf ſomewhat little by being ambitious, and a little poor in admiring Riches: But as to his Ambition, it was better regulated than in any of his Predeceſſors; and his Avarice might be ſaid to be more the Effect of his Policy than his Temper. The moſt real Stains upon his Memory was his taking off the Lord Stanley's Head, who had ſet the Crown upon his, and his unfair Execution of the young Earl of Warwick, without any certain Guilt, or perhaps none greater than his being the laſt of the Plantagenet Race; which ſeem'd to have been reveng'd upon his own Race and Progeny: For his Poſſeſſion in the firſt Line ended in his Grand-Children, as that of Edward the Third, and Henry the Fourth had done before him. He ſeems to have been more than ordinary ſolicitous about his Poſterity, and by a fam'd Tradition we are told that he ſent to enquire after his Succeſſors from a celebrated Prophet or Negromancer, who in his Anſwer return'd him this remarkable Latine Verſe, Mars, Puer, Alecto, Virgo, Vulpes, Leo, Nullus: But how far this was accompliſh'd in the Characters of his Succeſſors, will better appear from the following Hiſtory.

SECT. II.

The Reign of King HENRY the Eighth.

Containing 37 Years, 9 Months, and 5 Days.

Hall. Holling. Stow. Speed. Herbert. &c.

I. IN the laſt Reign of King Henry the Seventh, the two Houſes of Lancaſter and York were join'd and cemented; but now they were intirely united in the Perſon of King Henry the Eighth, in whoſe Character and Life there was ſuch uncommon Variety, that he may be ſaid to have inherited the good and bad Qualifications of both thoſe famous Families. He ſucceeded his Father with the univerſal Applauſe and Satisfaction of the Nation; being now near nineteen Years of Age, and happily endow'd with all the Perfections of Body and Mind. As to his Perſon, it was extraordinary tall, beautiful and majeſtick, and he had great Strength and Agility of Body, which ſignal- A. D. 1509. Reg. 1.

ſignally appear'd in ſeveral Juſts and Tournaments before and after he came to the Crown: For at Tilt he bore down a brave Man at Arms, both Horſe and Rider; at Barriers threw Sir William Kingſton a Knight of great Strength to the Ground; and with a Battel-Axe combated with Giot, a Gigantick German, and lent him more powerful Blows than he could repay. Then beſides his having a magnanimous Spirit and extenſive Soul, he had the Happineſs of a nice and learned Education, being deſign'd by his Father, during the Life of his Brother Arthur, for the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury; and not only the more neceſſary Parts of Learning were infus'd into him, but even thoſe of Ornament; ſo that beſides his being an able Linguiſt, Philoſopher and Divine, he was alſo a curious Muſician and Compoſer. All which Qualifications, being join'd to ſo excellent a Perſonage, caus'd him to be lov'd and admir'd by his Subjects, and alſo to be courted and rever'd by his Neighbours.

The Beginning of King Henry's Reign.

Thus happily began this remarkable Reign, when the young King, following the Advice of able Counſellors, committed fewer Errors than when he govern'd by a more unlimited Will; for as they were ſelected by the wiſe Lady Margaret his Grandmother, ſo he took their Impreſſions readily, both out of Diffidence of his own Abilities in managing a Kingdom, and a Deſire to be free as to thoſe Exerciſes moſt agreable to his Youth and Diſpoſitions. His chief Counſellors were William Warham Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and Lord Chancellor; Richard Fox, Biſhop of Wincheſter, Secretary and Lord Privy-Seal; Thomas Howard, Earl of Surry, Lord Treaſurer; George Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, Steward of the King's Houſhold; Sir Charles Somerſet, Lord Chamberlain; Doctor Thomas Ruthal, Sir Thomas Lovel, Sir Henry Wyat, and Sir Edward Poynings. By the Advice of theſe Counſellors, one of his firſt Acts, after the finiſhing his Father's magnificent Funeral, was his Care to perform his Father's former Appointment in marrying the Lady Catharine of Spain, the Relict of his Brother Prince Arthur; to which probably, but out of Reſpect to Filial Piety, he had not the greateſt Devotion; and for relinquiſhing of which, no doubt he might have more eaſily obtain'd a Diſpenſation from the Pope, than his Father had done for getting it allow'd. But Obſequiouſneſs to his Father's firſt Appointment, (tho' contrary to his laſt Thoughts) and Reſpect to the Advice of his Council, ſo far prevail'd with him, that he would not be crown'd 'till the Marriage was ſolemniz'd, that one Coronation might ſerve for both Parties. Accordingly, about ſix Weeks after his Father's Deceaſe, on the third Day of June, he marry'd the Princeſs Catharine at the Biſhop of Salisbury's Houſe in Fleetſtreet; where among the numerous Ceremonies, this is remarkable, that tho' the Bride was a Widow, ſhe was attir'd all in White, to expreſs her untouch'd Virginity, upon which ſhe and her Friends ever inſiſted. Shortly after, the King, having made twenty four Knights of the Bath in the Tower, upon Midſummer Day was crown'd at Weſtminſter, together with his Queen, by the Hands of Warham Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, with wonderful Magnificence, and all the Circumſtances of State. All the Nobility, Spiritual and Temporal, did their Homage; and the People, according to ancient Cuſtom, being ask'd Whether they would receive him for their King? they unianimouſly cry'd, Yea, Yea! Then to perform the moſt noble Part of his Father's Will, he proclaim'd a Pardon for all Crimes, except Treaſon, Murder, and Felony, and promis'd Reſtitution of all Goods unjuſtly taken from any of his Subjects. And becauſe the Inſtruments of ſuch Injuſtice are always moſt odious, and nothing gives a People more Satisfaction, than ſeeing their Perſecutors puniſh'd; he caus'd Empſon and Dudley, the two chief Actors in the late rapacious Proceedings, to be committed to the Tower, and divers of the inferior Agents, call'd Promotors, to be ſet in the Pillory in Cornhill, with Papers on their Heads, and then to ride through the City to Newgate, with their Faces to the Horſe-Tails.

His firſt Marriage, with Catharine of Spain.

And

And now the King, having taken ſeveral Proſpects of his neighbouring Princes, thought fit to call a Parliament in January following; in which the principal Proceedings ſeem to have reference to Empſon and Dudley's Extortions; which were ſo repreſented, that the King was willing in ſome meaſure to reſtrain his own Authority, that he might enlarge the Peoples Confidence and Affection towards him. And as divers of thoſe Statutes, by which the late King Henry took Advantage of the People, were repeal'd, explain'd or limited; ſo Empſon and Dudley, who had formerly been condemn'd, were now attainted of High-Treaſon. After they had continu'd above half a Year longer in Priſon, the King, to ſatisfie the importunate Clamours of the People, caus'd them both to be beheaded; in which, according to ſome, he acted more like a good King, than a good Maſter. However by this, and his remitting of ſeveral Fines, he gain'd the Love and Affection of the Nation at this Time, and was in perfect Peace and Safety with his People. This gave him Opportunity to follow thoſe Liberties and Pleaſures which were moſt ſuitable to his youthful and vigorous Diſpoſition; yet his Exerciſes were not ſportful alone, but had in them a mixture of Letters and Arms. For tho' he us'd Feaſtings, Masks, Dancings, Singing, Playing upon many Inſtruments, making Verſes, and the like; yet his more ſerious Entertainments were Study of Hiſtory, and School Divinity, in which he much delighted, as likewiſe in Juſts, Tourneys, and Barriers, and that not in an ordinary Manner, but with the two-handed Sword and Battel-Axe. Theſe again were adorn'd and ſet out with moſt coſtly Pageants and magnificent Devices, and thoſe ſo frequently, that they did not only conſume much Time, but alſo great part of his vaſt Treaſure. And indeed never any King delighted more in Pomp and Show; his Court was marſhall'd like a Camp, and his Camp ſet out like a Court; ſo that Mars and Venus ſeem'd to be in Conjunction all this Reign, and Love and Honour as faſhionable as in the Romances of thoſe Times. Nor needed he any thing beſides his own Example to draw the young Nobility after him, who were now no leſs conſiderable for their Number than their Quality; ſo that all the neighbouring Nations were both ſenſible and apprehenſive of his growing Greatneſs.

The King's uſual Exerciſes.

For this Reaſon ſeveral Ambaſſadors repair'd to him from France, Scotland, Denmark, Italy, and other Places, who were entertain'd after a moſt magnificent and extraordinary Manner. The Buſineſs of Lewis the French King was chiefly to keep a good Correſpondence between the two Nations, while he proceeded with his Wars in Italy; which was the Cauſe of a new Treaty between England and France. And whereas at the Treaty in 1498, King Lewis had given Caution to Henry the Seventh to pay that which remain'd of the ſeven hundred and forty five thouſand Crowns, due from a former Treaty between Charles the Eighth and the ſaid Henry, in 1492; He did now ſtipulate to pay the Remainder of the ſaid Sum. The Buſineſs of Scotland was Congratulation, in the Name of King James the Fourth, his Brother-in-law and Siſter, with a Confirmation of a late Treaty of Peace; and that of Denmark was chiefly to eſtabliſh a better Courſe for Trade and Commerce. But becauſe Pope Julius the Second became jealous of the Greatneſs of the French in Italy, he earneſtly ſolicited King Henry, by remembring him of the Glory of his Anceſtors, and offer'd him the Honour to be Caput Fœderis Italici. Upon this the King ſent Bambridge, Arch-Biſhop of York, to reſide at Rome, and to treat of theſe Affairs. In the mean time the French march'd forwards and inveſted Bononia, while the Pope lay ſick in the Place, and forc'd his Holineſs to very hard Conditions, which ſounded ſo ill, that King Henry immediately made a League with Ferdinand King of Spain for his Defence; which occaſion'd greater Actions afterwards. Ferdinand ſent an Embaſſie both to congratulate King Henry for the Birth of a Son, which liv'd near eight Weeks, and to deſire his Aſſiſtance againſt the Moors in Africa. His Requeſt was immediatly granted, and the Lord Thomas Darcy was ſent with fifteen hundred Archers, who afterwards wards returned home richly rewarded. In the like Manner Margaret, Regent of the Low-Countries, obtain'd of the King fifteen hundred Archers to aſſiſt her againſt the Duke of Guelders, tho' Confederate both to the French and Scotch. Theſe under the Command of Sir Edward Poynings, Knight of the Garter, were upon their Landing met by the Lady Regent, and treated with great Teſtimonies of their Worth, and afterwards diſmiſs'd with unuſual Marks of Honour. So that at preſent every Thing contributed towards the Fame of the Engliſh King and Nation.

Yet the King's Authority over the narrow Seas, which had been carefully preſerv'd by his Anceſtors, was about this Time ſomewhat leſſen'd by the Piracies of Andrew Barton a Scotch Man. This Perſon, in Revenge of his Father's Death and other Injuries, having in vain ſought Redreſs for a Ship taken from him by ſome Portugueze obtain'd Letters of Mark from James the Fourth his King, but upon Condition that he ſhould not exerciſe Piracy. Notwithſtanding which, he ſeiz'd upon ſeveral Engliſh Veſſels, upon Pretence of their carrying Portugueze Goods, and pillag'd them. To remedy which Inconvenience, the two Sons of Thomas Earl of Surry were employ'd; the Elder, call'd Thomas, commanding in one Ship, and Edward, the younger Brother, in another. In the open Sea they engag'd with Barton's two Ships, which, tho' leſs than the other, maintain'd a cruel Fight; the obſtinate Pirate, tho' wounded even to Death, encouraging his Men with his Whiſtle to his laſt Breath. But the Engliſh ſo well purſu'd their Point, that at laſt they forc'd their Ships, took all the Men Priſoners, and at London preſented them to the King; who, upon their Submiſſion, graciouſly pardon'd them, upon Condition they departed the Kingdom within twenty Days. King James hearing of this, ſent to require Satisfaction, as being againſt the Treaty between them; but it was anſwer'd, That it did not become a King to impute Breach of Treaty to his Confederate and Allie, only for ſhewing Mercy to Pirates. The Meſſenger, rather ſilenc'd than ſatisfy'd with this Anſwer, return'd to his King, who when Occaſion was offer'd, fail'd not to ſhew how much he reſented the Death of Barton. Having ſetled all things in Quiet, King Henry paſs'd away his Chriſtmaſs at Greenwich, with the extraordinary Pomp of many unuſual Masks, Interludes, and other glorious and expenſive Entertainments.

A. D. 152. Reg. 14.

II. While King Henry liv'd in Peace and Felicity at home, the French King proceeded in the Wars of Italy, with ſo much Succeſs, that the Pope was compell'd to ſollicite the Aſſiſtance of him and Ferdinand of Spain. This being variouſly debated in Council, it was at laſt determin'd that this was a fair Opportunity to recover the Engliſh Dominions in France. Whereupon the King reſolv'd, together with calling a Parliament, to ſend to Lewis the Twelfth a monitory Embaſſie, requiring him to deſiſt from the War againſt the Pope; but Lewis, whether out of his own Courage, or that he thought the Emperor aſſur'd to him, regarded not his Advice. King Henry therefore, that he might have more than one Pretence to invade France, ſent bravely to require all his Patrimonial Inheritance of Normandy, Gaſcony, Anjou, Maine, &c. and in caſe of a Refuſal, to denounce War. This then being proclaim'd, Levies were commanded, and Supplies granted by a Parliament that met in the Beginning of this Year, in which ſeveral new Laws were enacted.

Polydor. Hollingſ. Stow. Speed. Herbert. &c.

The King declares War againſt France.

The War with France being determin'd, it was conſulted in what Part the Engliſh ſhould begin: And tho' that of Calais ſeem'd the moſt ready Way, yet becauſe King Ferdinand promis'd to join with the King of England in this War, it was by his Conſent reſolv'd to land in ſome Part of the Spaniſh Dominions; and that from thence, both their Armies being united, ſhould jointly invade Guienne, and Gaſcony. The General nam'd by King Henry was Thomas Gray Marqueſs of Dorſet, with whom went, beſides his three Brothers, the Lord Thomas Howard, Son and Heir to the Earl of Surry, the Lord Brook, Lord

Lord Willoughby, and Lord Ferrers, with divers Knights and Eſquires, all of them brave Perſons, and ten thouſand Soldiers; of whom one half were Archers, who beſides their Bows and Arrows carry'd Halberts, which they pitch'd on the Ground while their Arrows were ſhot, and then took them again to do Execution on the Enemy. Theſe landed the third Day of June on the Coaſts of Biſcay, where within three Days after their Arrival, there came from the King of Spain a Marqueſs and an Earl to receive them; but without any of thoſe Neceſſaries promis'd them. After the Army had lain many Days expecting Aid and Proviſions from King Ferdinand, at length a Biſhop came from that King, deſiring them to have Patience for a while, and ſhortly they ſhould have full Satisfaction. In the mean Time the Engliſh Men being forc'd to feed much upon Garlick, and to drink hot Wines, fell into ſuch Sickneſs, that many of them dy'd, to the Number of eighteen hundred Perſons; upon which Diſcouragement, the Lord Marqueſs ſent to Ferdinand to know his Reſolutions, who return'd Anſwer, that the Duke of Alva was ready to join him with a great Power. And ſhortly after the Duke of Alva did advance with a powerful Army, as if he deſign'd to join him according to Promiſe; but being come within a Day's March, he ſuddenly turn'd towards the Kingdom of Navarre, under Pretence it was neceſſary to begin the Expedition through that Country. Here that King not anſwering his Expectations, he took the Occaſion to drive him out of his Kingdom, and to conquer it for the uſe of King Ferdinand. This Spaniſh Policy was no ways pleaſing to the Engliſh, who finding nothing but Words from the King of Spain, and being weary of ſo many Delays, they fell upon ſome Towns in the Borders of Guienne; but for want of a competent Number of Horſes, they were unable to perform any Thing of moment. At which Time the Lord Marqueſs fell ſick, and the Lord Howard ſupply'd the Place of General; to whom the King of Spain once again ſent Excuſes, deſiring him, ſince the Seaſon was ſo advanc'd, that he would be pleas'd to break up his Camp, and diſpoſe his Men into the neighbouring Towns 'till the following Spring, when he would not fail to make good all his Promiſes. King Henry in the mean Time, underſtanding the King of Spain's Intentions, ſent his Herald Windſor with Letters to the Army, ordering them to continue there, for ſhortly he deſign'd to ſend them a new Supply of Forces, under the Conduct of the Lord Herbert his Chamberlain. But this ſo incens'd the Soldiers, that in a Fury they had ſlain the Lord Howard, if he had not yielded immediately to return home; who thereupon was forc'd to hire Ships, and in the Beginning of December they landed in England; being taught by this fruitleſs Expedition what Reliance was to be had on Spaniſh Promiſes. King Henry was much offended, and deſign'd to have puniſh'd ſome of his Officers; but it was ſoon made appear to him, that King Ferdinand was only blamable, who had no greater Deſign than the Conqueſt of Navarre.

An Army ſent into Spain to invade France.

But to no Advantage.

Tho' this Voyage was ſucceſsleſs, yet Sir Edward Howard, who conducted the Marqueſs to Spain, having with his Fleet firſt clear'd the Seas from Enemies, landed at a Bay in Bretaign, and march'd ſeven Miles into the Country, from whence, after burning ſome Towns, he brought away rich Spoils. Not ſatisfy'd with this, he put his Men on Shore at Conquet, and ſeveral other Places; where the French ſtill receiving the worſe, they at laſt deſir'd a Parly. The Subſtance of which was, That the Engliſh ſhould deſiſt from this kind of deſultory and cruel War, which tended only to burning of Villages, and ruining the Poor. But he reply'd, He was not to take his Directions from them; that it was the Part of brave Gentlemen to defend their Country, and not meanly to ſue for Mercy. After which, and a Banquet in his Ship, they were diſmiſs'd, and the Engliſh Admiral return'd home. The French, in the mean Time, making great Preparations by Sea, King Henry thought fit to reinforce his Fleet, adding to twenty Ships under the Command of his Admiral, twenty five more under the Command of thoſe brave Men that attended him; placing in the chief Ship, call'd the Regent of a thouſand Tun, Sir Thomas Knevet, Maſter of his Horſe, and Mr. John Carew, with ſeven hundred Men; in the Soverain, the famous Sir Charles Brandon and Sir Henry Guilford, with ſixty of the talleſt Yeomen of the Guard. This choice Fleet meeting with thirty nine Sail coming out of Breſt in Bretaign, attack'd them; where two of the greateſt Ships on both Sides being grappled, fell on Fire by ſome Accident, or as the French would have it by the Deſign of Brimauguet the Commander. The Captains of the Engliſh Ship, the Regent, and of the French, call'd the Cordeliere, together with the Soldiers in them, periſh'd all, except a few who eſcap'd by ſwimming. However the reſt of the French were ſo terrify'd with the Sight, that they immediately ſtood off, ſome to Breſt, and others to the adjoining Iſlands. To repair this Loſs, King Henry built a Ship the greateſt that ever had been ſeen in England, calling it Henry Grace de Dieu.

Preparations againſt France.

King Henry now finding that Affairs were grown to ſome Extremity between the two Nations, diſclos'd his Deſign of going in Perſon into France, chuſing rather to make War in his Enemies Country, than to attend it at home. That he might the better perform this, he was adviſ'd to diſcover what Correſpondence he might expect from his Neighbours and Confederates; therefore he had formerly ſent Sir Robert Wingfield to negotiate with the Emperor Maximilian, and ingage him to his Party, in which he found no great Difficulty; the Emperor being pleas'd that the warlike Diſpoſition of the young King was turn'd againſt France, ſo that with Aſſurance of his Affection he incourag'd him to proceed. He endeavour'd likewiſe to gain the King of Spain, and the King of Scotland; but the former, having gain'd his Point as to Arragon, choſe rather to be quiet, and the latter had actually enter'd into a League with the French King. For which Reaſon the King ſent his Treaſurer the Earl of Surry into Yorkſhire and the Northern Parts, to have an Army in Readineſs, in caſe the Scots ſhould move in his Abſence. Order was alſo given that the Fortifications ſhould be repair'd, and all neceſſary Additions made to his Caſtles and Fortreſſes on the Sea-Coaſt. Together with all this Proviſion, he thought fit to call a Parliament, where beſides enacting divers good Laws, he obtain'd two Fifteenths, and four Demies, beſides a large Poll, according to every Man's Quality. In the mean Time Pope Julius the Second, who had kindled the War againſt France, dy'd; and was ſucceeded by Leo the Tenth, who purſuing his Predeceſſor's Deſigns, incourag'd King Henry in the ſame War. But he having now accompliſh'd the Age of one and twenty Years, needed little Invitation; and the rather becauſe he was aſſur'd of the Aſſiſtance of the Emperor, who was confident that however the Buſineſs ſucceeded between the two Nations, he could make his Advantage. That he might effect this the better, he politickly interpos'd ſome Difficulties; nor would he be wholly won, 'till he had obtain'd of King Henry a hundred and twenty thouſand Ducats towards his Charge in bringing three hundred Horſe and eight thouſand Foot, which ſhould enter Burgundy, as ſoon as the King attempted Picardy.

A. D. 1513. Reg. 4/5.

King Henry being reſolv'd to proceed in his Expedition, thought fit in the firſt Place to clear the Sea from the French Navy; and therefore he ſent out his own Fleet, conſiſting of forty two Sail, under the Conduct of Sir Edward Howard Lord Admiral, accompany'd with the Lord Ferrers, and many other worthy Perſons. Theſe ſailing to the Coaſt of Bretaign, arriv'd at Bertram Bay, and there lay at Anchor in Sight of the French Fleet, then commanded by one Pregent, a Knight of Rhodes, who keeping himſelf cloſe in the Haven of Breſt, the Engliſh Admiral deſign'd to attack him in that Place: But becauſe the Ships were too great to enter the Bay, he caus'd certain Boats to be mann'd out, expecting by that means to towe out the French; but this proving ineffectual, he call'd a Council of War, where it was determin'd, that firſt they ſhould attack Pregent and his Gallies, lying in Blancſable Bay, and then then ſet upon the reſt of the Fleet in the Haven of Breſt. And it was further appointed, That the Lord Ferrers, Sir Stephen Bull, and others, ſhould land with a competent Number to attack the Forts, which the French had there rais'd; while the Admiral with little Gallies and Barges enter'd the Bay, ſo that the French might at once be attack'd by Sea and Land. But tho' this was determin'd by a Council of War, yet the Admiral had a Project by himſelf, occaſion'd by a Spaniſh Knight, who affirm'd that he might enter the Bay with very little Danger; therefore calling a few ſelect Friends, he made them privy to his Deſign, which was to take upon him the whole Enterprize, with only their Aſſiſtance; and was ſo confident of Succeſs, that he wrote to King Henry to come in Perſon and have the Honour of the Enterprize himſelf; but the King being otherwiſe diverted, did not come. On St. Mark's Day the Admiral put himſelf in a ſmall Barge, appointing three little Gallies, and his own Ship-Boat to attend him, with which he ſuddenly row'd into the Bay, where Pregent had moor'd up his Gallies juſt to the Ground; from whence and the Forts on the Land came a terrible Storm of Shot: Yet ſtill the Admiral row'd on, and coming to the Gallies bravely drove out the French Soldiers. The Bay was ſhallow, and the other Ships, by reaſon of the Lowneſs of the Tide, could not enter, which the French Men perceiving, they enter'd the Gallies again, and renew'd the Fight with Pikes and other Weapons; whereupon the Admiral attempting to return to his Barge, which the Stream had driven from thence, was with a Pike thrown over-board and drown'd; the juſt Iſſue of his inconſiderate Enterprize. Upon which ſorrowful Accident, the Lord Ferrers with the reſt return'd into England: After whoſe Departure Pregent put to Sea with his Gallies, and coaſting about the County of Suſſex, burnt ſome poor Cottages; but the King ſuddenly made a new Admiral, the Lord Thomas Howard, Brother to him that was drown'd, who ſo ſcour'd the Seas, that the French were no more to be ſeen on any Coaſt of England.

A ſucceſsleſs Attempt made upon Breſt.

All Preparations being made for the Expedition into France, it was yet debated whether King Henry ſhould go in Perſon: Some urg'd the Affection and Tenderneſs of the Nation for his Safety; and that, if he dy'd at this Conjuncture, the People were ſtill ſo affected to the Houſe of York, that they might take Edmund de-la-Pole, Earl of Suffolk, out of the Tower, and ſet him upon the Throne: And that the War in France was not of that Conſequence, that the King ſhould make ſuch a Perſonal Deſertion of his own Kingdom. Others alledg'd, That to commit an Army, with the Flower of the Nobility and Nation, to any one Subject, was not only unſafe, but to the Prejudice of many worthy Competitors for that Honour; and that it was no new thing for the Kings of England to march at the Head of their Armies in Foreign Countries. But it was reply'd, That 'till the King had a more numerous Iſſue, it was againſt all Reaſon of State to hazard the Kingdom in ſuch Tumults as might enſue; to which Opinion it is believ'd the King would have condeſcended, had not freſh Letters arriv'd from the Emperor, in the Pope's Name exhorting him ſpeedily to come over, and promiſing that he would not only meet him, but take Pay under him. Therefore for a full Security, it was thought fit that De-la-Pole Earl of Suffolk, who had continu'd many Years Priſoner under Henry the Seventh, ſhould have his Head ſtruck off, as that King had order'd upon his Death-Bed. He was certainly of a turbulent and audacious Spirit; but whether any late Matter was alledg'd againſt him, does not ſufficiently appear by any Record.

The Earl of Suffolk beheaded.

The King now reſolving to go in Perſon, thought fit to ſend his Vanguard before; which was commanded by George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, who was accompany'd by Thomas Stanley Earl of Derby, Thomas Dowra Lord Prior of St. John's, the Lords Fitzwater, Haſtings and Cobham, Sir Robert Ratcliff, Sir Rice ap Thomas, and many other gallant Knights and Eſquires, and the Number of above eight thouſand Men, who arriv'd at Calais in Mid-May. Theſe were again follow'd by the Middle-Ward of about ſix thouſand more, commanded by the Lord Chamberlain Herbert, and accompany'd by the Earls of Northumberland, Kent and Wiltſhire, the Lords Audley, De-la-Ware, Carew and Curſon, who came to Calais fifteen Days after. Theſe two Commanders tarrying ſome Time for the King's Directions, at length march'd in good Order towards Terouënne in Artois, before which Town they arriv'd upon the twenty ſecond of June, pitching their Tents about a Mile diſtant. This Town was defended by a large Ditch, ſtrong Bulwarks, and ſufficiently provided with great Ordnance; there was in it a Garriſon of about two thouſand Foot, and two hundred and fifty Lances, commanded by Monſieur de Teligny, and Monſieur de Crequy. To relieve which, the French rais'd a puiſſant Army; to which were added ten thouſand Men more under the Duke of Gueldres, and ſix thouſand under Richard de-la-Pole, Brother to Edmund lately beheaded. In the mean Time King Henry, having conſtituted Queen Catharine Regent, paſs'd over to Calais upon the laſt Day of June; bringing with him the reſt of the Army, which was tranſported in four hundred Veſſels; and with him alſo the Almoner, and new Favourite Thomas Wolſey. The King, having ſtay'd a few Days, and receiv'd ſome Viſits and Compliments, hear'd that the French deſign'd to relieve Terouënne, under the Command of the Duke of Longueville, and Marqueſs of Rotelin; which occaſion'd him to haſten his Departure with his Army, which conſiſted of about nine thouſand fighting Men, beſides near three thouſand more belonging to the Carriages. The famous Sir Charles Brandon, lately created Viſcount Liſle, had the Vanguard, accompany'd by the Earl of Eſſex: The King came in the main Battel, having the Duke of Buckingham on the right Hand with ſix hundred ſelect Men, and Sir Edward Poynings on the left with as many more, Sir Henry Guilford carrying the Standard Royal; the Rere-guard being compos'd in a great Meaſure of the Retinue of Fox Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Thomas Wolſey, was led by Sir William Compton; and after all came Sir Anthony Oughtred and John Nevil with four hundred Spears. This ſmall but well appointed Army was ſcarce enter'd into the French Confines near Ardres, when News was brought that the Enemy appear'd; but as the Engliſh approach'd they thought fit to retire. In the March of the King's Army two Pieces of Ordnance miſcarry'd, one of which was loſt, the other happily recover'd from the French. Upon the fourth of Auguſt the King arriv'd at Terouënne before which he caus'd a ſumptuous Pavilion to be erected, and continu'd to ſhew his uſual Splendor and Magnificence.

The King paſſes with an Army into France.

He comes before Terouënne.

The Emperor ſerves under him.

While the King thus lay before Terouënne, the Emperor Maximilian upon the twelfth of Auguſt arriv'd at the Camp, in the Quality of the King's Soldier, and therefore not only wore the Croſs of St. George, but receiv'd his daily Pay, which was a hundred Crowns a Day: An Honour never ſhown to any King of England before, for which he was royally receiv'd, and lodg'd in a Tent of Cloath of Gold: And as no Emperor had ever ſerv'd as a Soldier under a King ſo no Soldier was ever lodg'd in ſo much State and Magnificence. At this Time the City of Terouënne being in ſome Diſtreſs for want of Victuals, the French King appointed all his Horſe, to the Number of eight thouſand, to convey Proviſions into the Place: But King Henry, by the Advice of the Emperor, had made Bridges to paſs his Men over the River, to the other Side of the Town, where the Acceſs was eaſieſt; in ſuch a Manner, that when the French Convoy came with their Proviſions, and thought to have enter'd the Town, they found the Engliſh Army there ready to oppoſe them. Whereupon a fierce Battel was fought between them; but in the Concluſion, the French were put to flight, and with ſo much Speed and Precipitation, that from thence it was call'd by the Name of The Battel of Spurs, becauſe they more us'd their Spurs in running away, than their Lances in fighting. In this Battel the Duke of Longueville, the Marqueſs of Rotelin, the Lord Clermont, and ſeveral others were were taken Priſoners, with ſix Standards; for which Succeſs the King and the Emperor congratulated each other upon the Place of Battel, and afterwards aſſiſted at a ſolemn Te Deum. A few Days after, the Engliſh having obtain'd ſome new Advantages, the Town deſpairing of Relief ſurrender'd it ſelf and Ordnance to the King of England, upon Condition that the Garriſon might depart in an honourable manner with all their Arms and Baggage. Upon which, on the twenty fourth of Auguſt, the King, ſtill having the Precedence of the Emperor, enter'd the Town, and din'd in the Biſhop's Palace; where it was at length reſolv'd that the Town and Fortifications ſhould be demoliſh'd, all but the Cathedral Church, and religious Houſes; and all the Ordnance was ſent to Aire, to be kept there for the King's Uſe.

After this it was concluded, that the King ſhould lay Siege to the City of Tournay in Flanders; whereupon he ſet forwards in three Bodies: The Earl of Shrewsbury led the Vanguard; the King and the Emperor the main Battel, and the Lord Herbert the Rere-ward. In this Order the King's Army advanc'd towards Tournay; but by the way, he went and viſited young Prince Charles of Spain, afterwards Emperor, and the Lady Margaret his Governeſs, in the Town of Liſle; where he was entertain'd with all Magnificence and Reverence. Being come within three Miles of Tournay, he ſent Garter King at Arms to ſummon the Place; But the Inhabitants, tho' they had but few Soldiers amongſt them, ſtood upon their Defence. Whereupon the King inveſted it on all Sides, and made ſuch fierce Batteries upon it, that tho' it was written on the Gates of the Town, Thou haſt never loſt thy Virginity, yet now it was forc'd to ſubmit, and likewiſe to pay ten thouſand Pounds Sterling, and an annual Penſion of four thouſand Pound Tournois for the Space of ten Years. And then Thomas Wolſey, the King's Almoner, who was now made Biſhop of the Place, calling before him all the Citizens, young and old, ſwore them to the King of England; the Number of whom was eighty thouſand Souls. This done the King enter'd the Town triumphantly, and calling to his Preſence Edward Guilford, William Fitz-Williams, John Danſy, William Tyler, William Huſſey, Chriſtopher Garniſh, and ſome other valiant Gentlemen, he gave them the Honour of Knighthood. And then remembring the honourable Entertainment the Prince of Spain and the Lady Margaret had given him at Liſle, he invited them ſolemnly to his new City of Tournay, and conducted them into the Place with great Splendor and Triumph. During their Abode here, among other publick Entertainments, there were held ſolemn Juſts and Tournaments, the King and his Companion in thoſe warlike Exerciſes, Brandon Lord Liſle, victoriouſly anſwering all Comers. Beſides theſe there were Banquets, Dancings and Masks, after an extraordinary Manner; and this was King Henry's Cuſtom and Diſpoſition, that he could not with-hold from Revellings in the midſt of Arms and War; and fair Ladies and brave Soldiers were equally in his Eſteem. After he had concerted ſome new Meaſures with the Emperor, and finding the Seaſon far advanc'd, he left the Government of Tournay to Sir Edward Poynings, took leave of the Emperor, and return'd firſt to Calais, and ſo into England, to the general Reputation of his Arms throughout the Nation.

Great Entertainments.

The King returns to England.

But this was not the only Reputation gain'd by the Engliſh Arms this Year: For whilſt King Henry was employ'd in his War againſt France, James the Fourth King of Scotland, retaining in his Mind ſome Reſentments, thought he could not more ſeaſonably revenge himſelf, and more conveniently oblige the French King, than at this Time to invade the Kingdom of England. Therefore, having firſt denounc'd War by his Herald, he ſent the Lord Humes his Chamberlain, to forage the Borders; which Sir William Bulmer hearing, us'd that Diligence, that he overtook and fought with him in his Retreat, ſo that he recover'd a rich Booty. King James hereupon in Perſon, with an Army of fifty thouſand Men or more, enter'd the Country, and after a few Days Siege took Norham Caſtle. Upon which Thomas Earl of Surry haſten'd his Army, conconſiſting of twenty ſix thouſand Men, appointing his Son the Lord Admiral to come by Sea, and meet him near Alnwick; which was perform'd by this gallant Lord, who brought a thouſand Men with him; whom when the Earl had view'd, and given neceſſary Orders, he march'd towards King James, who had remov'd to a Hill call'd Flodden, on the Edge of Mount Cheviot, where he ſtrongly intrench'd his Army. Here the Earl of Surry deſir'd nothing more than a Battel, finding all the adjacent Country ſo forag'd and pillag'd, that he could not long ſubſiſt: Therefore on September the fourth he thought fit to ſend Rouge-Croix Herald, with a Trumpet, and Inſtructions to King James, to declare to him, That in regard he had violated his Faith and League, and in a Hoſtile Manner enter'd the Engliſh Ground, that on Friday next he would give him Battel, if he would ſtay ſo long as to accept it. His Son the Admiral ſo requir'd the Herald to certifie King James of his Voyage by Sea; and becauſe he could meet no Scotch Ships there, he landed, that he might juſtifie Andrew Barton's Death: Adding further, As he expected no Mercy from his Enemies, ſo he would ſpare none, but the King himſelf, if he fell into his Hands; and to make all good, he would be in the Front of the Battel. King James receiv'd the Meſſage with Joy, and as he was a Prince of great Courage, by his own Herald he aſſur'd the Earl, That he did ſo much deſire to ingage with him, that if he had been at Edinburgh, he would have left all Buſineſs for that Purpoſe; and therefore he would not fail to abide Battel at the appointed Day. After that the Herald deliver'd to the Earl a Proteſtation, and a ſhort Vindication of his Maſter's Proceedings.

The Earl of Surry marches againſt him.

Upon the Return of the Meſſage, the Earl advanc'd within three Miles of Floddon; but perceiving that King James ſtill kept upon the Hill, which was inacceſſable, he ſent Rouge-Croix again with a Letter ſubſcrib'd by himſelf, his Son, and divers other Noblemen and Knights, where in reſpectful Terms, they provok'd him to deſcend from his Fortifications, and fight in a large Plain between them call'd Milfield, inſiſting alſo upon the Validity of his own Meſſage. But receiving no ſatisfactory Anſwer, the Earl remov'd with his Army to ſuch a Camp, that if the Scotch did not leave the Advantage of their Situation, he might cut off all their Proviſions. This caus'd the King to change his Meaſures, who firing his Huts, covertly remov'd by the Benefit of the Smoak, but ſtill kept on the high Ground, where he made a Stand. Immediately the Earl travers'd ſome Bogs and Marſhes, 'till he arriv'd at the Bottom of this Bank; where finding the Aſcent not very ſteep, he appointed the Vanguard to his two Sons, the main Battel to himſelf, and the Rere to Sir Edward Stanley, and then bravely incourag'd his Men to Battel. The King well obſerving this, and judging the Engliſh were making a very diſadvantageous Approach, he exhorted his Men to behave themſelves like valiant Soldiers, and thereupon join'd Battel. The Earl's youngeſt Son Sir Edmund Howard at firſt was in ſome Diſtreſs, by the ſingular Valour of the Earls of Lenox and Argile, but the Lord Dacres coming to his Succour, as alſo one Heron, the Fight was renew'd; the Earl's eldeſt Son the Lord Thomas purſu'd his Cauſe better, but met with a noble Oppoſition from the Earls of Crawford and Montroſs. The King's Battalion and that of the Earl's likewiſe maintain'd a long and cruel Fight. In the mean Time Sir Edward Stanley, by means of his Archers, conſtrain'd the Scotch to deſcend the Hill, and to open their Ranks to avoid the Storms of Arrows, by which they ſeem'd to give one of the firſt Overtures of Victory to the Engliſh. Which being perceiv'd by the King, he redoubl'd his Courage, and perform'd Wonders; but the valiant Lord Thomas Howard, and Sir Edward Stanley, who had defeated their Oppoſites, coming in with the Lord Dacres's Horſe, the Scotch were ſo diſtreſs'd, that for their laſt Defence they caſt themſelves into a Ring. No Man perform'd more than the King in his Perſon; but after a bloody Fight of three Hours, preſſing forwards, he was ſlain in the Field, as the Engliſh Writers aſſert; others ſay afterwards. In concluſion the Scots were defeated, with the Loſs of moſt of their Nobility, one Arch-Biſhop, two Biſhops, four Abbots, and about ten thouſand others. On the Engliſh Side, according to Polydore, there dy'd about five thouſand, tho' others ſay fewer; and this Battel was call'd Floddon-Field, in which the Earl took all the Scotch Ordnance, and particularly ſeven extraordinary fair Culverins, call'd The Seven Siſters. Then giving God Thanks, the Earl diſmiſs'd the greateſt Part of the Army, and retir'd himſelf home, 'till the News of King Henry's coming to Richmond brought him thither; taking order in the mean Time, that the dead Body of King James, being embalmed, ſhould be carry'd firſt to Newcaſtle, and then to Shene in Surry, where it was honourably interr'd. And thus was King James the Fourth cut off in the thirty ninth Year of his Age, and twenty fifth of his Reign, who in regard of his Princely Virtues, deſerv'd a longer Life and Reign; yet we know not how to free him from the Scandal of Breach of Faith in this laſt Expedition. He was ſucceeded in his Kingdom by his Son James the Fifth, then but two Years of Age.

Scots

King James ſlain, and the Scots defeated.

King Henry having gain'd ſuch Advantages over Scotland, where his own Siſter Queen Margaret was now Regent, he thought he could not act more juſtly and prudently, than to beſtow ſuitable Recompences upon his brave Commanders who had been moſt ſerviceable to him. Accordingly upon the ſecond Day of February, Thomas Earl of Surry was by him created Duke of Norfolk, a Title conferr'd on his Father by Richard the Third, but again extinguiſh'd; his eldeſt Son the Lord Thomas Howard being alſo made Earl of Surry; together with which he had an Augmentation of Arms for his Atchievment in Floddon-Field. Sir Charles Somerſet, who in Right of Elizabeth his Wife was Lord Herbert of Chepſtow, &c. was now created Earl of Worceſter. Sir Charles Brandon, Viſcount Liſle, was now alſo created Duke of Suffolk; and Sir Edward Stanley, not long after made Lord Mounteagle. Laſtly, the aſpiring Almoner Thomas Wolſey, Biſhop of Tournay, was alſo made Biſhop of Lincoln. And as the King conferr'd Honours upon others, ſo not long after he receiv'd ſome from the Hands of Pope Leo, who ſent him a Cap of Maintenance and a Sword; and being provok'd with the French King, he transferr'd, by Authority of the Lateran Council, the Title of CHRISTIANISSIMUS from him upon King Henry. This with great Pomp and Solemnity was publiſh'd the Sunday following in the Cathedral of St. Paul's, and afterwards attended with extraordinary Revellings, Maſques and Tournaments; in which laſt the King and new Duke of Suffolk were victorious Defendants againſt all Comers; who having the noble Priſoners Duke of Longueville and the Lord Clermont for their Spectators, ſpread the Fame of their Valour and Chivalry into Foreign Nations.

New Advancements.

About this Time the great Friendſhip between King Henry and the Flemmings began to abate upon this Occaſion: King Henry the Seventh his Father had concluded a Match between his Daughter Mary, and Charles Prince of Spain; but by reaſon of her Age, and the want of a ſecure Jointure, it was deferr'd during his Life. But now the preſent King ſeeing his Siſter of a ſuitable Age, began to revive the Contract, and ſignify'd as much to the Council of Flanders, from which he found nothing but formal Excuſes, and unneceſſary Delays. The French King had ſpeedy Intelligence how much King Henry was diſguſted at theſe Spaniſh Proceedings, and reſolv'd to make the moſt advantageous Uſe of it, which was to gain the Princeſs Mary for himſelf, and by that procure Peace with England, now he was ancient and fatigu'd with Wars. For this Purpoſe, he ſo far pleas'd the Pope as he became his Mediator; and both of them ſent Ambaſſadors to King Henry, the Pope to perſuade him to a Peace with France, the French King to treat about a Marriage with the Princeſs Mary. Upon whoſe Embaſſies, King Henry, partly to ſatisfie the Pope, and partly to advance his Siſter, did not unwillingly hearken to their Propoſals. But during this Negotiation, ſome Acts of Hoſtility paſs'd between the Engliſh and French Fleets,

A Treaty with France.

Fleets, and ſome Ravages were committed in both Nations: Yet in no long Time King Henry, by the Advice of his Council, and eſpecially of his then growing Favourite Wolſey, concluded both the Peace with France, and the Marriage of his Siſter Mary with the French King. The Subſtance of the Treaty and Agreement was, that the King of England was to hold Tournay, and King Lewis oblig'd himſelf in a Bond of a Million of Crowns, to be paid at ſeveral Payments to King Henry, in Conſideration of the Expences of the War, and the Arrears of the Penſion ſtipulated in the Year 1492. As to the Marriage, King Henry was to give four hundred thouſand Crowns with his Siſter, and Lewis to aſſign her a Jointure as great as any Queen of France ever had, which ſhe was to enjoy during Life, where-ever ſhe reſided.

The King's Siſter marry'd to King Lewis.

Theſe, and ſome other Articles being concluded, the Princeſs Mary was brought to Dover by King Henry and his Queen, where with an honourable Train ſhe took Shipping, the Duke of Norfolk, the Marqueſs Dorſet, and the Earl of Salisbury, being her chief Conductors. Their Fleet had not paſs'd two Leagues at Sea, before a ſudden Storm ſeparated the Ships, whereof ſome were driven to the Coaſts of Flanders, others to Calais, and that of the Princeſs ſtruck in at Boloign; where by Boats her Train was landed, and her ſelf carry'd on Shore in the Arms of Sir Chriſtopher Garniſh. From hence with thirty ſix Ladies, riding upon fine Horſes trapped with Crimſon Velvet embroider'd with Gold, her own Horſes and Chariot ſet out with Tiſſue Cloth of Gold and Crimſon Velvet, and her ſelf with thoſe Advantages of Beauty that made her ſeem more like an Angel than a Human Creature, ſhe met with King Lewis at Abbeville. There on the ninth of October the Marriage was ſolemniz'd with great Splendor; where the French ſo gaz'd at their new Queen's Beauty, that neither they nor their infirm old King could be ſatisfy'd with any other Object while ſhe was preſent. On the fifth of November ſhe was crown'd Queen of France at St. Denis, at which Time Francis the Dauphin held the Crown over her Head, as being too ponderous for her to wear; and the following Day ſhe was receiv'd into Paris, after a moſt magnificent manner. In Honour of this Marriage and Coronation, the Dauphin had caus'd ſolemn Juſts and Tournaments to be proclaim'd in Paris the ſeventh of November. Upon Notice of which in England, the Duke of Suffolk, the Marqueſs Dorſet, and his four Brothers, with ſeveral other Men of Quality, obtain'd leave of King Henry to be at the Challenge; where they all behav'd themſelves with great Succeſs and Agility, eſpecially the great Duke of Suffolk, whoſe Glory the Dauphin ſo much envy'd, that he caus'd a German, the ſtrongeſt and talleſt in the Court of France, ſecretly to encounter him, purpoſely to have him foil'd: But this turn'd to his greater Honour; for by the Blows he gave the German at Barriers, he ſoon let the Aſſembly know he was his Superior. King Henry at home was no ways inferior in Magnificence; and at publick Juſts he himſelf broke no leſs than three and twenty Spears; and in one ſingle Encounter he overthrew Man and Horſe to the Ground. About this Time the King rejoic'd at the Birth of a Son, which in a ſhort Time dy'd. Nor was the Satisfaction of King Lewis much longer; who being aged and infirm, after eighty Days Poſſeſſion rather than Enjoyment of his Queen, dy'd upon the firſt of January 1515. He was ſucceeded by Francis de Valois, a Prince of about twenty two Years of Age; in which, as well as Manners, there was much Conformity between King Henry and him; particularly they were judg'd two the nobleſt Perſonages, not only of their Quality, but of their Time.

She is crown'd in France.

III. All Things being now in a State of Peace, and Francis the French King deſirous to hold a good Correſpondence with England, King Henry ſent over Charles Duke of Suffolk and others to the French Court to ſtrengthen the Alliance, and to bring over the Queen Dowager his Siſter into England. Here that Lady caſt her Eyes upon the graceful Duke of Suffolk, and entertain'd ſuch ſuch an Affection for him, that ſhe made no Scruple to diſcover her Inclinations to both Kings; deſiring Francis to mediate the Marriage, and her Brother Henry to approve of it. Francis, fearing leſt Henry by contracting her elſewhere might enter into ſome greater Alliances, readily conſented; but Henry, for the Conſervation of his Dignity, kept at a little Diſtance; however he had long ſince deſign'd her for the Duke. The young Queen believing that this Formality was the greateſt Impediment, proteſted by Letters, That if the King would have her marry'd otherwiſe than to her own Inclinations, ſhe would ſhut her ſelf up in a Religious Houſe. Therefore to obviate all Difficulties, by a peculiar ſort of Courtſhip, ſhe prefix'd to the Duke the Term of four Days to gain her Conſent, in which, if he did not prevail, he ſhould for ever loſe all Hopes of obtaining her. And thus without any Pomp they were privately marry'd in France; and by the Interceſſion of King Francis and Wolſey at home, they ſoon recover'd King Henry's Favour. After which they took their leave of the French Court; the Queen carrying with her of the Jewels, Plate and Tapeſtriesof Lewis the Twelfth, to the value of two hundred thouſand Crowns; among which was a noble Diamond call'd Le Miroir de Naples, which King Francis would have gladly redeem'd at a great Price. Orders were alſo taken for the Payment of her Jointure, which was ſixty thouſand Crowns a Year. Being arriv'd in England, the Marriage between them was publickly ſolemniz'd with great Pomp and peculiar Sort of Tournaments, in which King Henry highly ſignaliz'd himſelf; and ever after the Duke continu'd a ſpecial Favourite at Court, where he generally ſhew'd himſelf more of the brave Courtier, than the profound Stateſman.

She marries to Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk.

Cavendiſh &c.

But the greateſt Favourite of all was Thomas Wolſey, whoſe Power and Grandeur began now to ſwell to a prodigious Extent, and to ſuch as had not been known in the Engliſh Nation. This extraordinary Perſon was Son to an honeſt poor Man of Ipſwich in Suffolk; and by means of a handſom Education, his own Parts and Dexterity, he rais'd himſelf through Variety of Preferments, to the higheſt Stations both in Church and State, and to the Splendor and Magnificence of any Prince in Europe. His firſt Preferment was a Fellowſhip in Magdalen College in Oxford; from whence removing to Calais, he got to be Chaplain to King Henry the Seventh, who ſucceſſively made him Dean of Lincoln, chief Almoner, and a Privy-Counſellor. The preſent King Henry coming to the Crown, he ſo well conform'd himſelf to his Diſpoſition, that he ſoon engroſs'd his Favour to himſelf. Upon the taking of Tournay, the King made him Biſhop of that Place, and not long after Biſhop of Lincoln; and this Year upon Cardinal Bembridges's Death, he was made Arch-Biſhop of York; and by the Intereſt of the two Kings of England and France, the Pope made him a Cardinal, and likewiſe Legate a Latere, by which he had a Power ſuperior to the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury. Then that there might be no interfering between the Legantine and Chancery Courts, he was likewiſe made Lord Chancellor of England, in Room of Arch-Biſhop Warham, who now retir'd to give Place to this aſpiring Favourite. Being thus at the Helm of Church and State, he made the moſt ſplendid Appearance of any Subject in England, and beſides the Purſe and Mace, he ever had two large Silver Croſſes and Pillars born before him by the talleſt Prieſts in the Kingdom. For the better Maintenance of this chargeable Eſtate, the King firſt beſtow'd on him the Biſhoprick of Durham, and after that the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter and the Abby of St. Albans in Comendam; and with them he held in Farm the Biſhopricks of Bath, Worceſter and Hereford, injoy'd by Foreign Incumbents; and had likewiſe the Diſpoſal of all the Eccleſiaſtical Benefices in England. From all theſe, and the numerous Preſents he receiv'd from Foreign Princes, his annual Incomes equal'd, if not exceeded the Revenues of the Crown; and in this Capacity he kept eight hundred Servants, among whom were nine or ten Lords, fifteen Knights, and forty Eſquires. All foreign Treaties and Places of Truſt at home were of his ordering; he acted as he pleas'd, and his Aſcendant over the King was ſuch, that there never appear'd any Party againſt him all this Time. He us'd the moſt inſinuating Artifices to gain the King to himſelf; undertaking to eaſe him of the Burden of Government, and to give him all the Pleaſure of it; he was the moſt earneſt and readieſt in all the Council to advance the King's only Will and Intention; and whereas others advis'd him to leave his Pleaſures, and attend his Affairs, this Prelate perſuaded him to what was moſt agreeable to his Appetite. Having got into ſuch Power, he obſerv'd the King's Inclinations exactly, and follow'd his Intereſts cloſely: For tho' he made other Princes retain him with great Preſents and Penſions, yet he never engag'd the King into any Alliance that was not for his Advantage. He was an extraordinary Miniſter of State, but as a Churchman the Diſgrace of his Profeſſion; being lewd and vicious, and exorbitantly proud and oſtenſtatious, and indeed the main Debaucher of his Soveraign Maſter. In a Word he had all the Qualifications neceſſary for a great State's-Man, and all the Vices ordinary in a great Favourite.

Margaret Queen Dowager of Scotland flies into England.

During the grand Power of this Cardinal, King Henry's Siſter Margaret Queen of Scotland, having marry'd Archibald Douglaſs, Earl of Angus, by reaſon of Factions among the Lords of Scotland, was compell'd to fly into England with her Husband, and ſeek Protection from her Brother; who aſſign'd her the Caſtle of Harbottle, in Northumberland for her Reſidence, where ſhe was deliver'd of a Daughter nam'd Margaret. From thence the King ſent for her and her Husband to come to his Court; and thereupon, with a noble Attendance, Queen Margaret riding upon a white Palfrey, which the Queen of England had preſented to her, behind Sir Thomas Parre, paſs'd through London to Baynard's Caſtle, and from thence to the Court at Greenwich: But her Husband, the Earl of Angus, was ſecretly before departed into Scotland, upon which King Henry with ſome Reſentment ſaid It was done like a Scot. However ſhe was joyfully receiv'd by the King and Queen, and her Siſter Mary Queen Dowager of France; who all enjoy'd a Happineſs rare for Princes in that Kind, which was to ſee each other, after they had been once diſpos'd in foreign Parts. But as this was a Meeting of three Queens, ſo the Occaſion of it proceeded from the Marriage of two of them to inferior Perſons, the Duke of Suffolk and the Earl of Angus. King Henry, for the more Honour of her Arrival, order'd ſolemn Juſts, in which he himſelf was the principal Challenger, and overthrew Sir William Kingſton, both Man and Horſe. In the ſame Year dy'd Ferdinand King of Spain, Father to Queen Catharine; for whom King Henry caus'd a ſolemn Obſequy to be kept in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's.

But the Mourning laſted not long; for it was ſhortly after ſucceeded by the Birth of the Princeſs Mary, afterwards Soveraign Queen of England. As to Queen Margaret, after ſhe had been a Year in England, ſhe return'd into Scotland.

Cardinal Wolſey's Management.

The publick Affairs being now left to the Management of Cardinal Wolſey, ſeveral great Men began to withdraw themſelves from the Court, as firſt the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, who went and liv'd in their reſpective Dioceſſes; next the Duke of Norfolk, who having borrow'd Mony of the King for his Journey into France, and being unable through the Cardinal's Oppoſition to obtain a Remiſſion of it, or otherwiſe to pay it immediately, he retir'd into the Country; ſo that the Cardinal had an uncontrol'd Liberty to govern all, under Colour of doing the King Service. For in whatſoever he acted, that was his Pretence, tho' in many Things he rather innovated than reform'd; from whence Clamours often aroſe among the People, who underſtanding nothing ſo much as their Ancient Cuſtoms, ſeldom endure a Change, tho' for their real Advantage. In this Year all who manag'd any Mony for the King in the Wars or otherwiſe, were by the Cardinal's Command call'd in Queſtion; among whom ſome by Bribery, and ſome by Policy eſcap'd, while others others were condemn'd in great Sums; ſo that he may be ſaid to have ſo much of a good Servant, as not to ſuffer any other to deceive his Maſter. To accompany this Severity alſo, he caus'd Perjury to be vigorouſly puniſh'd, in which he is much commended. Some Courts alſo were erected in Favour of poor People, againſt the Oppreſſions of the Great, which at firſt were much frequented; but at laſt the People receiving many Delays and Diſappointments in their Suits, they left them, and had recourſe to the Common Law; as too much fearing Innovations. And the Character of Juſt cannot be deny'd to the Cardinal, in all Affairs of publick Judicature, of which he was ever apparently ſtudious; ſo that where Diſorders were committed, he generally puniſh'd with Severity. This he did both in Eccleſiaſtical as well as Civil Affairs, by which means he accidentally became a prime Inſtrument in that great Work of the Reformation of the Church; which ſort of Work is oftentimes by the ordering of Providence effected by the Hands of wicked and ſcandalous Agents.

About this Time there happen'd a great Riot and Sedition in the City of London, from ſome Citizens and Apprentices of the poorer Sort, who being offended that all their chief Cuſtomers were won from them by the Diligence and Induſtry of Strangers, and others pretending to have receiv'd ſome Affronts and Indignities from them, found ſome Occaſion to make an Inſurrection againſt them; and the rather, becauſe the ſeditious Sermons of one Doctor Bele, by the Inſtigation of John Lincoln a Broker, had not a little incited them. The Apprentices and others being gather'd together in great Numbers, began with breaking open ſome Priſons, from whence they took divers Perſons committed thither for abuſing and hurting of Strangers: Nor could the Mayor or Sheriffs then preſent hinder this Outrage; nor Sir Thomas More, tho' much reſpected by them, as being late Judge of the Sheriffs Court, and a Native of the City. The Priſoners now let looſe adviſ'd the Multitude to run to the Houſe of one Meutas a French Man, much hated by them; where they kill'd ſome, chac'd the reſt, and plunder'd all his Goods; from whence they went to other Strangers Houſes, which they pillag'd in the like manner. The Cardinal hearing of this, and not being much more in the Peoples Favour than the Strangers, fortify'd his Houſe with Men and Ordnance; but the Lieutenant of the Tower proceeded further, and diſcharg'd ſome of the great Pieces among them. This, with the Completion of their deſign'd Revenge, caus'd them about three a Clock in the Morning to diſperſe and go home. But on their Way, they were firſt apprehended by the City Officers, and afterwards by ſome Followers of the Earls of Shrewsbury and Surry, who hearing of this Diſorder, and taking the Inns-of-Court Gentlemen with them, clear'd the Streets of this unruly Company. The Beginning of the Sedition was hereupon examin'd, and Doctor Bele and John Lincoln ſent to the Tower. About three Days after the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Surry his Son, with about thirteen hundred armed Men, came into the City, and joining with the Lord Mayor, proceeded legally againſt the chief Offenders, to the Terror of the Citizens, who were the more apprehenſive, becauſe the Duke of Norfolk, upon the killing of a Prieſt of his, was reported to have ſaid, I pray God I may once have the Citizens in my Power. By the Statute of the Second of Henry the Fifth, they were all found guilty of High-Treaſon: But however much Mercy was ſhew'd; for of two hundred and ſeventy eight Priſoners, only Lincoln and three or four more, were hang'd drawn and quarter'd; and about ten more were hang'd on Gibbets erected in the Streets. All the reſt in their Shirts, bound in Ropes and Halters about their Necks, were brought to Weſtminſter-Hall, where the King ſate attended with his principal Nobility: And when the Cardinal had charg'd them with the Greatneſs of their Offence, they all cry'd out Mercy, Mercy! upon which the King by the Mouth of the Cardinal pardon'd them all; which Clemency purchas'd the King no ſmall Love amongſt the People.

An Inſurrection in London.

It is quell'd.

All are pardon'd but a few.

The Beginning of the Reformation in Germany.

In this ſame Year were the Beginnings of a much more remarkable Commotion in Germany, which did not only raiſe a grand Fermentation in that Country, but in a few Years affected all England, and the greateſt part of Chriſtendom. This was in ſome meaſure occaſion'd from the mighty Progreſs of Selim the Turkiſh Sultan, whoſe powerful Arms Pope Leo propos'd to repel with the utmoſt Vigour both by Sea and Land. In order to that he ſent his Emiſſaries to all Chriſtian Princes; and to excite the Peoples Devotion, and procure their Alms and Benevolence for ſo great a Work, he ſent ſeveral Agents to preach Indulgences in every Province. The Conditions of which were, that without Diſtinction of Perſons or Sins, whoſoever perform'd certain Religious Rites, and paid certain Sums of Mony, ſhould obtain a full Remiſſion of all their Sins, and ſeveral other Benefits beſides. The Management and Sale of theſe appear'd very ſcandalous to many good People, but eſpecially to a certain Monk nam'd Martin Luther, a Doctor and Reader in Theology in the Univerſity of Wittenberg, a Man of a bold Spirit, an impetuous Reſolution, and eloquent Tongue. The Agents had furniſh'd him with ſufficient Matter for Reproach: For they made direct Marchandize of what was judg'd the moſt ſacred Treaſures of the Church; they kept their Courts or Shops rather in Taverns, and conſum'd a great part of what they collected in Debaucheries; and beſides it was certainly known, that the Pope deſign'd to apply conſiderable Sums to his own proper Uſe. Now tho' it was more agreeable to Reaſon and Policy to have remov'd the occaſion of this Clamour; yet Pride and Intereſt ſo far prevail'd, that by neglecting, and perhaps deſpiſing the Arguments of a private Monk, the Conteſt ſoon grew high, and was gradually blown up by Declamations, Theſes's, and Books on either Side. Frederick Duke of Saxony, whoſe Wiſdom and Virtue was exemplary in Germany, both maintain'd and animated Luther, for the Honour of his new Univerſity of Wittenberg. He at firſt began with propoſing of Doubts, then being hard beſet and roughly treated, he engag'd to maintain and make them good; and afterwards meeting with greater Severity, he proceeded openly to declaim againſt the Pope, the Corruptions and Doctrines of the Church of Rome, ſo as to bring about that mighty Work of the REFORMATION. So ſmall a Spark as this Colliſion firſt made, could never have rais'd ſo great a Fire, if the World had not been ſtrongly diſpos'd to it, by the juſt Prejudice they had conceiv'd againſt the Popiſh Clergy, whoſe Ignorance and lewd Lives had ſo expos'd them to Contempt and Hatred, that every one was ready to join with ſuch as oppos'd their Practices.

A D. 1518. Reg. 9/10.

Wolſey's Grandeur and Power.

The like Corruptions were at the ſame Time in England, and the Effects of theſe great Changes in Religion were ſoon felt in that Country, where now Cardinal Wolſey reign'd like a Pope of this other World. For this Year being made Legate a Latere, he was by a Bull from Pope Leo enabled to viſit not only Monaſteries, but all the Clergy of England, and to diſpence with Church-Laws for one whole Year: Which tho' it gave him great Power, it caus'd much Offence, as abridging the Authority of the Biſhops, and ſcandalizing the whole Clergy, who were extreamly defam'd by the Cardinal's Informations. And now the Pride and Oſtentation of this Prelate did ſo much increaſe, that on ſolemn Feaſt-Days, he would ſay Maſs after the Manner of the Pope himſelf; not only Biſhops and Abbots ſerving him in the Office, but even Earls and Dukes giving him Water and the Towel. All which was but a kind of Prelude to what follow'd: For, erecting a particular Court of Juriſdiction, which he call'd the Legate's Court, and placing in it as Judge one John Allen Doctor of Law, a Perſon of Infamy, all manner of Rapines and Extortions were committed there. For making Enquiry into the Lives of every Man, no Offence eſcap'd Cenſure and Puniſhment, unleſs they privately gave Mony: And as the Rules of Conſcience are in many Caſes of larger Extent than thoſe of the Law, ſo he found Means to ſearch into their moſt ſecret Receſſes. Beſides, under under this Colour, he arrogated a Power to call in queſtion the Executors of Wills and Teſtaments. He ſummon'd alſo all Religious Perſons whatſoever; who caſting themſelves at his Feet, were ſeverely chidden, and terrify'd with Expulſion, 'till they had compounded: Beſides all Spiritual Benefits that fell, were conferr'd on his Creatures. The Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury underſtanding how all Orders were thus treated by the Cardinal, went and acquainted the King; who reply'd, He ſhould not have heard of it but from him, and deſir'd him to go and tell Wolſey, that if any Thing be amiſs, he would amend it. Upon which this grave Perſon ſeriouſly admoniſh'd him to be cautious, and declar'd That, in concerning himſelf with the Wills of the Dead, he aſſum'd a Power not claim'd by the Pope himſelf; and his diſpoſing ſome Benefits in the Gift of the Nobility, he thought was an Uſurpation upon them. All the Uſe that Wolſey made of this was to hate the Arch-Biſhop, with whom he was formerly offended, only becauſe he ſtil'd himſelf his Brother, in the Subſcription of his Letter: But to prevent any ill Offices from him he temper'd his Speech for this Time. But ſhortly after his Agent John Allen being accus'd by one London a Prieſt, it ſufficiently appear'd that all the former Allegations againſt Wolſey were true; which caus'd the King to rebuke the Cardinal ſo ſharply, that after this Time he became better, or at leaſt more wary than before.

He is a little check'd.

But ſtill the Cardinal loſt no part of his Intereſt or the King's Favour; and ſtill retain'd the ſame Reputation and Influence in all foreign Courts, and particulary in that of France; between which and that of England he manag'd Affairs with ſuch a nice Policy, that King Henry once openly ſaid, That now he perceiv'd Wolſey would govern both. The French King at this Time being very deſirous to have the City of Tournay reſtor'd to him, by large Preſents and larger Promiſes won the Cardinal to move the King in it; who upon his plauſible Perſuaſions was willing to treat about it. Upon which Account the French King ſent the Lord Bonquet High-Admiral of France, and the Biſhop of Paris, who with an unruly Retinue of about twelve hundred Men, arriv'd in England; and on the twenty ſeventh of September were met at Black-Heath by the Earl of Surry, High-Admiral of England, attended with above five hundred Gentlemen and others, who conducted them to London, where they were lodg'd in Merchant Taylor's-Hall. On the laſt of September, the Ambaſſadors went to the Court at Greenwich, where after a long Communication, a Treaty was at laſt concluded under Pretence of a Marriage between the Dauphine of France, then not a Year old, and the Princeſs Mary, Daughter to the King of England: That in Name of her Marriage Mony, Tournay ſhould be deliver'd to the French King, he paying to the King of England, for the Caſtle he had built in that City, ſix hundred thouſand Crowns in twelve Years: And if the Marriage ſhould not take Effect, then Tournay ſhould be again reſtor'd to the King of England. Theſe and other Articles being concluded, noble Entertainments and great Preſents being made, the Princeſs Mary, of two Years of Age, was promis'd and betroth'd to the Dauphine in St. Paul's Cathedral. And the Earl of Worceſter, with the Biſhop of Ely, and a Train equal to the French Ambaſſadors, were ſent to require Performance from King Francis, who thereupon took his Oath, gave eight Hoſtages for Payment upon the Surrender of Tournay, and contracted the Eſpouſals in the Name of his Infant Son the Dauphine.

An Embaſſie from France.

The young Princeſs Mary contracted to the Dauphine.

In Conſequence of this, on the eighth of February following, the Earl of Worceſter deliver'd up Tournay to the French King; but before that was perform'd, the Cardinal took ſuch Care that he ſhould have an annual Stipend of twelve thouſand Livres Tournois, for relinquiſhing the Biſhoprick of that Place. Thus was Tournay gain'd by the French, and divers concurrent Articles not perform'd afterwards: And here it is obſervable that it was fatal to the Princeſs Mary to be a kind of Author of the Loſs of all the Engliſh Poſſeſſions in France; Tour- Tournay reſtor'd to the French.

Tournay being reſtor'd upon Pretence of Dowry now, and Calais loſt in the Time of her Match with King Philip the Second. King Francis having obtain'd this Point, about the ſame Time aſpir'd to another much greater, which was to be Emperor of Germany. For in the Beginning of this Year, the Emperor Maximilian dy'd; who having been Knight of the Garter, his Obſequies were ſolemnly kept in St. Paul's by King Henry and the Knights of that Society. Upon his Death King Francis us'd great Endeavours to obtain the Empire; but after many Contrivances and Struggles, it was given to Charles King of Spain; for Joy of which great Solemnities were perform'd by the Order of King Henry, on the ſeventh Day of July. In the ſame Month an Enterview had been appointed between the Kings of England and France, but the Death of the Emperor, and what follow'd upon it, caus'd it to be deferr'd 'till the ſucceeding Year; both Kings in the mean Time agreeing not to cut off their Beards 'till they ſaw each other. Francis having now a ſecond Son, deſir'd the King of England to give him his Name; which was kindly acknowledg'd, and his Name call'd Henry, afterwards King, and ſecond of that Name. Nor did Francis omit any thing that might argue his Reſpect; therefore with continu'd Gifts he ſollicited Cardinal Wolſey, whom he call'd his Father and Couſin, ſent Preſents to the Princeſs Mary, and left nothing unattempted which might ſecure him on that Side, knowing well how puiſſant an Enemy the new Emperor might prove. Charles on the other Side, conſidering how much it concern'd him to keep the Cardinal at his Devotion, ſoon countermin'd the French King in his own way of Bribes and Preſents. Francis fearing the Conſequences, timely provided to keep the Scotch his Friends; and tho' it was formerly his Motion to comprize the young King and that Nation in general within his League with England, yet now he ſtrove as much to withdraw them: Therefore when King Henry ſent to require their Oath to the Treaty, they refus'd; ſo that all that Buſineſs ended in a Truce only for one Year: And here the Cardinal's extream Ambition began to ſhow it ſelf more openly; who deſigning to make himſelf Pope, always comply'd with thoſe whom he thought his beſt Aſſiſtants. Therefore now that Charles the Emperor was grown the more potent; and beſides it being manifeſt that to which Party ſoever King Henry inclin'd, he would turn the Balance, he hop'd by favouring of Charles to obtain his Deſire. Nor wanted he continual Preſents on his Part, which were equal if not exceeding the others; ſo that now he rejected the Aſſiſtance of Francis, tho' he had actually offer'd him the Voices of fourteen Cardinals, and chiefly apply'd himſelf to the Emperor.

A. D. 1520. Reg. $\frac{11}{12}$.

Yet ſtill the Cardinal promoted the Enterview between the two Kings of England and France, which was appointed to be betwixt Guiſnes and Ardres; for having an equal Mixture of Pride and Vanity, he was deſirous of bringing and ſeeing thoſe two together, whom he was generally thought to govern. He knew alſo that his Preſents would not be ſmall; therefore he perſuaded King Henry to build a new Houſe near Guiſnes, as might be worthy of the Reception of two ſuch Monarchs; and to perform this, two thouſand Artificers were employ'd. He alſo ſummon'd the prime Nobility to attend the King this Journey, with that Splendor which might become Perſons of their Dignity; and becauſe the Duke of Buckingham repin'd at the Expence, it prov'd one great Step to his Ruin. For the greater Magnificence, a King of Arms was ſent to the Engliſh on the Part of the French King, with a Proclamation declaring that in June next, two Kings Henry and Francis, with fourteen Aids, would in a Camp between Guiſnes and Ardres, anſwer all Comers at Tilt, Tourney and Barriers; and the like Proclamation was made by Clarenceaux in the French Court. Theſe friendly Defiances ſtopp'd not here; for they were ſent by King Henry to the Low-Countries, Burgundy and Germany, and by King Francis into Spain and Italy. And now the Principal Noblemen having made themſelves ready to attend their Soveraign Maſter, and none more more magnificently than the Duke of Buckingham. The King went to Canterbury on the twenty fifth Day of May, deſigning there to keep his Whitſontide.

In the mean time Charles the Emperor, who much deſir'd to break this deſign'd Enterview, had ſo contriv'd his Voyage from Spain, that the Day following, he himſelf, accompany'd with many Lords and beautiful Ladies, came unexpectedly to Dover. The Cardinal hearing of this, poſted away immediately to aſſure him of his Welcome; and the King very early next Day came to Dover Caſtle, where the Emperor was lodg'd, who met him on the Stairs, with all the Marks of Courteſie and Affection. Charles had great Deſigns at this Time, as well as the French King, therefore he continu'd his Endeavours to break this Enterview, as well as all other Correſpondence with Francis; and knowing no Prince could ſo much help or hinder him, as the King of England, he offer'd more advantageous Conditions than Francis had done. And to make all the more acceptable, he made large Preſents to the Cardinal, promiſing upon a Vacancy to make him Pope; and that he might the better exceed his Competitor Francis in Preſents, a great Part of the Spoils of Mexico had been brought him. As to the Enterview King Henry excus'd himſelf to the Emperor, as being ingag'd in Honour to meet Francis; but as to any Treaty, he would be as ſerviceable as he could. From thence then King Henry invited him to Canterbury, where he with great Satisfaction ſaw his Aunt Queen Catharine; but he was much more affected with the admirable Beauty of the Queen Dowager of France, once deſign'd for his Wife; and ſuch paſſionate Emotions aroſe in his Mind, that he could not be perſuaded to dance with the reſt of the illuſtrious Company. And now having paſs'd over the Whitſon Holy-Days in theſe Sports and Entertainments which the King gave him, he departed to Sandwich, took Shipping, and arriv'd at his Native Country of Flanders; while King Henry the ſame Day paſs'd to Dover, and from thence with all his noble Train and Company to Calais.

The Emperor endeavours to break it by coming into England.

On the fourth Day of June, King Henry, with the two Queens and the reſt of his Train, remov'd to his new built Palace near Guiſnes, being a Square of Timber every Side containing three hundred and twenty eight Foot; the Parts of which extraordinary Building, being artificially fram'd in England, were now put together, and afterwards taken aſunder, and brought home. King Francis had another Building to anſwer this, near Ardres, which like the other was moſt ſumptuouſly furniſh'd. Before the Kings met, the Cardinal went to viſit Francis, and to treat with him concerning ſome Particulars relating to the Marriage between the Dauphine and the Princeſs Mary, which were ſoon concluded. On the following Day the famous Enterview began with a Signal from a Warning-Piece, when both the Kings were mounted, and moſt magnificently attended. The Meeting of theſe two great and beautiful Monarchs was with the Sound of Trumpets, and all the Solemnity that could be invented for Perſons of their Rank and Character; and being diſmounted, after mutual Embraces, they walk'd Arm in Arm to a Pavilion of Cloth of Gold erected for that Purpoſe; where, after they had made their ſeveral Compliments, they took leave, and return'd to their reſpective Lodgings. Two Days after, both Kings came to view the Camp or Place of Exerciſe, being three hundred Yards long, and a hundred and ſix broad, well ditch'd and fenc'd, with convenient Scaffolds on each Side for the Spectators. There were alſo ſet up two artificial Trees, with the Arms of the two Kings and their ſeveral Aſſiſtants, on which were afix'd the Articles of the Juſts, Tourney and Barriers. The Aſſiſtants or Supporters on the Engliſh Side were the Duke of Suffolk, the Marqueſs Dorſet, Sir William Kingſton, Sir Richard Jerwingham, Sir Giles Capel, Mr. Nicholas Carew, and Mr. Anthony Knevet: On the French Side were the Duke de Vendoſme, Mr. St. Paul, Mr. de Montmorency, Mr. de Bryon, Mr. de St. Meſme, Mr. de Brucall, and Mr. Tabanes. To encounter theſe many noble Per-Perſons and famous Knights come from Foreign Countries; who preſenting their Arms to the Heralds, were admitted to the Exerciſe, which was appointed on Monday the eleventh of June, when the Queens and Ladies took their Places, and two Kings with their Aſſiſtances enter'd the Liſts after a glorious and magnificent manner. We want Room to particularize the Courſes of theſe Champions, which are more largely deſcrib'd by Hall and Hollingſhed; it may be ſufficient to take Notice that none exceeded, if equall'd the two Kings, eſpecially King Henry; who in the ſecond Courſe diſabled Mr. de Grandeville, and after that ſucceſsfully encounter'd Mr. de Montmorency. This Exerciſe continu'd four Days, and on the following Week the Tourney began, in which there was a furious Encounter with Swords; yet the two Kings and their Aſſiſtance beat the Counter-Party to Diſarming; and King Henry particularly got that Honour, that a brave French Nobleman with whom he fought, preſented him with his Horſe as a Gage of his Victory. The next Day King Henry in Tourney likewiſe broke the Pouldron of Mr. de Fleuranges, and forc'd him to depart the Field. The following Day the Barriers began, and after that the caſting of Hand-Spears or Darts, with the Target, and fighting with the two-handed Sword; at which ſort of Exerciſe much Commendation was given to King Henry, who with a few Strokes diſarm'd his Adverſary. Thus with variety of Masks, Interludes, Banquetings, and other Entertainments, and after many Compliments, Embraces and rich Preſents, the two Kings took their Leaves on the twenty fourth Day of June, and King Henry came with all his Train to Calais.

The Valour of King Henry.

Shortly after, the Emperor being at Graveling, with his Aunt the Lady Margaret, King Henry at their Requeſt admitted of a ſecond Enterview. And for that purpoſe going towards Graveling, the Emperor met him in the way, and conducted him thither, giving him and the reſt of the Engliſh all that good Entertainment ſo ſmall a Place could afford. The next Day, the Emperor and the Lady Margaret went with King Henry to Calais; where in the midſt of extraordinary Maskings and Entertainments, Buſineſs was not forgot. For here all the Articles of the Tripartite League between the Emperor and the Kings of England and France were review'd; to which the King of France had ſo fully condeſcended, that he ſent Mr. de Roche to the Emperor with Letters of Credence, That on the Word of a Prince he would inviolably obſerve them all. But he ſoon began to change his Pretenſions, and from this preſent Enterview he began to be jealous of King Henry's Proceedings, as judging his Affection to himſelf and the Emperor inconſiſtent. King Henry having no more Buſineſs at Calais, took his Leave of the Emperor, who made him ſeveral new Preſents, and ſafely return'd with his Train into England; having made a Journey that diſplay'd both his own and the Cardinal's Grandeur.

The Emperor meets him near Calais.

He returns into England.

IV. All Things being in a peaceable Poſture, the Doctrines of Luther began to ſpread themſelves in many Parts, after an extraordinary manner: And King Henry being at leiſure, and much delighting in Learning, thought he could not give better Proof either of his Zeal or Education, than to write againſt Luther. To which alſo he was exaſperated, becauſe Luther had oftentimes ſpoken contemptuouſly of the learned Thomas Aquinas, who was eſteem'd both by the King and Cardinal. He therefore compil'd a Book, wherein he ſtrenuouſly oppos'd Luther in the Point of Indulgences, Number of Sacraments, the Papal Authority, and other Particulars, to be ſeen in that Work of his Entituled De ſeptem Sacramentis. A principal Copy of this being richly bound, was ſent to Pope Leo, and preſented by Doctor John Clark, Dean of Windſor, the King's Ambaſſador, appearing in a full Conſiſtory: The Pope knowing the glorious Preſent he brought, firſt gave him his Foot, and then his Cheeks to kiſs; then receiving the Book, he promis'd to do as much for the Approbation of it to all Chriſtian Princes, as ever was done for St.

Polydor. Holling. Speed. Mezeray. Herbert. &c.

The King writes againſt Luther.

St. Auſtin's or St. Jerom's Works; aſſuring him withal, he would beſtow a publick Title upon King Henry, in the very next Conſiſtory. This accordingly was done, and his Holineſs gave him the honourable Title of DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, in a pompous Letter ſign'd by himſelf and twenty ſeven Cardinals: In which the King took great Pleaſure, always affecting it beyond all his other Titles, tho' ſeveral of the former Kings of England had carry'd the ſame Title, as Spelman informs us. Being thus inclin'd to Learning, the King was much courted by all neceſſitous Scholars, who generally over Europe dedicated their Books to him, with ſuch flattering Epiſtles, that it very much leſſens him to ſee how he delighted in ſuch kind of Extravagances. And indeed of all Things Flattery did generally moſt affect him; and no ſort of Flattery pleas'd him better than to have his great Learning and Wiſdom commended. And in this, his Parliaments, his Courtiers, his Chaplains, Forreigners and Natives, all ſeem'd to vie in their Exceſſes, and came to ſpeak to him in a Stile that was ſcarce allowable to any Creature.

For which the Pope gives him the Title of Defender of the Faith.

But none manag'd him with greater Dexterity than the Cardinal, who had gain'd ſuch an Aſcendant in the Nation, that he could ſacrifice the greateſt Men to his Reſentments; the Force of which were about this Time felt by Edward Stafford Duke of Buckingham, eminent both for his high Blood and his large Revenues. The Cardinal had long hated him for ſpeaking certain detracting Words of him; and it was further ſaid, that the Duke once holding the Baſon to the King, the Cardinal, as ſoon as the King had done waſhing, dipp'd his Hands into the ſame Water, which rais'd ſuch Indignation in the Duke, that he pour'd the Water upon his Feet; and this ſo provok'd the Cardinal that he declar'd He would ſit upon his Skirts. To make a Jeſt of this vulgar Expreſſion, the Duke appear'd before the King the next Day in a Garment without Skirts, and told his Majeſty That it was by Way of Prevention; which added new Fuel to a Fire that could not be extinguiſh'd without his Blood; ſo dangerous it is for great Men to deſcend to Jeſting. To remove all Supporters, the Cardinal had caus'd the Duke's chief Friend and Father-in-law, the Earl of Northumberland, to be impriſon'd upon ſome ſuggeſted Crimes; and his Son-in-law, the Earl of Surry, to be ſent Deputy into Ireland; ſo that his Friends being ſequeſter'd from him, he might be expos'd to the worſt ſort of Accuſations. The Duke being in this Condition, the Cardinal treated ſecretly with one Charles Knevet, whom the Duke had angrily diſmiſs'd from his Stewardſhip, and who thereupon diſcover'd his late Maſter's Life; confeſſing that the Duke by Way of Diſcourſe was accuſtom'd to ſay, That if King Henry dy'd without Iſſue, he would obtain the Crown, and that he would puniſh the Cardinal: Beſides, that he had ſpoken the ſame to George Nevil Lord Abergavenny, who had marry'd his Daughter. The Duke being deſcended from the Daughter of the youngeſt Son of King Edward the Third, it was thought ſufficient Reaſon for his Accuſation; which was ſo aggravated to King Henry, that he order'd him to be apprehended and try'd by his Peers, and the Duke of Norfolk appointed Lord High-Steward for that Time. Being arraign'd, he was accus'd by Knevet, a Monk call'd Hopkins, and others, of ſeveral treaſonable Deſigns to obtain the Crown of England; for which he was found guilty of High-Treaſon, and the Duke of Norfolk with a Flood of Tears deliver'd the formal Sentence of Execution. To which the other ſubmitted, but with a Declaration of his Innocence, and Reſolution not to ſue to the King for his Life. Whereupon he was brought back to the Tower, where all the Favour he receiv'd, was to die the Death of a Nobleman, and be beheaded. Thus ended the Duke of Buckingham, much lamented by the People, who libel'd the Cardinal for it, as being thought criminal rather through Folly and raſh Words, than any real Intention againſt the King's Perſon; and therefore not uncapable of Mercy, if he had ſu'd for it in proper Terms. the Fifth, we have no great certainty; only we obſerve, that together with this Duke, that great Place of High-Conſtable of England remains extinguiſh'd, unleſs ſome extraordinary Occaſion revive it.

About the ſame Time a new War began between two of the principal Monarchs of Europe, the Emperor and the King of France; which at divers Times and Places, continu'd near forty Years, and coſt the Lives of above five hundred thouſand Men. For the compoſing or managing of which, the Cardinal was ſent over to Calais, with a ſplendid Attendance of ſeveral Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and many Knights and Gentlemen. Arriving on the ſecond Day of Auguſt, he was met by the Chancellor of France, and the Count De Paliſſe, attended with four hundred Horſe, as Ambaſſadors from the French King; and the like Number from the Emperor, with Commiſſions to treat and conclude of Peace. There were alſo Ambaſſadors from the Pope, whom the Cardinal mov'd to have his Holineſs to be a Party alſo in the League; but they wanting full Commiſſions, Letters were immediately ſent to Rome about that Affair; and 'till Anſwer might be receiv'd, the Cardinal went to Bruges, to conſult with the Emperor. After thirteen Days magnificent Entertainment, he return'd to Calais; and then immediately proceeded to the Treaty of Peace with the French Commiſſioners, but in a colder Manner than before, as having his Fervor abated by ſome Tranſactions with the Emperor; ſo that nothing material was concluded, but that the Fiſhermen of both Princes might fiſh in the Narrow-Seas without Moleſtation, 'till the End of February following, of which he ſent Advice to each Prince. During the Time of the Cardinal's Stay at Calais, all Writs and Patents were ſeal'd by him at that Place; and no Sheriff could be choſen for want of his Preſence, having the great Seal with him, and ſuch a Power as if the King had been there in Perſon. Before he return'd, he made a new and private League with the Emperor, of which the Lord Herbert has the Particulars; and intimated to the French King, That he doubted whether the King of England would hereafter be as much his Friend as formerly. At which, tho' King Francis was much offended, yet he ſignify'd by his artificial Letters that he would as much as ever continue the King of England's Friend: Only he inveigh'd againſt the Cardinal, as a Man of no Fidelity, and withdrew many Penſions granted by him to Engliſh Men. Shortly after, Tournay was beſieg'd by the Lord Moncada, a Spaniard; and tho' the French ſent great Forces to relieve it, it was ſurrender'd to the Emperor on the laſt Day of November. And here in this Year 1521, we may take notice of the Invention of Muskets, which Bellay ſays were firſt us'd in this War. In the ſame Year, on the firſt of December, dy'd Pope Leo the Tenth; ſome ſay out of Joy, and others by Poiſon.

He makes a private League with the Emperor.

A. D. 1522. Reg. 13, 14. Upon News of this Pope's Death, immediately the Engliſh Cardinal aſpir'd to the Tripple Crown; and ſent Dr. Pace, Dean of St. Paul's with all Speed to Rome, to uſe all poſſible Means to make him Pope. At the ſame Time he wrote earneſt Letters to the Emperor Charles, firſt reminding him of his Promiſe to him; next repreſenting to him how unjuſt and factious it would be in him, openly to have a Pope of his own nominating; and ſince it was the Place of King Henry to be Arbiter of Chriſtendom, it would be his alſo to be the chief Inſtrument of it, if he were elected. Some other Reaſons Pace alſo was order'd to give among the Cardinals at Rome, where he was to repreſent how much occaſion of Calumny the Lutherans and other Enemies of the Church would find, if an unfitting Choice were made at this Juncture; which muſt follow, if any belonging to Charles or Francis were elected. The Cardinal alſo did not forget Francis, to whom Indifferency, if not Favour was promis'd, in caſe he were Pope; which was more than he could hope for any other Way. But before Pace could arrive at Rome, Adrian Cardinal of Tortoſa, and Tutor to Charles the Emperor, was choſen Pope on the ninth of January; tho' not with ſuch an univerſal Conſent, but that Cardinal Wolſey had had ſometimes nine, ſometimes twelve, and ſometimes nineteen Voices. Pace, upon this Diſappointment, having ſecond Inſtructions to countenance his Imployment, departed to Venice, where he mediated a Peace between the Emperor and the Venetians; urging them to join with him and the King of England againſt King Francis, who had firſt broken the common Peace, made 1518, in which the State of Venice was compris'd. But the Venetians, being ingag'd to Francis, only took Time to adviſe upon it.

In the mean Time King Francis, not being fully provided to war with King Henry, continu'd for ſome Time his ſmooth Letters to the Cardinal; but at length between Impatience, and Hopes to give a great Diverſion in Scotland and Ireland, he began to declare himſelf. Therefore, his Subjects having made ſome Attempts upon the Engliſh Merchants, when Satisfaction was requir'd, he deferr'd, or rather deny'd Reparation; which particular Inſults were accompany'd with a main Breach of Treaty, as King Henry alledg'd. For the Duke of Albany, who ought to have continu'd in France, was now after five Years Abſence return'd to his Charge in Scotland; and the Engliſh Merchants diſcovering an approaching Storm, withdrew their Effects from France, and the Scholars their Perſons and Studies from Paris. King Henry alſo wrote ſharply to Francis, declaring, That whatever Excuſes he made for ſending over the Duke of Albany, he knew nothing was done without his Direction; and that it was the Manner of his Country to make Pretenſions; reproaching him alſo with Breach of his Oath. Francis inrag'd at this rough Expoſtulation, objected the laſt Year's ſecret Treaty at Bruges with the Emperor, requiring King Henry to declare himſelf; and caus'd all the Remainder of the Engliſh Merchants Goods to be ſeiz'd, eſpecially thoſe at Bourdeaux, where they had both paid for their Wines, and Cuſtom for them. King Henry upon this confin'd the French Ambaſſador to his Houſe, and ſecur'd all the French and Scotch in his Kingdom for a Time, or 'till they had paid pecuniary Mulcts; and the Vice-Admiral Sir William Fitz-Williams was order'd to Sea with a ſtrong Fleet, to ſecure the Engliſh Merchants, and take what French he could. Moreover becauſe the French deny'd the reſt of the Mony due, and detain'd the French Queen's Dower, the King caus'd the French Hoſtages to be kept under a ſtricter Guard, without uſing further Rigour; and becauſe Francis had urg'd him to declare himſelf, he ſent over Clarenceaux his Herald, declaring, That ſince Francis was the Infringer of the common Peace, the King of England muſt join with the Emperor againſt him. Upon which Ambaſſadors were recall'd on both Sides, and War expected. Howbeit, as the Lord Brook, Sir Edward Poynings, Sir John Peachy, and Sir Edward Belknap, all brave Commanders, dy'd about this Time, of Poiſon or a Peſtilential Air, ſo King Henry loſt thoſe whoſe Service he now moſt needed.

The French King breaks with England.

Still the Cardinal kept up his Reputation to the Height, and perform'd ſeveral popular Acts; and as the Manner of the moſt ſubtle Favourites is uſually to do great rather than good Actions, ſo this Cardinal by the perpetual Variation he ſeem'd to cauſe in the Affairs of Chriſtendom, not only held the Minds of the People in Suſpence, but render'd his Counſels more conſiderable to the King, than if he had purſu'd any one ſingle Way. The laſt Change of which he was Author, had its Beginning at Bruges, where among other Things the Emperor reſolv'd to repair to England, particularly to conſult King Henry concerning the Affairs of Europe, and to treat of a Marriage between him and the King's Daughter the Princeſs Mary; and laſtly, which was a ſingular Pleaſure to King Henry, be perſonally inſtall'd of the Order of the Garter at Windſor, while he himſelf ſate there as Chief. And now for the more magnificent Reception of the Emperor, the Marqueſs Dorſet was ſent to Calais, and the Cardinal with a glorious Train to Dover; where upon the twenty ſixth Day of May he aſſur'd that Prince of his Welcome, which King Henry in Perſon ſoon after confirm'd. From hence the King conducted him to his Palace at Green- wich, where the Queen his Aunt receiv'd him with extraordinary Joy. Here to honour the Emperor's Preſence, Royal Juſts and Tournies were appointed; where the King, the Earl of Devonſhire, and ten Aſſiſtants, bravely kept the Place againſt the Duke of Suffolk, the Marqueſs Dorſet, and ten other Aſſiſtants on their Part. On the ſixth of June the King and Emperor, with all their Trains rod into London, where the City receiv'd them with all the Ornaments and Magnificence of a Coronation; and the Emperor was lodg'd at the Black-Friyars, and all his Lords in the new Palace of Bridewell. On Whit-Sunday the King and Emperor rod to the Cathedral of St. Paul's, where the Cardinal ſung High-Maſs with an unuſual Pomp; in the Beginning of which two Barons gave him Water; after the Goſpel, two Earls; and at the laſt Lavatary two Dukes held the Baſon, which rais'd the Indignation of ſome of the Spaniards. After many Entertainments, they both repair'd to Windſor, where on the nineteenth Day of June, the Emperor wearing the Robes of the Order, and ſitting in his Stall, accompany'd the other Knights in all his Rites and Ceremonies uſual at that Time. Which being done, the two great Monarchs receiv'd the Sacrament together, and ſwore upon the Holy Evangeliſts to obſerve the League concluded between them: The Subſtance of which was, That they ſhould unite their Powers againſt King Francis, and that the Emperor ſhould marry the Princeſs Mary, when ſhe ſhould be at a proper Age. Beſides which, the Emperor gave his Oath to ſave King Henry harmleſs for all the Sums of Mony and Penſions, which were or ſhould be due to him from King Francis, upon former Agreements.

He is inſtall'd Knight of the Garter.

Shortly after the Emperor took his leave of the King, and repair'd to Southampton, where the Earl of Surry the Engliſh Admiral attended as his Convoy, who by a particular Patent had alſo been conſtituted Admiral to the Emperor, on the eighth Day of June. This Earl having accepted of that Honour by King Henry's Conſent, landed his Men in Normandy near Cherbourg; and having deſtroy'd the adjacent Parts, all but religious Houſes, he return'd to Portland. From whence ſetting Sail a ſecond Time, he landed near Morlais in Bretaign, and with ſeven thouſand Men march'd thither; where he fortunately enter'd the Town, which was ſoon plunder'd and burnt, and a rich Booty carry'd to the Fleet. After which the Earl caus'd ſixteen or ſeventeen French Ships, which he found on the Coaſts, to be burnt: And then leaving his Vice-Admiral to ſcour the Seas, he made certain Knights for their good Services, and return'd to Southampton, from whence he ſafely convoy'd the Emperor to his Kingdom of Spain. In the mean Time divers inferior Exploits paſs'd between the Garriſons of Calais and Boloign, in which the French were for the moſt Part Loſers. Likewiſe at the ſame Time the Lords Roſs and Dacres of the North, appointed to keep the Borders againſt Scotland, burnt the Town of Kelſie and fourſcore Villages, and overthrew eighteen Towers of Stone, with all their Bulwarks. Shortly after the Duke of Albany, being eſtabliſh'd Governor of Scotland, rais'd an Army of eighty thouſand Men, as ſome write, with which he approach'd the Borders, but made no Invaſion, concluding that the Name of ſuch an Army would terrifie the Engliſh. But this did not hinder the Marqueſs Dorſet from entering into Tividale, and to Galloway, where he burnt many Towns and Villages, and carry'd away four thouſand Head of Cattle.

He is convoy'd by the Engliſh Admiral to Spain.

Theſe Warlike Exploits being expenſive, oblig'd the King to make uſe of his Subjects Affections; the better to underſtand which, he caus'd a general Muſter or Deſcription to be made of all his Kingdom, commanding that each hundred ſhould certifie the Names of all above ſixteen Years of Age: That they ſhould repair to a certain Place aſſign'd with their Arms, declare their Names, their Pariſhes, the Lords and Parſons of each Town, the Worth of the Lands and Benefices, and alſo the Eſtates and Revenues, as well as the Employments and Occupations of every particular Perſon: So that this Survey was almoſt in the Nature

Nature of another Domeſday Book. The King rejoic'd to find his Kingdom ſo ſtrong and wealthy; yet as he was not ready for a Parliament, he borrow'd of the Citizens of London twenty thouſand Pounds, and ſent Privy Seals to ſeveral other rich Perſons of the Kingdom; in conſequence of which, he demanded a Loan of the Tenth of the Temporalty, and a Fourth of the Spiritualty: All which extraordinary Ways of furniſhing the preſent Neceſſities yet ended in a Parliament the next Year. The King having thus rais'd ſome Mony, proclaim'd open War againſt France, unleſs that King made Peace with the Pope or Emperor; and accordingly commanded the Earl of Surry, after his Attempts by Sea, to go over to Calais, and with convenient Forces to join with Florence d'Egmond, General of the Emperor's Troops. Theſe meeting between Ardres and St. Omers, ſpoil'd and burnt all the Villages in their Way 'till they came to Heſdin, in which the French had put a ſtrong Garriſon. But Autumn being far advanc'd, and the Weather unſeaſonable, they only could take the Town; the Caſtle being too ſtrong to be attempted at this Seaſon. They march'd therefore towards Dourlans, which they took and burnt, with all the adjoining Villages. The Seaſon ſtill continuing foul, and the Engliſh very unhealthful, the Army diſſolv'd, and the ſooner becauſe the two Generals could not agree about their Deſigns. Yet before the Earl of Surry departed, he burnt Marquiſe, and ſome other Places near the Engliſh Pale; after which he return'd home, and gave the King an Account of his Expedition.

A. D. 1523. Reg. 14. 31. A Parliament meets.

By the Methods of the Cardinal, as it is believ'd, Parliaments had been diſus'd for about ſeven Years; but now it was thought neceſſary to call one upon the fifteenth of April, to be held at the Black-Fryars in London; and here the Cardinal took care that the Spiritualty ſhould lead the Way. The Buſineſs of a Subſidy therefore being brought into the Convocation, in general met with a fair Paſſage; yet Fox Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Fiſher Biſhop of Rocheſter, and Phillips a Canon of Paul's, oppos'd it. But the induſtrious Cardinal ſilencing ſome, and cauſing others to abſent themſelves, ſo far prevail'd, that one half of the Spiritual Revenues for one Year was granted, to be paid in five Years following. From hence the Cardinal went to the Houſe of Commons, where in an eloquent Oration, Breach of Faith was charg'd upon the French King, upon the League ſworn for the general Peace of Chriſtendom: And beſides, the Default of Payment for Tournay, and other Matters were objected; ſo that the King could do no leſs in this publick Cauſe, than join in War againſt him with Charles the Emperor. And becauſe the Charge of it was judg'd to amount to eight hundred thouſand Pounds, it was requir'd that the foreſaid Sum might be rais'd out of the Fifth of every Man's Lands and Goods to be paid in four Years. This being propos'd, the next Day Sir Thomas More, Speaker of the Houſe, enforc'd this Demand, demonſtrating how it was not unreaſonable on this important Occaſion, to pay four Shillings in the Pound. To this many Replies were made, and Objections rais'd; and it was alledg'd, That of the thirteen thouſand Pariſhes then in England, the greateſt Part of them could not regularly produce a hundred Marks. At laſt, after ſome Debate and Contention, it was agreed that every Man's Eſtate of twenty Pound yearly, ſhould pay two Shillings in the Pound; and from twenty Pound a Year downwards to forty Shillings, one Shilling in the Pound; and under forty Shillings, every Head of ſixteen and upwards ſhould pay four Pence, in two Years. The Cardinal hearing no more intended, with great Warmth enter'd the Houſe of Commons, and told that great Aſſembly, That he deſir'd to reaſon with thoſe who oppos'd his Demands; but being anſwer'd, That it was the Order of that Houſe to hear, and not to reaſon but among themſelves, the Cardinal departed without Satisfaction. Yet by the liberal Motion of ſome, thoſe of fifty Pounds Land and upwards, were induc'd to add one Shilling more, for three Years to come; which at length being continu'd to the fourth Year, was all that could be obtain'd. In this Parliament a College of Phyſicians was erected, and many Pri-

Aids granted for War againſt France.

Privileges granted to the Members of it: And alſo an Act paſs'd, That the King ſhould have Authority for Life by his Letters Patents to reverſe and annul all Attainders of High-Treaſon, and to reſtore their Heirs, &c. As there had been no Parliament call'd for ſeven Years before this, ſo by the Cardinal's Means, there was none ſummon'd for ſeven Years after. Then by Vertue of his Legantine Authority, the Cardinal diſſolv'd the Convocation at St. Paul's, convok'd by the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and call'd him and all the Clergy to St. Peter's at Weſtminſter; but we do not find any thing material tranſacted.

In the mean Time the Scots, joining with the French, began again to threaten the Engliſh Nation; but after ſome Struggles, they were ſo diſcourag'd, that a ſhort Truce was made between the two Kingdoms. This gave King Henry Opportunity of proſecuting more important Affairs in Foreign Countries. But before he could bring them to any great Effect, Chriſtian the Second, King of Denmark, being by his Subjects expell'd his own Country, came from Flanders into England with his Queen, and a ſmall Retinue ſuitable to their Misfortunes. This did not hinder them from finding a Reception worthy of their Quality; and Queen Catharine, being Aunt to the other of Denmark, took particular Compaſſion on them. Therefore after all manner of Royal Entertainment, for the Space of about three Weeks, and divers rich Preſents beſtow'd upon them, they thought fit, upon ſome new Hopes of Recovering their Kingdom, to return into Flanders.

The King of Denmark viſits King Henry.

And now King Henry began to ſhew himſelf more and more vigorous againſt the French; and in the Month of Auguſt ſent over the Duke of Suffolk, attended by the Lords Montague, Herbert, Ferrers, Mowney, Sands, Berkley, and Powis, with divers other Knights and Gentlemen, and about thirteen thouſand Men. With this ſmall but ſelect Army the Duke march'd from Calais into the Enemy's Country, and took ſeveral inferior Places; then joining with the Emperor's General Florence d'Agmond, the Army amounted to twenty thouſand ſtrong; yet it being near the End of September, and the Weather more unſeaſonable than uſual for that Month, it was difficult to perform any great Action. King Henry order'd them to begin with Boloign; but the Imperialiſts alledg'd it was impregnable, and that for entering France, it was better to coaſt the River Somme; which they did, with Deſign to come to Battel. But finding no Forces in the Field, they beſieg'd Bray on the River Somme, in which Place was a ſtrong Garriſon; but a Breach being made by the Engliſh, and furiouſly attack'd, the Governor ſet Fire to the Town, and fled over the Bridge with the Remainder of his Men, with great Loſs. From hence paſſing over the Somme, they march'd towards Roye, taking ſome leſſer Places by the Way. This Town being ſummon'd, and promiſing to yield, Sir Richard Cornwall with four hundred Men was ſent to take Poſſeſſion of it. From thence the Army advanc'd towards Montdidier, being oppos'd in the way by two Commanders, who were at laſt taken Priſoners, with ſome others of Note. In Montdidier there was a Garriſon of twelve hundred Men, under the Command of Roche-baron; but after ſome few Hours Diſcharge of the Cannon, they capitulated and ſurrender'd. The Duke with his Army had now paſs'd the River Oyſe, and was come within eleven Leagues of Paris it ſelf; which threw the Citizens into a terrible Conſternation. Nor could the Arrival of Monſ. de Vendoſme with ſome Forces, cure them of their Fears. But the Seaſon being far advanc'd, and the Weather ſo extreamly cold, that almoſt all the Corn in France was frozen and deſtroy'd this Year, the Army was forc'd to return; eſpecially ſince the Lady Regent in the Low-Countries withdrew the Pay from her Soldiers, and let all the Charge fall upon King Henry. However they took the Caſtle of Bouchain near the Emperor's Territories, before they broke up; which notwithſtanding, with the other Places, was ſoon recover'd by the French. Thus ended this Year's Campaign, to the Diſſatisfaction of King Henry, it being more to the Terror of France, than the Advantage of England.

King Francis was at the ſame time turning his Forces againſt Italy, when on the fourteenth Day of September Pope Adrian dy'd, by Poiſon as it was believ'd. The News of this rous'd the Ambition of Cardinal Wolſey, who by Letters to King Henry humbly intreated him to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt in this important Affair, and likewiſe to write with his own Hand to the Emperor for his Intereſt in this Matter. But notwithſtanding all theſe Endeavours, the Emperor a ſecond Time fail'd him, and Julio de Medici was made Pope, by the Name of Clement the Seventh: Upon which, Wolſey artificially diſſembling his Reſentments, thought fit in Juſtification of his Merits to write again to the King, declaring, That the Election was not ſo clearly carry'd, but that many of the Cardinals were for him; tho' by reaſon of his Abſence, and the dangerous State of Italy, which call'd for preſent Remedies, they inſiſted on the other. Whereupon it was thought fit by the King and Cardinal to diſpatch an Embaſſie to the new Pope, to congratulate his Election, and to deſire him to continue his former Diſaffection to France, and to give publick Teſtimonies of it according to the Greatneſs of the Power inveſted in him. The Cardinal alſo, by a particular Diſpatch, deſir'd Richard Pace, then at Rome, to procure an Enlargement of his Legantine Authority; proteſting, That by reaſon of the King's Prerogative and other Cauſes, it was not a thouſand Ducats yearly to him; yet if his Power and Faculties might be encreas'd, it ſhould be thankfully acknowledg'd. To all which Pope Clement condeſcended, and the Legantine Power, which formerly had been granted only for five Years at a Time, was now by a new Precedent given him for Term of Life. Thus, to comfort him after his Repulſe at Rome, the Cardinal had a Kind of a Papal Authority in England; of which he made the utmoſt Uſe. For forming vaſt Things in his Mind, and deſigning two famous Colleges to be erected, one at his native Place Ipſwich, and the other at Oxford, towards the carrying on of thoſe Works, he ſoon procur'd a Bull from the Pope to ſuppreſs ſeveral of the leſſer Monaſteries in England. In this he met with ſome Difficulties from the King; but Henry, who often wanted Mony, conſidering, that if for his urgent Occaſions he was oblig'd at any Time to ſeize on the other Religious Houſes, he might this way diſcover how the People ſtood affected, at laſt granted his Requeſt. And King Henry thus concurring with the Pope, who in Favour of the Cardinal gave way to this Suppreſſion, that Overture was firſt made, which being afterwards purſu'd by the King's ſole Authority, became the final Ruin of all the Monaſteries in England.

Wolſey a ſecond Time aſpires to the Papacy in vain.

His vaſt Deſigns.

The Scots, the ancient Confederates of the French, began again to threaten the Engliſh Nation under the Conduct of the Duke of Albany, who had lately been in France, and now approach'd the Engliſh Borders, with a numerous Army. Hearing that the Earl of Surry, now by his Father's Death Duke of Norfolk, was aiming againſt him with a mighty Power, he ſent an Herald to him, promiſing upon his Honour to give him Battel, and if he took him Priſoner, to give him good Quarter: To which the Engliſh Duke ſeverely anſwer'd, That he would not fail to ſtand Battel; but if he took him Priſoner, the Quarter he would give him ſhould be to cut off his Head, and ſend it for a Preſent to his Maſter the King of England. The Engliſh Forces lying at Alnewick, were join'd by the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmorland, the Lords Clifford, Dacres, Lumley, Ogle and Darcy, with many Knights and Gentlemen; in all compoſing an Army of about forty thouſand Men. In October the Duke of Albany ſent two or three thouſand Men over the Water to beſiege the Caſtle of Warke; who by the Battery of their Ordnance won the outward Work call'd the Barnekins; and continuing their Batteries won the ſecond Work; but then Sir William Liſle, Governor of the Caſtle, ſally'd out with thoſe few he had left, and bravely repell'd the French Soldiers from the

the Place, with the Deaths of three hundred of them: A memorable Service, for which the Duke of Norfolk afterwards gave him particular Thanks. This brave Duke would gladly have follow'd his Enemies to their own Country, but only his Commiſſion was to defend England, and not to invade Scotland. Shortly after, Queen Margaret, Mother to the young King of the Scots, ſent to her Brother King Henry, for a Ceſſation of Arms 'till they might conveniently have a further Communication; which being granted, the Engliſh Army broke up, and the Duke of Norfolk return'd to Court. In the latter End of the Year, and the Beginning of the next Ambaſſadors from Scotland did negotiate a Peace, and ſhewing that the Lords of Scotland were content to relinquiſh the French, upon Condition that a Marriage might be ſecur'd between their young King and the Princeſs Mary; but they requir'd that the Promiſe by which ſhe was ingag'd to the Emperor, might firſt be diſcharg'd. King Henry anſwer'd he would firſt confer with the Emperor about it, and therefore nothing was concluded at this Time but a Truce for three Years and a half. The Emperor hearing of this Treaty, diſpatch'd an Embaſſie from Flanders to require that the Princeſs Mary might be deliver'd to him, promiſing hereupon to declare her Empreſs, and make her Governor of the Low-Countries; her Dower was alſo requir'd to be paid immediately, and that King Henry in Perſon would the next Year invade the Kingdom of France.

A Truce concluded with them.

But before King Henry could give a perfect Anſwer to theſe Particulars, there happen'd a remarkable Change of Affairs, which did not only affect the Kingdom of France, but had an Influence upon a great Part of Europe. King Francis had this Year vigorouſly purſu'd his warlike Deſigns in Italy, in order to recover the Dukedom of Milan; and becauſe the Duke of Bourbon, out of great Diſguſt, had revolted from him, and was made General of the Emperor's Forces in Italy, King Francis warmly purſu'd him, and cloſely beſieg'd him in the City of Pavia. This Duke had alſo receiv'd particular Incouragement, and conſtant Pay from the King of England; but by means of the ambitious Cardinal, who had ſecret Reſentments againſt the Emperor, the Pay was ſuddenly ſtopp'd or withdrawn. This hapning at the Time when the Duke was beſieg'd by the French King in Pavia, it drove him to ſuch a Degree of Fear and Deſpair, that he reſolv'd upon a moſt dangerous Eſcape. In the midſt of a dark Night he order'd Part of his Men to attack the Beſiegers on the weakeſt Side of the Town, while he ſally'd privately out of a Poſtern on the contrary Side. The Watch being ſlender, and the Soldiers in a ſecure Sleep, a mighty Terror aroſe, in which the Beſiegers turn'd their Ordnance to the Place of the Outcry, when as ſuddenly Bourbon gaining upon their Backs, won all their Artillery, diſcharg'd them againſt their Owners, ſlew their Soldiers, cut down their Tents, and laſtly by the Vice-Roy of Naples, the French King himſelf was taken Priſoner in the Field: Behaving himſelf with the Courage and Bravery of a Monarch, both before and during his Captivity. V. King Henry had now a greater Opportunity than ever of exerting his Power, and diſplaying his Grandeur in the general Affairs of Europe; yet he was very cautious how to proceed upon ſo unexpected a Change. When the News was brought to England, in Council it was thought fit the King ſhould comply with his Confederate Charles, in giving ſome publick Demonſtration of Joy. Therefore the King giong to St. Paul's, and cauſing a Maſs to be ſung in a more ſolemn Manner than ordinary, ſeem'd to celebrate the Victory; tho' inwardly he was not ſo well ſatisfy'd with it: For, as he conſider'd the Emperor now grown to a Greatneſs ſcarce allowable with Reaſon of State, or due Terms of Neighbourhood, he deliberated with his Council what was moſt proper to be done next. Whereupon it was thought fit immediately to ſend Ambaſſadors into Spain, to repreſent to the Emperor, 'How that this War being 'made at a common Charge, it was reaſonable that both ſhould receive the 'Fruit of it: That the Part to which the King of England pretended, was In-'heritance in France, which he deſir'd might be reſtor'd; in which the Emperor's 'beſt Aſſiſtance could not be doubted, both becauſe it was juſt in it ſelf, and agree-'able to their late Treaty; by Vertue of which he was to require the Emperor to 'proceed in levying Forces againſt France, in which his Majeſty would likewiſe 'concur. Nor was it to be doubted that the Emperor would decline this Mo-'tion, ſince he himſelf would finally reap the Benefit of it; for as his Majeſty 'was reſolv'd to ratifie and confirm the intended Match between the Emperor 'and the Princeſs Mary, who was Heir not only to the Crown of England, 'but to all the Titles in France, ſo all at laſt would devolve upon him; 'which therefore might be thought ſo advantageous, that he could not think 'it unreaſonable to deliver up King Francis into his Majeſty's Hands, upon 'conſigning the Princeſs to his. This Advice being approv'd by all, an Em-baſſie was diſpatch'd into Spain; in which it was further offer'd, That the Prin-ceſs Mary ſhould be deliver'd into the Emperor's Hands, upon proper Conditi-ons. But the Emperor being reſolv'd that none ſhould partake of the Profit or Honour of the late Victory, the Embaſſie found no real Reception in Spain; upon which King Henry return'd to that brave and wiſe Reſolution he had formerly taken, to make himſelf Arbiter of Chriſtendom, and to puniſh him who interrupted the publick Peace. To which he had alſo many other Induce-ments: For the Lady Margaret of Flanders, who by Articles was to have rais'd Forces againſt the French, began already to treat with them for an Accommoda-tion; and when Demand was made for the Payment of the Mony lent to the Emperor in his greateſt Neceſſity, nothing was return'd but a dilatory Excuſe. Nor was the King ignorant of the Treaty which the Emperor had already begun for the ranſoming of Francis; of a Match propos'd with Iſabella Princeſs of Portugal, which reflected on his Daughter's Reputation. Laſtly the Pope's Breve, repreſenting the Danger of Chriſtendom from the increaſing Proſperity of the Turks, had ſo prevail'd with King Henry, that he thought fit to lay aſide all Ambition to recover his Inheritance in France, and to endeavour for an Univerſal Peace.

His brave Reſolves.

In Purſuance of this laudable Deſign, as the Remembrance of the obliging Enterview between King Henry and Francis did not operate a little, ſo the Re-putation that the latter had gain'd by his Courage in this laſt Action, had kind-led in our generous King's Mind a compaſſionate Zeal for his Delivery. There-fore at the Requeſt of the King of France's Mother, who had much diſpos'd King Henry to return to his ancient Friendſhip, he ſent particular Orders to his Ambaſſadors in Spain, to intercede for the Liberty of King Francis; who had already begun the Way in a particular Letter to the Emperor, in which he declar'd, That the greateſt Comfort he found in this abandon'd Condition, was his falling into the Hands of ſo generous a Prince, who would not oblige him to what might be unjuſt to require, or impoſſible to perform: That he there-fore hop'd ſufficient Security would be accepted for his Freedom, ſince inſtead of detaining an unuſeful Priſoner, he ſhould make a King his Slave; when it was more advantageous to have him a faithful Friend, than to ſuffer him to die in Deſperation. None yet was ſo vigilant and intentive in this Affair, or the general Good of the Kingdom, as Madam Loviſe, his Mother and Regent of France, who by many forcible and reiterated Embaſſies, drew moſt of the Chriſtian Potentates and Republicks to favour the Deliverance of her Son. The Emperor finding ſuch powerful Interceſſions, of his own Accord ſent ſome Pro-poſitions and Articles to the Captive King; ſome of which were ſo hard and diſpleaſing to him, that he is ſaid to have drawn his Dagger, crying, It is better for a King of France to die after this Manner; but was prevented from uſing it by one of his Attendants. Yet to gratifie the Emperor, he gave Or-der that two of the chief Priſoners, mention'd in the Propoſals, ſhould be ſet at Liberty. And after that new Conditions were offer'd the Emperor, which tho' advantageous in themſelves, yet ſeveral Objections were rais'd againſt them, and nothing was concluded. About this Time the Emperor holding his Cortes or Parliament at Toledo, among other Things it was petition'd by the Eſtates aſſembled, that 'the Emperor being now of Age to marry, ſhould take to his 'Wife Iſabella the Infanta of Portugal, and not the Princeſs Mary of England; which was very agreeable to the Mind of him, who now aſpir'd to univerſal Monarchy.

The French King being weary of his Reſtraint in Italy, at length procur'd himſelf to be remov'd into Spain, reputing his Change of Priſon as a ſecond Liberty. Being brought to Madrid, he fell ſo dangerouſly ſick, that the Phyſicians had little Hopes of his Life, unleſs the Emperor would be pleas'd ſpeedily to viſit him; upon whoſe Viſitation, in which there was a pathetick Enterview, he ſoon recover'd his Health, tho' not immediately his Strength. Here new Propoſitions were made for his Deliverance, and new Objections were rais'd againſt them. In the mean Time the Pope, the Venetians and Princes of Italy, leagu'd together in Defence of the common Cauſe againſt the Emperor, and invited King Henry into the Treaty; nor did it leſſen their Suſpicion of Charles's aiming at univerſal Monarchy, becauſe upon his taking Francis Priſoner, he wrote to the King of England and Princes of Italy, That he ſhould not take it well if any of them diſturb'd the Dominions of Francis, ſince being his Priſoner, he could do no leſs than protect him againſt all others. Madam Loviſe the French Regent continu'd her Meſſages to King Henry, to procure his Aſſiſtance for the Redemption of her Son; 'till at length a Treaty for that Purpoſe was concluded at Moore, Auguſt the thirtieth, in which was to be an Amneſty of all Injuries done in the late Wars between England and France, and other Articles confirm'd. And by another Treaty this Year at Lyons, the Regent oblig'd her ſelf to pay all the Arrears due to King Henry's Siſter Mary, by Vertue of her Marriage with Lewis the Twelfth, and alſo to ſuffer her to enjoy her Jointure without Moleſtation. At length the Emperor concluded a Match with his Neice Iſabella of Portugal; alledging for his Excuſe to King Henry, That at the Petition of his States aſſembled at Toledo he had comply'd with his Subjects Deſires, which he hop'd would be underſtood as no Breach of Friendſhip. King Henry, conſidering the tender Age of his Daughter, and that it was incongruous to allie himſelf with a Prince againſt whom he might ſoon draw his Sword, ſeem'd well ſatisfy'd to relinquiſh the Match upon mutual Conſent. After which Time the Intimacy and Amity between them became ſo remiſs, that at length it was wholly diſſolv'd: Inſomuch that the Ambaſſadors on both Sides were recall'd, and the Emperor, who before us'd to ſign all his Letters by the Title of Son and Kinſman, from henceforwards only ſubſcrib'd Charles. It was the leſs to be wonder'd that the Emperor began now to take ſuch State upon him, ſince a richer Booty than that of Francis fell into his Hands, that is the Empire of Peru, where the golden Mines of Potoſi and many others were firſt diſcover'd.

He makes a Treaty with France.

The Emperor declines in his Friendſhip to King Henry.

While Affairs thus paſs'd in foreign Parts, King Henry, who well knew that to maintain a ſure Peace at home was almoſt as expenſive as the making War abroad, advis'd with his Council how to provide himſelf with Mony. Yet as the Cardinal had undertaken the King ſhould never want, as long as he might manage the publick Affairs, ſo they gladly diſcharg'd themſelves on him. But the Harmony of Government conſiſts in ſuch a nice Proportion, that no one Part can ſafely be ſtrain'd higher, unleſs the reſt can be well tun'd to it. And this appear'd in the Actions of this Year, when Commiſſions being granted out into all the Counties of England, for levying the ſixth Part of every Lay-Man's Goods, and the fourth of the Clergies, the People in general were ſo diſguſted, that they were ready to break out into Rebellion; alledging not only their own Poverty, but that the Commiſſions were againſt Law. ſolv'd ſolv'd to diſavow the whole Proceeding; and by Letters to all Parts, declar'd, He expected nothing from them but by Way of Benevolence. This procur'd the Cardinal many Curſes, and the King as many Bleſſings; notwithſtanding under the Name of Benevolence, he requir'd great Sums of all his Subjects, and particularly of the Citizens of London. This Way was likewiſe oppos'd by many, eſpecially in the Country, where ſome Perſons took up Arms; but by the Perſuaſion of the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, they ſubmitted themſelves, and were brought to London, and there ſecur'd. The King perſiſting in his Intention not to puniſh any on this Occaſion, brought the Matter to the Council-Table; where the Cardinal by Way of Apology declar'd, He had done nothing without firſt adviſing with the Judges, who poſitively affirmed the King might lawfully demand any Sum by Commiſſion, and that the Council of State confirm'd this Method. But the King declaring That he was aſſur'd his Subjects were richer than he found them by this Commiſſion, all the Blame was charg'd on the falſe Informers, and Pardon granted to all thoſe who deny'd the former Benevolence. Hereupon the Delinquents were brought to the Star-Chamber, where after a ſevere Reprimand given them, the Cardinal ſaid, That notwithſtanding their great Offences, the King in Conſideration of their Neceſſities, had granted them his moſt gracious Pardon, upon Condition they gave in Sureties for their good Behaviours. But they replying They had no Sureties, the Cardinal, to ſhow a popular Act, offer'd with the Duke of Norfolk to ſtand bound for them, at which they were diſcharg'd.

The prodigious Cardinal, who by the Concurrence of the Papal and Regal Authority, had ſuppreſs'd ſeveral Monaſteries, and given ſuch a Terror to the reſt as to draw large Sums from them, would not ſo deſiſt, but ſtill continu'd his Purpoſes of converting the Profits of all thoſe, to other Uſes, which by any Colour might be reputed Supernumerary. And having thus eſtabliſh'd his extenſive Authority, he was judg'd by this Time, between Viſitations, making of Abbots, Probates of Teſtaments, granting of Faculties, Licences, and Diſpenſations, and many other Ways, beſides the great Penſions he had from Foreign Princes, to have made his Treaſury equal to the King's, notwithſtanding the Sums he often tranſmitted to Rome. In which way of enriching himſelf, his Agent John Allen, accompany'd with a great Train, and riding from one Religious Houſe to another, in a kind of perpetual Progreſs, or Viſitation, did the Cardinal no ſmall Service. But as this at laſt became a publick Grievance, ſo the King took notice of it in ſo ſharp a Manner, that the Cardinal was inforc'd not only to excuſe himſelf with much Submiſſion, but alſo to promiſe Amendment; proteſting withal, That in his laſt Will and Teſtament, he had left a great Part of his Eſtate to his Highneſs. He did not only oblige the King by this, but likewiſe having now built his fair Palace at Hampton-Court, and wiſely conſidering how it would increaſe Mens Envy againſt him, he freely gave it to the King, who in Exchange permitted him to live in Richmond Houſe. He always took Care to ſooth the warm Monarch in promoting all his private Pleaſures, in which he was often too great a Sharer with his Maſter. One of the Liberties the King took at his leiſure Hours was to follow the Charms of Love: For as all Things concurr'd, his noble Preſence and Perſon, being further exalted by his high Dignity and Valour, it was not ſtrange, if among ſo many beautiful Ladies at Court, and ſuch a Cardinal to encourage him, he both gave and receiv'd Temptation. Among whom Mrs. Elizabeth Blunt, Daughter to Sir John Blunt, was thought, for her rare Ornaments of Nature and Education, to be the Miracle of her Time; which caus'd ſuch a ſecret Intimacy between them, as at laſt ſhe bore him a Son. This Child proving ſo equally like both his Parents, that he became the beſt Emblem of their mutual Affection, he was call'd Henry Fitz-Roy by the King, and ſo much avow'd by him, that having at this Time attain'd the Age of ſix Years, he was publickly made a Knight, and the ſame Day created Earl of Nottingham, Duke of Richmond and Somerset, Lieutenant-General beyond Trent, and Warden-General of the Borders of Scotland, and ſhortly after Admiral of England: And he was the more cheriſh'd by the King, becauſe he now expected no Iſſue Male from his Queen.

A. D. 1526. Reg. 17/18. Such was the generous Diſpoſition of King Henry, that he not only interceded for the Captive King Francis, but likewiſe for the expell'd King Chriſtian of Denmark. Therefore he ſent Ambaſſadors to Denmark, to perſuade his Subjects to recall him home; from whence nothing had ſo much chac'd him as the Guilt and Horror of ſhedding ſo much Blood among his People; but the exaſperated Danes poſitively refus'd either him or his Son. But he had better Succeſs as to the Liberty of the French King, which after a Year's Captivity was obtain'd upon very hard Terms, if any Thing can be hard that ſets a King out of Priſon. For in the Beginning of this Year, a Treaty between the Emperor and the French King was concluded, call'd The Concord of Madrid, conſiſting of forty four Articles, and more Particulars. Among many other Matters it was agreed, that on the ſame Day Francis was ſet at Liberty, his two Sons, the Dauphine and the Duke of Orleans, ſhould be deliver'd as Hoſtages into the Emperor's Hands: After which Francis was to deliver up the Dukedom of Burgundy to the Emperor, reſtore the Duke of Bourbon and all his Friends, marry the Emperor's Siſter Leonora, and indemnifie the Emperor againſt all Demands on the Part of the King of England. All which at large being ſolemnly ratify'd, and ſworn on both Sides, on the eighteenth of March the French King was exchang'd for his two Sons on the Borders of France with unuſual Niceneſs and Formality; and being once at Liberty, he immediately mounted a Fleet-Horſe, and riding with the greateſt Swiftneſs cry'd out I'm a King, I'm a King! in ſuch a Manner, as tho' he then deſign'd to have little Regard to the late Treaty. King Henry having been a Principal Agent in this Affair, both as to his Captivity and Deliverance, he immediately diſpatch'd Sir Thomas Cheyney to congratulate his ſafe Return, and to take his Oath to the Treaty of Moore; which Francis accepting, ſent a Meſſenger to inform King Henry of the Conditions of his Delivery, and to acknowledge that he chiefly ow'd his Liberty to him; which Acts of Civility, afterwards produc'd a more firm Correſpondency between theſe two Monarchs. By the Treaty of Moore, it was agreed that the French King ſhould pay two Millions of Crowns to the King of England, at ſome appointed Days; and after that to pay to King Henry during Life the annual Sum of a hundred thouſand Crowns.

The French King releas'd upon hard Terms.

The Clementine League againſt the Emperor.

Not long after a new famous League was made between the Pope and Francis, the Venetians, the Florentines, and Francis Sforza Duke of Milan, call'd by the Name of the Clementine League, and ſign'd at Coignac in France, May the twenty ſecond, by which the Pope abſolv'd the French King from the Oath he had ſworn at Madrid, and they all united againſt the Emperor, and further declar'd the King of England Protector of the League. Upon which King Henry, debating in his Council how he ſhould act in this Affair, it was nicely and ſuccinctly determin'd, That he ought not to be a Party, where he might be a Judge.

The Emperor was exceedingly allarm'd at this League, and ſolemnly proteſted againſt Pope Clement, as an ungrateful Perſon, who by his Favour had been made both Cardinal and Pope, notwithſtanding ſome Allegations that he was ſpurious, and uncapable of either of thoſe Dignities. He exclaim'd againſt the French King, as perjur'd and falſe, and againſt the Venetians, as wavering and unconſtant: However his principal Care was to intangle and divide them. And tho' in Italy, upon publiſhing the League by the Pope, they levy'd their appointed Numbers, yet Francis being in Hopes of the Reſtitution of his Children, delay'd ſo much on his Part, that the Imperial Army gain'd ſuch Advantage, that Sforza was conſtrain'd to yield the Dukedom of Milan, and fly to the Italian Army under the Duke of Urbin. About the ſame Time the Emperor peror was inform'd, That in Conſequence of the Pope's Relaxation of Francis's Oath, the Parliament of Paris and the King's Council had totally diſannull'd the Treaty of Madrid, as being concluded by a Perſon under Conſtraint and Impriſonment. Further to colour this Refuſal, Francis ſent Ambaſſadors to Spain, again to aſſure the Emperor, That Burgundy could not be alienated from the French Crown; and that if he would return his Sons at a reaſonable Ranſom, he would take his Siſter Leonora for his Queen; if not, he would recover them by Force. The ſeveral Ambaſſadors alſo of the Confederates then in his Court, and particularly the Engliſh, concurr'd in this Matter; requiring further, That he would recall the Spaniards out of Lombardy, and reſtore Sforza; relinquiſh his Pretenſions to Naples, and not go to Italy with an Army; and that he would pay the King of England, all the Confederates of the League, in caſe of Refuſal, denouncing War againſt him. The Emperor anſwer'd to all theſe Particulars, and declar'd, He was ready to defend himſelf againſt them all. Not long after King Francis ſent the Arch-Biſhop of Bourdeaux, with others, to deſire the Reſtitution of his Children; to which the Emperor, now more incens'd, reply'd, If he would have his Children, he muſt according to his Oath and Promiſe return Priſoner himſelf. After that he privately deſir'd the Ambaſſador to tell his Maſter, That by his own Acknowledgment, He had done cowardly and perfidiouſly in breaking the Treaty of Madrid, and that if he deny'd it, he would make it good in Perſon againſt him. King Francis wanted not Courage to reply in the ſame Language; but in the mean Time he caus'd an Apology to be publiſh'd, in Vindication of his Breach of Faith, and ſent it to all Chriſtian Princes; to which the Emperor reply'd with another, and with as much Severity as the Cauſe requir'd. In the mean Time King Francis enter'd into a new League with King Henry, which principally concern'd the Reſtitution of his two Sons, and the Monies due from the Emperor to the King of England. This was ſcarcely concluded, before the Family of the Colunna's in Italy, being of the Imperial Faction, with three or four thouſand Men enter'd the City of Rome, and ravag'd part of it; and then forc'd the Pope to fly to the Caſtle St. Angelo, where he was oblig'd to a Truce of four Months with the Emperor, to withdraw his Forces out of Lombardy, and to pardon all paſt Offences.

The French King makes a new League with England.

A. D. 1527. Reg. 18 19.

And now King Henry, finding no Advantage to be expected from treating with the Emperor, and underſtanding with what Indignity the Pope had lately been us'd, he reſolv'd according to his former League to join againſt that Prince who appear'd moſt refractory. Therefore conceiving the Fault to be in the Emperor, he immediately enter'd into a ſtrict League with Francis, chuſing rather to concur with him in particular, than to embrace the Clementine League, as containing many Articles that no ways concern'd him. Therefore he propos'd to the French King the Princeſs Mary in Marriage, ſince the Emperor had deny'd him Leonora; and offer'd beſides to enter into an offenſive League with him for the Recovery of his Children, and forcing the Emperor to reaſonable Conditions. Francis joyfully accepting this Motion, demanded the Princeſs Mary's Picture, which together with the King's was granted, and the Match treated in France by the Engliſh Agents, the Biſhop of Bath, and Sir William Fitz-Williams. The French King, if he marry'd her, requir'd ſhe ſhould be immediately given into his Hands; but King Henry diſſenting, becauſe ſhe was but eleven Years of Age, the Biſhop of Tarbe, the Viſcount Turenne, and the Preſident of Paris, came into England, where on the laſt of April three Treaties were concluded, as may be ſeen at large in the Lord Herbert. As to the Marriage, it was agreed that the Princeſs Mary ſhould be given either to Francis himſelf, or to his ſecond Son the Duke of Orleans; and that Alternative was to be determin'd by the two Kings at an Enterview deſign'd afterwards at Calais, with Forfeitures on both Sides if the Marriage were hinder'd. Then in Conſideration that King Henry and his Succeſſors ſhould never moleſt the French

Other Treaties concluded.

French King in any of thoſe Dominions he now poſſeſs'd, Francis did here bind himſelf and his Succeſſors, to pay every Year at two ſeveral Terms, after the Deceaſe of King Henry, to all the Kings of England his Succeſſors, forty ſix thouſand Crowns de Soleil, and twenty four Sols Tournois, without Deduction or Prejudice to the Sums already due to King Henry by the Treaty of Moore in 1525. Further the French King bound himſelf and his Succeſſors, to give of the Salt of Brovage yearly, as well to Henry as his Succeſſors, to the value of fifteen thouſand Crowns, as is above-mention'd. In theſe Treaties was the firſt Scruple rais'd by Foreigners, (particularly the Biſhop of Tarbe) concerning the Legitimation of the Princeſs Mary, which caus'd ſuch Commotions afterwards.

Before the Concluſion of this Treaty, Pope Clement had ſent Letters to King Henry, complaining of the Indignities offer'd to his Perſon by Cardinal Columna and the Imperialiſts, aſſuring him, That if he and the French King would effectually aſſiſt him, he would break the late Agreement made with the Imperial Party, to which he held himſelf not oblig'd, becauſe he was under Conſtraint. Upon which King Henry, who had always been true to the See of Rome, ſent him about thirty thouſand Ducats for preſent Uſe; which ſo incourag'd the Pope, that he cited Cardinal Columna to appear at Rome upon Pain of Deprivation of his Dignity; while he on the other Side threaten'd to call a Council againſt him, and depoſe him for Simony and other Incapacities. Upon which the Pope with an Army enter'd the Kingdom of Naples, and took ſeveral Places belonging to that Family; but the Confederates coming ſlowly to his Aſſiſtance, and hearing that great Forces were coming from Spain againſt him, for to gain a Ceſſation of Arms for eight Months, he was compell'd to make a diſhonourable Compliance, and to give ſixty thouſand Ducats. Yet after this, being again incourag'd with ſome Hopes from his Allies, and having by a Simonaical Creation of fourteen Cardinals rais'd three hundred thouſand Ducats, he ventur'd upon a ſecond Breach of Faith, and diſown'd the laſt Treaty; giving the Kingdom of Naples to Count Vaudemont, whom he ſent with Forces to ſubdue it. But for this he met with a greater Puniſhment than before; for the Duke of Bourbon at the Head of the Imperialiſts prevented all his Deſigns, and march'd directly with his hungry Army to the Walls of Rome; and giving the Aſſault, tho' he receiv'd a mortal Wound himſelf, yet that glorious City was ſoon taken by Storm, with the Slaughter of ſeveral thouſands of all Ages. That proud City never ſaw ſo ſad and diſmal a Day, not when it was ſack'd by the Goths and other barbarous Nations; for the Soldiers kill'd whomſoever they met, and cut them in Pieces; the Streets flow'd with Blood, the Altars were deſpoil'd, the Churches and Monaſteries ranſack'd, the Nuns and Virgins raviſh'd, and the Palaces of the Pope, Cardinals and Princes rifled and plunder'd; ſo that it is impoſſible to expreſs what Wealth and Riches lay in Heaps, and what precious Commodities belonging to Merchants were made a Prey to common Soldiers. But what made the Spoil greater, was the Number of Priſoners, who were all forc'd to pay ſuch Ranſoms as were laid upon them; and to augment the Ignominy as well as Deſolation of this miſerable State, the Prelates were taken by the Soldiers, and in all their Habits and Potificalibus ſet upon Aſſes and Mules, and led through the Streets with Contempt and Deriſion. The Pope amidſt theſe Diſtractions fled to the Caſtle of St. Angelo, with ſeventeen Cardinals, the Ambaſſadors of England, France, Venice, and Florence, and about five hundred Soldiers; where being ſtraitly beſieg'd, he was forc'd not only to ſurrender that Caſtle, with Oſtia, Civita Vecchia, and other Places, but alſo to give Hoſtages for four hundred thouſand Ducats, and after all to ſurrender himſelf Priſoner to the Emperor.

The Pope taken Priſoner.

This gave mighty Offence to all the Princes of Chriſtendom, except the Lutherans of Germany; of which the Emperor was ſoon ſenſible, and immediately thought fit to give them Satisfaction. Among all which none ſeem'd ſo conſiderable as King Henry; to whom by a Letter dated Auguſt the ſecond he made a kind of Apology for theſe Proceedings, declaring alſo the Cauſes why his Army could not be with-held from invading Rome; yet ſo as he diſclaim'd any Part, either the counſelling or authoriſing the Fact: He forgot not alſo, upon the Inſtance of the Engliſh and French Ambaſſadors for the Pope's Liberty, to write obligingly to his Holineſs, offering his Love and Friendſhip, in caſe he deſir'd it; but to the chief Officers of his Army he ſent Inſtructions, which for ſome Space amus'd them: For he commanded them to ſet the Pope at Liberty, Yet ſo to provide, that from a Friend he ſhould not become an Enemy. This myſterious Meſſage caus'd great Delays in the Pope's Deliverance, and much prolong'd his Miſery; which caus'd him to complain to King Henry and the Cardinal, proteſting, That all the Help and Succour he could expect in this Extremity, was from England, and therefore he implor'd his Aſſiſtance. At the ſame Time the Engliſh Ambaſſadors in Spain potently mediated for the Deliverance of King Francis's Sons upon more moderate Terms than was formerly propos'd; and in Concluſion ſo prevail'd, that the Emperor ſeem'd willing to relinquiſh his Demand of Burgundy, and to accept of ſuch a Ranſom as Francis had once voluntarily offer'd, which was two Millions of Crowns. But all this was again interrupted by the repeated Intelligence of the Pope's Impriſonment, which ſo rous'd the warm Temper of King Henry, that he would not ſo much as vouchſafe an Anſwer to the Emperor's Letter, but reſolv'd to join in a ſtricter League with Francis, concluding that Charles would never have ſo inſolently treated the Head of the Church, if he had not aſpir'd to univerſal Monarchy. Accordingly he enter'd into a new Confederacy with Francis, by which they mutually agreed to deſiſt from their War in the Low-Countries, and to tranſport it into Italy, with ſeveral other Particulars. Upon this, Clarenceaux King of Arms was ſent to King Henry's Reſidenciaries in Spain, who were to declare to the Emperor, That in Regard the King of England was at half the Charge of the War with Francis, the Emperor ſhould ſend him half the Prize and Booty taken at Pavia, and one of the two Hoſtages, or elſe Clarenceaux ſhould denounce War againſt him. To which rough Meſſage the Emperor return'd a ſoft and ſubtle Anſwer, which ſhew'd he had no other Deſign at preſent but to gain Time.

He begs King Henry's Aſſiſtance.

The two Kings of England and France being inform'd of the Emperor's dilatory Proceedings, together with the Pope's Diſtreſs, would no longer delay to give Orders for their own, as well as the general Affairs of Chriſtendom. Therefore the Cardinal, as the moſt proper Perſon, was order'd to France, both for concluding the Marriage of the Princeſs Mary, either with Francis or the Duke of Orleans his Son, as alſo for other Occaſions. A more magnificent Embaſſie than this of the Cardinals was never known, he was attended with all the Pomp and Splendor of a Soveraign Monarch, and a glorious Equipage of a thouſand Horſe. At Boloign he was met by the Cardinal of Lorrain and the Chancellor of Alanzon with the like Number of Horſe, who accompany'd him in his Way to Monſtreüil, and afterwards to Abbeville, where he continu'd in great State for ſome Days. Shortly after the French King, with Madam Loviſe his Mother, coming to Amiens, the Cardinal with all his ſplendid Train ſet forwards from Abbeville; of which Notice being given, King Francis being Royally attended, met him a Mile and a half from the Town; and the Cardinal was ſo exact in the honourable Circumſtances of Addreſs, that he would not yield to the French Monarch one Step in his Approaches. Being met with mutual Embraces, Francis, after a moſt obliging Acknowledgment That he ow'd his Liberty chiefly to the King of England, conducted him to his Lodgings. During many Ceremonies, Entertainments, and Viſits, three Treaties were enter'd into, and concluded on the eighteenth Day of Auguſt; by the Firſt of which the Princeſs Mary was to marry to the French King's ſecond Son the Duke of Orleans, but the Time not exactly appointed. The Second related chiefly to any Treaty that might be made between either of the two Kings and the Emperor. By the Third it was agreed that no Act, Sentence, Bull, Letter or Breve proceeding from the Pope, during his Captivity, and tending to the Damage of the two Kings, or the Legantine Power of the Cardinal, ſhould be obey'd, or have any Force. And the Power theſe two Princes aſſum'd began the Taſte that King Henry took of governing the Clergy in chief; of which, as well as the Diſſolution of Monaſteries, the firſt Arguments and Impreſſions were deriv'd from the Cardinal; who having now in a Conference with ſome Cardinals at Compeign, reſolv'd that ſuch a Power for the Government of the Church was in theſe Times neceſſary, took on him the Charge of the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs in England, under the Title of Vicar General. On the ſixteenth of September the Cardinal prepar'd to return; whereupon Francis not only richly preſented him, but conducted him through the Town, and a Mile beyond, accompany'd with the King of Navarre, the Pope's Legate, and the chief Nobility. The Cardinal now haſtning homewards, came to Calais, where having eſtabliſh'd a Mart, he arriv'd at the Engliſh Court in the End of September, where he was receiv'd by the King with great Demonſtrations of Affection. To correſpond with this Embaſſie, the French King ſent De Montmorency Grand Maiſtre, and ſeveral Noblemen and others, to ratifie the League in England; who, to the Number of ſix hundred Horſe, were conducted to London, and lodg'd in the Biſhop's Palace. They were firſt entertain'd by the Cardinal at Hampton-Court, with an unexpected Magnificence, and ſhortly after by the King at Greenwich with a Feaſt ſurpaſſing all Imagination, and then with a Comedy, in which his Daughter the Princeſs had a particular Part. On this Day alſo the King of England receiv'd at the Hands of Montmorency, the Order of St. Michael; and the King of France, with no leſs Solemnity, that of the Garter in Paris. Both Princes likewiſe gave their Oath and Seal of Gold for the Ratification of the late Treaty.

Wolſey's ſplendid Embaſſie into France.

Three Treaties concluded.

The Reception of the French Ambaſſadors.

The Emperor not being ignorant of theſe Treaties, thought fit to prevent the Execution of them, by a timely Compliance with all that could in reaſon be expected from him. Therefore on the fifteenth of September he offer'd to the French and Engliſh Ambaſſadors reſiding at his Court, That the Article for the Reſtitution of Burgundy ſhould be raſed out of the Treaty of Madrid; That Francis ſhould pay for the Ranſom of his Sons, the two Millions of Crowns that were offer'd; and out of them ſo much ſhould be allow'd, as would pay the King of England. When theſe and ſome other Particulars were approv'd on both Sides, the French Ambaſſadors alledg'd that they wanted ſufficient Authority from their King to ſign them, which they promis'd to procure; ſo that the Concluſion of Peace was at this Time deferr'd on their Parts. The Emperor not much diſſatisfy'd, return'd to his former Arts of dividing the two Kings; therefore he ſent privately to the Cardinal, offering him large Sums for that Purpoſe, beſides his ordinary Penſion, which was twenty four thouſand Crowns per Annum. Notwithſtanding which, becauſe he had prevented him in the Papacy, and deny'd him the Archbiſhoprick of Toledo, when both had been promis'd to him, he was found inexorable. Therefore on the twelfth of December the Engliſh Ambaſſadors made particular Demands to the Emperor at Bruges; That he would immediately pay to their Maſter what Mony had been lent him in the Time of Exigency, and pay a Penalty of five hundred thouſand Ducats, for not marrying the Princeſs Mary according to Agreement; as likewiſe that he would deliver the Pope, and make full Satisfaction for the Damage he had ſuſtain'd. To theſe the Emperor gave evaſive Anſwers, except to that concerning the Pope, to which he ſaid Orders were given for his Deliverance. This laſt prov'd true, for the Emperor having brought the Pope to new Terms, order'd him to be ſet at Liberty; but the Pope prevented them by making his Eſcape in the Habit of a Merchant, the Night before they promis'd to deliver him. His Hoſtages yet remain'd 'till the Sum agreed on was paid, towards raiſing of which, he was forc'd to make ſeveral Cardinals for Mony, and granted Licences in the Kingdom of Naples, and other Places for alienating of Eccleſiaſtical Goods and Poſſeſſions; giving therein a Beginning, as ſome obſerve, to that Liberty, which was afterwards taken in divers Places. The Pope being at Liberty he gave Notice of it to King Henry and Cardinal Wolſey, acknowledging them great Inſtruments in the happy Change, and deſiring the King to continue his Protection to the See of Rome. Upon which the Cardinal repair'd in ſolemn Triumph to the Cathedral of St. Paul's, and caus'd Te Deum to be ſung, and Bonfires and other Rejoycings to be made.

Night

In the following Year the two Kings proceeded more openly, and ſent their ſeveral Heralds to the Emperor, Clarenceaux from the King of England and Guyenne from the King of France, to expoſtulate their Grievances, and upon his refuſing to redreſs them, to defie him as their open Enemy. The Emperor heard the Heralds with great Temper, and anſwer'd Clarenceaux very mildly, That he knew his Maſter's Grievances were grounded upon Miſinformations, in which he would ſhortly rectifie him by his Letters, as deſiring nothing more than to continue his Friend: But he anſwer'd Guyenne very roughly, bidding him tell his Maſter, That he had broken his Faith, in not performing the Covenants agreed upon for his Liberty: And with theſe Anſwers he diſmis'd them; only Guyenne thinking it not proper to deliver his Anſwer by Word of Mouth in ſuch Terms, obtain'd to have it ſent in Writing. The Heralds return'd home, and delivering their Anſwers, the French King was ſo incenſs'd, that ſoon after he ſent another Defiance to the Emperor, declaring in plain Terms That he ly'd in his Throat; and thereupon challeng'd him to a ſingle Combate, requiring him to appoint the Field, and he would appoint the Weapons. The Emperor accepted the Challenge, but other Occurrences intervening hinder'd the Performance. In the mean Time the Emperor, being unwilling to make a Breach with England, ſent a particular Embaſſie to King Henry, declaring, That he had been ſo much oblig'd to him, that he could not take the Defiance given by his Herald, as a full Denunciation of War, 'till he had heard further of his Pleaſure. To this King Henry reply'd in theſe Terms, Tho' we highly reſpect your Maſter, yet we cannot ſuffer him to deſtroy the Realm of France, which is our true Inheritance, and for which our Brother and Allie the French King, pays us yearly a great Penſion and Tribute; wherefore, out of Juſtice and Equity, we are oblig'd to maintain that Land, that yields us ſuch a conſiderable Rent and Profit.

The Kings of France and England ſend Defiances to the Emperor.

Thus ſtood the Affairs of Europe in this memorable Year 1528: The Emperor at Variance with the French King, and formidable to the Pope and the States of Italy: The King of France joining with the King of England, and both favouring the Pope: The King of England an Arbiter of Chriſtendom, whoſe Friendſhip was courted, and his Power dreaded by all of them, and who in a ſpecial Manner had oblig'd both the French King and preſent Pope. A five Years Truce was made with Scotland; Ireland was quieted by the Return of the Earl of Kildare; and England in Peace, but only uneaſie under ſome Managements of the Cardinal, and a little diſturb'd by the Progreſs of Lutheraniſm. As to the King himſelf, he had been ſo great an Enemy to that Doctrine, ſo faithful a Friend to the Roman Church, and ſo ſtrong a Support to the Papacy, that if he had dy'd before this nineteenth Year of his Reign, he could ſcarce have miſs'd of being Canoniz'd, notwithſtanding all his Faults; for he abounded in thoſe Virtues, which had given Saintſhip to Kings for near a thouſand Years together, and had done more than any of them, by writing in Defence of the Roman Faith.

The State of Europe.

A. D. 1528. Reg. 19 20.

VI. The great King Henry had for nineteen Years liv'd in all Splendor and Proſperity, and had enjoy'd all the Pleaſure and Glory of a mighty Monarch, who commanded both at home and abroad. His Wars were made with Honour and Reputation, and his Treaties were juſt and advantageous; and he had no Inquietudes in all his Affairs, but in his Endeavours to raiſe Mony, in which the Cardinal always eas'd and reliev'd him. But at this Time a Domeſtick Trouble aroſe, which robb'd him of his former Eaſe, perplex'd all the reſt of his Government, and drew ſurpriſing Conſequences after it of the higheſt Nature. By Virtue of a Bull and Diſpenſation from Pope Julius the Second, in the Year 1503, King Henry in his Youth had been contracted to his Brother Arthur's Widow; and by Virtue of the ſame Diſpenſation, and his Father's Means he marry'd her when he came to the Crown, by the Advice and Conſent of his Council, tho' contrary to the laſt Thoughts of his Father, and the Opinion of ſome very conſiderable for Judgment and Learning. For many Years he enjoy'd this virtuous Queen, without any Scruple of the Validity of the Match, or outward Mark of Unkindneſs between them; ſhe having born him two Sons, who dy'd in their Infancy, and one Daughter, the Princeſs Mary, now about twelve Years of Age. This Daughter having been offer'd to ſeveral crown'd Heads, as has been formerly related, many Doubts began to ariſe concerning her Legitimacy and Right to the Crown, and the Validity of the King's own Marriage with his Brother's Widow. Now as other Princes had mov'd Scruples againſt a Marriage with this Princeſs, the Heir of ſo great a Crown, ſo eſpecially the King began to make ſome himſelf, or rather to publiſh thoſe he declar'd he had ſome Years before. The King inſiſted upon all the Arguments of Conſcience, and ſeem'd to lay the greateſt Weight on the Prohibition in the Levitical Law of marrying his Brother's Wife; and he being converſant in the Writings of the School-Men, found that they eſteem'd theſe Laws as Moral and for ever binding, and that by Conſequence the Pope's Diſpenſation was of no Force, ſince his Authority did not extend ſo far as to diſpence with the Laws of God. This caus'd him to reflect upon the Death of his Sons, which he now look'd on as a Judgment from Heaven for that unlawful Marriage; ſo that he was very deſirous to have the Advice and Opinion of the chief Divines in the Nation. All the Biſhops of England, except Fiſher of Rocheſter, declar'd by a Writing under their Hands and Seals, that they judg'd the Marriage unlawful. And as the Point of Conſcience wrought on his Mind, ſo the Intereſt of the Kingdom requir'd that there ought to be no Scruples concerning the Succeſſion to the Crown; leſt as the bloody War between the Houſes of Lancaſter and York had been bury'd with his Father, ſo a new one ſhould ariſe at his Death.

The King's Marriage queſtion'd by Foreigners, and ſcrupled by himſelf and his Biſhops.

Affairs ſtanding thus, no Probability of the Queen's Fruitfulneſs appearing, and ſhe having contracted ſome Diſeaſes that made her unacceptable to the King, he reſolv'd to have Recourſe to the Court of Rome; comforting himſelf, that there was no other Difficulty in removing all theſe Inconveniences, than the obtaining a Diſpenſation to diſſolve that Marriage, which only a Diſpenſation had firſt made. He knew that the ſame Key that had lock'd, could unlock again; and he had reaſon to expect a quick and favourable Diſpatch of his Buſineſs at Rome, where Diſpenſations or Divorces in Favour of Princes uſually paſs, more with regard to the Merits of the Prince that deſiers them, than the Cauſe it ſelf. His Alliance ſeem'd then neceſſary to the Pope, who was at that Time in Captivity; nor could the Emperor with any good Pretence oppoſe his Suit, ſince he had broken his Contract with his Daughter upon the Account of the Doubtfulneſs of the Marriage. The Cardinal had alſo given him full Aſſurances of a ſatisfactory Anſwer from Rome; whether upon the Knowledge he had of that Court, and of the Pope's Temper, or upon any Promiſe made him, is not certain. But that the Suit might not be ſhocking and reflecting ing upon the Authority of the papal Chair, the Reaſons to be alledg'd for the annulling the former Bull of Diſpenſation, upon which the Divorce was to follow in Courſe, were grounded upon ſome falſe Suggeſtions in the Bull it ſelf, and upon the Proteſtation the King had made when he came to be of Age. In reality they were ſo material, that a favourable Pope, left wholly to himſelf, would have yielded to them without any Scruple. About this Time the King began to ſhew ſome Favours to Mrs. Anne Bolen, a Lady at Court, which caus'd many to believe that all this Proceſs was mov'd by the unſeen Spring of that ſecret Affection. But it is not probable that the Ingagement of the King's Affections to any other gave the Riſe to all this; for ſo prying a Courtier as Wolſey was, would have diſcover'd it, and not have projected a Marriage with the French King's Siſter, as he did not long before, if he had ſeen the King prepoſſeſs'd: It is more probable the King conceiving himſelf in a manner diſcharg'd of his former Marriage, gave a free Liberty to his Affections, which ſoon began to ſettle upon Mrs. Bolen. This memorable Woman was Neece to the then Duke of Norfolk by her Mother, and related to ſeveral good Families, and was for ſome Years educated in the French Court, where ſhe was much admir'd, and no leſs in that of England, after her Return. She continu'd to live without any Blemiſh, 'till her unfortunate Fall gave Occaſion to ſome malicious Writers to defame her in all the Parts of her Life: She wanted no Charms relating to Wit or Perſon; tho' ſhe was more beautiful than graceful, and more pleaſant and witty, than nicely diſcreet. Upon her coming to the Engliſh Court, the Lord Piercy, being than a Domeſtick of the Cardinal's, made Love to her, and proceeded ſo far as to engage himſelf to marry her; and her Conſent ſhows ſhe had then no Aſpirings to the Crown. But the Cardinal, upon ſome private Reaſons, uſing Threats and other Methods, with great Difficulty put an End to the Deſign; for which it is ſaid the Lady ever after hated the Cardinal.

He applies to the Pope for a Divorce.

and inclines to Anne Bolen.

But to return to the famous Proceſs, Doctor Knight, then Secretary of State, was ſent to Rome to prepare his Holineſs in this important Affair; and the Family of the Caſſali having much of the Pope's Favour, they were likewiſe imploy'd to promote it. The Cardinal ſent a large Diſpatch to Sir Gregory Caſſali, ſetting forth all the Reaſons both in Conſcience and Policy, for obtaining a Commiſſion to himſelf to judge the Affair. Great Promiſes were made in the King's Name, both for publick and private Services, and nothing was omitted that might probably influence the Pope, or thoſe Cardinals who had greateſt Credit and Intereſt with him. Secretary Knight made Application to the Pope, after the moſt private Manner, and met with a very favourable Anſwer; for the Pope readily promis'd to diſſolve the Marriage: But a contrary Promiſe being exacted of him in the Emperor's Name, not to proceed in this Affair, he was reduc'd to exceeding Difficulties, not ſo much in reſpect of his Promiſes, which were impoſſible to keep on both Sides, as to his Intereſts. He was then in Captivity, and at the Mercy of the Emperor, whom he hated and diſtruſted, and at the ſame Time was infinitely deſirous to ſerve the King of England; therefore he projected to gain Time, and begg'd That if the King would reſpite the Matter for a little Space, he ſhould not only have the Diſpenſation, but every Thing that was in his Power to grant. At the ſame Time the Cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor made ſome Scruples concerning the Bull that was demanded, 'till he had rais'd his Price, and got a large Preſent; and then the Pope actually ſign'd both a Commiſſion for Wolſey to try the Cauſe, and judge in it, and alſo a Diſpenſation, and deliver'd them into Secretary Knight's Hands; but with Tears begg'd of him That there might be no Proceedings upon them, 'till the Emperor was put out of Capacity of executing his Revenge upon him, and then he was ready to own this Act of Juſtice which he did in the King's Favour. And being a very ſubtle Man, he propos'd an Expedient, which if follow'd by the King, it might have put a quicker and eaſier End to the Proceſs: He found, that his ſending Bulls, or a Legate to England would become publick, draw the Emperor upon him, and admit of dangerous Delays; therefore he propos'd, If the King was ſatisfy'd in his own Conſcience, in which he believ'd no Doctor could reſolve him better than himſelf, then he might without further Noiſe cauſe Judgment to be given in England; and upon that marry another Wife, and ſend over to Rome for a Confirmation; which would be very eaſily granted, if the Matter was actually done. But ſtill the Pope deſir'd that this might be repreſented to the King as the Advice of the Cardinals, and not as his own. But the King's Counſellors thought this more hazardous than the Way of a Proceſs; for if upon the King's ſecond Marriage, a Confirmation ſhould be deny'd, then the Right of Succeſſion would be ſtill more dubious; therefore they utterly declin'd it.

The Pope was at this Time diſguſted with Cardinal Wolſey; for he underſtood, that during his Captivity, he had been forming a Deſign to make himſelf Vicar of the Papacy, and was to have ſate at Avignion, which might have produc'd a new Schiſm. Staphileus, Dean of the Rota, being then in England, was prevail'd upon by the Promiſe of a Biſhoprick, and the Hopes of a Cardinal's Hat, to promote the King's Affair; and by him the Cardinal wrote to the Pope, after the moſt preſſing Manner, for a Diſpatch of this Buſineſs; and deſir'd, That an indifferent and tractable Cardinal might be ſent over, with a full Commiſſion to join with him and judge the Matter; propoſing Cardinal Campegio to the King's Ambaſſadors, as the fitteſt Man; and when a Legate ſhould be nam'd, he order Preſents to be made to him, and that they ſhould haſten his Diſpatch, and ſee that the Commiſſion be full. But upon the Arrival of the Couriers from Rome, Gardiner the Cardinal's Secretary, and Fox the King's Almoner, the one a Canoniſt, and the other a Divine, were ſent thither with Letters, both from the King and Cardinal to the Pope; and they carry'd Orders, moſt like to ſucceed, which was to make large Preſents to the Cardinals. They alſo carry'd with them the Draught of a Bull, containing all the ſaving Clauſes that could be invented, that it might not fail of Acceptance; one Clauſe was to declare the Iſſue of the Marriage good, as being begot bona fide; which probably was inſerted to make the Queen more eaſie, ſince by that it appear'd, that however it was determin'd, her Daughter would be no Sufferer. The Cardinal in his Letters to Caſſali ſhew'd the Height of his Zeal, and offer'd to take the Blame on his own Soul if his Holineſs would but grant this Bull; and with Earneſtneſs as hearty and warm as Words can expreſs, he urg'd the Matter, and added, That he perceiv'd, that if the Pope continu'd inexorable, the King of England would proceed another Way.

Theſe Sollicitations had ſuch Effects, That Cardinal Campegio was declar'd Legate, and order'd to go for England, and join in Commiſſion with Wolſey, for judging this nice Cauſe. This Cardinal was Biſhop of Salisbury, and a tractable Man, as was deſired; yet to raiſe his Price the higher, he mov'd many Scruples, and ſeem'd to enter upon this Employment with great Fear and Averſion. Wolſey, who knew his Temper, vehemently urg'd him to uſe Expedition, aſſuring him of great Rewards from the King; to which he kept ſo cloſe, that in a Letter he wrote to him, among other Motives to perſuade him, that of a good Conſcience being put in the firſt Draught, the Cardinal ſtruck it out as knowing how little it would ſignifie to Men of his Temper. At length Campegio ſet out from Rome, and carry'd with him a poſitive Decretal Bull for annulling the King's Marriage, which was truſted to him, and he was authoriz'd to ſhow it to the King and Wolſey; but was ſtrictly commanded not to give it out of his Hands to either of them. At this Time Wolſey was ſeiz'd with the Sweating-Sickneſs, which then rag'd in England; and by a Compliment which both the King and Mrs. Bolen wrote to him on the ſame Paper, it appears, he was then privy to the King's Deſign of marrying her, and deſign'd to advance himſelf ſtill higher, by his Merits in procuring her the Crown. This Year alſo he he eſtabliſh'd his two great Colleges; and finding both the King and People much pleas'd with his converting ſome Monaſteries to ſuch Uſes, he deſign'd to ſuppreſs more, and to change them to Biſhopricks and Cathedral Churches, which becauſe the Pope was unwilling to grant, by reaſon of ſome Oppoſitions, Gardiner told him, It was neceſſary, and muſt be done; therefore a Power for ſo doing was added to the Legate's Commiſſion.

While Affairs paſs'd thus between Rome and England, the Queen labour'd with all thoſe Paſſions which Jealouſie of the King's Affection, Senſe of her own Honour, and the Legitimation of her Daughter could produce, and vigorouſly apply'd her ſelf to her two Nephews, the Emperor and his Brother, to eſpouſe her Cauſe; complaining much of the King, and more of the Cardinal. The Emperor undertook the Cauſe more willingly, becauſe the King was then in the Intereſt of France; and to help forwards this Buſineſs, a certain Breve was now found out, or more probably forg'd, of the ſame Date with the Bull that diſpens'd with her Marriage in the Year 1503: But with ſtronger Clauſes in it, to anſwer thoſe Objections that were made againſt ſome Defects in the Bull; tho' it could not ſeem probable, that in the ſame Day, a Bull and a Breve ſhould be granted for the ſame Things in ſuch different Terms. The moſt conſiderable Variation was, That whereas the Bull did only ſuppoſe that the Queen's Marriage with Prince Arthur was Perhaps carnally conſummated; this Breve did ſuppoſe it abſolutely, without the Word Perhaps. This was thought a Prejudice to the Queen's Cauſe, as much as the Suſpicion of Forgery was a Blemiſh to her Agents.

The Queen applies to the Emperor, who eſpouſes her Cauſe.

In October Cardinal Campegio arriv'd in England, where he was receiv'd with great Solemnity; and in his Speech at his firſt Audience, he declar'd the King, The Deliverer of the Pope, and the City of Rome. After the firſt Compliments were over, he privately adviſ'd the King to deſiſt from the Proſecution of his Suit; and then counſell'd the Queen in the Pope's Name to make her Vows, and enter into a Religious Life, but both were ineffectual; and he by affecting a nice Impartiality, almoſt loſt both Sides. But he in a great Meaſure pacify'd the King when he ſhow'd him the Decretal Bull he had brought over for annulling the Marriage; but he would not part with it out of his Hands, nor leave it for one Minute either with the King or the Cardinal, declaring, That upon theſe Terms it was granted, and that he brought it to let the King ſee how well his Holineſs was affected to him. Upon this great Inſtances were made at Rome, that Campegio might be order'd to ſhow the Bull to ſome of the King's Counſellors, and proceed to the Determination of the Buſineſs, otherwiſe Wolſey would be ruin'd, and England loſt from the Papacy. Yet all this did not prevail in the crafty Pope, who knew what was intended by getting the Bull out of Campegio's Hands, that then the King would leave him to the Mercy of the Emperor; therefore he ſaid, That he would gladly loſe a Finger to recover the Bull: Yet ſtill he left the Legates in England free to judge as they ſaw Cauſe, and promis'd that he would confirm their Sentence. Upon this Sir Francis Brian and Peter Vannes were diſpatch'd to Rome with new Propoſitions, to offer this Expedient. If both King and Queen took Religious Vows, ſo that their Marriage was upon that annull'd, whether the Pope would engage to diſpenſe with the King's Vow, or elſe grant him a Licence for having two Wives: For which there were divers Precedents vouch'd from the Old Teſtament. Wolſey alſo offer'd in the King's Name, to ſettle a Pay for two thouſand Men, that ſhould be a Guard to the Pope, and to procure a Reſtitution of ſome of his Towns, ſeiz'd by the Venetians. But the Pope had no Inclination to have his Guards paid by other Princes, which was in Effect to be their Priſoner; and he dreaded every Thing that might bring new Calamities upon him. Therefore he now reſolv'd to unite himſelf firmly with the Emperor, by whoſe Means only he hop'd to re-eſtabliſh his Family at Florence; and from this Time forwards, all the Uſe he made of Campegio comes into England, who refuſes to ſhow the Bull in Publick.

The Pope's Policy and Knavery.

King

King Henry's Earneſtneſs in his Divorce, was only to draw in the Emperor on better Terms to his Intereſt. The Emperor was alſo at that Time preſſing him hard for a general Council; which, beſides the general Averſion of the Court of Rome, he had great Reaſon to fear; for being himſelf a ſpurious Iſſue, he was threaten'd with Deprivation, as uncapable of holding his Dignity. Thus paſs'd the firſt Year of this memorable Proceſs, in which it was believ'd that if the King had employ'd that Mony, unneceſſarily ſpent at Rome, on a War in Flanders, it had ſo diſturb'd the Emperor, and incourag'd the Pope, that he had ſooner granted that, which in a more fruitleſs Way was ſought of him.

A. D. 1529. Reg. $\frac{20}{21}$.

The Imperialiſts at Rome all the Time preſs'd hard to have the Legates in England inhibited, and the Cauſe to be recall'd and heard before the Conſiſtory; but the Pope diſlik'd that Motion as dangerous: But his conſtant Maxim being to promiſe and ſwear deepeſt, when he intended leaſt, to molifie King Henry, he ſent over Campana, one of his Bed-Chamber, into England, with Compliments too high to gain much Credit. He aſſur'd the King, That his Holineſs would ſerve him in every Reſpect, not only in Juſtice and Equity, but in the Plenitude of his Power; and tho' he had reaſon to be apprehenſive of the Emperor's Reſentments, yet that ſhould never divert his Zeal for the King's Intereſt, in which he would not be wanting, tho' it were with the Reſignation of the Popedom it ſelf. He was alſo order'd to require the Legates to put a ſpeedy Period to the Buſineſs; but his ſecret Inſtructions to Campegio were of a contrary Strain; he charg'd him to burn the Decretal Bull, and to protract the Matter by all the dilatory Methods he could invent. Yet ſtill the Pope continu'd his Compliments to thoſe the King ſent over, and gave new Aſſurances, That tho' he did not grant a Bull, by which the Divorce ſhould be immediately his own Act, yet ſtill he was ready to confirm the Legate's Sentence. But at the ſame Time the Pope propos'd a Journey incognito into Spain, and deſired Cardinal Wolſey to go with him, in order to obtain a general Peace for Chriſtendom. Tho' in ſecret he was then making Offers of Compliance with the Emperor, and gave his Agents Aſſurances, That tho' the Legates gave Sentence, he would not confirm it. Upon which the King's Correſpondents at Rome, wrote to him to puſh on the War more vigorouſly againſt the Emperor, for nothing was to be expected at that Court, unleſs the Emperor's Affairs declin'd.

Campana ſent to deceive the King.

But an unexpected Accident put ſome Stop to all Proceedings in the Court of Rome: For the Pope was taken ſuddenly ill, and fell into a dangerous Sickneſs; upon which the Imperialiſts began to prepare for a Conclave; but Farneſe, and the Cardinal of Mantua oppos'd their Deſigns, and ſhew'd a great Inclination for Wolſey, whom they reverenc'd as a Deity, as his Correſpondents wrote to him. Upon this he ſent a Courier to Gardiner, then in his Journey to Rome, with large Directions how to manage the Election; in which it was concluded, That the King of France, joining heartily with the King of England, of which he was confident, there were only ſix Cardinals wanting to make the Election ſure; and beſides Sums of Mony and other Rewards, he was to give them Aſſurance, that the Cardinal's Preferments ſhould be divided among them. Theſe were the ſecret Methods of attaining that Chair, that was believ'd to be attended with Infalibility. But the Pope's Recovery put an End to theſe dark Intrigues; which yet were ſoon after reviv'd by a long and threatning Relapſe. Then new Labours were undertaken to gain many Cardinals to favour King Henry's Cauſe; and many Precedents of Divorces were produc'd, that had been granted in Favour of Princes, upon much ſlighter Grounds. But the Imperialiſts were ſo powerful at Rome, that they could not hope for Succeſs, without the Emperor was firſt gain'd; upon which a ſecret Negotiation was ſet on Foot with him, but it had no other Effect, than to give great Jealouſie both to the Pope and French King. Another Diſpatch was ſent ſent to Rome, to procure a Commiſſion with fuller Power to the Legates, and a Pollicitation under the Pope's Hand to confirm the Sentence: The latter was granted, but the former utterly refus'd; for the Pope was reſolv'd to proceed no further in that Matter, tho' Wolſey wrote to Rome, That if any Juſtice were deny'd the King, not only England, but likewiſe France would withdraw their Obedience from the Apoſtolick See; becauſe by that it would be inferr'd, that the Emperor had ſuch Influence at Rome, as to oblige the Pope to be partial or favourable as he pleas'd. At this Time the Cardinal was bargaining for his Bulls for the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter, which were rated at fifteen thouſand Ducats; but ſince it was a Tranſlation from Durham, ſo that a new Compoſition would ariſe for that Vacancy, he refus'd to pay above a third of what was demanded.

He is guided by the Emperor's Intereſt.

As the Pope recover'd his Health, ſo he inclin'd more to join with the Emperor, who now by his Ambaſſador at Rome, enter'd a Proteſtation in the Queen of England's Name againſt the Legates, as unreaſonably partial in King Henry's Favour, which was receiv'd by the Pope, tho' much oppos'd by the Engliſh Ambaſſador. Upon this, Gardiner, who was a Man of great Subtelty and Penetration, wrote to King Henry, aſſuring him, That he was to expect nothing more from the Pope, who was reſolv'd to offend neither the Emperor nor him; therefore he adviſ'd him to procure the Legates to give Sentence with all poſſible Expedition; and when it ſhould come to the Emperor's Turn to ſollicite for Bulls againſt the King, the Pope would be as backward as he was now. All this he deſir'd might not be ſhown to the Cardinal; for he was now making his own Fortunes, and had at the ſame Time a private Correſpondence with Mrs. Bolen, whom he expected would in Time be Queen. In the Pollicitation which the Pope ſign'd to confirm the Legate's Sentence, ſome Clauſes were incerted, by which he could eaſily break looſe from it; therefore Gardiner endeavour'd to procure another in fuller Terms, by this Artifice: He told the Pope, That the Courier had met with an Accident in paſſing a River, by which the Inſtrument was ſo defac'd with the Water, that it could not be of any Uſe. But the Pope was ſuch a Maſter in the Arts of Diſſimulation and Policy, that inſtead of being catch'd with this, and to grant a new one, he was heartily glad it was defac'd, and poſitively refus'd to renew it. And a long and earneſt Letter wrote from the Legates to the Pope, urging him to end the Matter by a Decretal Bull, aſſuring him, It was only a Scruple of Conſcience that wrought on the King, and no Deſire of a new Wife, and that the whole Nation was much offended at the Delays of this Matter, in which all were ſo nearly concern'd, prevail'd nothing on him; for he conſider'd it was only done by them in Compliance with the King, who thought he had intirely gain'd Campegio, ſince the Scandals of his Life were ſo publick, that the Motives of Intereſt muſt certainly have the Aſcendant over him. But by all the Arts that could be invented, they were not able to over-reach the Pope, who whatever he might be in his Deciſions, ſeem'd infallible in his Sagacity and Jealouſie. The Queen's Agents ſtill preſs'd hard for an Avocation; but the Pope was unwilling to grant that, 'till he had finiſh'd his Treaty in all other Points with the Emperor, and he began to complain much of the cold Proceedings of the Confederates, and That they expos'd him both to the Emperor's Mercy, and the Scorn of the Florentines; by which it was viſible, he was ſeeking Pretenſions for throwing himſelf into the Emperor's Arms. Great Objections were made to the Motion for an Avocation, That it was contrary to the King's Prerogative to be cited at Rome; wherefore he would ſeek Juſtice from the Clergy of England, if deny'd by the Pope: It was alſo contrary to the Pollicitation under the Pope's Hand, to recall the Legate's Commiſſion, and his Faith often deliver'd by Word of Mouth, chiefly of late by Campana. But verbal Promiſes did not much bind the Pope, they vaniſh'd into Air, and Campana ſwore he had made none; and for the written Pollicitation, citation, there was a ſaving Clauſe in it, by which he could eſcape; ſo that he was at Liberty from all Engagements, but thoſe he had privately given in Diſcourſe, and to theſe he was no Slave.

King Henry being well inform'd of what paſs'd at Rome, recall'd Gardiner and Bryan, and ſent Doctor Bennet to Rome to hinder the Avocation of the Cauſe, of which he was ſo apprehenſive, that he not only intercepted thoſe Diſpatches ſent to Rome from Campegio, or any elſe, but alſo thoſe Intelligences which the Queen ſhould give to her Aunt Margaret of the Low-Countries. So that now the King finding his Conſcience unſatisfy'd, his Nobility in Suſpence, and the People murmering at theſe Delays in an Affair of the greateſt Importance, he charg'd the two Cardinals to proceed with all Expedition. The Place appointed for hearing and determining the Cauſe, was the great Hall in Black-Fryars, the Time the thirty firſt of May; when both the Cardinals appear'd in great Pomp; ſo that Wolſey might be ſaid to be now in the Height of his Grandeur, when he ſate Judge of his own Soveraign's Cauſe, upon which no leſs than the Succeſſion of the Kingdom depended. The Court being ſate, a peremptory Citation was iſſu'd out for the King and Queen, to appear on the eighteenth of June; upon which Day the Queen appear'd in Perſon, and proteſted againſt the Cardinals as incompetent Judges. Endeavours were therefore us'd to terrifie her into ſome Compliance, and a formal Complaint was made againſt her, 'That ſhe favour'd ſome who deſign'd to deſtroy the King and 'Cardinal; That ſhe carry'd her ſelf very diſobligingly to the King, and us'd many 'indecent Arts to render her ſelf popular; That the King was in Danger 'of his Life by her Means, and therefore he could no longer keep her Company, 'either as to Bed or Table: But ſhe was a Woman of ſuch Reſolution and Conſtancy, that no Threatnings could intimidate her. At the next Court Day, both the King and Queen appear'd; but the latter inſtead of anſwering to the Legates, kneel'd down before the King, and made a Speech that had all the Inſinuations to raiſe Commiſeration in the Audience. She declar'd She had been his dutiful Wife for twenty Years, had born him ſeveral Children, and had always ſtudy'd to oblige him; therefore ſhe beg'd to know where was her Offence. She inſiſted upon her Virginity when ſhe came to his Bed, alledging, That the Marriage was made by both their Parents, who were wiſe Princes, and had good Counſellors when it was made; but at preſent ſhe being a Stranger and a Subject, had neither indifferent Judges to hear, nor indifferent Lawyers to plead her Cauſe; therefore ſhe could expect no Juſtice in that Court. Upon which ſhe went out of the Court, and would never after appear in that Place. At her Departure, the King gave her a great Character for her extraordinary Qualities, and proteſted, He was acted by no other Principle, than that of Conſcience, and clear'd Cardinal Wolſey from being the firſt Mover in this Suit; declaring, That he firſt mention'd the Matter in Confeſſion to the Biſhop of Lincoln, and had deſir'd the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury to procure him the Reſolution of the Biſhops of England in this Caſe; and that they had under their Hands declar'd, That his Marriage was unlawful. The Biſhop of Rocheſter deny'd he had ſign'd ſuch a Paper; but the Arch-Biſhop alleg'd, That he gave him leave to make another write his Name to it, which the other ſtill deny'd. The Legates however, proceeded according to the Forms of Law; but the Queen inſtead of appearing, appeal'd from them to the Pope, and excepted both againſt the Place, the Judges, and her Lawyers. Yet ſtill they pronounc'd her contumacious, and proceeded to the Examination of Witneſſes for ſeveral Days, the Subſtance of which Allegations were, That there were many violent Preſumptions appear'd, That Prince Arthur had Carnal Knowledge of the Queen; and it could not be expected that greater Proofs could be made twenty ſeven Years after their Marriage.

The Proceſs begun in England under Campegio and Wolſey.

The Queen appeals to the Pope.

And now ſince the Proceſs was thus carry'd on, the Emperor's Agents vehemently preſs'd the Pope for an Avocation, to remove it to Rome; and all poſſible Endeavours were us'd by King Henry's Agents to preſent it; they omitted omitted nothing that could operate upon the Pope's Temper, either by Way of Perſuaſion or Threatning. It was repreſented to him, That there was a Treaty on foot between the King of England and the Lutheran Princes of Germany; and that upon his Holineſs declaring himſelf ſo partial, as to grant the Avocation, he would certainly imbark in the ſame Intereſts with them, and ſo England would be loſt from the Apoſtolick See. But as the Pope concluded the King was ſo far engag'd in Honour, that he could not be induc'd to unite with Luther's Followers in Points of Religion; ſo he did not imagine, that the Effects of his Avocation would be ſo diſmal and fatal as the Cardinal's Creature had repreſented them, or as he himſelf afterwards found them. He thought it would probably ruin the King's Affairs, which might occaſion his Agents to uſe ſuch Threatnings; but he did not much regard that, becauſe he hated him in his Heart. In Concluſion, after the Emperor had engag'd to reſtore his Family to the Government of Florence, he reſolv'd to publiſh his Treaty with him: But that the granting the Avocation might not look like a ſecret Article, as it was in reality, he reſolv'd to begin with that; and with the profoundeſt Marks of Sorrow, he declar'd to the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, That he could not avoid it, both becauſe all the Lawyers had aſſur'd him, It could not in common Juſtice be deny'd, and becauſe he could not reſiſt the Emperor's Forces, which ſurrounded him on all Sides. Their Endeavours to gain ſome Time by Delays, were alſo as fruitleſs as their other Arts had been; for on the fifteenth of July the Pope ſign'd it, publiſh'd the Treaty on the eighteenth, and ſent the Inſtrument of Avocation on the nineteenth by an expreſs Meſſenger to England.

Who grants an Avocation, and joins with the Emperor.

During this Management at Rome, the Legates, eſpecially Campegio who was the Senior, protracted the Matter by all the Delays that could be invented, and gain'd much Time under the Pretence of not precipitating the King's Affairs. At laſt, being reduc'd to a ſort of Neceſſity of pronouncing Sentence, inſtead of proceeding to that, Campegio unexpectedly adjourn'd the Court 'till October, declaring, That they being a Part of the Conſiſtory of Rome, were oblig'd to obſerve their Times of Vacation. The King who was in the next Chamber, was unexpreſſibly ſurpriz'd, and the Duke of Suffolk, then in Court in a Rage ſwore by the Maſs, That no Cardinal ever did good in England. To whom Wolſey ſeverely reply'd, If I poor Cardinal had not been here, you would not have kept your Head upon your Shoulders. This was one of the laſt Flights of the mighty States-Man, whoſe Grandeur being at the Height, was now ready to ſink: Campegio had nothing to loſe in England, but the Biſhoprick of Salisbury, for which the Pope or Emperor could eaſily recompence him; but Wolſey began to be under all the Terrors that are incident to an exorbitant Favourite, upon the Change of his Fortune; none being more abject in Misfortune than thoſe who are moſt elevated with Proſperity. When the Avoation was brought into England, the King ſubmitted ſo far as to allow the Legates to declare the Commiſſion void; but would by no means ſuffer the Letters citatory to be ſerv'd, for he look'd upon it as below the Dignity of his Crown, to be cited to appear at any other Court in Chriſtendom. This was the firſt Step he made towards the Diminution of the Pope's Authority. Yet upon this Occaſion he govern'd himſelf with more Mildneſs than was expected from the warmth of his Temper; he civilly diſmiſs'd Campegio, only his Officers ſtrictly ſearch'd his Coffers, when he took Shipping, with a Deſign as it was thought, to ſee if the decretal Bull could be found. Wolſey was now upon the Point of being diſgrac'd, tho' the King ſeem'd to treat him with the ſame Confidence he had uſually ſhown to him; it being common for many Princes to hide their Deſigns of diſcarding their Favourites, with higher Expreſſions of Kindneſs than ordinary, 'till their Ruin, being unforeſeen, breaks out with great Violence. Mrs. Bolen, who in the Time of the Proceſs had been diſmiſs'd the Court, was now return'd; and the King's Thoughts for a while were divided by many Doubts and Perplexities. He had the more Reaſon to be cir-cumſpect in his Affairs, becauſe the Pope and Emperor were now united in the former Alliance: The Pope's Nephew, who had been lately marry'd to the Emperor's Daughter, was now Duke of Florence. And the Emperor went afterwards in Perſon, and was crown'd with great Magnificence by the Pope; who when the Emperor was kneeling down to kiſs his Foot, humbled himſelf ſo far as to draw it back, and kiſs his Cheek. In this Year alſo another Peace was concluded at Cambray between the Emperor, the French King, and the Lady Margaret of Flanders, call'd the Womens Peace; where King Henry firſt found the Deceitfulneſs of the French Alliance; for he was not ſo conſider'd in the Treaty as he expected, and he found that Francis would not embroil his own Affairs in favour of his Divorce.

The Treaty of Cambray.

The King wiſely judg'd it neceſſary, to ſecure himſelf of the Affections and Confidence of his People, before he venter'd on any Thing that ſhould diſpleaſe two ſuch Potentates as the Pope and Emperor; therefore he thought fit to call a Parliament, which had been diſus'd in England for ſeven Years, and probably by the Advice of the Cardinal, who before the calling of it fell into a ſinking Condition. His too much Obſequiouſneſs to the See of Rome in the laſt Proceſs, and ſome inferior Accidents, render'd him obnoxious to the King and his neareſt Friends. So that he firſt commanded him to deliver up the great Seal, which was with great Reluctancy obey'd, and given to Sir Thomas More, who was not only eminent in his own Profeſſion, the Law, but in all Sorts of Learning; being much eſteem'd for the Strictneſs of his Life, and his Contempt of Mony. Shortly after, Hales the Attorney-General put in an Information againſt the Cardinal in the King's Bench, importing, That notwithſtanding the Statute of Richard the Second, againſt procuring Bulls from Rome upon Pain of Premunire, yet he had procur'd Bulls for his Legantine Power, which he had for many Years executed. To this he pleaded his Ignorance of the Statute, and ſubmitted to the King's Mercy; upon which it was declar'd, That he had forfeited all his Goods and Chattels to the King, and that his Perſon was liable to be ſeiz'd. Immediately his rich Palace of York-Houſe, ſince call'd White-Hall, was ſeiz'd to the King's Uſe; together with all that vaſt Wealth, and Royal Furniture that he had heap'd up together, which was prodigious, and beyond any Thing that had ever been ſeen in the Kingdom of England. But ſtill the King had no Deſire to ruin him intirely, but only to reduce him lower, to ſee if the Terror of that have any Influence on the Pope; therefore he firſt granted him his Protection, and then his Pardon, reſtor'd him to the See of York and Wincheſter, and gave him back in Mony, Goods and Plate to the Value of above ſix thouſand Pounds. But as he had carry'd his Greatneſs with moſt exorbitant Pride, ſo he was no leſs meanly abjected with his Misfortunes, and a deep Melancholy overcame his Spirits. The King as he more and more relented, ſent him frequent Aſſurances of his Favour; all which he receiv'd with extravagant Tranſports of Joy, and he that us'd to join or prefer himſelf to the King, now fell down on his Knees in the Dirt to a Meſſenger who brought him a Ring from his Majeſty. Yet his Enemies had gone too far, ever to ſuffer a Man of his Temper and Abilities, to return to Favour. Therefore they found Means to bring in a high Charge of forty four Articles againſt him in open Parliament. They related chiefly to his Legantine Power, contrary to Law, to his Inſolence and Ambition, his lewd Life, and other Things brought to defame his Reputation as well as deſtroy his Perſon. Theſe eaſily paſs'd in the Houſe of Lords, where he had but few Friends and many Enemies; but when the Charge was ſent down to the Houſe of Commons, it was ſo manag'd by the Induſtry of Thomas Cromwell, who had been his Servant, that no Treaſon could be laid to his Charge, ſo that the Accuſation drop'd.

A Parliament call'd.

Wolſey is diſgrac'd.

He is impeach'd in Parliament.

In this ſame Parliament, the Commons prepar'd ſeveral Bills againſt ſome of the Corruptions of the Clergy; one againſt the Exactions for the Probates of Wills, another for Regulating Mortuaries, and a third againſt Pluralities of Benefices and Non-reſidence. The Clergy abhorr'd the Precedent of the Commons, mons, intermedling in Eccleſiaſtical Affairs; and Biſhop Fiſher ſpoke violently againſt ſuch Proceedings, declaring, That all ſlow'd from want of Faith. Upon which the Commons complain'd to the King, for his reproaching their honourable Houſe, while the Houſe of Peers either thought it no Breach of Privilege, or were willing to connive at ſuch a Reflection. But Fiſher being hated at Court for his firm Adherence to the Queen's Intereſt, was put upon his Purgation to explain himſelf, and the Matter paſs'd over, and the Commons proceeded to their Bills; which, tho' ſtrenuouſly oppos'd by the Clergy, were at length paſs'd with the Royal Aſſent. Beſides theſe, a very peculiar Bill was brought in for the Relief of the King, who in this long Interval of Parliaments had borrow'd ſeveral large Sums of his Subjects: Now this Parliament, both to diſcourage that Way of ſupplying Kings for the future, and to ruin the Cardinal's Creatures, who had been moſt ready to lend, as having the greateſt Advantages from the Government, did by one Act diſcharge the King of all thoſe Debts. This occaſion'd great Murmurings among the Sufferers; but to qualifie the general Diſcontent, the King granted a free Pardon to all Offenders; only to terrifie the Pope, and to keep the Clergy in Submiſſion, he excepted ſuch as had incurr'd a Premunire, by acknowledging a Foreign Juriſdiction.

A. D. 1530. Reg. 21, 22.

The King had ſtill a particular View to the now ſubmiſſive Cardinal, and ſoon found that his Caſe was not much regarded at Rome: The Emperor hated him for his late Actions, and the Pope was jealous of his vaſt Aſpirings; ſo that tho' they were not well pleas'd to ſee a Cardinal ſo us'd, yet they could behold Wolſey's Downfal without much Concern. This Prelate was fondly deſirous to have ſtay'd at Richmond, which the King had given him in Exchange for Hampton-Court, that he had alſo built; but that was too near the Court, and his Enemies were reſolv'd to remove him further from it. Accordingly he was order'd to repair to his Dioceſe of York; in which Journey the very Ruins of his State were conſiderable, for he travell'd with a hundred and ſixty Horſe in his Train, and ſeventy two Waggons follow'd him with his Houſhold-Stuff. Having continu'd there a few Months, and perform'd many charitable and popular Acts, he was attach'd for High-Treaſon by the Earl of Northumberland, and committed to the Cuſtody of the Lieutenant of the Tower, who was order'd to bring him to London. And even then he had gracious Meſſages from the King, but they gave him no great Relief; for whether he knew himſelf guilty of ſome ſecret Practices with the Pope or Emperor, or whether he could ſtand no longer under the King's Diſpleaſure and this abject Condition, he was ſo diſpirited, that on his Way to London, he ſicken'd at Sheffield in the Earl of Shrewsbury's Houſe, from whence by ſlow Journies he went as far as Leiceſter, where he is ſaid to have taken Poiſon to end his miſerable Life. Being near his Departure, among other Things, he ſpoke this Sentence, worthy to be remember'd by all Favourites, Had I ſerv'd my God as diligently as I have ſerv'd my King, he would not have given me over in my grey Hairs; but this is my juſt Reward. He ſaid further to Sir William Kingſton, Lieutenant of the Tower, If ever you be one of the King's Council, beware of what you put into his Head, for you will be never able to put it out again. Thus dy'd this prodigious Man, on the twenty eighth Day of November, who had been the mightieſt of all Engliſh Subjects, and was the greateſt Inſtance that ſeveral Ages had ſhown of the Variety and Inconſtancy of Human Things, both in his Riſe and Fall. By his Temper in both, it appears he was unworthy of his Greatneſs, which renders his Character more ſurpriſing, that he ſhould be able of himſelf to perform ſo many Wonders; and it cannot but be accounted a ſingular Felicity, that during his Adminiſtration, all Things ſucceeded better than afterwards; tho' the Impreſſions he gave did probably occaſion ſeveral ſucceeding Irregularities. Notwithſtanding the general Hatred he had rais'd, few ever fell from ſuch a lofty Station, with leſſer Crimes objected againſt him. But as his being ſo ſubſervient to his Soveraign's criminal Pleaſures, was a greater Crime than his own lewd Life, or what was objected againſt him; ſo his ſacrificing the Duke of Buckingham to his Reſentments, was ſuch a Villany as call'd down the Vengeance of Heaven upon him, which rarely ſuſpends its Power, in Caſe of publick Blood.

The News of the Cardinal's Death being brought to the King, he could not with-hold from expreſſing a tender Concern, and declaring, That he had rather ſuffer'd the Loſs of twenty thouſand Pounds. But now his Thoughts were more poſſeſs'd with another riſing Favourite, of a finer Spirit, and more real Merit, Doctor Thomas Cranmer, a Fellow of Jeſus College in Cambridge, who in the preceding Year, meeting accidentally with Gardiner and Fox at Weltham, and being ask'd to declare his Thoughts concerning the King's Marriage, he propos'd a new and more rational Method: This was, 'That the 'King ſhould ingage the chief Univerſities and Divines of Europe, to examine 'into the Lawfulneſs of his Marriage; and if they declar'd their Opinions againſt 'it, then the Marriage in Courſe muſt be pronounc'd void, becauſe the Pope's 'Diſpenſation could not derogate from the Laws of God. As this was new, and reaſonable in it ſelf, ſo they propos'd it to the King, who was extreamly affected with it, as a Method that might have ſav'd him a vaſt Expence of Mony and Trouble; and ſaid in a coarſe way of ſpeaking, He had the Swine by the right Ear. He perceiv'd that this way was more like to be effectual, and would extreamly mortifie the Pope, who had ſo much deluded him; therefore Doctor Cranmer was ſent for to Court, where he ſo admirably behav'd himſelf, that the King conceiv'd an high Opinion both of his Learning and Prudence, and of his Probity and Sincerity, which took ſuch a deep Root in his Heart, that no Artifices nor Calumnies were ever able to remove it.

Cranmer's Riſe.

This new Method being reſolv'd on by the King, he firſt order'd Doctor Cranmer to write upon the Subject of the Divorce; and then ſent to procure the Concluſions of the two Univerſities of England. Here the King met with greater Obſtructions than from the Foreign Univerſities, by reaſon that Doctor Cranmer, and Mrs. Bolen, who was now like to be Queen, were thought Favourers of Lutheraniſm: Yet after a little Space, by a Majority, the Seals of both Univerſities were obtain'd; and they gave their Opinions, That the Marriage of the Brother's Wife, was contrary both to the Laws of God and Nature. Doctor Crook, a learned Man in the Greek Tongue, was employ'd in Italy, to procure the Reſolutions of Divines and Univerſities there; in which he was ſo ſucceſsful, that beſides the great Diſcoveries he made in ſearching the Manuſcripts of the Greek Fathers, concerning their Opinions in this Point, he engag'd ſeveral Perſons to write for the King's Cauſe; and alſo got the Jews to give their Opinions of the Laws in Leviticus, that they were Moral and Obligatory. The State of Venice would not declare themſelves, but ſaid they would be Neuters; and it was not eaſie to perſuade the Divines of the Republick to give their Opinions, 'till a Brief was obtain'd from the Pope, permitting all Divines and Canoniſts to deliver their Opinions, according to their Conſciences; which was not granted but with great Difficulty. For the Pope abhor'd this Way of Proceeding, tho' he could not decently oppoſe it; yet he ſaid in great Scorn, That no Friar ſhould ſet Limits to his Authority. Beſides many Divines and Canoniſts, not only whole Houſes of Religious Orders, but even the Univerſity of Bononia, tho' the Pope's Town, declar'd the Levitical Laws concerning the Degrees of Marriage, were Parts of the Law of Nature, and that the Pope could not diſpenſe with them. The Univerſity of Padua determin'd the ſame, as alſo that of Ferrara; ſo that Crook ſent over to England an hundred ſeveral Books, and Papers, with many Subſcriptions, all condemning the King's Marriage as unlawful in it ſelf. At Paris, the famous Sorbon made their Determination with great Solemnity of Maſſes and Oaths; and after three Weeks impartial Study, they agreed, That the King's Marriage was unlawful, and that the Pope could not diſpence with it. At Orleans, Angiers, and Tholouſe, and at other Univerſities in France, they determin'd to the ſame Purpoſe.

the

The King's Cauſe being favour'd and fortify'd by theſe, and many other Authorities, he procur'd many Members of Parliament, in a Time of Prorogation, to ſign a Letter to the Pope, complaining, 'That notwithſtanding the great 'Merits of their King, the Juſtice of his Cauſe, and the Importance of it to 'the Safety of the Kingdom, yet his Holineſs ſtill made new Delays; they 'therefore earneſtly preſs'd him to diſpatch it ſpeedily, otherwiſe they ſhould 'be compell'd to ſeek for other Remedies, tho' they were unwilling to drive 'Matters to Extremities, 'till it became unavoidable. This Letter was ſign'd by the two Arch-Biſhops, four Biſhops, forty two Peers, twenty two Abbots, and eleven Commoners: To this the Pope wrote an Anſwer: 'He took notice 'of the Vehemence of their Stile: He freed himſelf from the Imputations of In-'gratitude and Injuſtice: He acknowledg'd the King's great Merits, declaring 'he had done all he could in his Favour. He had granted a Commiſſion, but 'could not refuſe to receive the Queen's Appeal; all the Cardinals had with 'one Conſent judg'd, That an Avocation was neceſſary. Since then the Delays 'did not proceed from him, but the King; that he was ready to proceed, and 'would bring it to as ſpeedy an Iſſue, as the Importance of it would admit; 'and for their Threatnings, they were neither agreeable to their Wiſdom, nor 'their Religion. But the King finding the Pope reſolv'd to grant nothing, and apprehending that ſome Bull might be brought into England in favour of the Queen, he ſet out a Proclamation againſt any who ſhould purchaſe or publiſh any Thing from Rome contrary to his Royal Prerogative, threatning Impriſonment, and other Puniſhments, which were founded upon the Statute of Proviſors and Premunires. After this he caus'd an Abſtract of all the Reaſons and Authorities of the Fathers, or Modern Writers, againſt his Marriage, to be publiſh'd both in Latin and Engliſh; by which it appear'd, That according to the Authority given to Tradition in the Church of Rome, the King had clearly the Right on his Side. Yet ſtill the Queen continu'd firm to her Reſolution of leaving the Matter in the Pope's Hands; and therefore would hearken to no Propoſitions that were made to her, for the referring the Cauſe to the Arbitration of ſome ſelect Perſons on both Sides. In the Judgments that People paſs'd, the Sexes were divided; the Men generally approv'd the King's Cauſe, and the Women as much favour'd the Queen.

The chief Nobility of England write to the Pope.

His Anſwer.

A Seſſion of Parliament follow'd in the Month of January; in which the King caus'd all the Deciſions of the Univerſities, and the Books written for the Divorce, to be firſt read in the Houſe of Lords, and then they were carry'd down to the Commons, by the Chancellor More, and twelve Lords, both of the Spiritualty and Temporalty. There were twelve Seals of the Univerſities ſhew'd, and their Deciſions were read, firſt in Latin, and then tranſlated into Engliſh. There were alſo a hundred Books produc'd, written on the ſame Argument; upon the ſhewing of which, the Chancellor deſir'd them to report to their ſeveral Countries, That they now clearly ſaw, That the King had not attempted this Matter out of his meer Will and Pleaſure, but for the Diſcharge of his Conſcience, and the Security of the Succeſſion to the Crown. This Affair was alſo brought into the Convocation, where the Clergy declar'd themſelves ſatisfy'd concerning the Unlawfulneſs of the Marriage; but their unfortunate Circumſtances at that Juncture, render'd their Declaration leſs conſiderable. For Cardinal Wolſey by exerciſing his Legantine Authority having, as before related, fallen into a Premunire, they by joining in his Courts, were alſo involv'd in the ſame Guilt; and this Matter being excepted out of the late Act of Pardon, an Indictment was brought into the King's Bench, againſt all the Clergy of England, for breaking the Statutes of Proviſors and Premunires; by which they were declar'd out of the King's Protection, tection, their Goods forfeited, and their Persons liable to Imprisonment. Now these old Statutes were reviv'd, that the Terror of them might not only mortifie the Court of Rome, but also oblige the Clergy to an intire Submission, and to redeem themselves by a considerable Subsidy. They alleg'd that they had err'd ignorantly; for the King by his Favour to the Cardinal, seem'd to encourage that Authority he then exercis'd: It was a publick Error, therefore they ought not to be punish'd for it. To all which it was reply'd, that the Laws which they had transgress'd were still in Force, therefore no Ignorance could excuse the Violation of them. Upon which the Convocation of Canterbury made their Submission, and in their Address to the King, he was still'd The Protector, and supream Head of the Church of England; but some disliking that, they added as far as it is agreeable to the Law of Christ. This was sign'd by nine Bishops, fifty Abbots and Priors, and the greatest Part of the Lower House; and with it they offer'd the King a Composition of a hundred thousand Pounds, and promis'd for the future, not to make or execute any Constitutions, without a Royal Licence. The Convocation of York did with some Reluctancy acknowledge the King the Supream Head, and submitted with an Offer of above eighteen thousand Pounds; all which being well receiv'd, the Clergy were all restor'd and pardon'd. But when the King's Pardon was brought into the Parliament House, the Laity complain'd, That they were not included in it; for many of them were also obnoxious on the same Account, and liable to the same Punishment; therefore they address'd to the King for Ease and Security. The King return'd Answer, That his Mercy was neither to be restrain'd, nor extorted; which put the House of Commons under great Apprehensions. But soon after they had pass'd the Act, the King freely sent a Pardon to all his Temporal Subjects, which was receiv'd with Universal Joy; and they acknowledg'd, That in this Action, his Majesty had happily temper'd his Greatness, with his Clemency.

They submit, and compound with the King.

These Proceedings were highly mortifying to the Court of Rome, and the Pope, who being about this Time much disoblig'd by the Emperor, resolv'd to unite himself to the Crown of France; and Francis, to gain him more entirely, propos'd a Match between his Second Son Henry and the Pope's Neece, the famous Catharine de Medici; which as it wrought much on the Pope's Ambition, so it was like to prove a great Support to his Family. The Pope joining with the French, and out of Danger from the Emperor, by reason of the present Progress of the Turks, King Henry's Affairs might have easily been adjusted, if he had not proceeded so far already; for the Pope's Conscience being directed by his Interest, it was more than probable that at this Time he would give the King Satisfaction. He saw the Danger of losing England, the Interest of the Clergy sinking, Lutheranism encreasing, and the Protestant Princes of Germany taking Advantage from the present Employment of the Emperor; all which were melancholy Views. At the same Time King Francis enter'd into a League with the Protestant Princes, for the Conservation of their Privileges; and so prevail'd upon King Henry, that he sent over fifty thousand Crowns for the same Design. And now, as it were, declining all Assistance from the Court of Rome, he us'd all Methods to prevail with the Queen to submit; but nothing could remove her Resolutions. And when some Lords represented to her the great Burden of Conscience that lay upon the King's Mind, she pray'd God to send the King a quiet Conscience, for she was his lawful Wife, and would so continue, 'till the Court of Rome declar'd the contrary. Upon which the King forbore to see her, and order'd her to chuse to which of her Manors she would please to retire; she answer'd That wherever she retir'd, nothing could remove her from being his Wife. Upon which Answer the King took his final Leave of her at Windsor, upon the fourteenth of July, and never saw her more. Here ended all the Temporal Grandeur of Queen Catharine of Spain, after she had been twenty two Years Wife and Queen to one of the greatest Monarchs of the the Age; who tho' ſhe was a Lady of unqueſtionable Piety and Devotion, ſhe had both her Marriages attended with uncommon Misfortunes. This latter was examin'd by the Chief of all Chriſtendom, cenſur'd and pronounc'd Inceſtuous: But the former, which was ſeven Years in finiſhing by the two wiſeſt Kings in Europe, had the Way made to it by the Deſtruction of the Innocent Earl of Warwick; which made the religious Queen acknowledge, That her Misfortunes were the Hand of Heaven, ſince her firſt Marriage was founded in Blood.

VII. King Henry, after four Years mighty Struggle, had now freed himſelf from the Perſon of his Queen; but not being yet regularly divorc'd, the Affair did not end here; and the former Proceedings had ſtill further Effects upon the King, the Clergy, and the whole Body of the Nation. In the Beginning of this Year, a new Seſſion of Parliament was held, in which the Laity complain'd of the Spiritual Courts, of their Way of Proceeding ex Officio, and not admitting Perſons accus'd to their Purgation. But theſe Complaints were at this Time ſtifled, by Reaſon of an ill Underſtanding between the King and the Houſe of Commons, about a Bill concerning Wards; and tho' the King thought himſelf diſoblig'd, yet the Parliament being compos'd of Men very ill affected to the Clergy, he kept it ſtill in Being, to terrifie the Court of Rome. And in this Parliament the Foundation of the Breach that afterwards follow'd with Rome, was laid, by an Act for reſtraining the Payment of Annates or Firſt-Fruits to that Court. The Act ſets forth 'That they were founded on 'no Law, but being firſt given to defend Chriſtendom againſt Infidels, they 'were ſince kept up as a Revenue to the Papacy, and Bulls were not granted 'till they were paid; for eight hundred thouſand Ducats had been carry'd out 'of England to Rome upon that Account, ſince the Beginning of the laſt Reign. 'The King was bound by the Royal Care of his Subjects to hinder ſuch Op'preſſions; therefore all benefic'd Perſons were requir'd not to pay Firſt-Fruits 'for the future, under Pain of forfeiting their Goods and Livings: And thoſe 'who were preſented to Biſhopricks were appointed to be conſecrated, tho' their 'Bulls were deny'd at Rome; and were requir'd to pay no more than five per 'Cent. of the clear Proffits of their Sees. If the Pope ſhould upon this pro'ceed to Cenſures, the Clergy were notwithſtanding commanded to perform 'all Divine Offices. But by an extraordinary Proviſo, it was deferr'd to the 'King to declare at any Time between then and Eaſter in the following Year, 'whether this Act ſhould take Place or not. The King, being afterwards provok'd by the Pope, by his Letters Patents declar'd the Act to be in force.

A. D. 1532. Reg. 23/24. A new Seſſion of Parliament. An Act againſt Annates paid to Rome.

Before the Parliament broke up, the Pope, upon the Motion of the Imperialiſts wrote to the King, complaining, That notwithſtanding a Suit was depending concerning his Marriage, yet he had put away his Queen, and kept one Anne Bolen as his Wife, contrary to a Prohibition ſerv'd on him; therefore he exhorted him to live with his Queen, and put away the other. Upon which the King ſent Doctor Bennet to Rome, with a large Diſpatch, in which he complain'd, That the Pope having proceeded upon the Suggeſtion of others, who were ignorant and raſh Men, he had carry'd himſelf inconſtantly and deceitfully, and not like Chriſt's Vicar: He had granted a Commiſſion, with a Promiſe never to recall it, and had ſent over a Decretal Bull determining the Cauſe. Either theſe were unjuſtly granted, or unjuſtly recall'd; If he had Authority to grant them, where was the Faith of a Friend, or a Pope, who had broke his Promiſe? If he had not Authority to grant them, he had juſt Cauſe to diſtruſt all that came from him. It was therefore plain that he was govern'd more by Intereſt than Conſcience; and that as he had often confeſs'd his own Ignorance in theſe Matters, ſo he wanted learned Men to adviſe him, otherwiſe he would not maintain a Marriage which almoſt all the learned Men and Univerſities in England, France and Italy, had condemn'd as unlawful. After this this he declar'd, That he would not queſtion his Authority, unleſs he was compell'd to it, and deſign'd only to reduce it to its firſt and ancient Limits, which was much better than to let it run on with Precipitation and Error. This high Letter put the Pope upon a Reſolution to proceed and end this great Affair, either by a Sentence or a Treaty. Accordingly King Henry was cited to anſwer to the Queen's Appeal at Rome in Perſon, or by Proxy: Upon which Sir Edward Karne was ſent thither in the new Character of the King's Excuſator, to excuſe the King's Appearance, upon ſuch Grounds as could be founded on the Canon Law, and upon the Privileges of the Crown of England; and Doctor Bonner, a forward and ambitious Man, who would ſcruple at nothing that brought him Preferment, was ſent over with him.

The Pope cites him to Rome.

They arriv'd at Rome in the Month of March, where they found great Heats in the Conſiſtory about the King's Buſineſs: The Imperialiſts vehemently preſs'd the Pope to give Sentence; but all the wiſe Cardinals, who obſerv'd by the Proceedings of the Parliament, that the Nation would adhere to the King, if he ſhould be provok'd to ſhake off the Pope's Yoke, were very apprehenſive of a Breach, and ſuggeſted milder Counſels to the Pope; and the King's Agents aſſur'd him, that if he would give the King Satisfaction, the late Acts againſt Annates or Firſt-Fruits, ſhould not be put in Execution. At that Time the Cardinal of Ravenna was conſider'd as an Oracle in the Conſiſtory, therefore the King's Agents reſolv'd to gain him with great Promiſes; but he ſubtilly reply'd, That Princes were liberal of their Promiſes, 'till their Turns were ſerv'd, and then uſually forgot them. Therefore before he would proceed he caus'd Doctor Bennet to give him a Promiſe in Writing of the Biſhoprick of Ely, or the firſt that became vacant, and he alſo ingag'd that the King ſhould procure him Benefices in France to the Value of ſix thouſand Ducats a Year, for the Service he ſhould do him by his Divorce. This was an Argument of ſuch powerful Efficacy with the Cardinal, that it abſolutely turn'd him from being a great Enemy, to be as great a Promoter of the King's Cauſe, tho' with no ſmall Artifice. Several other Cardinals were likewiſe mollify'd and prevail'd upon by the ſame Topicks. The King's Agents put in his Excuſatory Plea in twenty eight Articles; and it was order'd that three at a Hearing ſhould be diſcuſs'd before the Conſiſtory, 'till all ſhould be examin'd: But that Court ſitting no more than once a Week, the Imperialiſts, after ſome of them had been heard, procur'd an Order, that the reſt for greater Diſpatch ſhould be heard in a Congregation or Committee of Cardinals, before the Pope: Which being refus'd by Karne, it was referr'd back to the Conſiſtory. Againſt this the Imperialiſts proteſted, and refus'd to appear any more; upon which Karne complain'd of their Contumacy, declaring, they were diſtruſtful of their Cauſe.

Some Cardinals gain'd to the King's Side.

During the Examination of this Plea, News were brought to Rome from England, That a Prieſt for preaching up the Pope's Power was caſt into Priſon; and that a Perſon committed by the Arch-Biſhop for Hereſie, appeal'd to the King as Supream Head, which was receiv'd and judg'd in the King's Courts. The Pope made great Complaints upon this; but the King's Agents only ſaid, The beſt Method to prevent the like for the future, was to do the King Juſtice. At this Time a Bull being deſir'd, was granted to the King for ſuppreſſing ſome Monaſteries, and erecting ſix new Biſhopricks out of them. Cheſter was nam'd for one; and the Cardinal of Ravenna was ſo pleas'd with the Revenue deſign'd for it, that he ſecur'd it to himſelf, 'till Ely ſhould fall vacant. In concluſion, the Pope ſeem'd to favour the King's Excuſatory Plea, which rais'd the Clamours of the Imperialiſts; but this amounting to no more than to excuſe the King's perſonal Appearance, the new-gain'd Cardinals adviſ'd the King to ſend over a Proxy for anſwering to the Merits of the Cauſe, and not to waſte more Time in that Dilatory Plea; and they having before declar'd themſelves againſt the King in that Plea, could now with the better Credit ſerve him in the Other. The Vacation coming on, it was reſolv'd by the Cardinals then neither to admit nor reject the Plea; but both the Pope and College wrote to the King to send over a Proxy for determining the Matter next Winter. Doctor Bonner was also sent to England to assure the King, That the Pope was now so much in the French Interest, that he might confidently refer his Matter to him; and likewise to declare to him, 'That since the grand Question 'was, Whether the Pope could grant the Dispensation or not, it could not re-'gularly be committed to Legates, but must be judg'd by the Pope and the Con-'sistory.

A new Session of Parliament.

During these dilatory and fruitless Proceedings at Rome, a new Session of Parliament was call'd in England; in which the Clergy gave in their Answer to the Complaints made of them by the Commons in the former Sessions. But when the King gave it to the Speaker, he express'd his Displeasure against one Temse, a Member of their House, who had mov'd for an Address, That the Queen might be brought back to the Court, and declar'd, That the Subject touch'd his Conscience, which was not to be determin'd by their House: He wish'd the Marriage was good, but many Divines had declar'd it unlawful: He did not make this Suit out of Lust or foolish Appetite, being then past the Heats of Youth; but as his Conscience was troubled, he desir'd the same might be reported to the House. Shortly after, the King sent again for the Speaker, and told him, That he had found the chief Clergy of the Realm were but half Subjects, or something less. For it appear'd that every Bishop or Abbot, at the entering upon his Dignity, took an Oath to the Pope, inconsistent with that of their Fidelity to the King, which Contradiction he desir'd might be remov'd by the Parliament. Whereupon these two Oaths being by the King's Order read and consider'd, the Parliament so treated the Matter, as it occasion'd the final Renunciation of the Pope's Authority about two Years after. A Plague put a sudden End to this Session; about which Time, Sir Thomas More laid down his Office of Lord Chancellor, which was conferr'd on Sir Thomas Audley. He now saw how far the King's Designs tended; and tho' he was for opposing the Papal Incroachments, and chearfully concurr'd with the Suit of the Premunire; yet when he saw a total Rupture like to ensue, he could not keep Pace with others, but retir'd to a private Life with a Greatness of Mind equal to what the ancient Greeks and Romans had express'd on such Occasions. He disliked Mrs. Bolen, and her Father, who endeavour'd to fasten some criminal Imputations on him, in the Distribution of Justice; but his Integrity was such, as nothing could be brought against him to blemish his Reputation.

Sir Thomas More quits his Office.

In September following the King created Mrs. Anne Bolen Marchioness of Pembroke, that she might have a gradual Rise to that Height for which he had design'd her. And in October he pass'd the Seas with her, and had a solemn Enterview with the French King, according to former Articles; where on both Sides all pass'd all possible Compliments and Endearments, with the utmost State and Magnificence, and a firm Union was concerted of all their Affairs. Extraordinary Entertainments and Diversions were made for them both at Boloign and Calais; and their Rule of Proceeding was, That while Francis was on French Ground, he gave Place, but when he came to the English Pale he receiv'd it. As to the Matter of King Henry's Divorce, Francis incourag'd him to proceed to a second Marriage, promising to assist him in it, if Occasion so requir'd; and assur'd him, That he intended to restrain the Payment of First-Fruits to Rome, and would demand of the Pope a Redress of that and other Grievances, which if deny'd, Remedies should be sought in a Provincial Council. An Enterview was also propos'd between the Pope and him, at which he desir'd King Henry to be present, to which he was not unwilling, if he could have Assurance that his Business would finally be determin'd. The Pope about this Time offer'd to King Henry to send a Legate to any indifferent Place out of England, to form the Process, reserving only the final Sentence to himself; and propos'd to him, and all Princes, a general Truce, that so he might call a general Council. The King of England in his Reply declar'd, 'That it was 'contrary to his Prerogative to ſend a Proxy to appear at Rome; That by the 'Decrees of General Councils, all Cauſes ought to be judg'd on the Place, and 'by a Provincial Council; and that it was more proper to judge it in England, 'than any other Place, That by his Coronation Oath, he was bound to main-'tain the Dignities of his Crown, and the Rights of his Subjects, and not to 'appear before any other Foreign Court. So Sir Thomas Elliot was ſent over with Inſtructions, to move that the Cauſe might be judg'd in England: Yet if the Pope had real Intentions to give the King Satisfaction, he was not to inſiſt on that Particular. And to make the Cardinal of Ravenna ſure, he ſent him the Offer of the Biſhoprick of Litchfield and Coventry, then vacant.

The King's ſecond Marriage, with Anne Bolen.

But before any Anſwers could be return'd, the King marry'd the late advanc'd Mrs. Bolen, on the fourteenth Day of November, at Calais; the Office being perform'd by Rowland Lee, afterwards Biſhop of Lichfield and Coventry, with great Privacy, tho' in the Preſence of the Duke of Norfolk, her Father, her Mother, her Brother, and Doctor Cranmer. It was now concluded among them, That the former Marriage being declar'd void by the profoundeſt Heads in Europe, the King might lawfully proceed to another: And probably it was hop'd, that as the Pope himſelf had formerly propos'd the very Method, ſo he would now readily join with him. But tho' the Pope had join'd himſelf to France, yet he ſtill ſo much dreaded the Emperor, that he reſolv'd not to provoke him; and therefore would not be prevail'd upon by any of the Expedients which Doctor Bennet propos'd, which was either to determine the Cauſe in England, according to the Council of Nice, or to refer it to the Arbitration of particular Perſons nam'd by the Pope and the two Kings of England and France; for all theſe he ſaid tended to the Diminution of the Papal Authority. Wherefore a new Citation was iſſu'd out for the King to anſwer to the Queen's Complaints; but the King's Agents proteſted, That as their Maſter could expect no Juſtice from Rome, where the Emperor's Power was ſo great; ſo he was a Soveraign Prince, and the Church of England a free Church, over which the Pope had no juſt Authority.

A. D. 1533. Reg. 24/25.

The Parliament condemns all Appeals to Rome.

In the mean Time the threaten'd Breach with the See of Rome was much promoted by a new Seſſion of Parliament, begun on the fourteenth of February, which paſs'd an Act, condemning all Appeals to the Pope; declaring, 'That 'the Crown was Imperial, and the Nation a compleat Body, with full Power 'to do Juſtice in all Caſes, both Spiritual and Temporal: And that as former 'Kings had maintain'd the Liberties of the Kingdom againſt the Uſurpations of 'Rome, ſo they found the great Inconveniences of allowing Appeals in Ma-'trimonial Cauſes, by occaſioning unreaſonable Charges and Delays: Therefore 'it was enacted, That thoſe hereafter ſhould be judg'd in the Kingdom, and no 'Regard had to any Appeals to Rome, or Cenſures from it; but Sentences 'given in England, were to have their full Effect; and all that executed any 'Cenſure from Rome, were to incur a Premunire. Appeals were to be from 'the Arch-Deacon to the Biſhop, and from him to the Arch-Biſhop: Only in 'Cauſes that concern'd the King the Appeal was to be to the Convocation. This Matter was likewiſe diſcuſs'd in the Convocation, which at preſent wanted a Head; for in the preceding Year dy'd Warham Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, who had been a great Patron of Learning, a good Canoniſt, and a wiſe Stateſman, but a cruel Perſecutor of Hereticks, and too much inclin'd to believe Fanatical Stories. Doctor Cranmer was then in Germany, diſputing in the King's Cauſe with ſome of the Emperor's Divines. The King reſolv'd to advance him to that Dignity, and ſent a Meſſage to haſten his Return; but a Promotion ſo far above his Thoughts had different Effects on him: He had a true and primitive Senſe of ſo mighty a Charge; and inſtead of aſpiring to it, he was really afraid of it, and he both return'd very ſlowly to England, and us'd all his Endeavours to be excus'd from that Advancement. At length, by the King's Order, Bulls for his Conſecration were deſir'd at Rome, notwithſtanding the late Act againſt Annates; which the Pope granted, tho' it could not be grateful to him to ſend them to one who had ſo publickly diſputed and queſtion'd his diſpenſing Power: Only a ſmall Compoſition was paid, and theſe were the laſt Bulls that were receiv'd in England during this King's Reign. On the thirtieth of March, Doctor Cranmer was conſecrated by the Biſhops of Lincoln, Exeter, and St. Aſaph; in which the Oath to the Pope rais'd ſome Scruples: Therefore he made a formal Proteſtation before he took it, That he conceiv'd himſelf not bound by it in any Thing contrary to his Duty to God, to his King, or Country, all which he openly repeated when he took the Oath: So if this ſeem'd too artificial for a Man of his Sincerity, yet ſtill he acted fairly, and without actual Deceit.

Cranmer made Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury.

Upon his Conſecration and Inveſtiture, he took his Place in the Convocation, where two Queſtions were then warmly debating: The firſt was, concerning the Lawfulneſs of the King's Marriage, and the Validity of the Pope's Diſpenſation; the other was of Matter of Fact, Whether Prince Arthur had conſummated the Marriage or not. To determine both, the Opinions of the Univerſities and foreign Divines were conſider'd, with all the preſumptive Evidences of Prince Arthur's Conſummation. After a ſolemn Debate, the King's Marriage was declar'd unlawful and null, and by ſo great a Majority in the upper Houſe, that it paſs'd under the Title of Nemine Contradicente. And the Church of England having made ſuch a full Deciſion, nothing remain'd but a judicial Sentence of Divorce. The new Queen Anne began to appear big with Child, which was look'd upon as a great Proof of her Chaſtity with the King before Marriage; and on Eaſter Eve ſhe was firſt declar'd Queen of England. Shortly after Arch-Biſhop Cranmer, with Gardiner, now Biſhop of Wincheſter, and the Biſhops of London, Lincoln, Bath and Wells, with many Divines and Canoniſts, went and held a Court at Dunſtable, near Queen Catharine, who reſided at Ampthil. The King and Queen were both cited; he appear'd by Proxy, but the Queen, refuſing to ſhow any Regard to the Court, after three Citations, was declar'd contumacious; and all the Merits of the Cauſe, formerly mention'd, were examin'd. At length, on the twenty third of May, Sentence was given, declaring the Marriage to have been null from the Beginning; and ſome Days after, the Arch-Biſhop gave another Judgment, confirming the King's Marriage with Queen Anne. Upon this, on the firſt Day of June, ſhe was crown'd Queen of England, with ſuch Pomp and Solemnity, as was anſwerable to the Magnificence of the preſent Monarch, as may be ſeen at large in Holingſhed and other Writers. Various Cenſures paſs'd upon this; but all admir'd at the new Queen's Conduct, who in a Courſe of ſo many Years manag'd the Spirit of a King ſo violent, as neither to ſurfeit him with too many Favours, nor to provoke him with too much Niceneſs. Her being ſo ſoon with Child, gave Hopes of a numerous Iſſue; and they who lov'd the Reformation, expected better Days under her Protection; but many Prieſts and Friars, both in Sermons and Diſcourſes, condemn'd the King's Proceedings, as prepoſterous, as well as unlawful. On the ſeventh of September the Queen brought forth a Daughter, chriſten'd Elizabeth, afterwards the renown'd Queen of England, and the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury was her God-Father. Great Rejoycings were made at her Birth, and ſhe was ſoon after declar'd Princeſs of Wales; tho' Lawyers thought it againſt Law, for ſhe could only be Heir preſumptive, but not apparent to the Crown, becauſe a Son coming after muſt have been preferr'd.

The Birth of Queen Elizabeth.

In the mean Time the King ſent Ambaſſadors to all the Courts of Europe, to give Notice of his new Marriage, and to juſtifie his Proceedings: At the ſame Time he ſent Perſons to Queen Catharine, to command her to aſſume no other Title than Princeſs Dowager; and to give her Hopes of her Daughter being put next the Queen's Iſſue in the Succeſſion, if ſhe would ſubmit her ſelf to his Will. But the afflicted Queen would not yield, declaring She would not damn her Soul, nor ſubmit to ſuch Infamy; and reſolv'd that none ſhould ſerve her, who did not treat her as a Queen. All her Servants ſo adher'd to her Intereſt, that no Threatnings or Promiſes could prevail upon them; and what the King did in this was thought below that Height of Mind which appear'd in his other Actions; for ſince he had ſtripp'd her of the real Greatneſs of a Queen, it was too much to refuſe her the Pageantry of the Title. The News of theſe Proceedings made great Impreſſions in foreign Parts: The Empetor ſeem'd ſwell'd with Reſentments. The French King was colder than King Henry expected; yet he promis'd to intercede with the Pope, and the Cardinals, on his Account: But he was now ſo intirely gain'd by the Pope, That he reſolv'd not to involve himſelf as a Party in King Henry's Quarrel; and he alſo receded from the Deſigns he once had of erecting a Patriarchate in France, for the Pope had lately granted him a Satisfactory Power over his own Clergy. The Emperor was not a little pleas'd with the French King's Coldneſs and Backwardneſs; for this might probably ſeparate thoſe two Kings whoſe Conjunction had been ſo dangerous to him. At Rome the Cardinals of the Imperial Faction loudly exclaim'd againſt the Attempt made on the Pope's Power, ſince a Sentence was given in England in a Proceſs depending at Rome; therefore they urg'd the Pope to proceed to Cenſures. But inſtead of putting the Matter paſt Reconciliation, there was only a Sentence given, annulling all that the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury had done; and the King was requir'd under Pain of Excommunication to reduce all Things to their former State, before September next; which Sentence was ſoon after affix'd in Dunkirk.

The Pope annuls Cranmer's Sentence.

At the ſame Time King Henry ſent a great Embaſſie to the French King, who was then removing towards Marſeilles, where the Pope was to meet him: The Deſign was to diſſuade him from the Journey, unleſs the Pope might be procur'd to give King Henry Satisfaction. The King of France declar'd he was ingag'd in Honour to make that Journey, but aſſur'd the Ambaſſadors, That he would remember their Maſter's Concerns, with as much Zeal, as if they were his own. At Marſeilles, the Marriage was concluded between the young Duke of Orleans, afterwards King Henry the Second, and the Pope's Neece; to whom the Pope gave a hundred thouſand Crowns, and many Principalities, which he pretended were either Fiefs of the Papacy, or belonging to him in the Rights of the Houſe of Medici. There was a private Agreement made between the Pope and Francis, 'That if King Henry would refer his Cauſe to 'the Roman Conſiſtory, with an Exception to the Cardinals of the Imperial 'Faction, and would in all other Things return to his Obedience to the Apo-'ſtolick See, then Sentence ſhould be given in his Favour; but this was to be kept ſecret. So that Bonner, not being truſted with it, and ſent thither with an Appeal from the Pope to the next general Council, made it with ſuch Heat and Inſolence to the Pope's Perſon, that he was threaten'd to be thrown into a Cauldron of melted Lead, or to be burnt alive; upon the Apprehenſion of which he fled away privately. But when Francis return'd to Paris, he ſent the Biſhop of that City to King Henry, to let him know what he had obtain'd of the Pope in his Favour, and the Terms on which it was promis'd; which ſo prevail'd upon the King, that thinking them ſecure, he immediately conſented to them. Upon which, the Biſhop of Paris, tho' in the middle of Winter, took a Journey to Rome; aſſuring himſelf of the Scarlet, if he were Inſtrumental in regaining England, which was then upon the Point of being loſt. What the Aſſurances were that the Pope gave may be gather'd from a Letter wrote by the Arch-Biſhop of York and Biſhop of Durham, which declares, That the Pope ſaid at Marſeilles, That if the King would ſend a Proxy to Rome, he would give Sentence for him againſt the Queen, for he knew his Cauſe was good and juſt.

Yet promiſes to give Satisfaction to King Henry.

Upon

Upon the Biſhop of Paris's Arrival at Rome, the Matter ſeem'd determin'd; for it was promis'd, 'That upon King Henry's ſending a Writing under his 'Hand to put Things in their former State, and his ordering a Poxy to appear for 'him, Judges ſhould be ſent to Cambray for making the Proceſs, and Sentence 'ſhould be immediately given. Upon Notice given of this, and of a Day that was prefix'd for the Return of the Courier, King Henry with utmoſt Expedition diſpatch'd a Perſon, with a formal Promiſe under his Hand; ſo now the Conteſt ſeem'd at an End, and the Wound that was thought fatal, was almoſt healed. But God thought fit to ruin the Attempt; and the Meſſenger, who had a Sea and the Alps to paſs, beſides ill Ways and Weather to encounter, could not obſerve the prefix'd Day: Which caus'd the Imperialiſts to ſhew their Reſentments, and violently to urge the Pope to proceed to Sentence, againſt one who had abus'd his Eaſineſs. The Biſhop of Paris mov'd only for a Delay of ſix Days, which he thought a reaſonable Requeſt for one who had Patience ſo many Years; but the Deſign of the Imperialiſts was to hinder all Terms of Reconciliation; therefore with the utmoſt Aggravations they urg'd, That King Henry was ſeeking Delays and Conceſſions meerly to delude the Pope; and that he had gone ſo far in his Deſigns againſt the Apoſtolick See, both by Books and Libels, that it was neceſſary to proceed to Cenſures. The inrag'd Pope was ſo fir'd with theſe Repreſentations, and the News he hear'd from England, that without conſulting his ordinary Prudence, he brought the Matter to the Conſiſtory; where the Imperialiſts being moſt numerous, it was hurry'd on with ſuch Precipitation, that they tranſacted that in one Seſſion, which according to Form, ſhould have been done in three. They gave the final Sentence, declaring King Henry's Marriage with Queen Catharine good; and requir'd him to live with her as his Wife, otherwiſe they would proceed to Cenſures. Two Days after that the Courier came with King Henry's Submiſſion in due Form, and with earneſt Letters from King Francis in his Favour. This ſo ſenſibly affected all the indifferent and wiſe Cardinals, that they begg'd of the Pope to conſider the Matter again, before all was loſt. A new Conſiſtory was call'd; but the Imperialiſts preſs'd with greater Violence than ever, That they would not give ſuch a Scandal as to revoke a definitive Sentence of a Marriage, and give the Hereticks ſuch Advantages by their Unſteadineſs in Matters of that Nature. Upon which it was carry'd, That the former Sentence ſhould take Place; and the Execution of it was committed to the Emperor himſelf. This was amazing to all Europe, to ſee the Court of Rome throw off England with ſo much Contempt, as if they had been ſurfeited with the Obedience and Profits of ſo famous a Kingdom; and their Proceedings look'd as if they had been ſecretly directed by a Divine Providence that deſign'd to draw mighty Conſequences from this Breach, and did ſo infatuate thoſe who were moſt concern'd to prevent it, that they needleſly drew it upon themſelves.

But afterwards proceeds haſtily to Sentence.

Which cauſes a final Breach with King Henry.

When King Henry had heard this, and underſtood that he was us'd with ſo much Scorn and Indignity at Rome, he was extreamly inrag'd, and the more becauſe he had made ſo great a Submiſſion; therefore he reſolv'd to make a total Breach with that See, that had put him to ſuch vaſt and uſeleſs Expences, and had treated him for ſeveral Years with all the Artifices that could ariſe from Subtilty and Perfidiouſneſs. And in this Matter he had partly anticipated the Deſigns of that Court; for judging it the beſt Way to procure a Peace, was to manage the War vigorouſly, he had held a Seſſion of Parliament from the fifteenth of January to the thirtieth of March, in which he procur'd a great Change in the whole Conſtitution of the Government of the Church. The Pope's Power had then for four Years together been nicely examin'd and diſputed in England; in which the Repreſentatives proceeded by theſe Steps. They firſt controverted his Power of diſpenſing with the Law of God: From that they paſs'd on to examine what Juriſdiction he had in England, upon which followed the convicting the Clergy in a Premunire with their Submiſſion: And

A. D. 1534. Reg. 25 26.

The Steps towards deſtroying the Pope's Supremacy in England.

And that led them to diſpute the Pope's Right to Annates, and other Exactions, which they condemn'd: And the condemning all Appeals to Rome, naturally follow'd that. And now ſo many Branches of that Power being cut off, the very Root was next ſtruck at, and the Foundations of the Papal Authority were examin'd. For near a Year together there had been many publick Debates about it; and both in the Parliament and Convocation the Subject was long canvaſs'd, and all that could be alledg'd on both Sides maturely conſider'd. The ſeveral Arguments being fully open'd in many Diſputes, and publiſh'd in ſeveral Books, all the Biſhops, Abbots and Priors in England, excepting Fiſher Biſhop of Rocheſter, were ſo far ſatisfy'd with them, or ſo unwilling to leave their Preferments, that they reſolv'd to comply with the Changes which the King was reſolv'd to make: Fiſher was in great Eſteem for Piety and Strictneſs of Life, therefore great Pains were us'd by the Arch-Biſhop and others to bring him to a Compliance, but with no Effect.

Every Sunday during this famous Seſſion of Parliament, a Biſhop preach'd at St. Paul's, and declar'd, That the Pope had no Authority in England: Before this, they had only ſaid That a general Council was above him, and the Exactions of the Roman Court, and Appeals to it were unlawful; but now they rais'd a Strain higher, to prepare the People for receiving the Acts then in Agitation. On the ninth Day of March the Houſe of Commons began the noted Bill for taking away the Pope's Power, and ſent it to the Lords in five Days Time; who after ſix Days longer paſs'd it without Oppoſition. In this Bill 'They ſet forth the Exactions of the Court of Rome, grounded on the Pope's 'Power of Diſpenſing; and that as none could diſpence with the Laws of God, 'ſo the King and Parliament only could diſpenſe with the Laws of the Land: 'Therefore ſuch Licences or Diſpenſations as were formerly in uſe, ſhould for 'the future be granted by the two Arch-Biſhops, ſome of which were to be 'confirm'd under the great Seal; and they appointed that hereafter all Com-'merce with Rome ſhould ceaſe. They alſo declar'd, That they did not deſign 'to alter any Article of the Catholick Faith of Chriſtendom, or of that which was 'declar'd neceſſary to Salvation. They confirm'd all the Exemptions granted 'to Monaſteries by former Popes, but ſubjected them to the King's Viſitation; 'and gave the King and his Council Power to examine and reform all Indul-'gences and Privileges granted by the Pope: The Offenders againſt this Law 'were to be puniſh'd according to the Statutes of Premunire. This Act reducing the Monaſteries entirely to the King's Authority, put them in no ſmall Confuſion; and thoſe who lov'd the Reformation, rejoyc'd both to ſee the Pope's Power extirpated, and to find the Scriptures made the Standard of Religion.

It is deſtroy'd by Act of Parliament.

After this, another remarkable Act paſs'd both Houſes in ſix Days Time, and without any Oppoſition, 'Setling the Succeſſion of the Crown; confirm-'ing the Sentence of Divorce, and the King's Marriage with Queen Anne, 'and declaring all Marriages within the Decrees prohibited by Moſes to be 'unlawful: All that marry'd within them were appointed to be divorc'd, 'and their Iſſue illegitimated; and the Succeſſion to the Crown was ſetled 'upon the King's Iſſue by the preſent Queen Anne, or in Default of that, to 'the King's right Heirs, for ever. All were to take a particular Oath, to main-'tain the Contents of this Act, againſt all manner of Perſons whatſoever; and 'if any refus'd the Oath when requir'd, or ſhould ſay any Thing to the Slander 'of the King's Marriage, he was to be judg'd guilty of Miſpriſion of Treaſon, 'and to be puniſh'd accordingly. And thus was the King's Marriage confirm'd 'by Parliament; and when the Commons return'd this Bill to the Lords, they ſent them another with it, which was receiv'd and paſs'd, regulating the Proceedings againſt Hereticks, 'That whereas by a Statute of Henry the Fourth, 'Biſhops might commit Perſons upon Suſpicion of Hereſie; and Hereſie being 'generally defin'd, To be whatever was contrary to the Scriptures, or Cano-'nical Sanctions, which was liable to great Ambiguity; therefore that Statute 'was Another to regulate the Proceeding againſt Hereticks.

'was repeal'd, and none were to be committed for Hereſie, but upon a Preſent-
'ment made by two Witneſſes; and none to be accus'd for declaring againſt 'Things only grounded upon the Pope's Canons. Bail was to be taken for He-'reticks, and they were to be brought to their Trials in open Court; and if 'upon Conviction they did not abjure, or were Relapſers, upon the King's 'Writ obtain'd, they were to ſuffer the former Puniſhment of Burning. This was a mighty Check to the Tyranny of the Popiſh Biſhops, and gave no ſmall Satisfaction to all that favour'd the Reformation.

The Submiſſion of the Clergy.

As the Parliament was proceeding in theſe uſeful Laws, there came a Submiſſion from the Clergy, then ſitting in Convocation, to be paſs'd into an Act. In it 'They acknowledg'd that all Convocations ought to be aſſembled by the 'King's Right, and promiſed upon the Word of Prieſts, never to make or ex'ecute any Canons, without the King's Aſſent: And ſince many of the re-
'ceiv'd Canons were found to be contrary to the King's Prerogative, and the Laws 'of the Land, there was to be a Committee of thirty two, the one half out of 'both Houſes of Parliament, and the other of the Clergy, to be nam'd by the 'King, and empower'd to abrogate or regulate them, as they ſhould ſee Cauſe.
'Appeals to Rome were again condemn'd, and an Appeal was allow'd from the 'Arch-Biſhop to the King, upon which the Lord Chancellor was to grant a 'Commiſſion for a Court of Delegates. A Proviſo was added, that 'till the 'Committee of thirty two ſhould ſettle a Regulation of theſe Canons, thoſe then
'in Force ſhould ſtill take Place, except where they were contrary to the King's 'Prerogative, and the Laws of the Land. In this Parliament another Act paſs'd, for the better regulating the Elections and Conſecrations of Biſhops;
'Condemning all Bulls from Rome; and appointing, That upon a Vacancy,
'the King ſhould grant a Licence for an Election, with a miſſive Letter ſigni-
'fying the Perſon nam'd to be elected: Within twelve Days after, the Dean
'and Chapter, &c. were requir'd to return an Election of the Perſon nam'd by 'the King, under their Seals. The Biſhop Elect was to ſwear Fealty, and a 'Writ to be iſſu'd out for his Conſecration after the uſual Manner: After 'which, he was to do Homage to the King, and be reſtor'd to the Spiritualties
'and Temporalties of the See; and Biſhops were to exerciſe their Juriſdiction
'as they had done before. All Tranſgreſſors of this Act were made guilty of 'a Premunire. A private Act alſo paſs'd, depriving Cardinal Campegio, and Jerome di Ghinuccii of the Biſhopricks of Salisbury and Worceſter; the Reaſons given for it were, 'Becauſe they did not reſide in their Dioceſes, for preaching
'the Word of God, and keeping Hoſpitality, but liv'd at the Court of Rome,
'and carry'd no leſs than three thouſand Pounds a Year out of the Kingdom.

An Act for Election of Biſhops.

The Attainder of the Nun of Kent.

The laſt Act of a publick Nature, tho' relating only to private Perſons, was concerning one Elizabeth Barton call'd The Holy Maid of Kent; who was the firſt Occaſion of ſhedding any Blood in the Quarrel, which was much cheriſh'd by all the Superſtitious Clergy, that adher'd to the Intereſts of Queen Catharine, and the Pope. This Barton, a Nun of Kent, being ſuborn'd by Monks, to uſe ſome ſtrange Geſticulations, and to produce ſome feign'd Miracles, accompany'd with Prophetical Sayings, ſhe drew much Credit and Concourſe to her; inſomuch that ſome Perſons of the higheſt Note, as the late Arch-Biſhop, the late Chancellor Sir Thomas More, and Biſhop Fiſher, gave no little Countenance to her; and notwithſtanding the Danger of incouraging a particular Prediction of hers, That the King ſhould not live one Month after his Marriage with Mrs. Bolen, ſhe was ſtill applauded for her extraordinary Gifts. But the Plot being at laſt diſcover'd, ſhe was attainted of Treaſon in this Parliament, and ſhortly after executed with her chief Accomplices; at which Time alſo ſhe confeſs'd the Names of ſuch as had been Promoters of the Deſign, among whom were More and Fiſher. Upon the firſt Diſcovery of this Cheat, Cromwell, now Secretary of State, ſent Fiſher's Brother to him to reprove him for his Carriage in that Buſineſs, and to adviſe him to ask the King's Pardon

She is executed.

Pardon for the Incouragement he had given to the Nun. But that Biſhop excus'd himſelf, declaring, He had only try'd whether her Relations were true or not; and that he thought it neceſſary to diſcover what ſhe ſaid concerning the King's Death, becauſe he knew that ſhe had told the ſame to the King; therefore he deſir'd to be no more troubled with that Matter. But upon this Anſwer, Cromwell wrote him a ſharp Letter, ſhewing him, That he had proceeded raſhly; being ſo partial to the Matter of the King's Divorce, that he believ'd every Thing that ſeem'd againſt it; that the higheſt Caution was to be us'd before new Revelations were receiv'd; otherwiſe the Peace of the World would be in the Power of every bold and crafty Impoſtor. Yet in Concluſion, he adviſ'd him to ask the King's Pardon for his Raſhneſs, for he was confident, that he was ready to forgive that, and every Thing elſe, by which he had offended him. But Fiſher was ſtill obſtinate, and would make no Submiſſion, and ſo was included in the Act for Miſpriſion of Treaſon; yet it was not put in Execution, 'till he drew a heavier Storm of Indignation upon himſelf.

The Oath of Succeſſion ſworn.

Upon the breaking up of the Parliament, both the Regular and Secular Clergy did in all Places take the Oath of Succeſſion; and none more zealouſly promoted it than Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter. And the religious Orders, being apprehenſive of the King's Jealouſies, ſent in Declarations under the Seals of their Houſes, 'That in their Opinion the King's preſent Marriage was lawful, and that they would ever acknowledge him, Head of the Church of England; That the Biſhop of Rome had no Authority out of his own Dioceſe, and that they would continue obedient to the King, notwithſtanding his Cenſures; That they would preach the Goſpel ſincerely according to the Scriptures, and pray for the King as Supream Head of the Church of England. A Meeting of the Council ſate at Lambeth, to which many were cited in order to take the new Oath; among whom was Sir Thomas More, and Biſhop Fiſher. More declar'd He neither condemn'd ſuch as made the Act, nor ſuch as took the Oath, and was willing to ſwear to the Succeſſion of the Crown, but he could not take the Oath as it was now made; and Fiſher made the ſame Anſwer, but all the reſt took the Oath. The Arch-Biſhop told More, If he did not condemn thoſe who took the Oath, he was not perſuaded it was a Sin, and ſo was only doubtful of it; but he was ſure he ought to obey the Law, if it was not ſinful; ſo there was a Certainty on one Side, and only a Doubt on the other, therefore the former ought to determine him. More ſaid, If the Parliament of England was againſt him, he believ'd the reſt of Chriſtendom was on his Side: In Concluſion both he and Fiſher declar'd, That they believ'd it in the Power of the Parliament to ſettle the Succeſſion to the Crown, therefore they were ready to that Particular, but not to the reſt of the Oath, that pronounc'd the King's Marriage unlawful. The Arch-Biſhop wiſely urg'd that this might be accepted; for if they ſwore to maintain the Succeſſion, it would conduce much to the Quiet of the Nation. But ſharper Counſels were then more acceptable; ſo they were both committed to the Tower, and Pen, Ink and Paper deny'd them; and the old Biſhop was treated with ſuch Hardſhip, as to Diet and Cloaths, as can never be excus'd.

More and Fiſher refuſe the Oath.

For which they are impriſon'd.

The King by Act of Parliament made Supream Head of the Church of England.

In Winter another Seſſion of Parliament was held, in the Beginning of which that memorable Act was made, declaring The King to be the Supream Head on Earth of the Church of England, and appointing that to be added to his other Titles; empowering alſo him and his Succeſſors to reform all Hereſies and Abuſes in the Spiritual Juriſdiction. By another Act they gave the King the Firſt-Fruits and Tenths of Eccleſiaſtical Benefices, as being the Supream Head of the Church; for the King being put in the Pope's Room, it was thought reaſonable to give him the Annates, which the Popes had formerly exacted. Another Act paſs'd, declaring ſome Things Treaſon; one of which was the denying the King any of his Titles, or calling him Heretick, Schiſmatick, tick, or Uſurper of the Crown: And by another Act Proviſion was made for erecting twenty ſix Suffragan Biſhops over England, for the more ſpeedy Adminiſtration of the Sacraments, and the better Service of God. In this Parliament Subſidies were alſo granted, which had been diſus'd for about twelve Years; and now introduc'd with the higheſt Preamble of the Nation's Felicity under the King's Government theſe twenty four Years, that Eloquence and Flattery could dictate. Fiſher and More by two ſpecial Acts were attainted of Miſpriſion of Treaſon; and five other Clerks were in like manner condemn'd, for refuſing to take the Oath of Succeſſion. Thus all Things conſpir'd to pull down the Power of Rome, and to make a greater Change than ever had been known in the Kingdom of England.

But before theſe Things were accompliſh'd, the preſent Pope Clement dy'd, who was one of the greateſt Diſſemblers and State-Jugglers that ever mounted the Chair: He was ſucceeded by Aleſſandro of the Houſe of Farneſi, under the Title of Paul the Third. The Pope dies.

Herbert. Burnet. Hoylin. &c.

VIII. The mighty King having paſs'd through the Traverſes and Toſſings of his famous Suit, and having with the Concurrence of his Clergy and Parliament compaſs'd what he had projected, ſeem'd now at eaſe in his own Dominions. But tho' theſe Matters were ſmoothly and ſucceſsfully carry'd in publick Aſſemblies, yet the Change was ſo ſhocking, that it caus'd many ſecret Diſcontents, which being fomented both by the Pope, and the Emperor's Agents, wrought him infinite Trouble, ſo that the reſt of his Life was fill'd with Vexations and Diſquiets. The Nobility and Gentry were in general well ſatisfy'd with the Change; but the Body of the People were more ſubject to the Power of the Prieſts, who endeavour'd to infuſe great Fears of a Change in Religion: It was continually inſinuated, That the King was joining himſelf to Hereticks, and that they were favour'd by the new Queen, Arch-Biſhop and Secretary. The Monks and Friars ſaw themſelves left to the Mercy of the King, and that their Bulls could be no longer uſeful to them; and they had ſome Intimations that Cromwell was forming a Project for ſuppreſſing them. So they thought it neceſſary for their own Preſervation to embroil the King's Affairs as much as was poſſible; therefore both in Confeſſions and Diſcourſes, they were inſtilling into the People a Diſlike of the King's Proceedings, which had ſuch Effect upon them, that if the Emperor's Affairs would have permitted him to make War upon the King, he might have done it with great Advantage, and found a ſtrong Party in England on his Side. But the Practices of the Clergy at home, and of Cardinal Pool, an Engliſhman, abroad, the Libels that were publiſh'd, and the Rebellions that were afterwards rais'd in England, wrought ſo unhappily upon the King's buſie Thoughts, that he loſt much of his former Temper and Patience, and became too ready upon ſlight Grounds to bring his Subjects to the Bar; and his new Title of Head of the Church, ſeem'd to have increas'd his imperious Temper, and made him fancy that all his Subjects were oblig'd to regulate their Belief by the Meaſures he ſet them. Yet it does not appear that Cruelty was natural to him, or that he thirſted after Blood; for in twenty ſix Years Reign, none had ſuffer'd for any Crime againſt the State, but La Pole Earl of Suffolk, and Stafford Duke of Buckingham, and both under reaſonable Pretenſions. But in the ten laſt Years of his Life, tho' he always proceeded upon Law, yet there occurr'd many Inſtances of Severity, for which this King is rather to be pity'd, than either imitated, or ſeverely cenſur'd. If there had been the leaſt Hope of Impunity, the laſt part of his Reign would have been one continu'd Rebellion; therefore to prevent a more profuſe Effuſion of Blood, it ſeem'd neceſſary to execute Laws ſeverely in ſome particular Inſtances.

A. D. 1535. Reg. 26/27.

Great Diſcontents among many, which began to ſower the King's Temper.

When the Supremacy was inveſted in the King, by Law, it was made a Premunire not to ſwear to it; but it was made Treaſon to deny it, or ſpeak any Thing againſt it. As there were ſeveral of the Pope's Agents that ventur'd to break this Law, and ſometimes with no ſmall Inſolence and Obſtinacy, ſo it was thought neceſſary by the King and Council, to make a ſpeedy Redreſs of theſe Miſchiefs. Therefore ſome Priors, and other Eccleſiaſticks, that were criminal in this Matter, being found guilty by the new Statute, were this Year executed as Traitors, being the firſt that ſuffer'd in this Kind. This Piece of Juſtice was not yet become ſo familiar to the King, which caus'd him not only to mourn inwardly, but alſo to have his Head bald, and his Beard, formerly ſhaven, to be cut round; for which his Enemies maliciouſly ſaid, It was only putting a new Countenance upon a new Dignity. But if he proceeded thus rigorouſly againſt the Oppoſers of his Supremacy, he did no leſs puniſh the many pretended Reformers or Contradictors of the Roman Catholick Religion. Therefore, as in the laſt Year he had condemn'd John Frith, a Sacramentary, to the Fire, ſo he now caus'd divers Hollanders in London, who invented ſome different Religious Opinions, to be burnt in Smithfield. Shortly after, ſome others again were executed for denying the Supremacy; ſo that on both Sides it prov'd a ſevere Seaſon. Only, as King Henry found the Terrors already given, not ſufficient to keep the reſt in awe, he reſolv'd to make ſome great Examples, and proceed againſt Biſhop Fiſher and Sir Thomas More. As to the former, the Pope's officious Kindneſs to him in declaring him a Cardinal, when in Priſon, did haſten his Ruin; tho' he valu'd the Honour ſo little, that he ſaid, That if the Hat were lying at his Feet, he would not take it up. He was try'd by a Jury of Commoners, and found guilty of Treaſon, for having declar'd againſt the King's Supremacy; and was condemn'd to be beheaded, which was executed on the twenty ſecond Day of June. On that Day he dreſs'd himſelf with more than ordinary Care, declaring, He was now to be a Bridegroom; and being led out he open'd the new Teſtament at a venture, and pray'd that ſuch a Place might turn up as might comfort him in his laſt Moments. The Words on which he caſt his Eyes were, This is Life Eternal to know Thee, the only true God, and Jeſus Chriſt whom thou haſt ſent. On the Scaffold he repeated the Te Deum, and then laid his Head upon the Block, which was ſever'd from his Body in the eightieth Year of his Age. He was a learned and devout Man, but much addicted to Superſtition and Severity. He had been long Confeſſor to the King's Grandmother, the Counteſs of Richmond, and it was believ'd that he perſuaded her to thoſe Noble Deſigns of Founding two Colleges in Cambridge, Chriſt's and St. John's, and Divinity Profeſſors in both Univerſities; in Acknowledgment of which, he was choſen Chancellor of Cambridge. King Henry the Seventh made him Biſhop of Rocheſter, which he would never exchange for any other, ſaying, His Church was his Wife, and he would not part with her becauſe ſhe was poor; and he was much eſteem'd by the preſent King, 'till his ſtrict Adherence to his Marriage, the Pope's Supremacy, and the Nun of Kent, brought this Misfortune upon him.

Some few are executed.

The Sufferings of Biſhop Fiſher.

His Character.

The Sufferings of Sir Thomas More.

It was more difficult to find Matter againſt Sir Thomas More; for he was very cautious, and ſatisfy'd his Conſcience by not ſwearing to the Supremacy, but would not declare againſt it. Yet he ſaid, The Act was like a Sword with two Edges, for if a Man anſwer'd one Way, it would confound his Soul, and if another, it would condemn his Body. This was all the Meſſage he ſent to Fiſher, when he deſir'd to know his Opinion about it; he had alſo ſaid the ſame to the Duke of Norfolk and ſome Counſellors that came to examine him. When Rich, the King's Sollicitor, came as a private Friend to perſuade him to take the Oath, urg'd him with the Act of Parliament, and ask'd him, If he ſhould be made King by Act of Parliament, whether he would acknowledge him? He anſwer'd, He would; becauſe a King might be made or depos'd by a Parliament; but the Matter of the Supremacy was a Point of Religion, to which the Power of Parliaments did not extend. All this being witneſs'd againſt againſt him, theſe Particulars were laid together, as amounting to a Denial of the King's Supremacy, and upon this he was judg'd guilty of Treaſon. He receiv'd his Sentence with that equal Temper of Mind which he had ſhew'd in both Conditions of Life; expreſſing great Contempt of the World, and much Wearineſs in living in it. His uſual Facetiouſneſs remain'd with him to the laſt Moment on the Scaffold; and that Way of Railery had been ſo cuſtomary to him, that Death did not diſcompoſe him, nor put him out of his ordinary Humour: Which ſome too juſtly cenſur'd as little and indecent, and as having more of the Stoick, than the Chriſtian in it. He was beheaded on the ſixth of July, in the fifty third Year of his Age; being a Man of great Capacities and eminent Virtues, who in his Youth had freer Thoughts, but was afterwards much corrupted by Superſtition, became fierce for all the Intereſts of the Superſtitious Clergy, and wrote much in Defence of the old Abuſes. The Execution of theſe two great Men, chiefly upon a Point of Conſcience, may juſtly be reckon'd among the Blemiſhes of that Reign: Yet we cannot but obſerve the Juſtice of Heaven, in thus retaliating their own Severities to others; for as Fiſher grievouſly proſecuted the Preachers of Luther's Doctrine, ſo More's Hand was heavy upon them, as long as he had Power, and he ſhew'd them no Mercy, but the Extremity of the Law, which himſelf felt now to be very heavy indeed. His Character.

Theſe Inſtances and Examples, unqueſtionably ſtruck a Terror into the Nation, and much haſten'd that great Work of the Reformation, ſo much deſir'd by many pious Perſons in the Kingdom. Queen Anne gave particular Incouragement to it, and took Latimer and Shaxton to be her Chaplains, and promoted them to the Biſhopricks of Worceſter and Salisbury. Arch-Biſhop Cranmer was fully convinc'd of the Neceſſity of it, and that he might carry it on with true Judgment, and juſtifie it by good Authorities, he made a famous Collection of the Opinions of the ancient Fathers, and later Doctors, in all the Points of Religion. He was a Man of rare Candor, Patience and Induſtry; and ſo on all Accounts admirably prepar'd for that Work, to which Providence did now call him; and tho' he ſeem'd in ſome Things too much ſubject to the King's Imperious Temper, yet he always ſhew'd he wanted not the Courage that became a Biſhop in ſuch critical Times. Next to him was Secretary Cromwell, his great and conſtant Friend; a Man of mean Birth, being the Son of a Blackſmith, but of noble and ſhining Qualities, as appear'd in two ſignal Inſtances; the one was his hearty Pleading in Parliament for his fallen and diſgrac'd Maſter the Cardinal, when others more oblig'd had abandon'd him; a rare Demonſtration of Gratitude in a Court, to a ſinking Favourite. The other was, That when he was in the height of his Greatneſs, hapning to ſee a decay'd Merchant of Lucca, who had pity'd and reliev'd him, when he was a poor Stranger in Italy, but did not as much as know him, or pretend to any Returns for the ſmall Favours formerly ſhew'd him, he treated him with ſuch extraordinary Acknowledgments, that it became the Subject of ſeveral Pens, which ſtrove who ſhould moſt celebrate his Generoſity. Having by his great Qualifications rais'd himſelf to the King's Favour, he was this Year made Vicar General, and Viſitor of all the Monaſteries and Churches of England, with a Delegation of the King's Supremacy to him; he was alſo impower'd to give Commiſſions ſubaltern to himſelf; and all Wills, where the Eſtate exceeded two hundred Pounds, were to be prov'd in his Court. This Power was afterwards enlarg'd, and he was made not only a Baron and Privy-Seal, but likewiſe the King's Vice-gerent in Eccleſiaſtical Matters, and had the Precedence of all Perſons next the Royal Family; and his Authority was in all Points the ſame, that the Legates had in the Time of Popery: For as the King's Authority ſucceeded that of the Pope, ſo the King's Vice-gerent was the ſame in Power that the Legate's had formerly been. The Progreſs of the Reformation, by Queen Anne, Cranmer, and Cromwell. Cromwell's Greatneſs.

The King and his Miniſters being reſolv'd to proceed, the Biſhops and Abbots us'd all reaſonable Methods to free the King of any Jealouſies that might be rais'd concerning them. At Oxford a publick Determination was made, to which every Member aſſented, That the Pope had no more Authority in England, than any other Foreign Biſhop. But the Regular Clergy, the Monks and Friars, whoſe Houſes and Government was generally exempted from their Biſhop's Juriſdiction, and more immediately dependent on the Pope, 'till this late Change, were ſecretly averſe, tho' openly complying. And having by a thouſand Artifices gain'd the Opinion of the People, it was therefore reſolv'd that ſome effectual Means ſhould be taken for leſſening their Credit and Authority among the Vulgar. Upon which Doctor Leighton, who had been in the Cardinal's Service with Cromwell, propos'd a general Viſitation of all the Monaſteries and Religious Houſes in England; and judg'd that nothing could reconcile the Nation ſo much to the King's Supremacy, as to ſee ſome good Effects flow from it. Others thought this too bold a Step, and that it might prove too dangerous a Provocation to the Religious; yet it was known that they were guilty of ſuch prodigious Diſorders, that nothing could ſo effectually keep them in awe, as a ſtrict Enquiry into them. To this the Arch-Biſhop led the Way by a Metropolitan Viſitation, for which he obtain'd the King's Licence; he took care to ſee the Pope's Name ſtruck out of all the Churches, and to have the King's Supremacy acknowledg'd.

The Regular Clergy hate the preſent Eſtabliſhment.

A general Viſitation of the Monaſteries.

In October the grand Viſitation of the Monaſteries began, to the Terror of great Numbers of impious and ſcandalous Perſons of both Sexes. They were then about ſix hundred in Number, and very lowly valu'd at near two hundred thouſand Pounds per Annum, beſides vaſt Riches in many of them; and ſeveral of them had the Privilege of Sanctuaries to all that fled to them. The numerous Abuſes, ariſing from the Nature of their Inſtitutions, as well as the Practices of the Monks, caus'd many to deſire a Diſſolution; and the King himſelf urg'd it forwards upon ſeveral Accounts. He deſign'd to erect new Biſhopricks, in order to which it was neceſſary to convert ſome of their Revenues: He alſo apprehended a War from the Emperor, and for that end, he intended to fortifie his Harbours, and to encourage Shipping and Trade, upon which the Ballance of the World began then to turn: And in order to that he reſolv'd to make uſe of the Wealth of thoſe Houſes, and judg'd the beſt Way to effect it would be firſt to expoſe their Abominations, that they might loſe their Eſteem, and make way for their Suppreſſion. The Arch-Biſhop promoted the ſame, both becauſe theſe Houſes were founded upon groſs Errors and Abuſes, and ſubſiſted by them, and that theſe were neceſſary to be remov'd, if a Reformation was purſu'd. The Extent of ſeveral Dioceſes were too great to be manag'd by one Biſhop; therefore he deſign'd to have more Biſhopricks founded, and to have Houſes at every Cathedral for the Education of thoſe who ſhould be employ'd in the Paſtoral Charge. For this famous Viſitation many Commiſſioners were employ'd, and nice Inſtructions were given to them, deſiring them to inquire into all manner of Abuſes and Neglects. Theſe went all over England, according to their Precincts, and found in many Places moſt monſtrous Impieties and Diſorders. All the Sins of Sodom were found in many Houſes, great Factions and barbarous Cruelties were in others, and in ſome they found Inſtruments for Coining Mony. The Report which was made at their Return contain'd many abominable Particulars, not fit to be mention'd by a Chriſtian, or a modeſt Pen; ſome of which were Printed, but the greateſt Part are are loſt. Upon theſe Diſcoveries, ſome of the Houſes immediately ſurrender'd to the King, the firſt of which was Langden in Kent; which Example was follow'd by two others in the ſame Year, and four more in that which follow'd.

Some of them ſurrender to the King.

A. D. 1536. Reg. 27/28. The ſame Year the Parliament met in February, after a Prorogation of fourteen Months; and one main Buſineſs of this Seſſion was the ſuppreſſing all the Monaſteries under two hundred Pounds a Year. Accordingly an Act was made,

'Setting

'Setting forth the infinite Diſorders of thoſe ſmaller Houſes, and the many 'unſucceſsful Attempts that had been made to reform them; therefore the Re- 'ligious that were in them, were order'd to be remov'd into the larger Houſes, 'where Religion was better obſerv'd, and the Revenues of them were given 'to the King. Thoſe Houſes, which were three hundred and ſeventy in Number, were much richer than they ſeem'd to be: For an Abuſe that had run over Europe, of keeping the Rents of the Church at their firſt Rates, and exacting great Fines upon all Occaſions, was ſo groſs in thoſe Houſes, that ſome rated but at two hundred Pounds were in real Value worth many thouſands. In this Parliament an Act was made of another Nature, which had been long projected, which was for the intire uniting and incorporating of the Principality of Wales with the Kingdom of England; which was now compleatly effected, two hundred and fifty two Years after that Country had been conquer'd or reduc'd by King Edward the Firſt. In the Convocation, which ſate at the ſame Time, a Motion was made for tranſlating the Bible into Engliſh, which had been formerly promis'd when Tindal's Tranſlation was condemn'd. The Matter was fully debated on both Sides, and at length by the Means of the Arch-Biſhop and ſome others, it was carry'd in the Affirmative; and by Queen Anne's Intereſt it was ſo far promoted at Court, that Orders were given for the performing of it with all Expedition. After all Buſineſs was finiſh'd, this famous Parliament, which had done the King ſuch eminent Service, and had now ſate ſix Years, was diſſolv'd on the fourteenth of April.

The Parliament diſſolv'd.

But before this happen'd, the afflicted and unfortunate Queen Catharine, who had often been the Subject of their Debates, dy'd at Kimbolton, in Huntingtonſhire. Her Sufferings begot great Compaſſion in the People, and all the ſuperſtitious Clergy zealouſly ſupported her Intereſts; but now her Troubles ended with her Life. She deſir'd to be bury'd among the Obſervant Friars, who had ſuffer'd moſt for her; and order'd five hundred Maſſes for her Soul, and that one of her Women ſhould go on Pilgrimage to our Lady of Walſingham, and give two hundred Nobles on her Way to the Poor. When ſhe found Death approaching, ſhe wrote to the Emperor, earneſtly recommending her Daughter Mary to his Care; and likewiſe to the King, with this Inſcription, My dear Lord, King and Husband: In which, 'She forgave him 'all the Injuries he had done her, deſiring him to have regard to his Soul: She 'recommended her Daughter to his tender Care, and begg'd of him to provide 'Matches for her three Maids, and to pay her Servants a Year's Wages; and 'concluded thus, Mine Eyes deſire you above all Things. She dy'd in the fiftieth Yeath of her Age, and thirty three after ſhe came into England; and was a ſufficient Inſtance that Greatneſs and Happineſs are of two diſtinct Natures. She was a devout and exemplary Lady, who us'd to work much with her own Hands among her Women; and the Severities and Devotions that were known to her Prieſts, and her Alms-Deeds join'd to her Misfortunes, rais'd a high Eſteem of her in all ſorts of People. The King indeed often complain'd of her uneaſie Temper; but that perhaps was to be imputed as much to the Provocations he gave her, as to any Sowerneſs in her own. The King receiv'd the News of her Death not without Tears; and order'd her to be bury'd in the Abby Church at Peterborough. But Queen Anne did not carry her Death ſo decently as became a happy Rival; expreſſing too much Joy, both in her Behaviour and her Habit.

The Death of Queen Catharine.

Her Character.

Burnet, &c. It was but a few Months after, that this flouriſhing Queen met with a Fall more unfortunate and fatal than the other; which in all Probability was occaſion'd by thoſe who now began to be diſtinguiſh'd by the Name of the Romiſh Party. For the King now proceeding both at home and abroad in the Point of Reformation, they found that the Intereſt the Queen had in him, was the great Obſtacle of their Deſigns: She encreas'd not only in the King's Eſteem, but in the Love of the Nation; and in the laſt nine Months of her Life, ſhe gave gave above fourteen thouſand Pounds in Alms to the Poor, and was much employ'd in doing of Good. But many Circumſtances contributed to her Ruin. Soon after Queen Catharine's Death, ſhe brought forth a dead Son, which was believ'd to have made ſome unfortunate Impreſſion on the King's Mind. It was alſo conſider'd by ſome Courtiers, That now Queen Catharine was dead, the King might marry another Wife, and be fully reconcil'd with the Pope and Emperor: And the Iſſue by any other Marriage would never be queſtion'd; whereas, while Queen Anne liv'd, the Ground of the Controverſie ſtill remain'd, and her Marriage being accounted null from the Beginning, would never be allow'd by the Court of Rome, or any of that Party. With theſe Reaſons of State, the King's Affections too much concurr'd; for he now entertain'd a ſecret Love for the Lady Jane Seymour, who had all the Charms of Youth and Beauty, and her Humour temper'd between the Gravity of Queen Catharine, and the Gaiety of Queen Anne. The poor unfortunate Queen us'd all poſſible Arts to blow up an expiring Flame in his Breaſt; but the King was chang'd, and inſtead of being warm'd by her Careſſes, he began to conſider them as Artifices to varniſh over ſome other criminal Affection. Her chearful Humour was not always govern'd by the moſt nice Decency, and exact Rules of Diſcretion; and her Brother's Wife, a Woman of Infamy, being jealous of her Husband and her, poſſeſs'd the King with her own Apprehenſions, and fill'd his furious Head with many Stories. Norris, Weſton and Brereton the King's Servants, and Smeton a Muſician, were by her Enemies thought to be too officious about her; and ſomething was pretended to have been ſworn by the Lady Wyngfield at her Death, that determin'd the King, but we find nothing particular. It is reported beſides, that when the King held a Tournament at Greenwich, he was diſpleas'd at the Queen for letting her Handkerchief fall to one for wiping his Face; but this ſeems a Fiction, becauſe the Parliament was ſummon'd the Day before that, and then was her Ruin determin'd.

She is impriſon'd.

However it was, upon that Day the King confin'd her to her Chamber, and order'd her Brother, and the four forementioned Perſons to be committed to the Tower, and her ſelf to be ſent after them the Day following. On the River ſome Privy-Counſellors came to examine her, but ſhe made deep Proteſtations of her Innocence; and as ſhe landed at the Tower, ſhe fell down on her Knees, and pray'd Heav'n ſo to aſſiſt her, as ſhe was free from the Crimes laid to her Charge. The Confuſion ſhe was in ſoon rais'd a Storm of Vapours within her; ſometimes ſhe laugh'd, and at other Times wept exceſſively: She was alſo devout and light by Turns; and ſometimes ſhe ſtood upon her Vindication, and at other Times ſhe confeſs'd ſome Indiſcretions, which ſhe afterwards deny'd. All about her took Advantage from every Word that fell from her, and ſent it immediately to Court. The Duke of Norfolk and others that came to examine her, the better to make Diſcoveries told her, That both Norris and Smeton had accus'd her; which tho' falſe had this Effect on her, that it caus'd her to confeſs ſome ſlight Acts of Indiſcretion, tho' no ways eſſential, which totally alienated the King from her. Yet whether theſe ſmall Acknowledgements were real Truths, or the Effects of Imagination and Hyſterical Emotions, is very uncertain. All the Court now turn'd againſt the miſerable Queen, and began to adore a riſing Sun; but Cranmer was a Stranger to thoſe Arts, and had a more noble Soul; therefore her Enemies procur'd an Order for him not to come to Court. Yet he put all to hazard, and wrote the King a long and nice Letter in that critical Juncture, in which 'he acknowledg'd if the 'Crimes reported of the Queen were true, it was the greateſt Affliction that 'ever befel the King, and therefore exhorted him to bear it with Patience and 'Submiſſion to the Will of God: He confeſs'd he never had a better Opinion 'of any Woman than of her; and that next the King, he was more oblig'd to 'her, than to all Perſons living; and therefore he begg'd the King's leave to 'pray

Cranmer writes for her to the King.

'pray that ſhe might be found Innocent: He lov'd her not a little, becauſe of 'the Love which ſhe ſeem'd to bear to God, and his Goſpel; but if ſhe were 'guilty, all that lov'd the Goſpel muſt hate her, as having given the greateſt 'Slander to the Goſpel: But he pray'd the King not to entertain any Prejudice 'to the Goſpel on her Account, nor give the World reaſon to ſay, That his 'Love to that was founded on the Power ſhe had with him. But Jealouſie, and the King's new Affection, had now defac'd all the Remainders of Eſteem for his once belov'd Queen: Therefore Norris, Weſton, Brereton and Smeton were all brought to their Trial at Weſtminſter-Hall. They all pleaded not guilty; only Smeton, probably in hopes of ſaving his Life, confeſs'd Lewdneſs with the Queen; and he with the other three were pronounc'd guilty, and condemn'd to die as Traitors.

Her Trial.

Three Days after the Queen of England by an unheard of Preſident was brought to the Bar, and indicted of High-Treaſon, before the Duke of Norfolk, as High-Steward, and a Court of twenty ſeven Peers. Her Brother, then a Peer, was alſo try'd with her, and the Crime charg'd upon her was, That ſhe had procur'd her Brother and four others to lye with her, and had often ſaid, That the King never had her Heart; all which was to the Slander of the Iſſue begotten between the King and her, and was Treaſon by the Act that confirm'd her Marriage: So that the ſame Act that was made for her Marriage, was now turn'd to her Ruin; which had too near Reſemblance to a Puniſhment from Heaven. It does not appear that any living Evidence was brought againſt her; for Smeton, already condemn'd, could be of no uſe; and he never being brought to confront her, gave great Suſpicion, that his Confeſſion was extorted by bare Practices. All the Evidence we find, was the Declaration of a dead Woman; yet this, or rather the Terror of offending the King, ſo wrought on the Lords, that they found her, and her Brother guilty; and Judgment was given, that ſhe ſhould be burnt, or beheaded at the King's Pleaſure. Yet all this did not ſatisfie the inraged King; he reſolv'd likewiſe to illegitimate his Daughter Elizabeth, and in order to that to annul his Marriage with the Queen. It was now remember'd that the Earl of Northumberland had ſaid to Cardinal Wolſey, That he had ingag'd himſelf ſo far with her, that he could not recede; which perhaps was done by ſome Promiſe conceiv'd in Words of the Future Tenſe, tho' no Promiſe, unleſs in Words of the Preſent Tenſe, could annul the ſubſequent Marriage. Perhaps the Queen did not underſtand that Difference; or probably the Terrors of her Execution wrought ſo upon her, that ſhe confeſs'd a Contract with the Earl; tho' that Lord poſitively deny'd it, and took the Sacrament upon it, with a Wiſh that it might turn to his Damnation, if ever there were either Contract or Promiſe of Marriage between them. However ſhe was ſecretly carry'd to Lambeth, where upon her Examination, and her own Acknowledging a Precontract, her Marriage was regularly declar'd null from the Beginning. Theſe two Sentences paſs'd upon her were inconſiſtent and contradictory; for if ſhe never was the King's Wife, ſhe could not be guilty of Adultery; becauſe, if ſhe was not truly marry'd, there could be no Breach of the Faith of Wedlock. But the impatient King was now reſolv'd to be freed from her, and the Succeſſion of her Iſſue; and in that Tranſport did not conſider, That the Method he took, diſcover'd the Injuſtice of his Proceedings.

Her Condemnation.

Her Divorcement.

The abandon'd Queen having Intimations given her to prepare for Death; among other Things ſhe reflected on her Carriage to the Princeſs Mary, to whom ſhe had been too ſevere a Step-Mother: Therefore cauſing one of her Women to ſit in the Chair of State, ſhe fell down on her Knees before her, and with a Flood of Tears charg'd her to go to the Princeſs Mary, and in that Poſture, and in her Name, to ask her Forgiveneſs for all ſhe had done againſt her. This generous Tenderneſs of Conſcience gave much Credit to the continual Proteſtations of her Innocence, which ſhe made to the laſt. The Day before her Death,

Her humble Carriage.

Death, ſhe ſent her laſt moving Meſſage to the King, aſſerting her Innocence, and recommending her Daughter to his Care; and particularly ſhe thank'd him for advancing her from a Gentlewoman to be a Marchioneſs, and then to be a Queen, and now when he could raiſe her no higher on Earth, for ſending her to be a Saint in Heaven. On the Day ſhe dy'd, the Lieutenant of the Tower wrote to Secretary Cromwell, 'That it was not fit to publiſh the 'Time of her Execution, for the fewer that were preſent it would be the bet-'ter; ſince he believ'd ſhe would declare her Innocence at the Hour of her 'Death; for that ſhe had made great Proteſtations of it, when ſhe receiv'd the 'Sacrament, and ſeem'd to long for Death, and had great Joy and Pleaſure in 'it: She was glad to hear the Executioner was good, for ſhe ſaid ſhe had a lit-'tle Neck, at which ſhe laugh'd heartily. A little before Noon, on the nineteenth of May, ſhe was brought a pitious Sight to the Scaffold, where were preſent ſome of the chief Officers and great Men of the Court, to behold the laſt Scene of this fatal Tragedy. It ſeems ſhe was prevail'd out of Regard to her Daughter, to make no Reflexions on the Hardſhips ſhe ſuſtain'd, nor to ſay any Thing touching the Grounds on which Sentence paſs'd againſt her, only ſhe deſir'd, That all would judge the beſt: She highly commended the King, and ſo took her leave of the World. She was for ſome time in her private Devotions, and concluded To Chriſt I commend my Soul; upon which the Execu-

Thus fell the unfortunate Queen in the twenty ninth Year of her Age, after ſhe had been marry'd about four Years and a half; and this uncommon Tranſaction met with various Cenſures. Some obſerv'd that ſhe who had ſupplanted Queen Catharine, did now meet with harder Meaſure; and they judg'd her faint Way of ſpeaking concerning her Innocence at laſt, was too great a Compliment to the King: Yet ſhe wrote a Letter to the King in ſo high a Strain both of natural Wit and Eloquence, in her Juſtification, that it may be reckon'd one of the beſt compos'd Pieces of that Time. The violent and jealous Behaviour of the King in this Matter can never be vindicated; and nothing more

The King's third Marriage with Jane Seymour. clearly diſcover'd the ſecret Cauſe of the Queen's Ruin, than his marrying Jane Seymour, Daughter to Sir John Seymour, the very next Day after her Execution. This Lady gain'd more upon him than any of his Wives; for ſhe was ſo happy as not to out-live his Love to her.

A. D. 1536. Reg. 27, 28. IX. The active and diſturb'd King Henry, from the Blood of his Subjects, had now ventur'd upon that of his Wife; and upon this Turn of Affairs there ſucceeded a great Change of Counſels. There was nothing now that kept up the Breach between him and the Emperor, but the Illegitimation of the Princeſs Mary, now about twenty Years of Age; and if that Matter could be adjuſted, the King would meet with no further Diſturbance from him: Therefore it was propos'd, that ſhe might be reſtor'd to Favour, upon making her Submiſſion to her Father. She offer'd to confeſs the Fault of her former Obſtinacy, and in general, to yield up her Underſtanding entirely to the King: But that would not ſatisfie, unleſs ſhe would be more particular; ſo that at lengh ſhe

The Princeſs Mary's Submiſſion. was contented to do it in the fulleſt Terms that could be deſir'd: 'She ac-'knowledg'd the King to be the Supream Head of the Church of England un-'der Chriſt, and utterly renounc'd the Authority of the Biſhop of Rome, and 'promis'd in all Things to be obedient to the Laws then made; all which 'flow'd

'flow'd from her inward Belief and Judgment, in which ſhe would for ever 'continue: And ſhe alſo did acknowledge that the King's Marriage with her Mo-'ther, was unlawful and inceſtuous, both by the Laws of God and Man. All this ſhe wrote with her own Hand, and ſubſcrib'd it; upon which ſhe was re-ceiv'd into Favour, and an Eſtabliſhment was made for a Family about her, in which forty Pound a Quarter was all the Allowance for her Privy-Purſe, ſo great was the Frugality of that Time. The hopeful Princeſs Elizabeth contin-nu'd to be educated with great Care, and was ſo forward, that before ſhe was four Years old, ſhe both wrote a good Hand, and underſtood Italian; and there are Letters extant written by her in that Language to the new Queen Jane, when ſhe was with Child, in which ſhe ſubſcrib'd her ſelf Daughter.

About this Time a new Parliament was ſummon'd, which met on the eighth Day of June: When the Chancellor told them, That the King had call'd them to ſettle the Succeſſion of the Crown, in caſe he ſhould die without Children lawfully begotten, and to repeal the Act made concerning his Marriage with Queen Anne. After ſome Debates and Conſideration, upon the thirtieth of June a Bill was brought in accordingly, which was ſoon diſpatch'd without Oppoſition: 'By it the Attainder of Queen Anne and her Accomplices was 'confirm'd, as likewiſe were both the Sentences of Divorce upon the King's 'two former Marriages; and the Iſſue by both was Illegitimated, and for ever 'excluded from claiming the Crown by Lineal Deſcent: And the Succeſſion 'was eſtabliſh'd on the King's Iſſue by the preſent Queen, or any to whom he 'might afterwards marry. But becauſe it was not proper to declare who 'ſhould ſucceed in Default of that, leſt the Perſon ſo nam'd ſhould raiſe Com-'motions, in Confidence of the King's Wiſdom, and Affection to his People, 'he was allow'd to nominate his Succeſſor, either by Letters Patents, or by 'his laſt Will ſign'd by his Hand. It was declar'd Treaſon to maintain the 'Lawfulneſs of his former Marriages, or of his Iſſue by them; and it was made 'not only Treaſon, but a Forfeiture of the Right of Succeſſion, if any of thoſe 'whom the King ſhould name in Default of others, ſhould endeavour to uſurp 'before them. The Scots complain'd of this Act, by which the King was now made Soveraign indeed, and had the Crown put intirely into his Hands, to be diſpos'd of at his Pleaſure; and his Daughters were now wholly to depend upon his Will: By this alſo he had it in his Power in a great Meaſure to pacifie the Emperor, by providing that his Kinſwoman Mary might ſucceed to the Crown.

A new Parliament.

The Act of Succeſſion.

About the ſame Time the new Pope Paul, who upon the Execution of Bi-ſhop Fiſher, had thunder'd out a formidable Sentence of Depoſition againſt the King, the Queens Catharine and Anne, who were the Occaſions of the Breach, being now dead, he thought it a proper Seaſon to endeavour for a Reconciliati-on; and therefore order'd Caſſali to acquaint the King, That he had always favour'd his Cauſe when he was a Cardinal, that he was forc'd contrary to his Inclinations to paſs Sentence againſt him; and that now it would be eaſie for him to recover the Favour of the Apoſtolick See. But the King inſtead of harkning to the Propoſition, procur'd two Acts to be paſs'd, 'The one was 'for the utter extinguiſhing the Pope's Authority; and it was made a Premu-'nire, for any to acknowledge it, or perſuade others to it: And a ſtrict Charge 'was given to all Magiſtrates under ſevere Penalties to enquire after all Offen-'ders. By another Act, All Bulls, and Privileges flowing from them, were de-'clar'd null and void, excepting Marriages, or Conſecrations of Biſhops'; all 'which were alſo requir'd to be brought into Chancery, upon which the Arch-'Biſhop was to make a new Grant of them, which being confirm'd by the great 'Seal, was to be of full Force in Law. In this Parliament another Act paſs'd, explaining an Exception that was in the Act for the Reſidence of all Incum-bents, by which thoſe who were in the Univerſities were diſpens'd with Non-Reſidence. Another Act paſs'd in Favour of the King's Heirs, if they ſhould reign before they were of full Age; 'That whatever Acts were made before they 'were twenty four Years of Age, they might repeal and annul by their Letters 'Patents. From all these Acts it appears, that the King was absolute Master both of the Affections and Fears of his Subjects, when in a new Parliament suddenly call'd, and sitting but six Weeks before it was dissolv'd, Acts of such high Importance were pass'd, without any publick Protestation or Opposition.

The Acts of the Convocation.

During this Session of Parliament the Convocation was no less busily imploy'd; and one of the first Things they did was to confirm the Sentence of the Divorce of the King's Marriage with Queen Anne. They acknowledg'd the King Supream Head of the Church, and proceeded to many Points of Religion, and to many Complaints of Corruptions and Abuses. Most Mens Eyes began now to be open'd, yet many being blinded by Interest and Design, several Contests were rais'd, and some Attempts made to the Detriment of Cranmer, Shaxton and Latimer, and other Promoters of the Reformation. But all Projects fail'd that were levell'd at Cranmer, who was fully establish'd in the King's Favour; and Cromwell was sent to them with a Message from the King, 'That 'they should reform the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, according to the 'Rules of Scripture, which ought to be preferr'd to all Glosses or Decrees of 'Popes. This being debated it occasion'd new Discussions and Disputations, which might have been prosecuted with too much Warmth, had not the King to end Differences sent a Scheme of about ten Atticles to be consider'd by that learned Body. These establish'd the Authority of Scriptures, the three Creeds, and the four general Councils; as likewise three of the seven Romish Sacraments, Baptism, the Eucharist and Pennance, with a truer Notion of Justification, and the Use of some Ceremonies. After some Consideration these Articles were sign'd by Cromwell, the two Arch-Bishops, sixteen Bishops, forty Abbots and Priors, and fifty of the lower House; to which the King join'd a Preface, declaring the Pains he and his Clergy had undergone for removing of all Differences in Religion, approving of the Articles, and requiring all his Subjects to accept them with the like Unanimity with which they were subscrib'd. These Articles did not satisfie either the strict Reformers, or the Romish Party: Yet the former were well pleas'd to see Things brought under Examination; and since some Things were at this Time chang'd, they did not doubt but more Changes would follow: They were glad to find the Scriptures and the ancient Creeds made the Standards of Faith, without Tradition, and that the Nature of Justification was rightly stated, and that some gross Abuses were remov'd, tho' there remain'd still some hard of Digestion. Some of the stricter Sort thought that these Articles had too much of a Political Compliance; and that it was agreeable with the Sincerity of the Gospel, still to allow of so many Errors. To which it was answer'd, That our Saviour did not deliver all Things to his Disciples, 'till they were able to bear them; and the Apostles did not at once abolish all the Rights of Judaism, but by a gentle Progress wean'd their Christian Converts from them. The Clergy were to be drawn by slow and easie Steps out of their Ignorance and Superstition; whereas driving forwards with Precipitation, might ruin the Design, and alienate those who by slower Methods might be gain'd; and it also might much endanger the Peace of the Nation.

Articles concluded.

When these things were known in Foreign Parts, the Court of Rome made great Advantage of them, to let all Princes see the Necessity of adhering to the Holy See; for as soon as England departed from that, it began also to change the Doctrine. The Pope had issu'd out Summons for a general Council at Mantua, and had cited the King to it; from which the King appeal'd to a general Council rightly constituted. And a Motion being made that the Convocation should deliver their Opinion in this Particular, they drew up a Paper, 'In which they set forth the great Good that might follow from a general 'Council rightly call'd; but that nothing could be more mischievous, than one call'd

'call'd on private Malice and Deſign: And they thought neither the Pope, nor 'any one Prince, had ſufficient Authority to call one, unleſs all Princes, who 'had intire and ſupream Government over all their Subjects, did agree and con-'cur. This was ſign'd by the whole Body on the twentieth of July, and ſo the Convocation diſmiſs'd. Shortly after the King publiſh'd a long and ſevere Proteſtation againſt the Council ſummon'd by the Pope; firſt denying that he had any Authority to ſummon his Subjects, and next ſhewing that no Advantage could be expected from any Council where the Pope preſided, Since the reſtraining his exorbitant Power was one of the chief Occaſions that the World had for a Council. Many Books were written on both Sides, upon this and other Subjects, in theſe buſie Times: But none appear'd more induſtrious than Cardinal Pool, who by his Mother was deſcended from the Duke of Clarence, Brother to King Edward the Fourth; and was likewiſe by his Father the King's near Kinſman. To this high Quality was join'd a great Sweetneſs of Temper, and Diſpoſition for Letters, which the King cheriſh'd much, and gave him the Deanery of Exeter, and ſome other Preferments, deſigning him the higheſt Dignities in the Church. He liv'd many Years in foreign Parts; and at Paris he firſt incurr'd the King's Diſpleaſure, in obſtructing the Determinations of the French Univerſities for his Divorce; yet after that he came to England, and was preſent when the Convocation declar'd the King to be their Supream Head. But the King ſuffering him to go out of the Nation, he could never draw him back again: Inſtead of which he wrote ſeverely againſt all the King's Proceedings, comparing him to Nebuchadnezzar; and addreſſing himſelf to the Emperor, he pray'd him rather to turn his Arms againſt King Henry than the Turk. This Indignity, which was High-Treaſon in a Subject, ſo far provok'd the King, that it afterwards drew a heavy Storm upon all his Kindred.

Cardinal Pool's Actions.

But nothing could ſtop the Progreſs of the vigorous King and his Miniſters, who purſuant to the Act of Parliament, now proceeded to the Diſſolution of the leſſer Monaſteries. Commiſſioners were appointed, and requir'd to carry along with them the Concurrence of the Gentry near them, and to examine the exact Value of their Revenues and Goods: They were to try how many of the Religious would take Capacities, and return to a ſecular Courſe of Life; but thoſe who deſign'd to continue in that State, were to be ſent to the larger adjacent Monaſteries; and a Penſion was to be aſſign'd to the Abbot, or Prior, during Life. There were loud Complaints made againſt the Proceedings of theſe Commiſſioners, both of their Violences and Briberies, and probably not without Reaſon, in the midſt of ſo many Temptations and Opportunities. About ten thouſand of the Religious were ſent to ſeek their Livings, with forty Shillings and a Gown to each Man. The Goods and Plate were eſtimated at a hundred thouſand Pounds, and the valu'd Rents of their Houſes at thirty two thouſand Pounds, which were really worth above ten Times as much. The Churches and Cloiſters were in moſt Places pull'd down, and the Materials ſold; all which gave a general Diſcontent, and the Monks were now as much pity'd, as they were formerly deteſted. It was thought prodigious to ſee the King devour what his Anceſtors had dedicated to God and his Saints. The Nobility and Gentry, who often provided for their younger Children and Friends in thoſe Sanctuaries, were ſenſible of their Loſs: The People, who had been fed at the Abbot's Tables, and in Travelling found thoſe to be Places of Reception for Strangers, immediately ſaw the Inconvenience: But the more ſuperſtitious, who thought their Friends muſt now lye ſtill in Purgatory, without that Relief procur'd by their Maſſes, were out of meaſure offended at theſe Proceedings. The mighty Diſorders of theſe Houſes had now but ſmall Effects upon the People, who alledg'd That there was no Reaſon to deſtroy whole Foundations for the ſake of ſome vicious Perſons, who ought to have been expell'd and made Examples.

The Diſſolution of the leſſer Monaſteries.

Great Diſcontents.

Cromwell's Policy.

To remove this general Diſcontent, the politick Cromwell adviſ'd the King to ſell theſe Lands at very eaſie Rates to the Nobility and Gentry, and to oblige them to retain the wonted Hoſpitality; which would be both grateful to them, and engage them to aſſiſt the Crown in all the late Alterations; and would be pleaſing to the People, when they found the the old Hoſpitality preſerv'd. And upon a Clauſe in the Act empowering the King to found a-new ſuch Houſes as he ſhould think fit, there were fifteen Monaſteries, and ſixteen Nunneries, which were more regular than the reſt, refounded, or rather repriev'd, 'till the general Diſſolution came afterwards. But all this did not ſo pacifie the People, but ſtill there was a great Outcry fomented by many of the Clergy, who laid great Weight upon this Notion, That King Henry, being an Heretical Prince, and actually depos'd by the Pope in the preceding Year, was no longer to be acknowledg'd; and this for five hundred Years had been receiv'd as an Article of Faith, and was decreed in the ſame Council that eſtabliſh'd Tranſubſtantiation. To allay or divert theſe Diſturbances, ſome Injuctions were publiſh'd in the King's Name by Cromwell, relating chiefly to the regular Behaviours, and faithful Duties of the Clergy of the Nation, which was the firſt Act of pure Supremacy done by the King. This increas'd the ill Diſpoſition; for the Romiſh Clergy deteſted this Preſident of the King's giving Injunctions without the Concurrence of a Convocation, and by which, they alledg'd, they ſhould be made Slaves to his Vice-gerent: They alſo complain'd of thoſe heavy Taxes that were laid upon them; and that Images, Relicks, and Pilgrimages would by theſe Injunctions be brought under great Contempt. Both the Regular and Secular Clergy were ſo ſenſibly concern'd in theſe Things, that they us'd all Methods to inflame the People. The great Abbots were not wanting in the ſame Deſign; they were now burden'd with the Crouds of thoſe who were ſent to them from the ſuppreſs'd Houſes, and they expected to meet with the ſame Fate: Nor were the Fears remov'd by a Letter that was ſent about in the King's Name for ſilencing all Reports that were given out of his Intentions to ſuppreſs them; for this rather increas'd than leſſen'd their Jealouſie.

New Complaints.

The People continu'd quiet 'till they had reap'd their Harveſt; but in the Beginning of October twenty thouſand roſe in Lincolnſhire, led by one Doctor Mackrel, Prior of Barlings in that County, and diſguis'd like a Cobler. They took an Oath to be true to God, the King, and the Common-wealth, and ſent a Paper of their Grievances to the King; 'In which they complain'd of ſome 'Acts of Parliament, of the Suppreſſion of many Religious Houſes, of mean 'and ill Counſellors, and bad Biſhops; praying the King to redreſs their Grie-'vances by the Advice of the Nobility: But ſtill they acknowledg'd him to be 'their Supream Head, and that the Tenths and Firſt-Fruits of Livings belong'd 'of Righ to him. The King ſent the Duke of Suffolk to levy Forces againſt them, and to give an Anſwer to their Petition; declaring, 'It was not the 'Buſineſs of the Multitude to direct Princes what Counſellors to chuſe: The 'Religious Houſes were ſuppreſs'd by Law, and the Heads of them had under 'their Hands confeſs'd ſuch ſcandalous Enormities as were a Reproach to the 'Nation; and ſince in many of them there were not above four Perſons, who 'waſted the whole Rents in riotous Living, it was much better to apply them 'to the common Good of the Nation, than leave them in ſuch Hands: He re-'quir'd them to ſubmit to his Mercy, and to put two hundred of their Leaders 'into the Hands of his Lieutenants. The diſcontented Clergy having brought ſuch Numbers together, us'd all Methods to inſpire Heat and Spirit into them, and perſuaded them, That if they did not now maintain their Faith and Liberties, both would be loſt. Some of the Gentry were compell'd to join with them for their own Preſervation; and they ſent Advices to the Duke of Suffolk, to procure the Offer of a general Pardon from the King, which would effectually diſſipate them. At the ſame Time there was a more formidable Inſurrection in in Yorkſhire, which being in the Neighbourhood of Scotland, was like to draw Aſſiſtance from that Kingdom; tho' their King was then gone into France, to marry Francis's Daughter. This mov'd King Henry to uſe more Expedition in ſetling the Affairs of Lincolnſhire: He ſent them ſecret Aſſurances of Mercy, which ſo prevail'd on the greateſt Part, that they diſpers'd themſelves, and the moſt obſtinate repair'd to them in Yorkſhire. Mackrel the pretended Cobler, and ſome few others, were taken and executed.

As to the Northern Rebellion, the Diſtance of the People from the Court, gave them Time to form themſelves into a better Method: One Ask, a Gentleman, commanded in Chief, and perform'd his Part with great Dexterity. Their March and Progreſs was call'd The Pilgrimage of Grace, having on their Banners and their Sleeves the five Wounds of our Saviour; and they took an Oath to reſtore the Church, ſuppreſs Hereticks, preſerve the King and his Iſſue, and drive from him all mean born Men and ill Counſellors. In a few Days their Number increas'd to forty thouſand; and meeting with no Oppoſition, they forc'd the Arch-Biſhop of York and the Lord Darcy to ſwear to their Covenant, and to go along with them. They inveſted Skipton, but the Earl of Cumberland ſecur'd it againſt them; and Sir Ralph Evers bravely held out Scarborough Caſtle, tho' for twenty Days he and his Men had no Proviſions but Bread and Water. There was alſo an Inſurrection in all the other Northern Counties, againſt whom the valiant Earl of Shrewsbury made Head; and the King ſent ſeveral of the Nobility to his Aſſiſtance, particularly the Duke of Norfolk, who join'd him with ſome regular Troops. Theſe Noble Men poſſeſs'd themſelves of Doncaſter, and reſolv'd to ſecure that Paſs 'till the reſt of the Forces order'd by the King ſhould come up to them; for they were not in a Condition to engage with ſuch Numbers of deſperate Men; and it was probable, upon any Misfortune, the People would have riſen on all Sides. Therefore the Duke of Norfolk reſolv'd to keep intirely to Doncaſter, and ſuffer the Rage as well as Proviſions of the Rebels to ſpend, and then by gaining a little Time, they might pobably fall into Factions, and ſo diſſolve their Power. They were now decreas'd to thirty thouſand; but the King's Forces were not above the ſixth of that Number. The Duke of Norfolk politickly propos'd a Treaty, and caus'd ſome to go amongſt them as Deſerters, and ſpread Reports that their Commanders were making private Terms for themſelves. They were perſuaded to ſend their Petitions to the Court; and the King to ſatisfie them of their Security, diſcharg'd a Rendezvous that he had appointed at Northampton, and ſent them a general Pardon, excepting ſix by Name, and reſerving four to be afterwards nam'd: But this threw them all into ſuch Apprehenſions, that it made them more reſolv'd and deſperate; yet the King, to give his People ſome Content, put out Injunctions, requiring the Clergy to continue the Uſe of all the Ceremonies of the Church.

Another in Yorkſhire more formidable.

At length three hundred were imploy'd to carry the Rebels Demands to the King, which were, 'A general Pardon to be granted; a Parliament to be held 'at York, and Courts of Juſtice erected there: That ſome Acts of Parliament 'might be repeal'd; That the Princeſs Mary might be reſtor'd to her Right of 'Succeſſion, and the Pope to his wonted Juriſdiction; That the Monaſteries 'be again reſtor'd; That Audley Lord Chancellor, and Cromwell Privy-Seal, 'be remov'd from the King, and that ſome of the Viſiters of Monaſteries be im-'priſon'd for Bribery and Extortion. But theſe being rejected, the Rebels reaſſum'd their Courage; upon which the Duke of Norfolk adviſ'd the King to gentle Methods: He in his Heart wiſh'd that all their Demands might be granted; and the Lord Darcy afterwards accus'd him, as if he had incourag'd them to make them. The King ſent him a general Pardon without any Exception, to be us'd according to his Diſcretion. In the mean Time the Rebels, finding that with the Loſs of Time they loſt Strength, reſolv'd to attack him and force him from Doncaſter: But at two ſeveral Trials, when they had agreed agreed to paſs the River, there fell ſuch Rains, as made it impracticable; which being magnify'd as a Miracle, caus'd very diſcouraging Impreſſions. The King ſent a long Anſwer to their Demands, in which 'He aſſur'd them he would live 'and die in the Defence of the Chriſtian Faith; but the Multitude ought not to 'preſcribe to him, and the Convocation in that Matter. As to the Monaſteries, he gave the ſame Anſwer as he had done to the Men of Lincolnſhire, For the Laws, 'They were not to preſume to alter what was eſtabliſh'd; and 'he had govern'd them twenty eight Years with Security to their Eſtates, and 'Clemency to their Perſons. And whereas it was reported that when he be-'gan to Reign, he had many of the Nobility in his Council, and now none 'but thoſe of mean Extract; this was falſe, for at firſt he found but two No-'blemen of his Council, and at preſent there were ſeven Temporal Lords and 'four Biſhops in it. He found it neceſſary to have ſome that were conver-'ſant in the Laws of England, and Treaties with Foreign Princes; therefore 'he had call'd Audely and Cromwell to the Board. If they had any Complaints 'to make of any about him, he was ready to hear them; but would not ſuffer 'them to direct him what Counſellors to employ; nor could they judge of 'the Biſhops that were promoted, who were unknown to them: He charg'd 'them not to believe Lies, nor to be govern'd by Incendiaries, but to ſubmit 'to his Mercy. Accordingly on the ninth Day of December, he ſign'd a Proclamation of Pardon without any Reſtrictions.

The King's Anſwer.

A. D. 1537. Reg. 28/29.

When this was fully known, and the Rage of the People abated, they were willing to take the Advantage of it; and all the Artifices that ſome of the Clergy and their Commanders could uſe, had no other Effect but to draw ſuch Numbers together as brought them under new Guilt, and caus'd them to forfeit the Benefit of the King's Pardon. Many came in and renew'd their Oaths of Allegiance, promiſing all future Obedience; and Ask was invited to the Court and well treated by the King, that he might learn from him all the ſecret Correſpondences they had in other Parts of the Kingdom; for the Diſpoſition to rebel was general, only all had not the like Opportunities. It was particularly believ'd that the great Abbots cheriſh'd the Rebellion; for which ſome of them were afterwards try'd and attainted. The Lord Darcy earneſtly pleaded his great Age, being then fourſcore, and the eminent Services he had done the Crown for fifty Years together, and that he was compell'd for his own Preſervation to go along with the Rebels; but yet he was put into Priſon. This gave the Clergy an Occaſion to infuſe into the People, that the King's Pardon was precarious; ſo that eight thouſand flock'd together again, and endeavour'd to ſurprize Carliſle; but the Duke of Norfolk ſet upon them and routed them, and by Martial Law hang'd their Captains and ſeventy other Perſons. Others deſign'd to have ſurpriz'd Hull, but were likewiſe defeated, and many of them executed. Many other ſmall Inſurrections were ſoon diſpers'd; and the Duke of Norfolk's Vigour and Vigilance was ſo remarkable, that he was ready for them in all Places, before they could make their Numbers conſiderable; ſo that in a few Months from the Beginning, the Country was abſolutely at reſt. Ask left the Court without leave, but was ſoon retaken and hang'd at York. The Lords Huſſy and Darcy were arraign'd at Weſtminſter, and condemn'd by their Peers; the one for the Lincolnſhire, and the other for the Yorkſhire Rebellion. Huſſy was beheaded at Lincoln, and Darcy on the Tower-Hill; the laſt being much lamented upon the Account of his old Age and former Services. In his Trial he accus'd the Duke of Norfolk of favouring the Rebels; but his late Services were ſuch, as the King would not ſeem to have any Jealouſie of him. After theſe and other Executions, the King proclaim'd a general Amneſty in July, by which the Nation was again put in a quiet Condition; and the threatning Storm diſſipated without the Effuſion of much Blood but what was drawn by the Sword of Juſtice. At the ſame Time James King of Scotland, returning from France with his new Queen, Daughter to

to the French King, and touching on the Court of England, many of the People fell down at his Feet, begging him to aſſiſt them, and he ſhould have all; but he was then bound up by his Father-in-law, and therefore return'd home without giving them any Incouragement. And thus ended this Rebellion, which was chiefly promoted by the Romiſh Clergy, under the Pretence of Religion.

To crown the King's Happineſs, not long after, upon the twelfth Day of October, he had a Son born at Hampton-Court; who three Days after, with great Splendor and Solemnity was baptiz'd by the Name of Edward; the Arch-Biſhop, and the Duke of Norfolk being his God-Fathers. After he was Chriſten'd by one of the Biſhops, his Name was aloud proclaim'd by Garter King at Arms, and call'd Prince Edward, Duke of Cornwall and Earl of Cheſter; and ſo attended by the two Princes, Mary and Elizabeth, he was carry'd to the Queen's Apartment with great State and Magnificence. But the Joy of his Birth was much allay'd by the Departure of the admirable Queen, who, contrary to the common Opinion of many Writers, dy'd twelve Days after the Birth of this Prince, as appears from unqueſtionable Manuſcripts; having been well deliver'd, and without any Inciſion, as others have maliciouſly reported. On the twelfth of November, her Body was with great Solemnity convey'd to Windſor, and there magnificently interr'd in the midſt of the Choir. This was a great Affliction to the King; for of all his Wives, ſhe was the deareſt and moſt charming to him; and his Grief for that Loſs is given as the Reaſon, why he continu'd two Years a Widower.

X. The prevailing King was now deliver'd from all his Apprehenſions of Diſturbances at home; he was Maſter of his own Subjects, and no longer to be diſobey'd. For he had not only broken the Rebellion of his People, and by Alliance ſecur'd himſelf from the Dangers threaten'd by the Pope; but all the Romiſh Expectations from the Princeſs Mary were now clouded by the Birth of Prince Edward. Being thus incourag'd, he reſolv'd to proceed in his Deſigns of ſuppreſſing the reſt of the Monaſteries, and reforming ſome other Points of Religion. Accordingly a new Viſitation was appointed to enquire into the Converſation of the Monks, how they ſtood affected to the Pope, and how they promoted the King's Supremacy; and likewiſe to examine what Impoſtors were among them, either in Images or Relicks, which might work upon the Superſtition of the credulous Vulgar. Some few Houſes of greater Value, were prevail'd with the former Year to ſurrender to the King. Many of the Houſes that had not been diſſolv'd, tho' they were in the former Act, were now ſuppreſs'd; and many of the greater Abbots were wrought on to ſurrender to the King by ſeveral Motives: Some had been culpable during the late Rebellion, and ſo offer'd a Reſignation to prevent a future Storm: Others approv'd of the Reformation, and were willing to comply: Some were found guilty of ſuch horrid Diſorders, that to prevent a ſhameful Diſcovery, they offer'd their Houſes to the King, and others had made ſuch Waſtes and Dilapidations, that having provided for themſelves, they had no Concern for others. Many Abbots and Monks were willing to accept of Penſions for Life, which was generally proportion'd to the Value of their Houſes, and Innocence of their Lives. Some who favour'd the Reformation, deſir'd to convert their Houſes to better Uſes, for Preaching, Study and Prayer; and Biſhop Latimer earneſtly preſs'd the Vice-gerent Cromwell, that two or three Houſes might be reſerv'd for ſuch Purpoſes in every County. But the Reſolution was at once taken to extirpate all; and the Viſiters proceeded with that Vigour and Expedition, that a hundred and twenty one Houſes were this Year reſign'd to the King, and thirty three more before the Parliament met. And what further promoted the Downfal of the Monaſteries, beſides the ſhameful Diſorders of the Houſe, was that many of the Abbots and Priors were found guilty of Rebellion and Treaſon, for which ſeveral were executed.

Many of the larger Monaſteries ſurrender.

Yet

Yet all these personal Blemishes did not work much on the Peoples Mind, to whom it seem'd unreasonable to extirpate noble Foundations, for the Crimes of some Individuals. Therefore another Method was pursu'd, which had better Effect: They discover'd many Impostures about Relicks, and wonderful Images, to which Pilgrimages were usually made. Among many other, The Rood of Grace at Boxley in Kent, had been highly esteem'd, and drawn many Pilgrims to it. It was observ'd to bow, and roll its Eyes, and at particular Times look well pleas'd or angry, to the great Admiration of the credulous Multitude: But all this was discover'd to be a Cheat, and it was brought to St. Paul's Cross, where all the Springs were openly shown, that govern'd its several Motions. Many other notorious Impostures were also discover'd, both as to Relicks and Images, which contributed much to the undeceiving the People. The richest Shrine in England was Thomas Becket's at Canterbury, whose Actions and Behaviour may be read in the Reign of King Henry the Second. By the Incouragement of the Court of Rome, his Shrine grew to be of inestimable Value: He had two Holy Days appointed for him, and a Jubilee every fifty Years, with Indulgences granted to all who visited his Tomb; which in the Year 1420 brought no less than a hundred thousand Pilgrims to the Place. It is hard to tell whether the Hatred to his seditious Practices, or the Love of his rich Shrine, did most incite King Henry to Unsaint that Prelate. His Shrine was broken, and the Gold of it was so heavy, that it fill'd two Chests, which were as much as sixteen Men could carry out of the Church; and his Skull, which had been so much worshipp'd, was prov'd to be an Imposture; for the true Skull was with the rest of his Bones in his Coffin. His Bones were burnt, according to some; but others say they were so mingled with other Bones, that nothing but a Miracle could have distinguish'd them afterwards.

Several Impostures discover'd.

Becket's Shrine broken.

When these Transactions were known at Rome, all the eloquent Pens were there employ'd to represent King Henry as the most sacrilegious Tyrant that ever reign'd; who made War with Christ's Vicar on Earth, and his Saints in Heav'n; and he was compar'd to the worst Princes that the World ever saw. In many of these Cardinal Pool's Stile was sufficiently known, and they were all at least much incourag'd by him; which provok'd the King to show implacable Resentments against him and his Family. The Pope proceeded further; for now he publish'd all those Fulminations with which he had threaten'd him three Years before: In which 'He profess'd himself to be God's Vicar on Earth, 'who had Power to eradicate and destroy, and had Authority over all the Kings 'in the World: And therefore after he had enumerated all King Henry's Crimes, 'he requir'd him to appear within ninety Days at Rome, and his Accomplices 'within sixty Days; which if refus'd, he declar'd him to have fallen from his 'Crown, and them from their Estates. He put the whole Kingdom under an 'Inderdict; and absolv'd all his Subjects from their Oaths of Allegiance: He 'declar'd him and his Accomplices Infamous; and put their Children under 'Incapacities. He requir'd all the Clergy to go out of England within five 'Days after the prefix'd Time should expire; leaving only so many as might 'serve for baptizing Children, or giving the Sacrament to such as dy'd in Peni-'tence. He charg'd all his Subjects to rise in Arms against him, and that none 'should assist him. He absolv'd all other Princes from their Confederacies with 'him, and obtested them to have no Commerce with him. He requir'd all 'Christians to make War on him; and to seize on the Persons and Goods of 'all his Subjects, and make Slaves of them. He charg'd all Bishops to publish 'the Sentence with due Solemnities: and ordain'd it to be affix'd at Rome, Tour-'nay and Dunkirk. This was first given out in the Year 1535; but it had been all this Time suspended, 'till the Suppression of Monasteries, and the Rumour of burning of Becket's Bones, did so inflame the Pope, that he resolv'd upon the utmost Extremities. Therefore this Year he publish'd the Bull, which which he declar'd He had long ſuſpended at the Interceſſion of ſome Princes, who hop'd that King Henry might have been reclaim'd by gentler Methods; and therefore ſince his Impieties daily encreas'd, he was compell'd to proceed to his higheſt Cenſures. The Pope alſo wrote to the Kings of France and Scotland, to excite them againſt King Henry; and if this had been an Age of Croiſades, no doubt one had been undertaken againſt him. And thus the Breach between King Henry and the Pope was now paſt Reconciliation; and at Rome it was declar'd equally meritorious to fight againſt him, as againſt Turks and Infidels; and Cardinal Pool made it more meritorious, in a Book of his writing.

The Biſhop's and Clergy aſſert the Power of the King.

The Thunders of the Vatican had now loſt their Force; yet to prevent any Inconveniences that might ariſe, the King procur'd all the Biſhops and eminent Divines of England, to ſign a Declaration againſt all Churchmen who pretended to the Power of the Sword, or to Authority over Kings; and all who aſſum'd ſuch Powers, were Subverters of the Kingdom of Chriſt. Many of the Biſhops did alſo ſign another Paper, declaring the Limits of the Regal and Eccleſiaſtical Power, that both had their Authority from God, for ſeveral Ends, and different Natures; and that Princes were ſubject to the Word of God, as well as Biſhops ought to be obedient to their Laws. There was alſo another Declaration ſign'd by Cromwell, the two Arch-Biſhops, eleven Biſhops, and twenty Divines, aſſerting the Diſtinction between the Power of the Keys, and the Power of the Sword. And to give the cleareſt Lights, this Year the Engliſh Bible was finiſh'd and publiſh'd; and Cromwell procur'd a general Warrant from the King, allowing all his Subjects to read it, for which Cranmer wrote his Thanks to Cromwell, Rejoicing to ſee the Day of Reformation now riſen in England, ſince the Word of God did ſhine over it all, without a Cloud. Not long after Cromwell iſſu'd out Injunctions to the Clergy, requiring them all to ſet up Bibles in their Churches, and to incourage all to read them; with ſome other Particulars which ſtruck at ſome of the main Points of the former Superſtition, both concerning Images, Pilgrimages, and the Invocation of Saints: But the free Uſe of the Scriptures gave the moſt deadly Blow; yet all the Clergy ſubmitted to the Injunctions without Murmuring.

The Bible publiſh'd in Engliſh.

Thus the Reformation increas'd and ſucceeded daily; yet ſtill the Doctrines of the Real Preſence, and of Tranſubſtantiation were retain'd with great Strictneſs by the King and moſt Divines. Biſhop Gardiner, a ſubtle Man and ſecret Enemy to the Reformation, us'd one Topick which prevail'd much with the King, That his Zeal againſt Hereſie was the greateſt Advantage that his Cauſe could have over all Europe; and therefore he preſs'd him to begin with the Sacramentaries, the Deniers of the Corporal Preſence; and thoſe being condemn'd by the German Princes, he had the leſs Reaſon to fear the imbroiling his Affairs by his Severities againſt them. Accordingly a conſiderable Divine, call'd Lambert, was brought before the King, and with great Solemnity try'd in his Preſence, and condemn'd to be burnt for denying the Corporal Preſence in the Euchariſt. His Execution in Smithfield was very barbarous: For there was not Fire enough under him to conſume him ſuddenly; ſo that his Legs and Thighs were burnt away while he remain'd alive; yet he bore it with admirable Patience, and continu'd to cry out, None but Chriſt, none but Chriſt! This gave ſome Satisfaction and Life to the Romiſh Party, and added Vanity to the King, who now made ſome new Promotions in the Church. Doctor Bonner was advanc'd to the Biſhoprick of Hereford, by the Death of Fox; and Stokesby dying not long after, he was tranſlated to London. Cromwell thought he had rais'd a Man that would be a faithful Friend to Cranmer in his Deſigns of Reformation, who indeed needed Aſſiſtants; not only to ballance the Oppoſition made him by other Biſhops, but to diminiſh the Prejudices he ſuffer'd by the Weakneſs and Indiſcretion of many of his own Party. For ſuch great Complaints were brought to Court of the Raſhneſs of the new Reforming Lambert's Sufferings.

Preachers, that Cranmer's Intereſt was ſunk ſo low, that he had ſcarcely any to depend on but Cromwell. There now wanted a Queen in the King's Boſom to ſupport them; therefore Cromwell continually endeavour'd to ingage the King in ſuch an Alliance with the Princes of Germany, as might prevail with him both in Affection and Intereſt, to carry on what he had thus began. And the Beauty of Anne of Cleve, Siſter to the Duke of Cleve, was ſo repreſented to him, that he reſolv'd to effect that Match.

A. D. 1539. Reg. 30. 31.

A new Parliament.

But before this could be accompliſh'd, a new Parliament was ſummon'd to meet on the twenty eighth Day of April; to which all the Miter'd Abbots had their Writs. After many Struggles by Cranmer, and ſome of the Reformers to oppoſe the preſent Proceedings, the famous Bill paſs'd againſt Diverſity of Opinions in Religion. The Subſtance of it was, 'That the King being ſenſible 'of the Benefit of Union, and the Miſchief of Diſcord, in Matters of Reli-'gion, had come to the Parliament in Perſon, and there laid open many Points 'of high Learning; and that with the Aſſent of both Houſes, he ſet forth

The Act of the Six Articles.

'theſe ſix Articles. 1. That in the Euchariſt, there was no Subſtance of Bread 'and Wine, but only the Natural Body and Blood of Chriſt. 2. That Chriſt 'being entirely in each Kind, the Communion in both was not neceſſary. '3. That Prieſts by the Law of God ought not to marry. 4. That Vows of 'Chaſtity, taken after the Age of twenty one Years, ought to be kept. 5. That 'private Maſſes were lawful and uſeful. 6. That Auricular Confeſſion was 'neceſſary, and ought to be retain'd. Such as did ſpeak or write againſt the 'Firſt of theſe, were to be burnt, without the Benefit of Abjuration; and it 'was made Felony to diſpute againſt the other Five: And ſuch as did ſpeak 'againſt them, the firſt Offence was Premunire, and the ſecond Felony. 'Marry'd Prieſts, who did not put away their Wives, were made guilty of 'Felony; in thoſe that liv'd incontinently, the firſt Offence was a Premunire, 'and the next Felony; and the Female Criminals to be puniſh'd after the ſame 'manner. Thoſe that contemn'd Confeſſion and the Euchariſt, and abſtain'd 'from it at the accuſtom'd Times, for the firſt Offence incurr'd a Premunire, 'and the ſecond was Felony. All Proceedings were to be made in the Forms 'of Common Law, by Preſentments and a Jury; and all Churchmen were 'commanded to read the Act in their Churches once a Quarter. Theſe were call'd the ſix bloody Articles, which were bravely oppos'd by Arch-Biſhop Cranmer in the Parliament, who declar'd himſelf bound in Conſcience to vote againſt the Act, tho' he was ſure it would paſs. This Act was receiv'd with great Joy by all the Romiſh Party, who concluded they had gain'd their Cauſe: The unhappy Reformers were now expos'd to the Rage of their Enemies, and had no Comfort from any Part of it, but that they were not deliver'd up to the Cruelty of the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, but were to be try'd by Juries: Yet the Denying the Benefit of Abjuration, was a Severity without Precedent, and was forcing a Martyrdom upon them, ſince they could have no Advantage from their Apoſtacy. However they might have ſome Comfort from what the King declar'd to the German Ambaſſadors, who were diſguſted at the Act, That he did not deſign to put it in Execution, but upon great Provocation.

This Act being paſs'd, to the Satisfaction of the Romiſh Party, another for Suppreſſing all Monaſteries found a more eaſie Admittance. The Words of the Act ſeem to run otherwiſe. 'For by it no Monaſtery was directly ſuppreſs'd, 'but only the Reſignations made, or to be made, were confirm'd; and the King's 'Right founded either on their Surrenders, Forfeitures, or Attainders of 'Treaſon, was declar'd good in Law: All Churches belonging to them, and 'formerly exempted, were put under the Juriſdiction of the Biſhop, or of 'ſuch as ſhould be appointed by the King. Which laſt Proviſo produc'd a great Miſchief to the Church; for many that purchas'd Abby-Lands, had this Clauſe put in their Grants, That they ſhould be Viſiters of the Churches; and by this they ſtill do, or pretend to continue exempted from the Epiſcopal Juriſdiction.

riſdiction. As the Monaſteries were to be ſuppreſs'd, ſo to counter-ballance their Loſs, another Bill was brought in to 'empower the King to erect what 'Biſhopricks he thought fit, and to aſſign what Limits and Diviſions, and 'appoint them what Statutes he pleas'd. The firſt Draught of the Preamble of this Act was written by the King himſelf; and indeed he us'd extraordinary Care in correcting both Acts of Parliament and Proclamations with his own Hand. All Papers in Matters of Religion, publiſh'd by Authority, were revis'd by him, and in many Places large Corrections were made by his own Hand; which manifeſted both his great Judgment, and his extraordinary Application to Buſineſs: And as he was fond of his two acquir'd Titles of Defender of the Faith, and Supream Head of the Church, ſo he affected nothing more, than to diſcover his Learning and Underſtanding in Matters of Religion. He alſo writ a Liſt of all the new Biſhopricks he deſign'd to erect, which were for the Benefit of nineteen ſeveral Counties; and he had form'd a glorious Deſign of endowing many Sees, and making many other noble Foundations; yet the great Change made in the Councils and Miniſtry before this took Effect, caus'd but too ſmall a Part of his Deſigns to be accompliſh'd.

And erecting new Biſhopricks.

In this Parliament ſeveral other Statutes were made; particularly an Act to inforce due Obedience to the King's Proclamations, which in ſome Caſes was made Treaſon. An Act was alſo made, eſtabliſhing the Precedence of the Biſhops; by which the two Arch-Biſhops firſt, then the Biſhops of London and Durham, and then Wincheſter, as Prelate of the Garter; and all other Biſhops were to take Place according to the Date of their Conſecrations. Laſtly, a Bill of Attainder paſt, not only confirming the Sentences that had been given againſt the Marqueſs of Exeter, the Lord Montacute, and others, that had been condemn'd at Common Law; but of ſome that were newly attainted without a Trial: Of theſe ſome were abſent, and others in Priſon; but it was not thought convenient to bring them to make their Anſwers. The principal of theſe were the Marchioneſs of Exeter, and the Counteſs of Salisbury, Mother to Cardinal Pool. It was queſtion'd whether this could be done in Law or not: The Judges deliver'd their Opinion, that it was againſt natural Juſtice to condemn any without hearing them, and then when the Parliament proceeded as a Court, they were oblig'd to follow the common Rules of Equity; but if they acted otherwiſe, yet ſince they were the Supream Court of the Nation, it could not be revers'd. In concluſion, the latter Part of this was inſiſted on, and the former neglected; ſo the Act paſs'd: And this Counſel was aſcrib'd to Cromwell; and he being the firſt that was executed upon ſuch a Sentence, gave occaſion to many to obſerve the Juſtice of Heaven, in making ill Counſels turn upon thoſe that give them.

Other Acts.

When the Parliament was prorogu'd, the King remember'd his trueſt Friend Cranmer, and the Apprehenſions he might have from the ſix Articles; therefore he ſent both Cromwell and the Duke of Norfolk to dine with him, and aſſure him of the Conſtancy of his Kindneſs to him. At the Table they expreſs'd great Eſteem for him, and acknowledg'd he had oppos'd the Articles with ſo much Learning and Gravity, that thoſe who moſt differ'd from him, could not but highly value him; and that he needed not fear any thing from the King. Cromwell ſaid, the King made that Difference between him and the reſt of his Council, that he would not ſo much as harken to any Complaints made againſt him; and comparing him to Cardinal Wolſey, he ſaid, The one loſt his Friends by his Pride and Oſtentation, and the other gain'd his Enemies by his Humility and Mildneſs. The Arch-Biſhop was not only incourag'd by the King, but was alſo allow'd by him to write his Reaſons againſt the ſix Articles, for the King's Uſe; all which he perform'd, to the great Hazard of his Perſon and Fortunes. But the Act fell much heavier upon many other Perſons; Shaxton and Latimer not only reſign'd their Biſhopricks, but being preſented for Words ſpoken againſt the Articles, they were put in Priſon, ſon, where they continu'd 'till a Recantation diſcharg'd one, and the King's Death freed the other. There were about five hundred others preſented on the ſame Account; but upon the Interceſſions of Cranmer, Cromwell, and others, they were ſet at Liberty, and a Stop was put to the Execution of this Act 'till Cromwell's Fall. The Biſhops of the Popiſh Party took unjuſtifiable Methods to inſinuate themſelves into the King's Confidence; for they took out Commiſſions by which they acknowledg'd, 'That all Juriſdiction, Civil and Ec-'cleſiaſtical, flow'd from the King, and that they only exercis'd it at the King's 'Courteſie; and as they had this of his Bounty, ſo they were ready to deliver 'it up, when he ſhould think fit to call for it: And therefore the King did 'empower them in his Steed, to Ordain, give Inſtitution, and exerciſe all the 'other Parts of the Epiſcopal Function, which was to laſt during his Pleaſure. By this they were in Reality made the King's Biſhops; in which Bonner ſet an Example to the reſt; but it does not appear that Cranmer took out any ſuch Commiſſion all this Reign.

The King's Care for Cranmer.

The Biſhops hold their Sees by a new Tenure.

All the Monaſteries ſuppreſs'd.

And now follow'd the final Diſſolution of the Monaſteries of England, of which fifty ſeven had ſurrender'd this Year, and twelve of them Parliamentary Abbies. When all had thus reſign'd, Commiſſioners were appointed by the Court of Augmentations to ſeize on the Revenues and Goods belonging to thoſe Houſes, and to eſtabliſh the Penſions that were to be given to the Abbots and Monks, and to pull down the Churches, or ſuch other Parts of the Fabrick, as they judg'd ſuperfluous, and to ſell all the Materials. The number of the Monaſteries firſt and laſt ſuppreſs'd were ſix hundred and forty five; of which twenty eight were in this Reign Mitred or Parliamentary Abbies, whoſe Abbots ſate in the Houſe of Lords, which were as following. St. Albans, in Hartfordſhire; St. Peter's, in Weſtminſter; St. Auſtin's, in Canterbury; Glaſſenbury, in Somerſetſhire; St. Edmund's Bury, in Suffolk; St. Bennet's in the Holm, in Norfolk; Bardney and Croyland, in Lincolnſhire; St. Mary's in York, and Selby in Yorkſhire; Shrewsbury, in Shropſhire; Eveſham, in Worceſterſhire; Gloceſter, Tewxbury, Winchelcomb, and Cirenceſter, in Gloceſterſhire; Abington and Reading, in Barkſhire; Malmesbury, in Wiltſhire; Peterborough, in Northamptonſhire; Thorney, in Cambridgeſhire; Ramſey, in Huntingtonſhire; Battel, in Suſſex; Hide by Wincheſter, in Hampſhire; St. John's, in Colcheſter, and Waltham, in Eſſex; Coventry, in Warwickſhire; and Taveſtock, in Devonſhire. The valu'd Rents of all the Abby Lands in England were exceeding low; but the real Worth and Value of them was judg'd at that Time to amount to above fifteen hundred thouſand Pounds per Annum. So that never any King in England had ſuch mighty Advantages of inriching the Crown, and making noble Foundations. But whether out of Policy to ſatisfie the Gentry, by ſelling them at low Rates, or out of Eaſineſs to his Courtiers, or out of his unmeaſur'd Expences, all this melted away in a few Years, and his great Deſigns were never accompliſh'd. He deſign'd to have founded eighteen new Biſhopricks, but he founded only ſix; and other noble Projects alſo became abortive. In particular one that was deſign'd by the famous Sir Nicolas Bacon, which was a Royal Seminary for Ambaſſadors, Statſemen and Hiſtorians; which would ſupply one Loſs proceeding from the Fall of Abbies, in moſt of which was kept a Chronicle of the Times. However the King laid out great Sums in building and fortifying many Ports, in the Channel, and other Ports of England; and in the demoliſhing theſe Houſes, he had ſo tender a Regard to Learning, that he not only preferr'd many able Perſons he found there, but took ſpecial Care to preſerve the choiceſt Books of their well furniſh'd Libraries. All the Ground that Cranmer gain'd this Year, in which there was ſo much loſt, was a Liberty that all private Perſons might have Bibles in their Houſes; and tho' it was violently oppos'd by Gardiner, yet a particular Patent for that Purpoſe was iſſu'd out, and put to the Management of the Vicegerent Cromwell.

The Mitred Abbies.

This

This great Miniſter was now projecting a Match for the King, that might ſupport him and his Friends; and tho' Perſons were propos'd both by the Emperor and the King of France, yet Cromwell's Management prevail'd; and the King fix'd upon Anne, Siſter to the Duke of Cleve, whoſe eldeſt Siſter had been marry'd to the Duke of Saxony. Homs Holbin, the famous Painter of that Age, took her Picture very much to her Advantage; for the nice King never lik'd the Original, as he admir'd the Picture. The Duke of Saxony diſcourag'd the Match, becauſe the King was making backward Steps in the Matter of the Reformation; but Cromwell purſu'd it with a fatal Aſſiduity. It was ſaid, the Lady had great Charms in her Perſon; but ſhe could ſpeak no Language but Dutch, which the King underſtood not; nor was ſhe bred to Muſick, which he admir'd: And ſhe had a Stiffneſs in her Breeding, not at all accommodated to the King's Inclinations. The Match was at length concluded; and in the end of December, the Lady was brought over into England. The King was impatient to ſee her, and went incognito to Rocheſter; but the Sight of her damp'd all his Ardour. There appear'd ſuch Unpoliteneſs in her Perſon and Behaviour, that the King ſwore, They had brought over a Flanders Mare to him, and immediately conceiv'd an incurable Averſion to her. He reſolv'd to break the Match, if it were poſſible; but his Affairs then requir'd the Friendſhip of the German Princes; ſo that he did not think it adviſable to put any Affront upon the Dukes of Cleve and Saxony. The Emperor had at this Time made a haſty Journey through France; and Francis and he had a magnificent Enterview, where as the King was inform'd, by the Pope's Inſtigation a Project was forming againſt him. Francis was alſo contriving how to take Calais from him; it was eaſie for him to have engag'd the King of Scotland againſt him; and the People in the North were thought to retain their former Diſpoſition to rebel; ſo that a War made on the King in ſuch Circumſtances, would probably find him at a great Diſadvantage. This caus'd the King to be more tender of offending the Germans; but hearing there had been a Contract between the Duke of Lorrain and his intended Bride, he reſolv'd to try if that would furniſh him with a fair Excuſe to break off the Match. The King expreſs'd his great Trouble and Uneaſineſs, both to Cromwell, and many of his other Acquaintance; upon which one of them ſaid, That mean Perſons had this Advantage over Princes and great Men; that the former choſe their own Wives, while the latter were oblig'd to take ſuch as were brought them. But nothing could be founded on that Pre-contract, which was only an Agreement between the Fathers, when their Children were under Age, and which was afterwards broken and annull'd by their Parents. So Cranmer and Tonſtall being requir'd to give their Opinions as Divines, declar'd, There was nothing in it to hinder the King's marrying with the Lady.

A new Treaty of Marriage with the King.

At length the King finding himſelf preſs'd on all Sides, on the ſixth Day of January, marry'd her; but expreſs'd his Diſlike of her ſo manifeſtly, that all about him were apprehenſive of it; and the Day after he told Cromwell, as an intimate Friend, That he had not conſummated the Marriage, and believ'd he never ſhould: He ſuſpected ſhe was no Virgin, and had ſuch ungrateful Smells about her, as had increas'd his Averſion to an inſuperable Degree. This was a mortal Stab to Cromwell, who well knew how delicate the King was in theſe Matters, and that ſo great a Misfortune muſt needs fall heavy upon him, who was the chief Promoter of it. He us'd all Methods to overcome theſe Inclinations, but to no Effect; and tho' the King liv'd five Months in her Company, and lay often in Bed with her, yet his Averſion rather increas'd, than abated. She ſeem'd not much concern'd at it, and expreſs'd a great Readineſs to concur in every Thing that might diſengage him from a Marriage ſo highly unacceptable to him. Inſtruments were brought over, to ſhew that the Contract between her and the Prince of Lorrain was void; but the King's Advocates took ſome Advantage, becauſe it was not declar'd whether the Contract tract was in the Words of the Preſent, or of the Future Tenſe, and reſolv'd to make uſe of that upon a proper Occaſion.

Notwithſtanding the King's inſuperable Diſlike of this Match, he was ſo far from diſcarding the chief Promoter of it, that two Days after a Seſſions of Parliament was call'd, he created Cromwell Earl of Eſſex, upon the fourteenth of April; the Male Line of the Bourchiers, who had born that Title, being extinguiſh'd. So that being now Earl of Eſſex, Lord Privy-Seal, Lord Chamberlain, Knight of the Garter, and Maſter of the Rolls, and above all, the King's Vicegerent, he was arriv'd at the Height of his Grandeur, and equal to that of any Subject in England. This laſt Title of Earl, was too much like Lightning before a dreadful Storm of Thunder; for ſuddenly after, the Duke of Norfolk, who had ſecret Reſentments againſt him, arreſted him of High-Treaſon, and ſent him Priſoner to the Tower, to the great Surprize of all his Friends. He had many Enemies: The Meanneſs of his Birth caus'd the prouder Sort of the Nobility to be diſguſted, when they ſaw the Son of a Blackſmith advanc'd above them all. The Romiſh Clergy had conceiv'd inſuperable Prejudices againſt his Actions and Authority: They imputed the Suppreſſion of Monaſteries, and the Injunctions laid on them, to proceed chiefly from his Counſels; and it was believ'd, that principally by his Means the King and the Emperor continu'd in ſuch Miſunderſtandings. The King by his late Informations was now ſenſible, that no Accommodation was like to be made between the Emperor and the French King; and he was ſure that either of them would court his Friendſhip, in caſe of a War, which made him leſs concern'd for the Favour of the German Princes. This caus'd Cromwell's Counſels to be of leſs Moment; with which concurr'd a more near and ſecret Reaſon: The King did not only hate his new Queen, but had now ſetled his Affections upon the Lady Catharine Howard, Neice to the Duke of Norfolk; which both rais'd the Intereſt of that Relation, and depreſs'd Cromwell, who had made this late Match. The King was alſo too willing to throw upon him all the Errors that had been committed of late, and by making him a Sacrifice, he hop'd to regain the Affections of his People. The King had alſo Informations brought him, That he ſecretly incourag'd thoſe who oppos'd the ſix Articles, which highly provok'd his Majeſty; ſo that his Fall was as inevitable, as it was unexpected.

Cromwell ſent to the Tower.

In his Fall he had the common Fate of all diſgrac'd Miniſters, to be forſaken by his Friends, and inſulted by his Enemies: Only the generous Cranmer ſo retain'd his former Simplicity, that he could never learn theſe Court Arts. Therefore the next Day he wrote earneſtly to the King in his Favour, 'Declaring he had found that he had ever lov'd the King above all Things, and 'had ſerv'd him with ſuch Fidelity and Succeſs, that he believ'd no King of 'England had ever a more faithful Servant: And he wiſh'd the King might 'find ſuch a Counſellor, who was both willing and able to ſerve him as he 'had done. So great a Soul had Cranmer, that he could not be turn'd by the Changes of his Friend's Fortunes, nor the Dread of an imperious Prince; for had not the King's Kindneſs been deeply rooted, this Letter had ruin'd him. But the King was now reſolv'd to ruin Cromwell; and that unjuſt Practice of Attainting, without hearing the Parties anſwer for themſelves, which he had too much promoted, was now turn'd upon himſelf. He had ſuch Enemies in the Houſe of Lords, that the Bill of Attainder was diſpatch'd in two Days, during the Abſence of Cranmer, when no one durſt venture to plead for him. He met with more Juſtice in the Houſe of Commons, where it remain'd ten Days; but in Concluſion, a new Bill was drawn againſt him, and ſent up to the Lords, where it paſs'd theirs and the Royal Aſſent. It conſiſted of an Accumulation of ſeveral Crimes, Miſdemeanors and Suggeſtions, and of ſeveral Heretical Principles and Practices, and indeed of ſome great Improbabilities; for which he was attainted both of High-Treaſon and Hereſie. In all this Matter,

All forſake him but Cranmer.

A Bill of Attainder againſt him.

Matter, he is thought to have met with great Hardſhips; not only becauſe he was not permitted to anſwer, but becauſe the principal Matters objected againſt him might eaſily have been clear'd, he being able to have produc'd the King's Orders for moſt of them.

Cromwell's Fall was the firſt Step to the King's Divorce; for immediately after, an Addreſs was mov'd to be made to him by the Lords, that he would permit his Marriage to be examin'd. Cranmer and others were ſent down to deſire the Concurrence of the Commons; and they order'd twenty of their Number to go along with the Lords in one Body to the King. The Matter being concerted before, he granted their Deſire, and Commiſſion was ſent to the Convocation to diſcuſs it. Gardiner open'd the Cauſe to them, and they appointed a Committee for Examination of Witneſſes. The Subſtance of the whole Evidence amounted to theſe Particulars; That the Matter of the Pre-contract between the Queen and the Prince of Lorrain, was not fully clear'd; That the King had marry'd her againſt his Will, without an inward Conſent; and that he had never conſummated the Marriage, ſo that they ſaw he could have no Iſſue by the Queen. Upon theſe Grounds the whole Convocation with one Conſent annull'd the Marriage, and declar'd both Parties free; which was the groſſeſt Compliance that the King had from his Clergy in his whole Reign. For as they knew that there was nothing material in the Pre-contract; ſo by vacating the Marriage, becauſe the Conſent was not internal and free, they made a moſt pernicious Precedent for breaking all publick Treaties. But in reality, the King was reſolv'd to be freed from the Queen, and the Clergy reſolv'd not to diſoblige him; and they rather ſought out Reaſons to give Colour to their Sentence, than paſs'd it on the Force of thoſe Reaſons. Cromwell in the Tower was requir'd to ſend a Declaration of all he knew concerning the Marriage, which he did; but being overwhelm'd with the Greatneſs of his Fall, he ended with theſe abject Words, Written with the heavy Heart, and trembling Hand, of your Highneſs's moſt heavy, and moſt miſerable Priſoner, and poor Slave, Thomas Cromwell: And under his Subſcription he wrote, Moſt ſacred Prince, I cry for Mercy, Mercy, Mercy. The Judgment of the Convocation, and their Reaſons, were reported to the Parliament; and both Houſes reſted ſatisfy'd. The following Day ſome Lords were ſent to the Queen, who had retir'd to Richmond, and told her, The King was reſolv'd to declare her his adopted Siſter, and ſettle four thouſand Pounds a Year upon her, if ſhe would conſent to it; which ſhe chearfully embrac'd: And it being left to her Choice, either to live in England, or return to her Brother, ſhe preferr'd the former; and was likewiſe prevail'd on to write to her Brother, that all this was done with her free Will; that the King had us'd her like a Father, and that he and the other Allies ſhould not take the Matter amiſs. When Affairs were thus prepar'd, the Parliament paſs'd an Act conforming the Judgment of the Covocation, without Oppoſition.

The King's laſt Marriage annull'd.

The King and Queen ſeparate.

In this Parliament there paſs'd ſeveral other Acts; particularly one for Suppreſſing the Knights of St. John of Jeruſalem, ſince call'd the Knights of Rhodes and Malta, who ſucceeded the Knights Templars. Another Act paſs'd to mitigate one Clauſe in the Act of the ſix Articles; 'by which the Pains of 'Death for the Marriage or Incontinency of the Clergy, were chang'd into a 'Forfeiture of their Goods and Benefices. Another Act paſs'd, 'Authoriſing 'thoſe Committees of Biſhops and Divines, nominated by the King, both for 'the Doctrine and Ceremonies, to proceed in it; and appointing, That what 'ſhould be concluded by them, and publiſh'd with the King's Approbation, 'ſhould bind the Subjects. But a Proviſo was added, 'That nothing might 'be done by them contrary to the Laws then in force; which Contradiction in the Proviſo's ſeems to have been made to keep all Eccleſiaſtical Proceedings under the Inſpection of the Secular Courts. Another peculiar Act paſs'd, 'That no Pretence 'of a Pre-contract ſhould be us'd to annul a Marriage duly ſolemniz'd and conſummated;

Several Acts paſs'd.

'ſummated; and no Degrees of Kindred, but thoſe enumerated in the Laws of 'Moſes, might hinder a Marriage. This laſt Clauſe was added to enable the King to marry to the Lady Catharine Howard, who was Couſin German to Anne Bolen, which was one of the Degrees prohibited by the Canon Law.

Subſidies granted. The Province of Canterbury gave the King a Subſidy of four Shillings in the Pound, to be paid in two Years, with a Preamble of high Acknowledgments of their Happineſs under his Protection. A Subſidy was alſo demanded of the Laity, but it was much oppos'd in the Houſe of Commons: Many alledg'd They had given the King the Abby Lands, in Hopes that no Subſidies ſhould be demanded for the future; and it ſhew'd a ſtrange Profuſeneſs, that one ſhould be demanded within one Year after. But it was anſwer'd, That the King had been at great Charges in fortifying his Coaſts, and ſupporting ſuch foreign Leagues as preſerv'd the Nation in Safety; therefore a Tenth, and four Fifteens were granted. Several Bills of Attainder were paſs'd; and in Concluſion, the King ſent a general Pardon, out of which Cromwell, and ſeveral

The Parliament diſſolv'd. others were excepted, and on the twenty fourth Day of July the Parliament was diſſolv'd.

And now the unfortunate Cromwell, who had been ſix Weeks a Priſoner, was brought to his Execution, notwithſtanding all his Endeavours for his Preſervation. Once he wrote to the King in ſuch melting Terms, that he caus'd the Letter to be read thrice, and was ſenſibly affected with it; but the Charms of Catharine Howard, and the Endeavours of the Duke of Norfolk and the Biſhop of Wincheſter at length prevail'd: So a Warrant was ſent to cut off his Head on Tower-Hill, on the twenty eighth of July. Being brought to the Scaffold, his Kindneſs to his Son made him very cautious in what he ſaid, 'He 'thanked God for bringing him to die in that Manner, which was juſt, on the 'Account of his Offences againſt God and his Prince. He declar'd he doubted 'of no Article of the Catholick Faith, nor of any Sacrament of the Church. 'He ſaid he had been ſeduc'd, but now he dy'd in the Catholick Faith; and Cromwell beheaded. 'deny'd that he had ſupported the Preachers of evil Opinions. Then praying fervently for the King, and the Remiſſion of his own Sins, upon giving the Sign, the Executioner cut off his Head very barbarouſly. Thus fell that wonderful Miniſter of State, who had rais'd himſelf meerly by the Strength of his

His Character. natural Parts. For tho' his Extract was mean, and his Education and Learning as low; yet his mighty Wiſdom and Dexterity in Buſineſs, mounted him through various Aſcents, 'till he had gain'd the utmoſt Height of a Subject. He carry'd his Greatneſs with an admirable Temper and Moderation; and fell more under the Weight of a popular Odium, than any real Guilt, with which he was charg'd. Yet he cannot be excus'd in two Particulars: His too boldly dipping his Hands in Sacrilege, and his too ready joining in condemning Perſons unheard. The laſt of which prov'd his own Fate; which ſeems more like the Vengeance of Heaven, than the Puniſhment of Men. With him fell the Office of the King's Vicegerent; and none after ever aſpir'd to that Title and Character, that prov'd ſo fatal to him who firſt bore it, The King is ſaid to have lamented his Death when it was too late; and the Miſeries that fell on the new Queen, and on the Duke of Norfolk and his Family afterwards, were look'd upon as ſo many Scourges of Providence, for their implacable Proſecution of this unfortunate Miniſter.

With his Fall, the Progreſs of the Reformation ſtopt; for Cranmer could never gain much Ground after this, and indeed many hop'd to ſee him made the next Sacrifice; and ſome complain'd of him in the Houſe of Commons, and Informations were brought to the King, that the chief Incouragement that the Hereticks had, came from him. In the mean Time the King purſu'd his

The King's fifth Marriage, with Catharine Howard. Amours, and marry'd the Lady Catharine Howard, and ſhortly after upon the eighth Day of Auguſt, ſhew'd her publickly as Queen. Still the Eccleſiaſtical Committees were imploy'd by the King, and gave their laſt finiſhing to a Book formerly formerly prepar'd, but at this Time corrected and explain'd in many Particulars. This was purſuant to the late Act of Parliament, and was an Explanation of Faith, Juſtification, the Apoſtles Creed, the Sacraments, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, Free-Will, Good Works; all writ in a plain and maſculine Stile, and accommodated to any Capacity. This was publiſh'd by Authority, and the People requir'd by the King to read it, and print it in their Hearts. Tho' this Book in many Particulars condem'd the Romiſh Tenets, yet that Party reaſſum'd much Courage, and Bonner began to ſhow his Severity and Cruelty, which occaſion'd Barnes, Gerrard, and Jerome, three Preachers, to be condemn'd for Hereticks. When they were carry'd to Smithfield, three others, Abel, Featherſton, and Powel, who were attainted for denying the King's Supremacy, were coupled with them in the Hurdles that carry'd them; the King affecting in this an extravagant Appearance of Impartiality in his Juſtice. In the end of this Year, the King began to endow his new Biſhopricks: Weſtminſter was the firſt; after which he endow'd Cheſter, Gloceſter and Peterborough, and laſtly Oxford and Briſtol. And here ends the Series of the King's Advances towards a Reformation, which was now digeſted and form'd into a Body. What follow'd was not in a Thread, but by Starts, ſometimes in favour of the one, and ſometimes of the other Party. Nor was he truly ſteady in his Councils as to State Affairs; for ſince Cromwell's Death he had no Miniſter about him, that had a juſt Aſcendent over him. So that the King was now left too much to himſelf, at a Time when Years, Sickneſs and Oppoſition had made him more humorous and impatient than formerly; ſo that more Errors were committed in the laſt ſeven Years of his Government, than in all his Reign beſides.

XI. In the latter Part of this Reign, by the Commotion of the unſetled Times, and the growing Indiſpoſitions of the King, Bloodſheds and Executions became more frequent in the Nation than formerly. A little Rebellion now appearing in Yorkſhire, in which Sir John Nevil was an Accomplice, the King took Order to ſuppreſs it in due Time, and commanded that Knight to be put to Death at York. Shortly after follow'd the Execution of the Counteſs of Saliſbury; which was probably occaſion'd by the late Rebellion, as being judg'd of her Son Cardinal Pool's Inſtigation. The old Lady, above ſeventy Years of Age, being brought to the Scaffold, erected in the Tower, was commanded to lay her Head on the Block; but ſhe poſitively refus'd, ſaying, So ſhould Traytors do, but I am none. Nor did it avail, that the Executioner told her It was always cuſtomary; but turning her gray Head every Way, ſhe cry'd out, If you will have my Head, get it as you can: So he was conſtrain'd to take it off barbarouſly. And thus ended the laſt of the right Line of the famous Plantagenets. There ſtill remain'd one of that Name, Arthur a natural Son to King Edward the Fourth, who this Year dy'd with Joy at Calais.

The Execution of the Counteſs of Saliſbury.

The End of the Plantagenets.

In Summer, the King with his fair and beloved Queen went to York, to meet his Nephew the King of Scotland, who promis'd to give him an Enterview in that City. He was an extraordinary Prince, a great Promoter both of Learning and Juſtice; but ſtill unmeaſurably addicted to his Pleaſures. The Clergy of Scotland were very apprehenſive of his ſeeing his Uncle Henry, leſt he ſhould perſuade him to follow the Copy he had ſet to his Neighbours; and they us'd ſuch Perſuaſions, that being ſeconded by a Meſſage from France, they diverted him from his Purpoſe; which provok'd his Uncle, and gave Occaſion to a Rupture not long after. King Henry being arriv'd at York, he iſſu'd out a popular Proclamation, 'That all who had been aggriev'd for want of Juſtice, 'by any whom he had formerly imploy'd, ſhould repair to him and his Council 'for Redreſs; all which was done to caſt all paſt Miſcarriages on Cromwell, and to put the People in Hopes of better Times.

The King and Queen go to York.

He was now ſo captivated with the Charms of his Queen, at his Return to London, he gave publick Thanks to God for the Happineſs he enjoy'd by her Means. But this prov'd very ſhort-liv'd Pleaſure; for the next Day the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury came to him, and deliver'd him a melancholy Account of the Queen's lewd Life, as it had been brought him by one John Laſſels; who had told him from his Siſter, an old Servant belonging to the Duke of Norfolk, and concern'd in the Queen's Education, that the Queen had often been wicked with two Perſons nam'd Deirham and Mannock, with other ſcandalous Circumſtances not fit to be related. By the Advice of the Lord Chancellor and other Privy-Counellors, Cranmer put down the Particulars in Writing, and deliver'd it to the King, as not well knowing how to open it in Diſcourſe. When the King ſaw it, he was much confounded, but he lov'd the Queen ſo tenderly, that he at firſt look'd upon it as a Forgery; ſo that if full Evidence had been wanting, it had certainly turn'd to the Arch-Biſhop's Ruin. The King imported the Matter to ſome other Counſellors, and with the utmoſt Secrecy ſent to examine Laſſels and his Siſter; which being confirm'd by them, he order'd Deirham and Mannock to be arreſted upon ſome other Pretences. But they being examin'd, not only confeſs'd what was inform'd, but reveal'd ſome other Circumſtances that ſhew'd the Queen had laid aſide all Senſe of Modeſty, as well as the Fear of a Diſcovery; three ſeveral Women having been Witneſſes to her lewd Practices. The Report of this ſtruck the King into a moſt profound Penſiveneſs, and caus'd him with a Flood of Tears to lament his Misfortune. The Arch-Biſhop and ſome other Counſellors were ſent to examine the Queen; who at firſt deny'd every Thing, but finding it was already known, ſhe confeſs'd all and ſet her Hand to it. It alſo appear'd that ſhe had intended to continue in that impious Courſe of Life, for ſhe had brought Deirham into her Service; and at Lincoln, by the Lady Rochford's Means, one Culpepper was brought to her in the Night, and ſtay'd many Hours with her in a Cellar; and at his Departure, ſhe gave him a Gold Chain. Culpepper being examin'd, confeſs'd the Crime; for which, both Deirham and he ſuffer'd; and others were indicted of Miſpriſion of Treaſon, and condemn'd to perpetual Impriſonment.

The Queen's ill Life diſcover'd.

A. D. 1542. Reg. 33 34.

This unfortunate Affair occaſion'd a new Parliament to be ſummon'd on the ſixteenth of January; in which a Committee was particularly appointed to examine the Queen: Their Report is recorded only in general, that ſhe confeſs'd, but no Particulars are mention'd. Upon which they paſs'd an Act in the Form of a Petition: 'After deſiring the King not to be griev'd at this Misfortune, they 'pray'd, that the Queen and her Complices, with her Procureſs the Lady Roch-'ford, might be attainted of Treaſon: And that all thoſe who knew of the 'Queen's vicious Courſe before her Marriage, might be attainted of Miſpriſion 'of Treaſon, for not revealing to the King in due Time; among whom were 'her Father and Mother, and her Grand-Mother, the Dutcheſs of Norfolk. 'It was alſo declar'd Treaſon to know any thing of the Incontinence of any 'Queen of England for the future, and not to reveal it. And it was made 'Treaſon, in any whom the King intended to marry, judging they were Vir-'gins, not to reveal it, if they were not really ſuch. This remarkable Act being paſs'd, the Queen, and the Lady Rochford, were beheaded on Tower-Hill the twelfth of February; about ſeventeen Months after ſhe was marry'd to the King, and had founded her Greatneſs in the unfortunate Blood of Cromwell. The Queen confeſs'd the Miſcarriages of her former Life, before the King marry'd her, which had brought her to this fatal End; but did poſitively deny, before God and his Angels, and upon the Salvation of her Soul, that ſhe was ever guilty of betraying her Soveraign's Bed; yet the unbounded Looſeneſs of her former Courſe of Living, inclin'd the World to believe the moſt ſcandalous Things that could be reported. But all obſerv'd the Judgments of Heaven upon the Lady Rochford, who had a principal Part in the Death of Queen Anne

An Act of Attainder againſt the Queen.

The Queen beheaded.

Anne Bolen, and her own Husband; and her appearing ſo vile a Woman, tended much to raiſe their Reputations again, in whoſe Fall her Spite and other Artifices had ſo criminal a Share. The Attainting her Kindred and Parents, for not diſcovering her former Lewdneſs, was thought extream Severity; for in them it would have been a hard Piece of Duty to have diſcover'd ſuch a Secret: Yet tho' they lay ſome Time in Priſon, the King pardon'd them all when his Rage was a little qualify'd. That other Proviſo, which oblig'd a young Lady to diſcover her own Frailties, if the King ſhould pleaſe to make Love to her, was thought a Piece of grievous Tyranny: Upon which, thoſe who thought fit to rally the Sex, took Occaſion to ſay, That after this no one, reputed a Virgin, could be induc'd to marry the King: So that it was not ſo much Choice, as Neceſſity, that caus'd him to marry a Widow two Years after.

In this Parliament there paſs'd another Act that made way for the Diſſolutions of Colleges, Hoſpitals, and other Foundations of that Nature. The Courtiers had been practiſing with the Preſidents and Governors of ſome of theſe, to make Reſignations to the King; which were conceiv'd in the ſame Stile with the Surrenders of Monaſteries. Eight of theſe were already procur'd; but they could not make any great Progreſs, becauſe by their local Statutes it was provided, that the Conſent of all the Fellows, was neceſſary to make their Deeds good in Law; which were not ſo eaſily obtain'd. Therefore all ſuch Statutes were now annull'd; and none for the future were any more to be ſworn to them. In this Parliament it was obſerv'd, That the Kings of England for many Years had govern'd Ireland by no other Title than Lords of that Iſland; King Henry now thought fit to change the Stile, and honour a populous and warlike Nation with the Title of a King. Therefore in a Parliament held at this Time in that Country, he gave Orders to be declar'd King of Ireland; which was alſo proclaim'd in England during this Parliament, and afterward finally enacted in the thirty fifth Year of this Reign.

The Kings of England firſt ſtil'd Kings of Ireland.

This gave Offence to James King of Scotland; and by the Inſtigation of the French King, a War broke out between the two old contending Kingdoms. King Henry ſet out a Declaration, importing that the Crown of Scotland ow'd Homage to that of England; and cited many Precedents to ſhew that it had been done not only by their Kings, but by Conſent of their States; for which he appeal'd to Original Records. The Scots aſſerted they were an independent Kingdom, and the Homages they paid were for Lands in England, or elſe were extorted by Force of Arms. And thus a War began in October, when the Duke of Norfolk made an Inroad into Scotland with twenty thouſand Men; but after he had burnt ſome ſmall Towns, and waſted Teviotdale, he return'd into England. In the End of November, an Army of fifteen thouſand Scots, with a good Train of Artillery, was gather'd together, with a Deſign to march into England by the Weſtern Road. King James repair'd thither in Perſon; but he was at this Time violently diſturb'd in his Fancy, and imagin'd the Ghoſt of one whom he had unjuſtly put to Death, follow'd him continually; ſo that he not only left his Army, but Commiſſion'd Oliver Sinclare, then called his Minion, to command in chief. This highly diſguſted the Nobility, who were weary'd out with the Inſolence of that Favourite; inſomuch that they refus'd to march, and were beginning to ſeparate. While they continu'd in this inglorious Diſorder, five hundred Engliſhmen appear'd; and the Scotch apprehending it was an advanc'd Part of the Duke of Norfolk's Army, refus'd to fight: So the Engliſh ſet upon and diſpers'd them, and took all their Ordinance and Baggage, and a thouſand Priſoners, of whom two hundred were Gentlemen, the Earl of Glencarn and Caſſiles being the chief. This unexpected News ſo overcharg'd the melancholy King, that he dy'd ſhortly after; leaving only an Infant Daughter newly born to ſucceed him. The Scotch Lords that were taken, were brought to London, and lodg'd in the Houſes of the Engliſh Nobility: Caſſiles was ſent to Lambeth, where he receiv'd thoſe Seeds of Knowledge, which afterwards produc'd a plentiful Harveſt in Scotland. The other Priſoners were alſo ſo well inſtructed, that they ſoon had very different Thoughts of the Changes made in England, than what the Scotch Clergy had taught them; who had given the greateſt Incouragement to this War. The King's Death, and the Crown falling to his Daughter, caus'd the Engliſh Council to make uſe of this as a proper Conjuncture for uniting the whole Iſland; therefore they ſent to the Scotch Lords, and propos'd the marrying the young Prince Edward with their Queen; which was ſo acceptable, that they promis'd to promote it to their utmoſt Power. But that unfortunate Princeſs was not born under ſuch happy Stars, tho' ſhe was Mother to him, in whom this long deſir'd Union took Effect. However upon giving Hoſtages for Performance of their particular Promiſes, the Lords were ſent home honourably; being highly pleas'd both with the Splendor of the King's Court, and with the Way of Religion which they had ſeen in England.

A. D. 1543. Reg. 34. 35.

Shortly after a Parliament was call'd, in which the King had large Subſidies granted him of ſix Shillings in the Pound, to be paid in three Years. A Bill was now propos'd for the Advancement of true Religion, by Cranmer and ſome other Biſhops; for the Spirits of the Romiſh Party were much ſunk ſince the Death of the laſt Queen; yet at this Time a Treaty was ſet on Foot between the King and the Emperor, which began to raiſe them again: For ſince the King had Thoughts of ingaging in a War with France, it was neceſſary for him to make the Emperor his Friend. Cranmer's Motion was much oppos'd, and the timorous Biſhops forſook him; yet ſtill he puſh'd the Matter as far as he was able, tho' in moſt Points Things went contrary to his Deſire. By the Act 'Tindall's Tranſlation of the Bible was condemn'd; but Bibles of ano'ther Tranſlation were ſtill allow'd to be kept, only all Prefaces and Annota'tions were to be daſh'd or cut out: All the King's Injunctions were confirm'd:
'No Books of Religion might be printed without Licence; there was to be no
'Expoſition of the Scripture in Plays or Enterludes; nor none of the Laity 'might read the Scripture, or explain it in any publick Aſſembly. Noblemen,
'Gentlemen and their Wives, or Merchants, might have Bibles; but they were 'forbidden to ordinary Perſons, Tradeſmen, and Husbandmen. Every Perſon
'might have the Book ſet out by the Biſhops, and the Pſalter, and other Ru'diments of Religion in Engliſh. All Churchmen that preach'd contrary to 'that Book, were to recant for the firſt Offence, to carry a Faggot and abjure
'for the ſecond, and to be burnt for the third: The Laity for the third Offence
'were only to ſuffer Loſs of Goods and perpetual Impriſonment; but they 'were to be proceeded againſt within a Year, and the accus'd Parties were al-
'low'd Witneſſes for their Purgation. The Act of the Six Articles was here
'confirm'd, and Liberty was left to the King to change this Act, or any Pro-
'viſo in it. As this Act about Religion was a great Mitigation of former Severities, ſo it brought the Reformers to depend wholly on the King's Mercy for their Lives; ſince he could now chain up, or let looſe the Act of the Six Articles upon them, at his Pleaſure. This Proviſo was highly grateful to the King, who much affected to have his People depend intirely upon him.

A Parliament call'd.

An Act about Religion.

A League with the Emperor.

Soon after the Concluſion of this Parliament, on Trinity-Sunday a League Offenſive and Defenſive was ſworn between the King and the Emperor; for England, Calais, and the adjacent Places, and for all Flanders, with many other Particulars ſet down at large by the Lord Herbert. Here Aſſurances were given, that tho' the King would not declare the Princeſs Mary Legitimate, upon which the Emperor much inſiſted, yet ſhe ſhould be put in the Succeſſion to the Crown next Prince Edward. By this Treaty the Emperor gain'd much; for having ingag'd the Crowns of England and France in a War, and drawn off King Henry from his League with the Princes of Germany, he was now more at leiſure to proſecute his aſpiring Deſigns in that Country.

But

But the Negotiation did not ſo well ſucceed in Scotland, where the Earl of Arran, next in Blood to the Infant Queen, was eſtabliſh'd in the Government during her Minority. King Henry ſent Sir Ralph Sadler to him to induce him to promote the Queen's Match with Prince Edward, and to offer the young Princeſs Elizabeth to his Son. This was ſo acceptable, that it was agreed and confirm'd in Parliament, That the young Queen ſhould be bred in Scotland 'till ſhe was ten Years old, and the King of England to ſend a Nobleman and his Lady with others not exceeding twenty, to wait on her, after which Age ſhe was to be ſent into England; and in the mean Time, ſix Hoſtages were to be given. But all the Clergy, headed by Cardinal Beaton, together with the Queen-Mother, violently oppos'd this Deſign; and it was alledg'd, That a Match with the French would be more advantageous to the Nation, who being at ſo great a Diſtance could not ſo eaſily oppreſs them as the Engliſh: For if the French oppreſs'd them, it would be the Intereſt of the Engliſh to protect them; but if they came under the Yoke of England, they could expect no Protection from any other Prince. This meeting with that Antipathy then form'd between the two Nations, and being inflam'd by the Clergy, turn'd the People in general to prefer a Match with France before the other propos'd with Prince Edward. The French ſent over the Earl of Lennox to make a Party againſt the Governor, together with the Governor's natural Brother; who together us'd ſuch Threatnings and Artifices, as had their full Effects upon him: For he turn'd off wholly from the Intereſts of England, and gave himſelf up to the French Councils. When they had thus reſolv'd to break the Match with England, the Lords who had left Hoſtages with King Henry for the faithful Performance of their Promiſes, now little regarded either their own Honour, or the Safety of their Hoſtages. Only the brave Earl of Caſſiles thought it unworthy of him to break his Faith in ſuch a mean manner; therefore he went into England, and generouſly deliver'd himſelf Priſoner to King Henry; who expreſs'd the higheſt Value for him, and call'd him a ſecond Regulus, but treated him after a better manner. For he gave him his Liberty and a noble Preſent, and ſent him back honourably to Scotland with all his Hoſtages; but he reſolv'd to take a ſevere Reparation of thoſe who had fail'd him in that Kingdom.

Affairs in Scotland.

At the ſame Time he reſolv'd upon a War againſt France, their great Supporter on all Occaſions; for which there were many Reaſons and Provocations. Among others one was, That King Francis had fail'd in the Matter of ſhaking off the Pope's Authority, and advancing a Reformation, in which he had promis'd to ſecond him. But before this was undertaken, the King reſolv'd upon another Marriage, in which he met with ſome Difficulty, by Reaſon of the late Act concerning the Virginity of the Perſon to be marry'd with him: Therefore at length he fix'd upon the Lady Catharine Parr, Widow to the Lord Latimer; who as ſhe was a Lady of much Integrity and Worth, and ſome Maturity of Years, ſo the King for the moſt part liv'd happily with her. She was a ſecret Favourer of the Reformation; yet could not divert a Storm, which at this Time fell on ſome of her Party at Windſor, particularly Perſon, Teſtwood, Filmer and Marbeck, all but the laſt of whom were burnt alive; tho' ſome of their Accuſers were afterwards convicted of Perjury. Others were alſo accus'd and threaten'd by the Romiſh Party, but none ſo induſtriouſly aim'd at as the Arch-Biſhop himſelf. The Plot againſt him was laid very deep by Biſhop Gardiner and ſeveral others, and a long Paper of his Heretical Principles and Practices were deliver'd to the King; who in this ſhew'd himſelf ſo true a Friend to him, and the other ſo true a Chriſtian, that it ſunk and vaniſh'd into Air. Shortly after when Cranmer gain'd the moſt apparent Advantage over his Enemies and Accuſers, he would make no other Uſe of it than to diſplay his Readineſs to forgive, and to do Good for Evil; for which he became ſo celebrated, that it was commonly ſaid, That the beſt way to obtain his Favour, was to do him an Injury.

The King's ſixth and laſt Marriage, with Catharine Parr.

Cranmer's Behaviour.

XII. We

A. D. 1544. Reg. 35/36.

XII. We are now arriv'd at the latter Scenes and Tranſactions of this buſie and memorable Reign; when a new Parliament was ſummon'd that paſs'd the laſt remarkable Act for the Succeſſion of the Crown. By this it was enacted, 'That in Default of Heirs of Prince Edward's Body, or of Heirs by the King's preſent Marriage, the Crown ſhould devolve on the Lady Mary; and in Default of Heirs of her Body, or if ſhe did not obſerve ſuch Limitations or Conditions as ſhould be declar'd by the King's Letters Patents, or by his laſt Will under his Hand, it ſhould next fall to the Lady Elizabeth, and her Heirs; or if ſhe had none, or ſhould not keep the Conditions declar'd by the King, it ſhould fall to any other nominated by the King's Letters Patents, or his laſt Will ſign'd with his Hand. An Oath was alſo appointed both againſt the Pope's Supremacy, and for the maintaining the Succeſſion according to this Act, which all were requir'd to take under the Pains of Treaſon, and it was made Treaſon to ſay or write any thing contrary to this Act, or to the Slander of any of the King's Heirs nam'd in it. By this, tho' the King did not Legitimate his Daughters, yet it was made Treaſon to declare them Spurious. Hall. Holling. Speed. Herbert. Burnet. &c.

The laſt Act of Succeſſion.

Other Acts.

In another Act, 'The Stile of King of England, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, and of the Church of England and Ireland, in Earth the Supream Head, was united and annex'd for ever to the Imperial Crown of England. Another Act was paſs'd, qualifying the Severities of the Act of The Six Articles; 'by which none were to be impriſon'd, but upon a legal Preſentment, except upon the King's Warrant; and none was to be challeng'd for Words, but within a Year, nor for a Sermon, but within forty Days. All this was to prevent ſuch Conſpiracies as had been diſcover'd the former Year. Another Act renew'd the Authority given to thirty two to reform the Eccleſiaſtical Law, which Cranmer much promoted; and to effect it, drew out of the Canon Law a Collection of many things inconſiſtent with the preſent Eſtabliſhment, to ſhow that ſuch a Book ought not to continue in Credit in England: But he could not bring this to a good Iſſue, during this Reign. By another Act all the King's Loans were diſcharg'd, and ſuch as had receiv'd Payment, requir'd to bring back the Mony into the Exchequer. This was cenſur'd as a direct Piece of Injuſtice; and it was thought ſtrange, that ſince the King had done this once before, he could have the Credit to raiſe more Mony, and be tempted to do it a ſecond Time. Laſtly, a general Pardon was granted, out of which, Hereſie was excepted; and ſo the Parliament was prorogu'd 'till the next Winter.

The King makes War both with France and Scotland.

The valiant King was now ingag'd in a War, both with France and Scotland; and to make his Treaſure more effectual, he embas'd the Coin in a very extraordinary Manner. The Earl of Hartford was ſent with an Army into Scotland, who landing a little above Leith, burnt both that Town and the Capital City Edinburgh; but did not ſtay to take the Caſtle of Edinburgh, or to fortifie Leith, but waſted all the Country between that and Berwick. He perform'd too much, if it was intended to gain the Hearts of that Nation; and too little, if it was deſign'd to ſubdue them: For this did only more highly inflame their Spirits, by which they were ſo implacably united againſt England, that the Earl of Lennox, who had been thrown off by France, and had join'd with the Engliſh Intereſt, could form no Party in his Country, but was conſtrain'd to fly into England for Preſervation. In the mean time Audley, the Chancellor, deceaſing, Wriotheſly, who was of the Romiſh Party, was put in his Place; and in his Room, Doctor Petre, a great Friend to Cranmer, was made Secretary of State; ſo equally did the King preſerve the Ballance between both Parties. And being ready to croſs the Seas, he left a Commiſſion for the publick Adminiſtration, during his Abſence, to the Queen, the Arch-Biſhop, the Chancellor, the Earl of Hartford, and Secretary Petre: And if there ſhould be Occaſion to raiſe any Forces, he appointed the Earl of Hartford his Lieutenant.

nant. He gave order alſo to tranſlate the Prayers, Proceſſions and Litanies, into the Engliſh Tongue, which gave the Reformers ſome new Hopes that he had not quite abandon'd of correcting of ſuch Abuſes, as had crept into the Worſhip of God.

He goes into France.

Affairs being thus ſetled at home, the gallant King having ſent his Forces before him, croſs'd the Seas with his uſual Pomp, the Sails of his Ship being of Cloath of Gold. He landed at Calais on the fourteenth of July; and the Emperor preſs'd his marching directly to Paris. But he judg'd it of more Importance to take Boloign; and after a two Months brave Siege, it was ſurrender'd to him; ſo that in a ſhort time, he is obſerv'd to have gain'd that, which neither his Father, nor the former Kings of England could ever win. After a triumphant Entrance into the Place, he found that the very next Day, the Emperor, to carry on his Deſigns in Germany, had unfairly concluded a Treaty with the French King, upon the nineteenth of September, which is ſet down at large by the Lord Herbert. On the thirtieth of that Month, the King return'd into England with freſh Laurels; and to prevent future Inſults, he caus'd Fortifications to be made at Graveſend, and Tilbury, and afterwards at Dover, Portſmouth, and many other Places. He alſo took an exact Account of his Ordnance; and he himſelf invented certain ſmall Pieces of Artillery, not unlike Drakes, for Defence of his Waggons, as alſo certain Forms of Bulwarks: For as he was a great Soldier, ſo he had a ſingular Capacity in apprehending all the new Inventions daily appearing; and as the Musket was firſt in uſe in this Reign, ſo in this Year the Piſtol came firſt in requeſt among the French Horſe.

He takes Boloign

A D. 1545. Reg. 36/37.

The following Year, the French King reſolving to recover Boloign, and to take Calais, and ſo expel the Engliſh out of France, intended firſt to make himſelf Maſter of the Sea. Accordingly he ſet out a great Fleet of a hundred and fifty larger Ships, and ſixty of a leſſer Sort, beſides many Gallies brought from the Streights. But after the French Fleet had view'd the Engliſh Coaſt, unſucceſsfully attempted to land, both in the Iſle of Wight and Suſſex, and had ingag'd in a Sea-Fight for ſome Hours, they return'd without any conſiderable Action: Nor did they perform any thing at Land. But King Henry's Fleet made a ſucceſsful Deſcent upon Normandy, and deſtroy'd the Country; ſo that this Year prov'd likewiſe glorious to the King. The Emperor had now effected what he had long deſign'd; and therefore being courted by both Crowns, he undertook a Mediation, that under Colour of that, he might the better keep up the War. The Princes of Germany ſaw what Miſchiefs were threaten'd them; and the famous Council of Trent was now open'd, and was condemning their Doctrine. A League was alſo concluded between the Pope and the Emperor, for procuring Obedience to their Canons and Decrees; and an Army was rais'd. The Emperor was alſo reviving ancient Conteſts with ſome of the Princes; and a firm Peace was concluded with the Turk. So that if the Crowns of England and France were not brought to an Agreement, they might be ruin'd; therefore they ſent Ambaſſadors to both Courts to mediate a Peace. With them Cranmer join'd his Endeavours, but he wanted a Cromwell in the Court to manage the Temper of the King; who was ſo exaſperated with the ill Treatment from France, that he would not come to any Agreement; nor would he reſtore Boloign, without which the French would hear of no Peace. Cranmer had now almoſt prevail'd with the King to make further Steps in a Reformation; but Gardiner, then Ambaſſador in the Emperor's Court, wrote to the King, that the Emperor would certainly join with France againſt him, if he made any further Innovation in Religion. This diverted the King from the Deſign; and in Auguſt this Year the only great Friend Cranmer had in the Court dy'd, Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, who for many Years continu'd in the Height of Favour; which was ever preſerv'd, not only by an Agreement of Diſpoſitions between the King and him, but by the conſtant Succeſs that attended his valiant ant Exploits. By his Death Cranmer was in a great Measure left alone, without Friend or Support.

The Parliament meets. In November following, a new Parliament was held, where towards the Expence of the King's Wars, the Spirituality gave him a Subsidy of six Shillings in the Pound, payable in two Years. The Temporalty also not only gave him a Subsidy for the War, but confirm'd all the Surrenders that had been made of Chantries, Chappels, Colleges, Hospitals, and other Foundations, for saying Masses for departed Souls; and they empower'd the King during his Life to grant Commissions for seizing on the rest of them. Yet the King found that this would probably give new Discontent to the Gentry, to whom these belong'd; so he made but a small Progress in it, and many were reserv'd to be devour'd by his Son's Courtiers. The King dismiss'd the Parliament with a long Speech, which was the last he ever spoke in that Place. The King's Speech. In it, 'After he had thank'd them 'for their Bills in his Favour, he earnestly exhorted them to Charity and Con-'cord in Matters of Religion; and to forbear all Terms of Reproach, such as 'Papist and Heretick: He complain'd much of the Obstinacy of some Church-'men, and of the Indiscretion of others, who both gave ill Examples, and sow'd 'the Seed of Discord among the Laity: He, as God's Vicar on Earth, thought 'himself oblig'd to see these Abuses reform'd. He also reprov'd the Temporal-'ty for the ill Use they made of the Scriptures; for instead of being taught by 'it to live better, and to be more Charitable to one another, they only rail'd 'at each other, and made Songs out of it, to disgrace those that differ'd from 'them; so he exhorted them to serve God, and to love one another, which 'he would esteem the best Expression of their Duty and Obedience to him. The King had appointed a Distribution of five hundred and fifty Pounds a Year in several Cathedrals, for the Poor, and about four hundred Pounds a Year for High-ways; so this Year some Bishops were appointed to see whether these Payments were made as he had order'd or not. The two Universities were now in great Danger of having their Colleges suppress'd by the late Act of Parliament; but upon their Applications to the King by Doctor Cox, Tutor to Prince Edward, they were deliver'd from their Fears.

A. D. 1546. Reg. 37/38. We are now enter'd upon the last Year of this King's Reign; in which the War with France was manag'd with doubtful Success; yet the Losses were greater on the English Side. And the Forces being commanded by the Earl of Surry, who was brave but unsuccessful, he was not only blam'd, but recall'd, and the Earl of Hartford sent to command in his Room. But Surry being of an aspiring Spirit, and disdaining to see the Earl of Hartford axalted above him, dropt some Words of a high Resentment, and violent Contempt, which not long after caus'd his Ruin. The King was now single in the War, which was very chargable to him; and observing the Progress that the Council of Trent was making, where Cardinal Pool was one of the Legates, he had reason to expect some severe Decree to be made against him, since none was so much hated by the Court of Rome as himself: Therefore he harkned to Counsels of Peace. And tho' he was not old, yet he was extreamly corpulent, and felt such Decays in his Strength, as he judg'd he could not live long: Therefore that he might not leave his young Son involv'd in so great a War, a firm Peace was concluded in June, which was manag'd much to the King's Honour and Wisdom, tho' the taking and keeping of Boloign for eight Years, according to Articles, cost him above a million and three hunded thousand Pounds. The Peace was proclaim'd in London with a general Procession; and all the richest Silver Crosses out of the Parish Churches were carry'd, and the finest Copes worn, for the greater Solemnity; which was the last time that they were publickly us'd. The two Kings had new Projects for Reformation on foot, and the Animosities which the former War had rais'd between them, were converted into a firm Friendship; which became so strong in King Francis, that he never was seen to rejoice at any Thing, after he heard of King Henry's Death.

A Peace with France.

In

In this Year dy'd the famous Martin Luther, in the ſeventy third Year of his Age. Luther's Death.

There was at this Time a new Proſecution of thoſe that deny'd the Corporal Preſence in the Euchariſt; and Shaxton was accus'd of ſome Words about it, but he abjur'd and comply'd ſo entirely, that ſoon after he preach'd a Sermon at the Execution of Anne Aiſcough, a Gentlewoman who was firſt barbarouſly rack'd, and then burnt at Smithfield, with two others. In this Year there were alſo two burnt in Suffolk, and one in Norfolk, on the ſame Account. But the chief of the Romiſh Party were not ſatisfy'd with theſe ſmaller Sacrifices; therefore they perſuaded the King that Cranmer was the Source of all the Hereſie in England, but becauſe of his great Favour to him none durſt appear againſt him: So they deſir'd that he might be once put in the Tower, and then it would appear how many would inform againſt him. The King ſeem'd to conſent to this, and they reſolv'd to execute it the next Day; but in the Night the King ſent for the Arch-Biſhop, and generouſly told him the whole Deſign. He thank'd the King for not ſuffering him to be ſurpriz'd, and ſubmitted to it; only he deſir'd he might be heard to anſwer for himſelf before indifferent Judges who underſtood theſe Matters. The King was amaz'd to ſee him ſo little apprehenſive of his Ruin, and kindly told him, He muſt take Care of him, ſince he took ſo little Care of himſelf. He therefore gave him Inſtructions to appear before the Council, and to deſire to ſee his Accuſers before he was ſent to the Tower; and that he might be us'd by them, as they would deſire to be us'd in the like Caſe: And if he could not prevail by the Force of Reaſon, then he was to appeal to the King in Perſon, and was to ſhew the King's Seal-Ring, which he took from his Finger and gave him; which was ſo well known to them all, that they ſoon ſtopp'd when they once ſaw that. According to his Expectation, being ſummon'd before the Council next Morning, he came over to White-Hall, where he was unhandſomly detain'd in the Lobby, before he was call'd in. When he appear'd, and had obſerv'd the Method the King had order'd him to uſe, and had at laſt ſhown the Ring, they all roſe in great Confuſion, and went to the King, who had deſignedly abſented himſelf that Day. He ſeverely repremanded them, and expreſs'd his Eſteem and Kindneſs for the Arch-Biſhop in ſuch Terms, that his Enemies were glad to retreat, by pretending they only deſign'd to clear his Innocence in a publick Trial; and were now ſo convinc'd of the King's unalterable Favour to him, that they never made any more Attempts upon him. Cranmer in Danger.

But what they durſt not attempt in Relation to the Arch-Biſhop, they thought they might more ſafely experience againſt the Queen, who was known to love the Reformation, and to have Sermons in a Privy-Chamber; which could not be ſo ſecretly carry'd, but that it came to the King's Knowledge. Yet her Conduct in all other Reſpects was ſo exact, and ſhe expreſs'd ſuch a tender Care of the King's Perſon, as ſhe gain'd much upon his Affections; but his Peeviſhneſs being increas'd by his Diſtempers, made him often uneaſie, and ſometimes to her. They frequently diſcours'd of Points of Religion, and often concerning the Reformers; and once in Defence of them ſhe provok'd the King's Humour ſo far, that before he was cool, he expreſs'd his Diſpleaſure to Biſhop Gardiner; who greedily ſeiz'd on this Opportunity to perſuade the King, That ſhe was a great Cheriſher of Hereticks. Chancellor Wriotheſly join'd with him in the ſame Artifice, and fill'd the angry King's Head with many Conjectures and Surmiſes; inſomuch that he ſign'd the Articles upon which ſhe was to be impeach'd. But the Chancellor careleſly dropping the Paper, it was accidently taken up by one of the Queen's Friends, who carry'd it to her. Upon which ſhe repair'd to the King, and ingeniouſly brought in a Diſcourſe about Religion; and after a little Oppoſition, ſhe artificially yielded, and ſeem'd convinc'd by the King's Arguments, and told him, That ſhe only argu'd with him by way of Inſtruction; ſometimes to ingage him in Diſcourſe, and to divert his Pains; and this ſhe Deſigns againſt the Queen.

ſeconded with ſuch nice Flattery, that he was perfectly ſatisfy'd, and reconcil'd to her. The following Day, as they were walking in the Garden, the Chancellor came thither with a Deſign to have carry'd her to the Tower; but the King ſtepping aſide, chid him ſeverely for his Attempt, and was heard to call him Knave and Fool. The good natur'd Queen innocently interpos'd to mitigate his Diſpleaſure; but the King handſomly told her, She of all others had leaſt Reaſon to plead for him. Thus the Deſign vaniſh'd, and Gardiner, who promoted it, intirely loſt the King's Favour.

The Fall of the Duke of Norfolk and his Son the Earl of Surry.

But the chief of the Party, the Duke of Norfolk, and his Son the Earl of Surry, fell under deeper Misfortunes. The Father had many Years been Treaſurer, and had ſerv'd the King with great Fidelity and Reputation: His Son was a Man of rare Qualities, great Wit, and more than ordinary Learning; but particularly hated the Earl of Hartford, and deſpis'd an Alliance with him, which his Father had projected; which was to unite his Family to the Seymours, by marrying his Son to the Earl of Hartford's Daughter, and his Daughter the Dutcheſs of Richmond, to Hartford's Brother, Sir Thomas Seymour. But both his Children refus'd to comply in this Matter: The Seymours were apprehenſive upon the King's Death, of the Oppoſition they might meet with from the Earl of Surry, who was of a high Spirit, had a vaſt Fortune, and was the Head of the Romiſh Party; and it was likewiſe ſuſpected, that he kept himſelf unmarry'd in Hopes of gaining the Princeſs Mary. The Duke's Family was alſo fatally divided: His Dutcheſs had been ſeparated from him about four Years, and now turn'd Informer againſt him: His Daughter hated her Brother, and was a Spy upon him; and one Holland, a Jilting Miſtreſs of the Duke's, did alſo betray him, and diſcover'd all ſhe could; yet all amounted to no more than ſome Complaints of the Father, who thought his great Services too little regarded, and ſome indiſcreet Threatnings of the Son. It was alſo alledg'd, that the Father gave the Coat of Arms belonging to the Prince of Wales, and his Son gave the Arms of Edward the Confeſſor; but this ſeem'd rather a Pretence to create a Clamour among the People, and to cover the Want of more material Objections againſt them. One Southwell indeed alledg'd Matters of a higher Nature againſt the Earl of Surry; which he deny'd, and deſir'd a Trial by Combate, and to fight in their Shirts. But all Challenges avail'd nothing, for the Father and the Son were, upon Reaſons of State, mark'd out for Ruin, and both ſent Priſoners to the Tower.

A. D. 1547. Reg. 38.

The Earl of Surry beheaded.

The Earl of Surry being but a Commoner, was try'd by a Jury of nine Knights and three Eſquires; by whom he was found guilty of Treaſon, and had Sentence of Death paſs'd upon him, which was executed on the nineteenth of January at Tower-Hill. This was generally condemn'd as an Act of great Hardſhip and Severity, which loaded the Seymours with a popular Odium that they could never overcome. He was much pity'd, as a Man of great Parts and Courage, and other noble Qualifications; but yet was thought to have too much dipp'd his Hands in the Blood of Cromwell, and others of his Party. The Storm fell next upon the old Duke, who ſaw a Parliament call'd to deſtroy him by an Act of Attainder, ſince there was not Matter enough to ruin him by common Law: Therefore to prevent that, he made ſuch an humble Submiſſion to the King, as might have mollify'd the moſt obdurate Diſpoſition. He wrote to him, 'That he had ſpent his whole Life in his Service, without entertaining one 'Thought to his Prejudice; and that he had obey'd all his Laws, and was re-'ſolv'd to obey all that ever he ſhould make. He earneſtly begg'd that he might 'be hear'd with his Accuſers Face to Face; and that the King would take all 'his Lands, and Goods, and only reſtore him to his Favour, and grant him 'ſuch an Allowance for his Subſiſtance, as he thought fit. Becauſe this had no Effect, he proceeded further, and ſet his Hand to a Confeſſion of ſeveral Crimes; 'as Firſt, his revealing the Secrets of the King's Council; Secondly, his 'concealing his Son's Treaſon in giving the Arms of Edward the Confeſſor; 'and

The Duke of Norfolk's Submiſſion.

'and Thirdly his own giving the Arms of England, with the Labels of Silver 'belonging only to the Prince; which he acknowledg'd to be High-Treaſon, and 'therefore humbly begg'd the King's Mercy and Compaſſion. But all this had 'no Effect upon the King, who, as one expreſſes it, never hated or ruin'd 'any Body by halves.

When the Parliament met, the King was not able to come to Weſtminſter, but he ſent his Pleaſure to them by a Commiſſion. He declar'd his Intention was to have his Son Edward crown'd Prince of Wales; and therefore deſir'd they would make all poſſible Haſte in the Attainder of the Duke of Norfolk, that ſo the Places which he held by Patent might be diſpos'd of to others, who ſhould aſſiſt at the Coronation: Which, tho' it was a very ſlight Excuſe for ſo high a Piece of Injuſtice, yet had that Effect, that in ſeven Days both Houſes of Parliament paſs'd the Bill. On the twenty ſeventh of January, the Royal Aſſent was given by thoſe commiſſion'd by the King; and the Execution was poſitively order'd to be the next Morning. There was no ſpecial Matter in the Act, but that of the Coat of Arms, which he and his Anceſtors were wont to give, according to Records in the Herald's Office; ſo that this was condemn'd by all Perſons as a moſt inexcuſable Act of Tyranny. But the Death of the King that Night put a Stop to the Execution, which, tho' it was conceal'd three Days from the Nation, yet we are aſſur'd it was reveal'd by an extraordinary Viſion to the Duke that Morning, by which he narrowly and fortunately eſcap'd. Yet both Parties made their Inferrences from this Calamity that befel him. The Romaniſts ſaid it was God's juſt Vengeance upon him, for his too great Obſequiouſneſs to the King in many Particulars. But the Reformers ſaid, it was a juſt Return upon him, for what he had acted againſt Cromwell, and many others upon the Account of Opinions. The Arch-Biſhop would not concern himſelf in that Affair, but retir'd himſelf to Croydon; whereas Biſhop Gardiner, who had continually been his Friend, ſtill kept to the Court.

He is Attainted in Parliament.

He eſcapes narrowly.

The King was now overgrown with Corpulency and Fatneſs, and became ſo exceeding unwieldy, that he could not go up or down his Stairs, but as he made uſe of an Engine for that Purpoſe. He had an old Ulcer in his Leg, which became very uneaſie to him; and all the Humours of his Body ſinking down thither, he was much afflicted, and became exceeding froward and intractable, to which his late Severities may be in a great meaſure imputed. His Servants durſt ſcarcely ſpeak to him, to put him in mind of his approaching End, leſt they might be brought within the Statute that made it Treaſon to foretel the King's Death. His Will was made ready, and was ſign'd, or rather ſtamp'd, on the thirtieth Day of December. He had finiſh'd one at his laſt going over to France; and all the Change he made in this was, that he order'd Gardiner's Name to be ſtruck out, for in his former Will he was nam'd one of the Executors. When Sir Anthony Brown endeavour'd to perſuade him not to put that Diſgrace upon an old Servant, he continu'd poſitive in his Reſolution, and declar'd, That he knew Gardiner's Temper ſufficiently; and tho' he could govern him, none of them would be able to do it, if he were put into ſo high a Truſt. The moſt material Clauſe in this Will was, That in the Succeſſion of the Crown, he preferr'd the Children of his ſecond Siſter by Charles Brandon, to the Children of his eldeſt Siſter, the Queen of Scotland. On his Death-Bed he finiſh'd the Foundation of Trinity-College in Cambridge, one of the nobleſt in Europe; and likewiſe founded Chriſts-Church Hoſpital near Newgate; yet this laſt was not ſo fully ſetled as was needful, 'till his Son compleated what he had begun. On the twenty ſeventh of January his Spirits ſunk ſo low, that it was apparent he had not long to live; and when all declin'd touching upon ſo unwelcome a Subject, Sir Anthony Denny had the Honeſty and Courage to do it, deſiring him to prepare for Death, and to call upon God and Jeſus Chriſt for Mercy. Upon which the King expreſs'd his Sorrow for the Sins of his paſt Life; yet he ſaid, he truſted in the Mercies of Chriſt, which were greater than his Sins. Then Denny ask'd him if any Churchman ſhould be ſent for, and he anſwer'd, If any, it ſhould be Arch-Biſhop Cranmer. Upon which Cranmer was ſent for to Croydon; but before he arriv'd, the King was ſpeechleſs. Therefore Cranmer deſir'd him to give ſome Sign of his Dying in the Faith of Chriſt; upon which he tenderly ſqueez'd his Hand, and ſhortly after dy'd, upon the twenty eighth Day of January, and fifty ſixth Year of his Age; after a moſt active and wonderful Reign of thirty ſeven Years, nine Months, and five Days. His Funeral Obſequies were as pompous and magnificent as his Reign, as appears from Sandford and others; being bury'd at Windſor, where he had begun a noble Monument, and founded a College for thirteen poor Knights, and two Prieſts. Nor were theſe laſt Rites perform'd by his own Subjects only; but a ſolemn Obſequy was kept for him by King Francis, at the Cathedral of Paris, notwithſtanding his Excommunication, and all the Fulminations of the Court of Rome.

His Death and Obſequies.

His Character. To ſay ſomething of the Perſon and Qualifications of this wondrous Prince; his Hiſtory will be his trueſt Character and Deſcription, which contain'd an uncommon Variety, in all his Capacities; as a Man, a King, and a Chriſtian. He had all the Qualifications of Nature and Education, with no leſs Perfections of Body and Mind. His Perſon was extraordinary tall and majeſtick, of a mighty Strength and Activity; his Looks great and ſurprizing, and his whole Countenance beſpoke the Monarch. His Mind was ſtill more capacious than his Body, vigorous and vaſt, his Temper generous and fiery, his Spirit magnanimous and invincible, and his Judgment profound and penetrating; ſo that with all his Failings he was every way a proper Inſtrument to effect thoſe great Works deſign'd by Providence. As to Matters of State, never Prince proceeded upon truer Maxims for this Kingdom, which was to make himſelf Arbiter of Europe; in which, inſtead of being a bare Spectator, he was ſo much an Actor, that there was no Treaty or State Aſſembly in Chriſtendom, in which he had not his particular Agent and Intereſt; which was one of his extraordinary Ways of ſpending Mony. At home, it was his Manner to treat much with his Parliaments, where he ſometimes made uſe of rough Methods; yet none of his Predeceſſors underſtood the Temper of Parliaments better than himſelf, or more dexterouſly prevail'd upon ſuch a numerous Body. His Diſpoſition was certainly very aſpiring, and his Ambition very extenſive; which by Means of Flattery and ill Counſel, in the latter Part of his Reign produc'd Effects very formidable to his Subjects: So that he has been too juſtly charg'd with Cruelty, Rapaciouſneſs and Luſt; all which have been unmeaſurably aggravated by his Enemies, whoſe Numbers were very great. His Cruelties appear both from the Number and Manner of the Executions in his Reign, which were generally towards the latter End of it, at a Time when he had met with unſufferable Provocations and Oppoſitions, and when leſs Severities might probably have ruin'd him and all his Deſigns: And really it is extraordinary wonderful that ſuch Alterations in the Nation ſhould be made with ſo little Bloodſhed. His Rapaciouſneſs appears from his Sacrilegious ſwallowing ſuch vaſt Quantities of Church Revenues: To palliate which, beſides its being done by the Repreſentatives of the Nation, it has been alledg'd that the Religious Orders of the Kingdom would have aſſiſted thoſe who threaten'd Invaſion from abroad, and that he had no other Means but their Revenues left to defend himſelf. However he had laid noble Deſigns for Reparation, and tho' he accidentally fell ſhort of them, yet he actually founded ſix Biſhopricks, endow'd Deaneries, Prebends, and other Offices, in fourteen ſeveral Sees, and founded Chriſt-Church Hoſpital, Trinity College in Cambridge, Profeſſors in both Univerſities, and many Grammar Schools. As to his Luſts, they are as much aggravated as any other of his Vices; of which the Number of his Wives are but a weak Proof. Fornication in Princes is never to be excus'd by a Chriſtian Politician; yet this may be alledg'd for him, that he was not ſo exorbitant as many other Princes, Princes, and we find but one Miſtreſs that he kept, which was in his younger Years, when incourag'd by a Churchman, and indulgent Confeſſor. It is true, the general Steps he made were ſometimes bold and deſperate, yet with all his Crimes he was one of the moſt glorious Princes of his Time; and if his Crimes were ſtill greater, it would be no juſt Aſperſion upon the Reformation he effected; ſince Providence often brings about the nobleſt Deſigns by the moſt exceptionable Inſtruments, when the beſt Men have been deny'd that Honour. In ſhort as his Reign affords the greateſt Varieties, ſo in his Character there was a wonderful Mixture of Virtues and Vices; and the Hand of Heaven ſeem'd to lye heavy upon him and his Family; for notwithſtanding all his extraordinary Methods to obtain Poſterity, and his peculiar Eſtabliſhments of the Succeſſion, from ſix ſeveral Wives he was not able to produce one Grand-Child.

SECT. III.

The Reign of King EDWARD the Sixth.

Containing 6 Years, 5 Months, and 9 Days.

Holling. Speed. Stow. Hayward Heylin. Burnet. &c.

I. THE Imperial Crown of England, that had for thirty ſeven Years been worn by the moſt martial and vigorous Monarch of the Age, now devolv'd upon a Child of little more than nine Years of Age; but a Child of thoſe promiſing Virtues, and admirable Abilities, that might well beſpeak him a Man in Wiſdom and Underſtanding. This Prince had a moſt noble Education given him by his Father, who at ſix Years of Age put him under the Government of Doctor Cox and Mr. Cheek; the one his Preceptor for Philoſophy, Morality and Divinity, and the other for Languages and Mathematicks. He was alſo provided with Maſters for the French Tongue, and other Parts of Learning becoming a Prince, who was Heir to ſuch famous Dominions. He gave early Indications of a rare Diſpoſition to Knowledge, of a moſt wonderful Probity of Mind, and of the higheſt Veneration for Religion and Piety: So that once in his Childiſh Diverſions, ſomewhat being wanted which he and his Companions could not reach, one of them laid a great Bible on the Floor to ſtep on, which he beholding with Indignation, reverently took it up, and gave over his Play. He was ſo forward in Languages, that beſides his Proficiency in French, Italian and Spaniſh, at eight Years of Age he frequently wrote Latin Letters to the King, to the laſt Queen, the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and his Uncle the Earl of Hartford. In all things he was a Prince of extraordinary Hopes; but ſuch unuſual Beginnings ſeem'd rather to threaten the too early End of a Life, that was to produce ſuch aſtoniſhing Things. A. D. 1547. Reg. 1.

The great Abilities of Prince Edward.

His Father's Death was conceal'd from the Publick for three Days; during which time, his Uncle the Earl of Hartford, and Sir Anthony Brown, were ſent by the Council to Hartford where he reſided, to conduct him to the Tower of London. Having brought him to Enfield, with his Siſter the Princeſs Elizabeth, they told him that his Father was actually dead; which News was receiv'd with ſuch real Sorrow, that it was hard to know whether Tears did more obſcure or illuſtrate their Beauties. At the Tower, his Father's Executors, with the reſt of the Privy-Council, receiv'd him with a profound Reſpect due to their King; ſo tempering their Sorrows for their Maſter's Deceaſe with their Satisfaction for his Son's ſucceeding him, that by an Exceſs of Joy they might not ſeem too ſoon to have forgot the one, nor by Extremity of Grief to apprehend Ill from the other. The firſt Thing they did was the opening of King Henry's

He is receiv'd by the Lords of the Council.

Henry's Will, by which they found that he had nominated ſixteen Perſons to be his Executors, and Governors of his Son 'till he ſhould be eighteen Years of Age. Theſe were the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor Wriotheſly, the Lord St. John great Maſter, the Lord Ruſſel Privy-Seal, the Earl of Hartford Lord Great-Chamberlain, Viſcount Liſle Lord Admiral, Tonſtall Biſhop of Durham, Sir Anthony Brown Maſter of the Horſe, Sir William Paget Secretary of State, Sir Edward North Chancellor of the Augmentations, Lord Chief Juſtice Montague, Judge Bromley, Sir Anthony Denny, and Sir William Herbert chief Gentlemen of the Privy-Chamber, Sir Edward Wotton Treaſurer of Calais, and Doctor Wotton Dean of Canterbury and York. By the Conſent of theſe Sixteen, the King and his Siſters were to be diſpos'd in Marriage; but with this Difference, that it was only order'd that the King ſhould marry by their Advice; but the Siſters were ſo limited in their Marriages, that they were to forfeit their Right of Succeſſion if they marry'd without their Conſents; it being of greater Importance to the Good of the Nation, who ſhould be their Husbands, if they come to the Crown, than who ſhould be the King's Wife: And King Henry was empower'd by Act of Parliament to leave the Crown to them with what Limitations he ſhould think fit to appoint. Beſides theſe Sixteen there was a Privy-Council nominated to be their Aſſiſtants in the Government; and if any of the Sixteen dy'd, the Survivers were to continue in the Adminiſtration, without a Power of ſubſtituting others in the Rooms of the Deceas'd. He alſo charg'd them to pay all his Debts, the Legacies he left, to perfect all the Grants he had begun, and to make good every thing he had promis'd. It was now propos'd that one ſhould be choſen out of the Sixteen, to whom Ambaſſadors ſhould addreſs themſelves, and who ſhould have the chief Direction of Affairs; but ſhould be reſtrain'd from acting without the Conſent of the major Part of the reſt. The Chancellor, who thought the Precedence in ſecular Affairs fell to him by his Office, oppos'd this much, and ſaid it was changing the King's Will, who had made them equal in Power and Dignity; and if any were rais'd above the reſt in Title, it would be impoſſible to keep him within juſt Bounds, ſince great Titles made way for exorbitant Power. But the Earl of Hartford had ſo prepar'd his Friends, that it was voted that he ſhould be declar'd The Governor of the King's Perſon, and the Protector of the Kingdom; with this Reſtriction, that he ſhould not act without the Advice and Conſent of the reſt. Upon this Advancement, and the Oppoſition made againſt it, two ſeveral Parties were form'd, the one headed by the new Protector, and the other by the Chancellor: The Favourers of the Reformation were for the Former, and the Oppoſers of it were for the Latter.

King Henry's Teſtament.

A Protector choſen.

After this the Chancellor was order'd to renew the Commiſſions of the Judges and Juſtices of Peace; and King Henry's Great Seal was to be us'd, 'till a new one ſhould be made. Then all the Executors took their Oaths to execute their Truſt faithfully; and the Privy-Counſellors were brought into the King's Preſence, who all expreſs'd their Satisfaction in the Choice of the new Protector; and it was order'd that all Diſpatches to Foreign Princes ſhould be ſign'd only by him. All that held Offices were requir'd to come and renew their Comiſſions, and to ſwear Allegiance to the King; and even the Biſhops themſelves took out ſuch Commiſſions as were granted in the former Reign; only by thoſe they were ſubaltern to the King's Vicegerent, but none being now in that Office, they were immediately under the King: And by them they were to hold their Biſhopricks only during the King's Pleaſure, and were impower'd in the King's Name, as his Delegates, to perform all the Parts of the Epiſcopal Function. The ill Conſequences of this unjuſtifiable Method being ſoon foreſeen, the Biſhops afterwards promoted, were not put under ſuch unreaſonable Obligations, but were appointed to hold their Biſhopricks during Life. After a Diſpatch of ſome Buſineſs relating to Scotland, the Protector knighted the young young King, being authoriz'd to do it by Letters Patents; and the King at the ſame time knighted Sir John Hubleſthorn, the Lord Mayor of London. An Account of ſome Diſturbances being now preſented to the Council, concerning the pulling down ſome Images in Churches, Orders were ſent to the Juſtices of the Peace, to take Care of the Peace and Government of the Nation, to meet frequently, and every ſix Weeks to advertiſe the Protector of the State of the Country where they reſided.

On the thirteenth Day of February, the Obſequies of the late King were ſolemniz'd with the utmoſt Degree of Pomp and Magnificence. Shortly after follow'd the Diverſions of the Coronation; before which, according to the late King's Intentions, the Protector was made Duke of Somerſet, the Earl of Eſſex Marqueſs of Northampton, the Lords Liſle and Wriotheſly Earls of Warwick and Southampton; Seymour, Rich, Willoughby and Sheffield were made Barons. In order to the King's Coronotion, the Office of that Ceremony was now review'd, and much ſhorten'd: One remarkable Alteration was, that formerly the King was always preſented to the People at the Corners of the Scaffold, and they were ask'd, If they would have him to be their King? Which look'd more like a Rite of an Election, than a Ceremony of Inveſting one who was already King. This was now chang'd, and the People were deſir'd only to give their Aſſents and good Will to his Coronation, as they were bound by their Duty of Allegiance. On the nineteenth Day of February, the King rode in great State and Splendor from the Tower, to the Palace of Weſtminſter; and the following Day he was crown'd by the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, according to the Form preſcrib'd. We are aſſur'd that when three Swords were deliver'd to him as King of England, France and Ireland, he ſaid, He wanted another Sword yet, the Holy Bible, the Sword of the Spirit, without which they could all do nothing. At this Time a general Pardon was proclaim'd to all Offenders, ſix only excepted, namely the Duke of Norfolk, Cardinal Pool, Edward Courtney, Mr. Forteſcue, Mr. Throgmorton, and Doctor Pates Biſhop of Worceſter, who was fled to Rome, to avoid the Oath of Supremacy; all which ſix continu'd unpardon'd, 'till the firſt of Queen Mary's Reign, and then were reſtor'd.

King Edward's Coronation.

Burnet. The Lord Chancellor, who was eſteem'd the Head of the Romiſh Party, now gave an Advantage againſt himſelf, which ſoon occaſion'd his Diſgrace. He granted a Commiſſion to the Maſter of the Rolls and three Maſters of Chancery, to execute his Office in the Court of Chancery, as if he were preſent; only the Decrees were to be brought to him to be ſign'd, before they ſhould be Inroll'd. This being perform'd without any Authority from the Protector, and the other Executors, was thought a high Act of Preſumption, ſince by this he devolv'd that Truſt on others which was depoſited in his own Hands. Several Lawyers complain'd of this Practice to the Protector, being apprehenſive of ſome dangerous Innovations in that high Court. The Judges being deſir'd to give their Opinions, made Report, That what the Chancellor had acted, was againſt Law, that he had forfeited his Place, and was liable to Impriſonment during the King's Pleaſure. But he carry'd it with a high Hand, and with Threats both to the Judges and Lawyers; and when it was urg'd, That he had forfeited his Place, he alledg'd He had it from the late King, who had likewiſe nominated him one of the Executors during his Son's Minority: To which it was anſwer'd, That the Major Part had Power over any of the reſt, otherwiſe one of them might rebel, and pretend the reſt could not bring him to Puniſhment. Being driven from this Hold, he became more humble, and acknowledg'd he had no Warrant for granting the Commiſſion, but thought he might lawfully do it by his Office: He ask'd Pardon for his Offence, and begg'd that he might loſe his Place with as little Diſgrace as was poſſible; upon which it was reſolv'd the Seal ſhould be taken from him, and a Fine laid upon him as ſhould be thought proper. He was per-permitted to go home with the Seal; but the Lord Seymour and ſome others were ſent to demand it of him. He was alſo confin'd to his Houſe, and kept under the Terror of an arbitrary Fine; but upon giving a Bond of four thouſand Pounds to be paid upon Demand, he was freed from his Confinement. Yet he was not remov'd from the Truſt of the King and Government; for probably the Council look'd upon that to be out of their Power. The Protector, the better to ſecure himſelf, took out a Patent for his Office under the Great Seal, 'by which he was confirm'd in his Authority, 'till the King ſhould 'be eighteen Years of Age; he was alſo authoriz'd to bring in new Counſel-'lors, beſides thoſe enumerated in the Patent, who were both the Executors 'and Counſellors nominated by the late King: The Protector, with ſo many 'of the Council as he thought fit, were empower'd to adminiſter the Affairs of 'the Kingdom; but the Council was limited not to act any thing without his 'Advice and Conſent. And thus was he as fully eſtabliſh'd in his extraordinary Authority as Law could do it: He had a Negative on the Council, but they had none on him; and he could either bring his own Creatures into it, or ſelect a Cabinet-Council out of it, at Pleaſure: And the other Executors having by this Patent deliver'd up their Authority to him, were only Privy-Counſellors as the reſt, without retaining any Authority peculiar to themſelves, as was particularly provided by King Henry's Will.

The Protector's Patent.

The Emperor's Deſigns in Germany.

The firſt foreign Affair that requir'd great Conſideration, was the German War, then begun between the Emperor and the Princes of the Smalcaldick League; by which the Emperor, if ſucceſsful, was in a probable Way, both to extirpate Lutheraniſm, and to make himſelf abſolute Maſter of Germany. But he politickly diſguis'd his great Deſign to other Princes: To the Pope he pretended it was only to extirpate Hereſie; to other Princes, that it was only to ſuppreſs ſome Rebels, and deny'd all Intentions of ſuppreſſing their new Doctrines; all which he manag'd ſo artificially, that he divided Germany it ſelf, and gain'd ſome Lutheran Princes to declare for him, and others to be Neutrals: And having, by granting an Edict for Liberty of Religion, obtain'd a liberal Supply for his Wars with France and the Turk, he made Peace with both thoſe Princes, and reſolv'd to imploy the Mony the Germans had given him, againſt themſelves. That he might deprive them of their chief Allies, he us'd all Means to ingage King Henry and Francis in a War; but that was compos'd chiefly by their Interpoſition: And now when the War was to be purſu'd with great Vigour, they loſt both thoſe Princes; for as Henry dy'd in January, ſo Francis dy'd the March following. Many of their Confederates began to capitulate and fall off; and the divided Command of the Duke of Saxony and Prince of Heſſe, loſt them great Advantages the former Year, in which they might have eaſily driven the Emperor out of Germany. The Pope deſir'd to ingage the Emperor in a War with Germany, that Italy might be unmoleſted; in order to which, and the imbroiling the Emperor with the Lutherans, he publiſh'd his Treaty with him, to ſhew the World that the Deſign of the War was to extirpate Hereſie, tho' the Emperor was making great Proteſtations to the contrary in Germany. He alſo open'd the Council of Trent, which tho' formerly deſir'd by the Emperor, was now unſeaſonable to his Affairs: For the Proteſtants all declar'd, That they could not eſteem it as a free General Council, ſince it was ſo intirely at the Pope's Devotion: Nor could the Emperor prevail with the Council to relax their Proceedings againſt Hereſie; but the more he obſtructed it by his Delays, the more vigorouſly the Pope drove it on, to open the Eyes of the Germans, and engage them more unanimouſly againſt the Emperor, who now gave them ſuch ſecret Aſſurances of tolerating the Ausburg Confeſſion, that the Marqueſs of Brandenburg declar'd for him; and this, join'd with the Hopes of an Electorate, drew in Maurice of Saxony. The Count Palatine was old and feeble, the Arch-Biſhop of Cologn would make no Reſiſtance, but retir'd, and many Cities ſubmitted; and and Maurice by falling into Saxony, forc'd the Elector to ſeparate from the Prince of Heſſe, and return to the Defence of his own Dominions. This was the general State of the Affairs in Germany: So that it was a difficult Point to determine, what Anſwer the Protector ſhould give to the Duke of Saxony's Chancellor, whom he ſent over to beg an Aid in Mony, for carrying on the War. It was certainly of great Importance to the Safety of England to preſerve the German Princes; and yet it was very dangerous to begin a War of ſuch Conſequence under an Infant King. However at preſent they promis'd within three Months to ſend the Duke fifty thouſand Crowns by certain Merchants to Hamburgh; but reſolv'd to do no more 'till new Emergencies ſhould lead them to new Counſels.

The German Princes ſue to England.

The Nation was now in an ill Condition for a War with ſuch a mighty Prince, the Government in ſeveral Things disjointed, labouring under great Diſtractions at home; the People generally cry'd out for a Reformation, they deſpis'd the Romiſh Clergy, and lov'd the new Preachers. The Prieſts were for the moſt part very ignorant and ſcandalous in their Lives and Converſations; and were many of them degraded Monks crept into ſmall Benefices. Theſe were zealouſly engag'd againſt all Changes, and were encourag'd in their Oppoſition, by the Protection they expected from Gardiner, Bonner and Tonſtall, who were Men of great Reputation, and in high Stations: And above all the Princeſs Mary did openly declare againſt all Changes, 'till the King ſhould be of Age. But on the other Hand the diligent Cranmer, who poſſibly had been too obſequious to King Henry, being now at Liberty, reſolv'd to proceed more vigorouſly: The Protector was firmly united to him, as alſo the young King's Tutors; and he himſelf was as much ingag'd as could be expected from ſo young a Perſon; for both his Knowledge and Zeal were far above his Years. Doctor Ridley, now made Biſhop of Rocheſter, and Doctor Latimer by his popular Sermons, were both very ſerviceable in this Affair. Moſt of the Privy-Council were conſenting towards a further Reformation; and according to the Power inveſted in them, it was reſolv'd to begin with a general Viſitation of all England, which was divided into ſix Precincts; and two Gentlemen, a Civilian, a Divine, and a Regiſter, were appointed for each. But before they were ſent out, Letters were written to all Biſhops, giving them Notice of it, and ſuſpending their Juriſdiction, while the Commiſſion laſted. The greateſt Difficulty that the Reformers found, was in the Want of able and prudent Men; and thoſe that were moſt eminent were to be imploy'd in London and the Univerſities. Therefore the only Thing by which the People could be univerſally inſtructed, was a Book of Homilies; ſo the twelve firſt Homilies in the Book, ſtill known by that Name, were compil'd to be us'd by every Miniſter. Orders were alſo given, that a Bible ſhould be kept in every Church, which tho' it was commanded by King Henry, yet had not been generally obey'd; and for underſtanding the New Teſtament, the Paraphraſe of Eraſmus was publiſh'd in Engliſh, and appointed to be ſet up in every Church. They alſo renew'd the Injunctions made by Cromwell in the late Reign, which after his Fall had been neglected, as thoſe for inſtructing the People, for removing of Images, and aboliſhing all Cuſtoms abus'd to Superſtition; for reading the Scriptures in Engliſh, for frequenting Sermons and Catechiſing, for the exemplary Lives of the Clergy, and the other Parts of their Functions.

Diviſions in England.

A Viſitation of all Churches.

Whilſt theſe and many other Things were tranſacting towards a Reformation, a War with Scotland was under a cloſe Conſultation: But the Protector being apprehenſive that France would engage in the Conteſt, ſent an Embaſſie to congratulate the new King Henry the Second, to deſire a Confirmation of the laſt Peace, and to complain of the Scots, who had broken their Faith with King Edward on the Point of the Marriage of their Queen. The French King refus'd to confirm the Treaty, 'till ſome Articles were firſt explain'd, and diſown'd what had been done by his Father's Agent Poligny; and for the Scots,

The War with Scotland.

he declar'd he could not abandon them, if they were in Diſtreſs. The Engliſh alledg'd that Scotland was ſubject to England, but the French had no Regard to that, and would not ſo much as look on the Records that were offer'd to prove the Subjection; declaring, That they would eſteem the Cauſe as they found it, and not look back to a Diſpute of two or three hundred Years old. This caus'd the Engliſh Council to be more cautious in beginning one War, which in all Probability would bring another upon them from France. The Caſtle of St. Andrews was ſurrender'd, and all the Penſioners in Scotland were not able to do them much Service: The Scots were now much elevated; for as England was under the Government of a Child, ſo the Court of France was govern'd by the Scotch Queen Dowager's Brothers. The Scots began to make Inroads upon England, and Deſcents into Ireland; Commiſſioners were ſent to the Borders to treat on both Sides; and the Protector rais'd a powerful Army, which he bravely reſolv'd to command in Perſon. But the Meetings on the Borders were ſoon ended; for the Scots had no Inſtructions to treat concerning the Marriage, and the Engliſh were order'd to treat of nothing elſe, 'till that ſhould be firſt concluded. As to the Records that were ſhown to prove the Homages of the Scotch Kings to the Engliſh, they had no great Effect; for the Scots either ſaid they were forc'd or extorted from ſome weak Princes, or were only Homages for their Lands in England, as the Kings of England did Homage to the Crown of France, for their Lands in that Country. They alſo ſhew'd their Records, by which their Anceſtors had aſſerted themſelves free and independent of England.

All Hopes of Peace vaniſhing, on the twenty firſt Day of Auguſt the Protector took out a Commiſſion to be General, and to make War in Scotland; in order to which he left Commiſſions of Lieutenancy to his Brother and other Noblemen, and during his Abſence devolv'd his own Power on the Privy-Council.

The Protector enters that Kingdom with an Army.

He came upon the Borders by the End of Auguſt, and enter'd the Scotch Ground the ſecond of September; where he found the Paſſes abandon'd, and ſmall Forts that were in his March were ſurrender'd upon Summons. On the ninth, he arriv'd at Falſide, where there was a long Struggle in ſeveral Parties, in which thirteen hundred of the Scots were ſlain. And now they were in Sight of the Scotch Army, which for Numbers of regular Men was one of the greateſt they had ever brought together, conſiſting of thirty thouſand Men, with a fair Train of Artillery both of Braſs and Iron Guns. On the other Side, the Engliſh Army conſiſted of about fifteen thouſand Foot, and three thouſand Horſe, but all excellently well appointed. The Scots were now inflam'd with the old National Quarrel to England; it was rumour'd that the Protector was come to carry away the Queen, and enſlave the Kingdom; and for their Incouragement, it was ſaid, that the French were coming with a great Fleet to their Aſſiſtance. The Protector ſent a Meſſage to the Scots, 'Inviting them by 'all the moſt inſinuating Arguments, to conſent to the Marriage; and if that 'would not be granted, he deſier'd Ingagements from them, that their Queen 'ſhould be contracted to no other Perſon, at leaſt 'till ſhe came of Age, and 'by the Advice of the Eſtates, ſhould chuſe a Husband for her ſelf. All this the Protector offer'd, that he might be diſingag'd from this unſeaſonable War upon honourable Terms; but the Scotch Lords thought this great Condeſcenſion the Effect of Fear, and believ'd the Protector was ſtraiten'd for Want of Proviſions; ſo inſtead of publiſhing this Offer, they reſolv'd to fall upon him the next Day: And all the Return that was made, was, that if the Protector would march back without any Act of Hoſtility, he ſhould not be moleſted; which the Protector rejected, as knowing that ſo mean an Action at this nice Conjuncture would ruin his Reputation. At the ſame Time a Perſon went officiouſly with the Trumpeter, and challeng'd the Protector in the Earl of Huntley's Name, to decide the Conteſt in their private Valour; but the Protector anſwer'd, He was oblig'd to fight no Way but at the Head of his Army; yet the Earl of Warwick accepted the Challenge, but it appear'd that Huntley had given no Commiſſion for it.

On

On the tenth of September the two Armies drew out, and ingag'd in the Field of Pinkey near Muſſelburgh; in the beginning of which Action, a Cannon Ball from the Ships cut off a whole Lane of Men, and ſo diſorder'd the Highlanders, that their Commanders could not make them keep their Ranks. The Earl of Angus made a brave Charge, but ſtill was repuls'd; and the Engliſh upon this broke in with ſuch a dreadful Fury upon the Scots, that they threw down their Arms and fled. About fourteen thouſand were kill'd, and fifteen hundred taken Priſoners, among whom was the Earl of Huntley, and five hundred Gentlemen; and all the Artillery was taken. This Loſs quite diſhearten'd the Scots, ſo that they all fled to Striveling, and left the whole Country to the Mercy of the Protector; who the next Day went and took Leith, and the Soldiers in the Ships burnt ſome of the Sea-Towns of Fife, and recover'd ſome Engliſh Ships that had been taken from the Scots. The Protector ſent ſome Ships to the Mouth of the Tay, and took the Caſtle of Broughty, that commanded that River, and likewiſe waſted Edinburgh it ſelf, with other Places. If he had follow'd this remarkable Blow, and march'd directly to Striveling, where the Governor of Scotland and the young Queen were retir'd, it is probable that under that great Conſternation he might have taken the Place, and put an End to the War. But the Party his Brother was making at Court, gave him ſuch an inward Alarm, that he drew off before he had finiſh'd his Work; and the Scots making Overtures for a Treaty, which was only to gain Time, he order'd them to ſend their Commiſſioners to Berwick, and ſo march'd back. The ambitious Earl of Warwick, who had a large Share in the Honour of the Victory, but knew that the Errors in Conduct would much diminiſh the Protector's Glory, which otherwiſe might have been too exorbitant, was not diſpleas'd at it. Yet ſtill he wanted not new Opportunities of Triumphing; for in his Return he took all the Caſtles in the Counties of Merch and Teviotdale, and caus'd all the Gentry to ſwear to be true to King Edward, and to promote the Marriage. After twenty five Days Continuance in Scotland, the Protector return'd into England, cover'd with Glories, having in the whole Expedition loſt but ſixty Men, taken eighty Pieces of Cannon, bridled the two chief Rivers of the Kingdom by Garriſons, and gain'd ſeveral ſtrong Places. And now it may eaſily be imagin'd how much this rais'd his Reputation in England, eſpecially ſince he had done ſuch great Services in France, ſo that all had great Expectations under his Government. And if the Breach between his Brother and him had not loſt him the preſent Advantages, this Action had laid a Foundation of prodigious Fortunes to him.

The Protector returns to England.

The Scots ſent no Commiſſioners to Berwick, but inſtead of that, they ſent ſome to France, to offer their Queen to the Dauphine, and to throw themſelves on the Protection of that Crown; and ſo the Earl of Warwick, whom the Protector left to treat with them, return'd back, with no ſmall Share in the other's Glory. This remarkable Man was Son to that Dudley who was attainted and executed in the firſt Year of the late Reign, and was one of extraordinary Abilities, had not inſatiable Ambition and profound Diſſimulation ſtain'd his other noble Qualities. By means of the Scots the Wars were continu'd, and manag'd the following Year by the Lord Gray of Wilton with various Succeſs. The Earl of Shrewsbury was alſo ſent with fifteen thouſand Men; againſt him, for the Aſſiſtance of the Scots, was ſent the Rhinegrave with ten thouſand French; who entering into a Conſultation how to remove the young Queen beyond the Engliſh Power, provided a Fleet, and ſailing round the North of Scotland, notwithſtanding the Engliſh Fleet lay in readineſs to ſtop their Paſſage, yet ſhe was convey'd ſafely into France, being about ſix Years of Age; and was long afterwards marry'd to the Dauphine of France.

A. D. 1547. Reg. 1.

II. The Protector having obtain'd ſuch ſignal Advantages, proceeded in the Buſineſs of the Reformation, and to ſummon a new Parliament. As to the former, great Inferences were made from one Particular, that on the ſame Day in which the Images were burnt in London, the Engliſh Army obtain'd a ſignal Victory in Scotland, which was the ſame Day of the Victory of Floddon Field, thirty four Years before. All ſubmitted to the new Viſiters, only the two Biſhops Bonner and Gardiner, for refuſing the Injunctions, were both impriſon'd. Upon the fourth of November the Parliament was open'd; the Day before which the Protector gave too publick an Inſtance how he was elevated by his Proſperity: For by a Patent he was authoriz'd to ſit under the Cloath of State, on the right Hand of the Throne; and to have all the Honours and Privileges that any Uncle of the Crown ever had, with a Non-obſtante to the Statute of Precedence. The Lord Rich was made Lord Chancellor; and the firſt Act that paſs'd was 'A Repeal of all Statutes that had made any thing Trea-'ſon or Felony in the late Reign, which was not ſo before; particularly of 'the Six Articles, and the Authority given to the King's Proclamations, as 'alſo of the Acts againſt Lollards. All who deny'd the King's Supremacy, or 'aſſerted the Pope's, the firſt Offence was forfeiture of Goods, the ſecond a 'Premunire, and the third Treaſon: But if any intended to deprive the King 'of his Eſtate or Title, that was made direct Treaſon. It alſo repeal'd the 'Power the King had of annulling all Laws made, 'till he was twenty four 'Years of Age, and reſtrain'd it only to the annulling them for the time to 'come; but that it ſhould not be of force for the declaring them null from the 'Beginning. In paſſing of this Act five Biſhops diſſented; and another Act paſs'd with the ſame Diſſent, 'For the Communion in both Kinds, and 'that the People ſhould always Communicate with the Prieſt; and by it Irre-'verence to the Sacrament was condemn'd under ſevere Penalties. Another Act paſs'd without any Diſſent, 'That the Conge d'elire, and the Election 'purſuant to it, ſhould ceaſe for the future, and that Biſhops ſhould be nam'd 'by the King's Letters Patents, and thereupon conſecrated; and ſhould all hold 'their Courts in the King's Name, excepting the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury; 'and were to uſe the King's Seal in all their Writings, excepting Preſentati-'ons, Collations, and Letters of Orders, in which they might uſe their own. After an Act againſt idle Vagabonds, came the Act for giving the King all the Chantries, which the late King had not ſeiz'd by virtue of the Grant made to him of them. Cranmer, with ſeven other Biſhops diſſented, but could not prevent the Act from paſſing at laſt. Laſt of all came the King's general Pardon, with the common Exceptions, among which the Duke of Norfolk was named. And thus ended this Seſſion; when the Protector, being eſtabliſh'd in his Power without Contradiction, took out a new Commiſſion, in which beſides his former Authority, he was empower'd to ſubſtitute one in his Room, during his Abſence.

The Affairs of Germany.

During theſe Tranſactions at home, the poor German Princes, who rely'd upon the Aſſiſtance of England, were ruin'd by the Emperor: The Duke of Saxony was defeated and taken Priſoner; the Prince of Heſſe was perſuaded to ſubmit, and by an Artifice detain'd Priſoner; upon which all the Princes and Towns of the Smalcaldick League ſubmitted, and purchas'd their Pardon, at what Terms the Conqueror was pleas'd to impoſe. Now all Germany, except Magdebury and Breme, was at the Emperor's Mercy; ſome Cathedrals were again reſtor'd to the Biſhops, and Maſs was ſaid in them; a Diet was alſo held, in which the Emperor obtain'd a Decree, by which Matters of Religion were referr'd wholly to his Care. The Pope inſtead of rejoicing at this Blow given to the Lutherans, was extreamly concern'd at it: For the Emperor had now in one Year finiſh'd a War, which he hop'd would have imbroil'd him his whole Life; ſo that Italy was more than ever expos'd to his Arms, where he had many many Reaſons to be jealous of his Power. The Emperor's Ambaſſadors became very uneaſie to the Legates at Trent, and urg'd a Reformation of Abuſes, and endeavour'd to reſtrain them from proceeding in Points of Doctrine; upon which they took advantage from the Death of one who ſeem'd to have ſome Symptoms of the Plague, and remov'd the Council to Bononia in Italy. By this all the Advantages the Emperor had from the Promiſes of the Proteſtants to ſubmit to a free General Council aſſembled in Germany, were defeated: And it was judg'd a wonderful Turn of Providence, that when Lutheraniſm was ſo near its Extirpation, a Stop was put to it by what was leaſt imagin'd; ſince it was highly probable that perfecting ſuch a Deſign would have reconcil'd the wideſt Differences between the Pope and the Emperor. So unexpected an Accident caus'd the Favourers of the Reformation to aſcribe it to the immediate Care that Heaven had of that Work, at a Time when all human Supports were remov'd. However upon the Emperor's Advantages, the Foreign Reformers, who generally made Germany their Sanctuary, were now forc'd to come into England: Peter Martyr and Bernard Ochinus came over firſt, and Bucer and Fagius follow'd. They were invited over by the generous Cranmer, who entertain'd them at Lambeth, 'till Proviſion was made for them; Martyr was ſent to Oxford, and Bucer and Fagius to Cambridge, where ſhortly after the latter dy'd. In this Year there were ſome Differences between the French and Engliſh, concerning ſome new Forts, which were made about Boloign, on both Sides, yet a Truce was concluded; for the Protector, who began to have Troubles in his own Family, had no Deſire to ingage in a War againſt France.

The Foreign Reformers repair to England

The great Work of the Reformation was ſtill carry'd on by continu'd Steps and Progreſſions; and much Care was taken to remove what related to Ignorance and Superſtition. As Candlemaſs and Lent were approaching, Cranmer procur'd an Order of Council againſt the carrying of Candles on Candlemaſs-Day, of Aſhes on Aſh-Wedneſday, and Palms on Palm-Sunday. By a Proclamation, the creeping to the Croſs, and taking Holy Bread and Water were aboliſh'd; and Power given to the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury to certifie, in the King's Name, what Ceremonies ſhould be afterwards laid aſide. Shortly after, a general Order follow'd for a Removal of all Images out of Churches, of which ſome were of a very groſs Nature: The only Occaſion given to cenſure this Order, was that all Shrines, and the Plate belonging to them, were appointed to be brought in to the King's Uſe. Eighteen Biſhops, and ſome Divines, were now imploy'd to examine the Offices of the Church, and to ſee which of them needed Amendment. They began with the Euchariſt, and the firſt Step now made was a new Office for the Communion, and the Diſtribution of the Sacrament; which differ'd not much from what is ſtill in Uſe, and was printed with a Proclamation, requiring all to receive it with ſuch Reverence and Uniformity, as might incourage the King to proceed further. Auricular Confeſſion was alſo examin'd, which being then us'd as a mere Trade, it was now thrown out of the Church, and private Confeſſion was declar'd indifferent. After this a general Reformation of the whole Liturgy was under Conſideration, that all the Nation might have an Uniformity in the Worſhip of God, and be no more canton'd to the ſeveral Uſes of diſtinct Dioceſes. It was reſolv'd to have a Liturgy, as might bring the Divine Worſhip to a fit Medium, between the Pomp of Superſtition, and a naked Flatneſs: And it was reſolv'd to have nothing chang'd meerly in Oppoſition to receiv'd Practices, but rather in Imitation of what Chriſt did, in the Inſtitution of the two Sacraments of the Goſpel, that conſiſted of Rites us'd among the Jews, but bleſs'd by him to higher Purpoſes, to comply with what had been formerly in uſe, as much as was poſſible, thereby to gain the People. It was alſo reſolv'd to have the whole Worſhip in the vulgar Tongue; and the Morning and Evening Prayers were put almoſt in the ſame Method, in which they are ſtill us'd, only there was no Confeſſion or Abſo-Abſolution. The Liturgy thus compil'd, was publiſh'd with a Preface concerning Ceremonies; the ſame that is ſtill in the Common-Prayer-Book, written with extraordinary Judgment and Temper. Of all theſe Eccleſiaſtical Tranſactions the Reader may ſee a large Account in Doctor Burnet's ſecond Volume of The Hiſtory of the Reformation.

The Affairs of State took up the Council, as much as the Matters of Religion imploy'd the Biſhops; the War with Scotland became chargeable, and was ſupported from France, but the Sale of the Chantry Lands brought in ſome Mony to the Council. About the ſame time Biſhop Gardiner, who was lately releas'd from his Impriſonment, again rais'd ſome Diſturbances againſt the Reforming Preachers; for which, not without ſome Hardſhip, he was ſent to the Tower. Another Accident alſo rais'd no ſmall Diſputes in the Court, which was the ſecond Marriage of the Marqueſs of Northampton, which was try'd at this time, for his firſt Wife being convict of Adultery, he and ſhe were ſeparated. He had mov'd at the end of the late Reign, that he might be ſuffer'd to marry again; therefore a Commiſſion was then granted, and was renew'd in the preſent Reign to ſome Delegates to examine what Relief might be given to the innocent Perſon in ſuch a Caſe. But this being new, and Cranmer proceeding in it with his uſual Exactneſs, which was often accompany'd with Slowneſs, the Marqueſs became impatient, and marry'd a ſecond Wife. This gave Offence to the Council, who order'd them to be parted 'till the Delegates ſhould give Sentence; which after famous Debates, and Conſideration of all Arguments, was at length given in his Favour, and his ſecond Marriage confirm'd. Yet four Years after, he was adviſ'd to have a ſpecial Act of Parliament for confirming this Sentence.

Affairs in Scotland.

The War with Scotland ſtill continu'd, where being incourag'd by a great Supply from France, the Clergy could not be ſatisfy'd, 'till they had put all things out of their Power, by ſending away their Queen into France, as was before-mention'd. The Engliſh had fortify'd Hadington, a Scotch Town well ſituated, and in a fruitful Country; upon which the Governor of Scotland, joining with the French, ſate down before it; a great Recruit ſent to the Garriſon from Berwick was intercepted and cut off, but they were well ſupply'd with Ammunition and Proviſions. Some Caſtles that the Engliſh had gain'd were taken by Surprize, and others by Treachery: A Fleet was ſent to waſte the Coaſt of Scotland, under the Admiral's Command; but he only made two Deſcents, in both which he had ſuch ill Succeſs, that he loſt near twelve hundred Men. The Earl of Shrewsbury advanc'd with a conſiderable Army to the Relief of Hadington, broke up the Siege, and well ſupply'd the Place. But as Deſſy the French General march'd back to Edinburgh, his Soldiers committed great Outrages upon the Scots, ſo that Shrewsbury might have taken great Advantages, ſince the Scots were ſo weary of their imperious Friends the French; but he march'd back, having perform'd his Commiſſion. Deſſy follow'd him, and made a great Inroad into England, but would not give the Scots any Share of the Spoil, and treated them in all Things as a conquer'd People; and being juſtly apprehenſive of them, he fortify'd himſelf in Leith, which before was but an inconſiderable Village. He alſo attack'd the Fort which the Engliſh had in Inchkeith, and took it; but he was recall'd upon the loud Complaints that were ſent to the Court of France againſt him. Now the People began to be ſenſible of their Slavery, and to deteſt thoſe who had adviſ'd the ſending their Queen to France, particularly the Clergy; and were by that the more diſpos'd to hearken to ſuch Preachers, as diſcover'd their Superſtition and Corruptions. And thus ended this Year's War between England and Scotland, with a Mixture of good and bad Succeſs. The Engliſh had preſerv'd Hadington, but loſt all Hopes of the Marriage, and were in danger of being ingag'd in a War with France, at a time when the King's Affairs were in an ill Condition, his People divided and diſcontented at home, and his Treaſure much exhauſted by the preſent Expences.

* The

The Protector had us'd ſeveral Methods to bring the Scots to a ten Years Truce, but with no Effect; for he had now moſt unhappy Troubles rais'd in his own Family by the Ambition of his Brother the Admiral, who being alſo Uncle to the young King, expected to have ſtill a larger Share in the Government. This aſpiring Man had formerly made his Addreſſes to the Princeſs Elizabeth the King's Siſter, but finding no hopes of Succeſs, he made early Applications to King Henry's Queen Dowager, who comply'd with him a little undecently; for it was afterwards objected to him, that he marry'd her ſo ſoon after the King's Death, that if ſhe had conceiv'd immediately after this Marriage, it might have been dubious whether it was by the late King or himſelf. Yet the Marriage was for ſome Time conceal'd, and the Admiral ſubtilly mov'd the King and his Siſters, to write to the Queen in his Favour: The Princeſſes excus'd themſelves, that it was not proper for them to interpoſe in ſuch a Matter; but he prevail'd upon the young King, and upon his Letter the Queen publiſh'd her Marriage. The Admiral being by this poſſeſs'd of great Wealth, and finding the King frequently repairing to the Queen's Lodgings, he endeavour'd to gain him, and all that were about him; and often took Occaſion to furniſh the King with ſmall Sums of Mony. Having thus inſinuated himſelf to the King's Acquaintance, his Deſign was this; that whereas, in former Times, when Infant Kings had two Uncles, one was Protector of the Realm, and the other Governor of his Perſon, ſo now theſe two Truſts might be divided, and that he might be made Governor of the King's Perſon. This is the moſt probable Foundation of the Breach between the unfortunate Brothers; for the vulgar Story of the Quarrel between their Wives about Precedence, ſeems an ill-grounded Fiction: For there was no Pretence of a Competition between the Queen Dowager and the Dutcheſs of Somerſet; only the latter being of a moſt haughty Spirit, might probably inflame her Husband's Reſentments, over whom ſhe had an unreaſonable Power, which gave riſe to the Story, and to other Miſchiefs. At firſt the Protector was eaſie to be reconcil'd to his Brother; but after the numerous Provocations he receiv'd from him, he too much threw off Nature. When he was in Scotland, the Admiral was daily forming a Party againſt him; and the good Advices given him by Paget, to treat ſuch as Enemies as were making a Breach between them, had no Effect to cure a Mind impetuouſly hurry'd on by a fatal Ambition. During the laſt Seſſion of Parliament the Admiral prevail'd with the King to write a Meſſage with his own Hand to the Houſe of Commons, to make him Governor of his Perſon; and when his Brother and his Friends endeavour'd to divert him from this Deſign, he declar'd, That if he was croſs'd in his Attempt, he would make this the blackeſt Parliament that ever was in England. Upon this he was ſent for to appear before the Council, but he refus'd to come; but when they threaten'd to turn him out of all his Places, and to ſend him to the Tower, he ſubmitted, and he and his Brother ſeem'd perfectly reconcil'd.

Differences between the Protector and the Admiral his Brother.

The Admiral's Deſigns.

The Parliament being broke up, in the Month of September, the Admiral's Wife, the Queen Dowager dy'd, not without Suſpicion of Poiſon; upon which he boldly renew'd his Addreſſes to the Princeſs Elizabeth. But finding it vain to expect that his Brother and the Council would conſent, and knowing that if ſhe marry'd without their Conſent, ſhe would be excluded the Succeſſion, he reſolv'd to ſecure the King's Perſon, 'till he had made a ſufficient Change in the Government. Accordingly he fortify'd his Houſe in the Country, prepar'd Magazines, liſted great Numbers of Men, and openly complain'd That his Brother deſign'd to inſlave the Nation, and govern all; and he alſo enter'd into a Treaty with ſeveral of the Nobility, who envy'd his Brother's Greatneſs, promiſing that they ſhould be of the Council, and that he would diſpoſe of the King in Marriage to one of their Daughters. The Protector imploy'd many to divert him from theſe deſperate Deſigns; but his reſtleſs Ambition being incurable, he was oblig'd to proceed to Extremities, and to ſend him Priſoner ſoner to the Tower, together with his Confederate Sharington, who being Vice-Treaſurer of the Mint at Briſtol, had ſupply'd him with Mony, and had coin'd much baſe Mony for his Uſe. Many were ſent to perſuade him to a better Temper of Mind, and his Brother was again willing to be reconcil'd to him, if he would retire from the Court and publick Buſineſs; but he was ſtill violent and intractable. Upon which many Articles were drawn up againſt him, both of his Deſigns againſt the State, and of his Maleverſation in his Office, ſeveral Pirates having been entertain'd by him; and many Witneſſes and Letters under his own Hand, were produc'd againſt him. The greateſt Part of the Council went to the Tower, and examin'd him; but he refus'd to give any particular Anſwers, but declar'd he expected a fair and open Trial. The whole Council upon this, acquainted the young King with it, and deſir'd him to refer the Matter to the Parliament then ſitting; which he granted with a Caution and Reſpect becoming one of riper Years. Upon which ſome Counſellors were again ſent to him to ſee what they could draw from him; but he ſhew'd a peculiar Sullenneſs, and after he had anſwer'd to three of the Articles, denying ſome Particulars, and excuſing others, he refus'd to proceed any further.

He is intractable.

A D. 1549. Reg. 3.

A Seſſion of Parliament.

The old Parliament met in the latter End of the Year 48, but no Bills were finiſh'd before February following: The firſt was concerning the marry'd Clergy, which was finiſh'd by the Commons in ſix Days, but lay ſix Weeks before the Lords; nine Biſhops and four Temporal Lords proteſting againſt it. 'By 'it, it was declar'd that tho' it was better for Prieſts to live unmarry'd, and 'free from worldly Cares; yet ſince the Laws compelling it had occaſion'd 'great Filthineſs, and other Inconveniences, they were all repeal'd. Another Act paſs'd, confirming the Liturgy, which was now finiſh'd; eight Biſhops, and three Temporal Lords only proteſting againſt it. There was a long Preamble, 'ſetting forth the Inconvenience of the former Offices, and the Pains 'taken to reform them; and that divers Biſhops and Divines had, by the Aid 'of the Holy Ghoſt, with an uniform Agreement concluded on the new Book: 'Therefore it was Enacted, That all Divine Offices ſhould be perform'd accor-'ding to that; and whoever us'd other Offices, for the firſt Offence ſhould ſuffer 'ſix Months Impriſonment, loſs of Benefice for the ſecond, and perpetual Im-'priſonment for the third. There was alſo another Act paſs'd concerning Faſting, declaring, 'That tho' all Days and Meats were of themſelves alike, 'yet Faſting, being a great Help to Virtue, and to the ſubduing the Body to 'the Mind, and a Diſtinction of Meats conducing to the Fiſhing Trade, it was 'Enacted, That Lent, and all Fridays and Saturdays, and Ember Days ſhould 'be Fiſh-Days, under ſeveral Penalties, excepting to the Weak, or thoſe that had 'the King's Licence. Theſe and ſome other Things being paſs'd, and Subſidies granted to the King, the Parliament was prorogu'd in March to November.

The Admiral attainted.

But what occaſion'd as great Diſcourſe as any Thing in this Parliament was the Attainder of the Admiral; which was begun in the Houſe of Lords, who had been too much accuſtom'd to paſs ſuch Bills in the late Reign. All the Judges and the King's Council deliver'd their Opinions, that the Articles produc'd againſt him were Treaſon. When the Evidence was produc'd, many Lords gave it ſo fully, that all the reſt with one Voice conſented to the Bill; only the Protector, for the ſake of natural Pity, deſir'd Leave to withdraw. The Lords diſpatch'd it in two Days; but in the Houſe of Commons many argu'd againſt ſuch unjuſt Attainders without a Trial, or bringing the Party to make his Anſwers. At length a Meſſage was ſent from the King, deſiring them to proceed as the Lords had begun; and the Lords who had given Evidence againſt him in their own Houſe, were ſent down to the Commons. Upon which the Bill paſs'd, and had ſhortly after the Royal Aſſent. On the ſeventeenth of March the Council ſign'd a Warrant for his Execution, to which both the Lord Protector, and the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, ſet their Hands. And on the twentieth he was beheaded on Tower-Hill; but we find not his Behaviour on the Scaffold, only that he declar'd, That he had never committed, or meant any Treaſon againſt the King or Kingdom. Thus fell Thomas Lord Seymour, Lord High-Admiral of England; a Man of high Thoughts, of great Violence of Temper, and unmeaſurably aſpiring; ſo, as other ambitious Men, he was like a Bubble, which is ſwell'd by every ſmall Breath, and broken by every great Blaſt. This Execution caus'd divers Cenſures, particularly againſt the Protector, who ſet his Hand to the Warrant; for the popular Notion, of its being againſt Nature for one Brother to deſtroy another, was eaſily entertain'd by the Multitude, who could not penetrate into the Myſteries of State. Then the Attainting of a Man without hearing him, was condemn'd as contrary to natural Juſtice; ſo that the Protector loſt one who could have been a mighty Prop, and ſuffer'd almoſt as much by his Death, as he could have done by his Life. He is beheaded.

III. The Protector having now loſt the chief Support of his Houſe, deſign'd to repair that Ruin, by erecting a magnificent Palace. Accordingly he caſt his Eyes upon a Piece of Ground in the Strand, on which ſtood one Pariſh-Church and three Epiſcopal Houſes; the former dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and the latter belonging to the Biſhops of Worceſter, Litchfield and Landaff: All which he aſſum'd into his Hands without any great Oppoſition. Having clear'd the Place and projected the intended Fabrick, the Workmen found that more Materials would be wanting to finiſh it, than the demoliſh'd Churches and Houſes could afford. He therefore reſolv'd to take down the Pariſh-Church of St. Margaret's in Weſtminſter, and appointed a particular Portion of the Abby-Church to be mark'd out for the Uſe of the Pariſhoners. But in this his Workmen were prevented by an Inſurrection of the Multitude, who finally diſcourag'd the Undertaking. In the next Place he was inform'd of ſome ſuperfluous, or rather ſuperſtitious Buildings about St. Paul's, as a regular Cloyſter with a Chappel, and a fair Charnel Houſe, and another Chappel belonging to it. This was conceiv'd to be a ſafer Undertaking, while the Churchmen continu'd to be little better than Tenants at Will; and thereupon he employ'd his Workmen to take all down, and convert the Stone, Timber, Lead and Iron, to the uſe of his intended Palace, leaving the Bones of the dead Bodies to be bury'd in the Fields. But all this not being ſufficient for his Work, the Steeple, and the greateſt Part of the Church of St. John's of Jeruſalem, not far from Smithfield, a beautiful Building, was pull'd down, and the Stone imploy'd to the ſame Purpoſe. Such was the Ground, and ſuch were the Materials of the Duke's new Palace, call'd Somerſet-Houſe; which either he liv'd not to finiſh, or elſe it muſt be unaccountably ſtrange, that after the demoliſhing of two Churches, two Chappels, and three Epiſcopal Houſes, to build one Palace, there ſhould be no particular Room erected for Religious Offices. The Building of Somerſet-Houſe.

As this Year began, ſo it proceeded; in which nothing more was to be found than Troubles, Commotions and Diſquiets, both in Church and State. For about this Time there ſtarted up a ſort of Men, call'd by the Name of Goſpellers, who held peculiar Notions as to Puniſhments and God's Providence, and making God the Author of Evil. And at the ſame Time the Anabaptiſts from Germany began to vent their Opinions in England, which were not only a Denial of Infant Baptiſm, but alſo of the Trinity, the Divinity of Chriſt, and other Heretical Principles. For the ſtifling of this Miſchief, ſome of the Principal of them were conven'd before the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and other Divines and Civilians; and being convicted of their Errors, ſome of them were diſmiſs'd only with Admonition, ſome ſentenc'd to a Recantation, and others condemn'd to bear their Faggots at St. Paul's Croſs. But Variety of Opinions in Religion.

they proceeded further with one Joan Bocher, commonly call'd Joan of Kent, who deny'd the Incarnation of Chriſt; and being unmeaſurably vain and conceited of her Notions, ſhe ſcornfully rejected all Inſtructions that were offer'd her. Upon which ſhe was condemn'd as an obſtinate Heretick, and deliver'd to the ſecular Power; but it was very difficult to perſuade the tender King to ſign the Warrant for her Execution: He thought it an Inſtance of the ſame Spirit of Cruelty, for which the Reformers condemn'd the Papiſts; and that it was unreaſonable to burn a Perſon for ſome wild Opinions, eſpecially when they ſeem'd to flow from a diſturb'd Brain. But Cranmer perſuaded him that being God's Lieutenant, he was oblig'd to puniſh direct Blaſphemers, according to the Laws of Moſes. This rather ſilenc'd than ſatisfy'd the young King; who ſign'd the Warrant with Tears in his Eyes, and told the Arch-Biſhop, That ſince he reſign'd himſelf to his Judgment, if he ſinn'd it ſhould lye at his Door. This ſenſibly ſtruck the Arch-Biſhop; and both he and Ridley took her to their Houſes, and try'd how far Reaſon, join'd with Gentleneſs, could prevail. But being ſtill more inſolent, at laſt ſhe was burnt, and ended her Life with ſuch indecent Jeers and Reproaches, that ſhe was thought a Perſon more fit for a dark Chamber than a Stake. Afterwards a Dutchman, nam'd George van Parre, was alſo condemn'd and burnt, for denying the Divinity of our Saviour, who was a Man of exemplary Piety, and ſuffer'd with great Compoſedneſs of Mind. Theſe Things caſt a great Blemiſh upon the Reformers, who were ſaid to condemn Cruelty only when it was exercis'd on themſelves; and the Papiſts made great uſe of this in the next Reign; and when Cranmer and Ridley ſuffer'd, it was thought a juſt Retaliation upon them, by that Providence that does Juſtice to all Mankind.

Great Tumults about Incloſures.

At this Time a ſort of Contagion of Rage and Violence ran over all the Commons of England: The Nobility and Gentry finding more Advantage by the Trade of Wool than by their Corn, did generally incloſe their Grounds, and turn them to Paſture; and ſo kept but few Servants, and took large Portions of their Eſtates into their own Hands. Yet ſtill the Numbers of the People increas'd, ſince Marriage was allow'd to all; and the Abrogation of many Holy-Days, and the putting down of Pilgrimages, gave them alſo more Time to work. By theſe Means the Commons were under terrible Apprehenſions, and fear'd to be reduc'd to great Miſery. Some propos'd a ſort of Aggrarian Law, for regulating this threatning Inconvenience; and the King himſelf wrote a Diſcourſe about it, that there might be ſome Equality in the Diviſion of the Soil among the Tenants. The Protector, being naturally juſt and compaſſionate, was a great Friend to the Commons, and much complain'd of the Oppreſſion of the Landlords. There was therefore a Commiſſion iſſu'd out, to enquire concerning Incloſures and Farms, and whether thoſe who purchas'd the Abbey Lands, and were oblig'd to keep up Hoſpitality, perform'd it, or not; and what Incouragement they gave to Husbandry. This having but little Effect, the Commons roſe in moſt Parts of the Nation, but chiefly in the Inland Counties; but they were eaſily diſpers'd, with a Promiſe that their Grievances ſhould be redreſs'd. The Protector, contrary to the Council's Opinion, ſet out a Proclamation againſt all new Incloſures, and for indemnifying the People for what was paſt. Commiſſioners were alſo ſent into moſt Counties, to hear and determine all Complaints; but the Power that was given to them was ſo arbitrary, that the Landlords call'd it an Invaſion of Property, when their Rights were thus ſubjected to the Pleaſure of ſuch Men. The Commons underſtanding that the Protector was ſo favourable to them, ſoon fell into greater Outrages than ever: Inſomuch it was afterwards objected to him, that the Convulſions of England were chiefly owing to his ill Conduct; in which he was the more blam'd becauſe he acted againſt the Opinion of the Majority of the Council.

The

The moſt dangerous Commotions, which continu'd ſo long, as to gain the Name of Rebellions, were thoſe of Devonſhire and Norfolk; Counties remote from each other, but ſuch as ſeem'd to have communicated Counſels, for carrying on the Deſign. The firſt was in Devonſhire, where the Inſurrection was very formidable, the Superſtition of the Prieſts joining with the Rage of the People; ſo that they ſoon became ten thouſand ſtrong. The Lord Ruſſel at firſt was ſent againſt them with a ſmall Force, and was order'd to try if he could compoſe the Diſturbance without Bloodſhed; but Arundel, a Man of Quality, commanding the Rebels, they prov'd not a looſe Body of Men, eaſily diſſipated. They boldly ſent their Demands to the Court, 'That the old Ser-'vice and Ceremonies might be reſtor'd; That the Act of the Six Articles, and 'the Decrees of General Councils might again be in Force; That the Bible in 'Engliſh might be call'd in; That Preachers ſhould pray for the Souls in Pur-'gatory; That Cardinal Pool ſhould be reſtor'd; That half the Abby Lands 'ſhould be reſtor'd, to found two Abbies in every County, and that Gentle-'men of a hundred Marks a Year ſhould have but one Servant: And they deſir'd a ſafe Conduct for their chief Leaders, in order to redreſs their particular Grievances: Afterwards they moderated their Demands, only to Points of Religion. Arch-Biſhop Cranmer wrote a large Anſwer to theſe, 'ſhewing the 'Novelties and Superſtition of thoſe Rites and Ceremonies, and of the whole 'Way of Worſhip of which they were ſo fond: That the Amendments and Al-'terations had been made according to the Scriptures, and the Cuſtoms of the 'Primitive Church; and their being fond of a Worſhip they did not under-'ſtand, and deſirous to be kept ſtill in Ignorance without the Scriptures, ſhew'd 'that their Prieſts had a greater Influence over them, than the common Reaſon 'of all Mankind: As for the Six Articles, that Act had never paſs'd if the 'King had not gone in Perſon to the Parliament, and argu'd for it; yet he 'ſoon ſaw his Error, and was ſlack in executing it. After that there was a high threatning Anſwer ſent them in the King's Name, condemning them for their Rebellion, and blind Obedience to their Prieſts: In which, the King's Authority under Age was largely ſet forth; becauſe the Pretence of the King's Minority caus'd the People in general to believe, that their Inſurrection was no Rebellion. In Concluſion, 'They were earneſtly invited to the King's 'Mercy, as others had done, whom the King had not only pardon'd, but had 'redreſs'd their juſt Grievances.

A Rebellion in Devonſhire, commanded by Arundel.

But this giving no Satisfaction, the Rebels march'd with all their Forces to beſiege Exeter; carrying before them in their March the conſecrated Hoſt, born under a Canopy, with Croſſes, Banners, Candleſticks, and other Utenſils. But all theſe had no Effect upon the Citizens, who were no leſs gallantly reſolv'd to make good the Town, than the other were deſperately bent to force it. To which Reſolution of the Citizens, the natural Defences of the City gave not more Incouragement, than ſome inſolent Speeches of the Rebels, boaſting, That they would ſhortly meaſure all the Silks and Sattens in it, by the Length of their Bows. They ſet Fire to the Gates, and wrought Mines, but all to no Effect; at length they reſolv'd to try how far Famine would prevail, and after many Days Siege, they reduc'd the Citizens to great Extremities. They were forc'd to feed upon Horſes, eſpecially for twelve Days; during which Time, they were incourag'd by an Aged Citizen, who brought out all his Stores, and declar'd, That he would eat one Arm, and fight with the other, before he would yield to the Seditious. After they were reduc'd to theſe Neceſſities, the Lord Ruſſel with his ſmall Army reſolv'd to attack the Rebels; who had poſſeſs'd themſelves of a Bridge behind him, both to ſurround him, and to hinder others from joining him: But he ſuddenly march'd back, and ſoon beat them from the Bridge with the Loſs of ſix hundred of their Men; by which Attempt he perceiv'd how eaſie a Work it would be to diſperſe them. Shortly after the Lord Gray, and Spinola, commanding ſome Germans, joining him, he proceeded to raiſe the Siege of Exeter. They had block'd up the Ways, and left two thouſand Men to keep a Bridge, where the King's Forces were to paſs; but the Lord Ruſſel bravely broke through them, and kill'd about a thouſand of them; upon which they were forc'd to raiſe the Siege and retire to Lanceſton. Having purſu'd them with new Slaughter, the Lord Ruſſel enter'd the City of Exeter on the ſixth of Auguſt, where he was joyfully receiv'd by the half ſtarv'd Citizens; whoſe Loyalty the King rewarded with an Encreaſe of Privileges, and the Manor of Eviland. This very Day has been ever ſince obſerv'd amongſt them for an annual Feaſt, in perpetual Gratitude to God, for their happy Deliverance. Arundel, and the reſt of the Heads, were taken and executed; and the Vicar of St. Thomas, a principal Incendiary, was hang'd on the Top of his own Tower, in his Popiſh Attire, and his Beads at his Girdle. And thus was the Rebellion happily ſuppreſs'd in the Weſt, to the great Honour of the Lord Ruſſel, who finiſh'd it with little or no Loſs.

They are totally ſuppreſs'd.

Another Rebellion in Norfolk under Ket a Tanner.

In the mean Time the Norfolk Rebellion broke out, on the twentieth Day of June, beginning at a Place call'd Attleborough; but was not conſiderable either for Power or Numbers, 'till the ſixth of July; when it was greatly increas'd by Robert Ket a Tanner of Windham, who undertook to lead the Multitude. Theſe Men at firſt pretended only againſt Incloſures, and Religion ſeem'd to be kept as a Reſerve; but when their Numbers were greatly increas'd, their Inſolence was ſuch, as nothing would ſatisfie them, but the total Suppreſſion of the Gentry, the placing of new Counſellors about the King, and other Things to be done in favour of the old Religion. Concerning which they made large Remonſtrances both to the King and People. The Sheriff of the County came boldly to them, and requir'd them in the King's Name to diſperſe and go home; but had he not been well mounted, they would have put him to a cruel Death.

The Rebels incamp before Norwich.

After this they march'd directly towards Norwich, and poſſeſs'd themſelves of Mouſhold-Hill; which gave them a full Proſpect over, and a compleat Command upon that large City, where they had many Friends. To this Place great Numbers reſorted out of Suffolk as well as Norfolk, many for Want, and many upon a turbulent Mind and a weak Notion of Levelling the World; and in all Parts Beacons were fir'd and Bells rung, to promote the Inſurrection; ſo that in a ſhort Time the Multitude increas'd to twenty thouſand, which were rather to be eſteem'd a Number than an Army. Their Companies rang'd through all the neighbouring Parts, and took what Goods they thought fit; and beſides Deer out of Parks, they brought ſuch Quantities of Beaſts and Proviſions, that a fat Sheep was ſold for four Pence. This was interpreted as a preſent Plenty, but it afterwards made ſuch a Scarcity, as could not be repair'd in ſeveral Years. Their Actions were diſguis'd with the uſual Coverings in Time of Rebellion, which were Religion and Juſtice: For the former they had one Coniers for their Chaplain, an idle vicious Perſon, who Morning and Evening read Prayers to them, and often Preach'd. But Doctor Parker, afterwards Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, coming to Preach before them, ſo fully laid open their notorious Impieties, that he was in Danger of his Life. As for Juſtice, Ket aſſum'd to himſelf the Power of Judicature, and in Imitation of the ancient Druids, under an old Oak, ſince call'd The Oak of Reformation, together with two of each Hundred in the County, did ſuch Juſtice as might be expected from ſuch a Judge, and in ſuch a Camp.

The Marqueſs of Northampton unſucceſsful againſt them.

The Marqueſs of Northampton was ſent againſt them, but with Orders to keep at a Diſtance from them, and to cut off their Proviſions; for it was hop'd that without much Bloodſhed, they might in Time be reduc'd. But at the ſame Time there was an Inſurrection in Yorkſhire, the Commons being further incourag'd by a Prophecy, That there ſhould be no King nor Nobility in England, that the Kingdom ſhould be rul'd by four Governors choſen by the Commons, who ſhould hold a Parliament in Motion, to begin at the South and North Seas; which they apply'd to the Devonſhire Men on the South Seas; and and to themſelves on the North Seas. They at their firſt Riſing fir'd Beacons, and ſo gather'd the Country as if it had been for the Defence of the Coaſts; and meeting two Gentlemen and two others, they without Provocation murder'd them, and left their naked Bodies in the Road. At the ſame Time the French King reſolv'd to take Advantage of theſe Commotions, and to regain the Town of Boloign: Three Days before he march'd with his Army, the Engliſh Ambaſſador preſſing him upon the Intimations that were given him of his Deſigns, he aſſur'd him, On the Faith of a Gentleman, he would not begin a War, 'till he had firſt given Warning: But many Princes reckon it a Part of their Prerogative, to be exempted from ſuch Obligations as bind poor Subjects. All theſe Misfortunes falling upon the Government at once, it may eaſily be imagin'd that the Council was under no ſmall Conſternation. Therefore a ſolemn Faſt was proclaim'd at Court, where Arch-Biſhop Cranmer preach'd with a true Chriſtian Freedom and Vehemence. This was the more ſeaſonable, becauſe the Marqueſs of Northampton was at this Time unſucceſsful in Norfolk; for having eleven hundred Men with him, he did not ſtrictly obſerve his Orders, but enter'd the City of Norwich. The Rebels rejoic'd at an Occaſion to engage with him, and fell in upon him the next Day with great Fury; and the Place not being tenable, he was forc'd to quit it, with the Slaughter of a hundred of his Men, among whom was the Lord Sheffield, who was much lamented. The Rebels alſo took about thirty Priſoners, fir'd great Part of the City, and return'd in Triumph to their Camp.

The French take Advantage.

This being underſtood at Court, the Protector ſuffer'd his moſt dangerous Enemy the valiant Earl of Warwick, to march againſt the Rebels with ſix thouſand Foot, and fifteen hundred Horſe, that were prepar'd for an Expedition to Scotland. He with difficulty enter'd the City of Norwich, but was ſcarce able to defend it, nor was he well aſſur'd of the Inhabitants. But he entertain'd the Rebels with frequent Skirmiſhes, and ſo cut off their Proviſions, that having waſted all the Country about them, they forſook the Hill, and retir'd to a Place call'd Duſſing-Dale, where by a Prophecy they expected great Succeſs. Here they came to a Battel, where the Rebels plac'd in the Front all the Gentlemen they had taken Priſoners, deſigning that they ſhould be firſt ſlain; but the brave Earl of Warwick ſo manag'd his Men, that without any great Hurt to the Gentlemen, he defeated the Rebels with the Death of above two thouſand of them. And now again the Earl offer'd them Pardon, if they would ſubmit; but notwithſtanding all their Loſſes, they continu'd ſtill obſtinate. At laſt, the Earl ſent to know, if they would accept of a Pardon, if he ſhould come in Perſon to offer it to them: This ſo ſenſibly mov'd them, that they anſwer'd, They knew him to be ſo honourable, that from himſelf they would embrace it. Whereupon the Earl riding to them, and cauſing their Pardon to be read, they threw away their Arms, and cry'd Long live King Edward! The Principals of them were taken and deſervedly executed: Robert Ket was hang'd in Chains upon Norwich Caſtle, and his Brother William upon the Top of the high Church-Tower of Windham: Nine of his chief Followers were hang'd on as many Bows of the Oak of Reformation, where Ket held his Courts; of whom two were Seducing Prophets, and one a moſt excellent Cannonier, who had done extraordinary Service to the Rebels. This great Deliverance was celebrated in the City of Norwich by a publick Thankſgiving, on the twenty ſecond Day of Auguſt, which has been ſince annually obſerv'd. The Rebels in Yorkſhire, who were no more than three thouſand in Number, hearing of this Succeſs, accepted of the Pardon that was ſent them; only ſome few of the Ringleaders, continuing obſtinate, were executed at York. After this, the Protector publiſh'd a general Pardon, in the King's Name, of all that had been done, with ſome few Exceptions; tho' many of the Council oppos'd it, as Mercy too profuſe, judging it better to keep the Commons under the Laſh; but the Protector and his Friends thought, that in this Caſe Fear was a greater Cauſe of Diſorders than Impunity. Thus was England deliver'd from one of the moſt threatning Storms that had broke out for many Years; in which Deliverance the ſingular Prudence and Temper of the Protector ſeems to have had no ſmall Share.

The Engliſh unſucceſsful abroad.

The Engliſh Affairs in Foreign Parts were very unſucceſsful this Year; for when England was ſo diſtracted at home, it was no wonder if the French and Scots took what Advantages they could. Moſt of the Forts about Boloign were taken by the French; but thoſe who commanded them, for their Excuſe alledg'd they were ill provided; yet Thuanus ſays they were all well ſtor'd. From theſe they came and ſate down before Boloign, with their King in Perſon; and tho' the Plague broke out in the French Camp, yet the Siege was not rais'd; but the King left the Army under the Command of Coligny, the famous Admiral of France. He found the only Way to take the Place was to cut it off from Sea, and ſo to keep out all Supplies; in order to which he deſign'd to have ſunk a Gally full of Stones and Gravel in it; but this and ſeveral other Attempts prov'd unſucceſsful. The Winter coming on, compell'd him to raiſe the Siege; but he lodg'd the greateſt Part of his Army in the adjacent Forts, ſo that the Town was in danger of being loſt the next Year. In Scotland there was alſo a great Turn; the Caſtle of Broughty was taken by the Scots, and the Garriſon almoſt intirely cut off. The Engliſh took particular Care of Hadington, to ſupply it well, expecting a Siege, upon which the Scots deſiſted from attacking it; yet the Charge of keeping it was ſo great, and the neighbouring Country ſo waſted, that it was neceſſary to ſend all their Proviſions from Berwick: So that the Protector thought it more adviſable to abandon it; and upon that ſent Orders to the Garriſon to demoliſh the Works, and return into England. So that now the Engliſh had no Place beyond the Borders but Lauder; and Thermes the French General ſate down before that, and if a Peace had not been concluded, it would have fallen into his Hands.

Several Expedients propos'd.

Affairs being in this Diſorder both at home and abroad, the Protector had nothing to depend on, but the Emperor's Aid; who was ſo diſſatisfy'd with the Changes made in Religion, that much was not to be expected from him. At this Time the Emperor brought his Son Philip into the Netherlands, that he might put him in Poſſeſſion of thoſe Provinces; where he ſetled ſeveral Limitations both as to Civil and Military Power, and made a ſpecial Proviſion, that in Caſe his Son ſhould break theſe Rules, the Provinces ſhould not be oblig'd to obey him any longer: Which was the chief Ground both in Law and Conſcience, upon which they afterwards juſtify'd their ſhaking off his Yoke. The Emperor was now Maſter of the Princes of Germany, who ſaw no Way to recover their Liberty but by the Aſſiſtance of the French King; therefore Applications were made to him, which were chearfully receiv'd, only he was reſolv'd firſt to make himſelf Maſter of Boloign, and then to turn his whole Force towards Germany. Advertiſements were given of this to the Protector, who thereupon enter'd into a deep Conſultation with his Friends what was proper to be done in ſo critical a Conjuncture; whether it was better to deliver up Boloign to the French by a Treaty, or to engage in a War to preſerve it, which would not only be vaſtly expenſive, but highly dangerous in theſe unſetled Times. He himſelf was inclin'd to deliver up Boloign; but his Enemies, who were a Majority in the Council, ſaw the Continuance of the War like to ruin him, whereas a general Peace would put the whole Nation into his Hands; therefore they ſet themſelves againſt all Motions for a Treaty, declaring that the Sale of ſuch a Place as Boloign would be a laſting Reproach to the Government. Many conſiderable Arguments were us'd on both Sides; and the Iſſue of their Conſultations was the ſending over Sir William Paget to the Emperor, to learn what might be expected from him. His publick Inſtructions were ſome ſuperficial Matters relating to former Treaties and Trade; but his ſecret Inſtructions were to ſee whether the Emperor would include Boloign in the Defenſive League, and ſo protect it; or whether he would take it into his Hands, and what Recompence he would give for it; the Emperor long ſhifted him off with Delays and Pretences of great Buſineſs, and at laſt would give him no ſatisfactory Anſwer as to Boloign: So he was oblig'd to return home, and give an Account of his Negotiation to a divided Council.

Upon this ill Succeſs the Protector found that his Power was in a declining Condition. But to finiſh this perplexing Affair, it was propos'd in Council, Whether ſince Boloign by a former Treaty was to be deliver'd up within a few Years, it were not better to prevent a new War and a Siege, where the Iſſue was like to prove very dangerous, and to enter into a Treaty for doing it immediately; and at the ſame Time, whether it were not more adviſable to finiſh the War with Scotland, ſince there was no Poſſibility of compaſſing the Marriage, for which it was firſt begun. Upon this Motion, all the Protector's Enemies took off the Mask, and declar'd themſelves againſt it. The Earl of Southampton and the Earl of Warwick were chief of the Party; the one hated him for turning him out of his Office, and the other expected to be the principal Man in Buſineſs, if he ſhould be remov'd. Various Things concurr'd to raiſe the Protector many Enemies: His Partiality to the Commons provok'd the Gentry; his cutting off his Brother's Head, and his Palace in the Strand, ſacrilegiouſly erected in the Time both of War and Plague, diſguſted the People. The Clergy hated him, not only for his promoting the Changes made in Religion, but for his enjoying ſo many of the Biſhop's beſt Manors: His entertaining Foreign Troops, both Germans and Italians, tho' done by the Conſent of Council, yet gave a general Diſtaſte: And the high Station he had obtain'd, wrought much on himſelf and others; raiſing the Pride of the former, and the Envy of the latter. The Privy-Counſellors complain'd, that he was become ſo Arbitrary in his Proceedings, that he ſcarcely regarded the Oppoſition made by the Majority to any of his Deſigns. All theſe Particulars concurr'd to beget him many Enemies; and except the generous Cranmer, who never forſook his Friend, and Paget and Smith, all turn'd againſt him, and violently oppos'd his Propoſition for a Treaty with France. They alſo complain'd that the Places about Boloign were loſt by his Careleſsneſs, and Neglect of well furniſhing them, and that he had recall'd the Garriſon out of Hadington. They put him in mind of the Conditions, upon which he was firſt made Protector, by which he was limited to act nothing without their Advice; tho' he had ſince that taken out a Patent, which inveſted him with far greater Power. Then they charg'd him with ordering Paget to procure no better Anſwer from the Emperor, that he might be furniſh'd with an Excuſe for a diſhonourable Treaty with France. Thus all the Month of September there were great Heats in the Council, when ſeveral interpos'd to no Effect; for the Faction againſt him was now ſo ſtrong, that they reſolv'd to ſtrip him of his exorbitant Greatneſs, and reduce him to an Equality with themſelves.

A Faction againſt the Protector.

Upon theſe Animoſities, the Protector carry'd the King to Hampton-Court, and put many of his own Creatures about him, which increas'd the former Jealouſies; therefore nine of the Privy-Council met at Ely Houſe, and aſſum'd to themſelves the Name and Authority of the Council; and Secretary Petre being ſent by the King, to demand the Reaſon of their Meeting, inſtead of returning, join'd himſelf to them. They made a large Declaration of the Protector's Male-Adminiſtration and dangerous Deſigns, and of his ingaging the King to ſign Letters for raiſing of Men, and for diſperſing ſeditious Papers; therefore they reſolv'd to provide for the Safety of the King and Kingdom. Both the City of London, and the Lieutenants of the Tower declar'd for them; and they alſo ſent Letters all over England, deſiring the Aſſiſtance of the Nobility and Gentry. They were join'd by ſeven more Privy-Counſellors; and all wrote to the King 'Complaining of the Protector's Obſtinacy, and his refuſing 'to hearken to their Counſels, tho' the late King had left the Government of 'his Perſon and Kingdom to them in common, and the Protector was advanc'd 'to Great Heats.

'to that Dignity over them, upon the Conditions which he had little regarded; 'therefore they desir'd that the King would make a good Construction of their 'Intentions and Proceedings. The Protector had remov'd the King from Hampton-Court, as being an open Place, to Windsor, which had some better Defence about it; and had arm'd some of his own Servants, and plac'd them about the King's Person, which still encreas'd the former Jealousies; yet seeing himself abandon'd by most of his Friends, and finding the Party against him so formidable, that it would be in vain to struggle any longer, he offer'd to submit himself to the Council. Accordingly a Proposition of a Treaty was set on Foot; and the Lords at London were desired to send two of their Number with their Propositions, and a Passport was sent them for their Safety. Cranmer, Paget and Smith wrote to the Council, to dispose them to an Agreement, 'and not to follow cruel Counsels. Many false Reports, as is usual in all such Occasions, were carry'd of the Protector, as if he had threaten'd, that if they design'd to put him to Death, the King should die first; which serv'd to improve their Prejudices against him. The Council wrote to Cranmer and Paget, 'Charging them to look well to the King's Person, that he should not be 'remov'd from Windsor, and that the Duke of Somerset's Servants might be 'remov'd from his Presence, and his own sworn Servants admitted to wait; 'protesting also that they would proceed with all Moderation and Favour that 'was possible towards the Duke of Somerset.

The Council understanding that all Things were prepar'd, as they had desir'd, first sent three of their Number, to take care that the Protector, and some of his Favourites, Smith, Stanhop, Thynne, Wolf and Cecil should be confin'd to their Lodgings; and on the twelfth of October the whole Council went to Windsor, and made great Protestations of their Duty to the King, which he receiv'd favourably, and assur'd them he took all they had acted in the best Sense. The Protector, with the rest of his Friends, except Cecil, were sent to the Tower, and many Articles were drawn up against him, 'That he being 'Protector, with this Condition, that he should act nothing, but by the Con- 'sent of the other Executors, had separately treated with Ambassadors; had 'made Bishops and Lord-Lieutenants without their Knowledge; had held 'a Court of Requests in his House; had embas'd the Coin of the Nation; 'had neglected the Places the King had in France; had incourag'd the Com- 'mons in their late Insurrections, and had given out Commissions, and pro- 'claim'd a Pardon without their Consent: That he had animated the King 'against the rest of the Council, and had proclaim'd them Traitors; and had 'put his own Servants armed about the King's Person. And thus fell the Duke of Somerset from his high Offices and great Trust; but it appears by the Articles that what was charg'd upon him were rather Errors and Infirmities, than notorious Crimes, such as are incident to all who are suddenly exalted to a disproportion'd Greatness. He was not charg'd with Cruelty, Rapine or Bribery, or yet Sacrilege; and his embasing the Coin was done upon a common Mistake of weak Governments, which in the Necessity of Affairs usually fly to that as their last Refuge. He bore his Fall more equally than he had done his Prosperity; and in his Imprisonment, he set himself to the Study of moral Philosophy and Divinity, and wrote a Preface to a Book of Patience, which had noble Impressions upon his Mind. However his Fall was a great Affliction to all who lov'd the Reformation; which was increas'd by the Apprehensions they had of the two chief Men of the Party against him, Southampton and Warwick; the one a known Papist, and the other esteem'd as a Man of no Religion: And both at the Emperor's Court, and in France, it was expected, that upon this Revolution, Matters of Religion would be reduc'd back to the same Posture, in which King Henry had left them. The Duke of Norfolk, and Bishop Gardiner, now hop'd to be set at Liberty; and Bonner, who for his Principles and Disobedience had this Year been depriv'd of his Biſhoprick, expected to be re-eſtabliſh'd; and all the People began much to decline from the Uſe of the new Service. But the Earl of Warwick, finding the King ſo zealouſly addicted to the Reformation, as nothing could more recommend a Man than that, ſoon forſook the Popiſh Party, and appear'd a mighty Promoter of that Work. Upon this the Earl of Southampton left the Court in great Diſcontent: He was neither reſtor'd to his Office of Chancellor, nor made Lord Treaſurer, nor one of the Six who had the Charge of the King's Perſon, as he expected. Therefore he began to lay a Train againſt the Earl of Warwick, who being too quick for him, he retir'd, and not long after dy'd, by the Force of Poiſon or Grief.

A Seſſion of Parliament.

In November, a Seſſion of Parliament met; in which an Act was paſs'd, declaring it Treaſon to call any to the Number of twelve together, about any Matter of State, if being requir'd, they did not diſperſe themſelves: Other Riotous Aſſemblies were alſo declar'd Felonious; and the giving out of Propheſies concerning the King, or Council, was alſo made penal. Another Law was made againſt Vagabonds, the former Statute was repeal'd, as too ſevere, and Proviſions were made for the Relief of the Sick and Impotent, and imploying ſuch as were able to Work. The Biſhops made a great Complaint, of the Growth of Vice and Impiety, and that their Power was ſo much abridg'd, that they could not ſuppreſs it: Therefore a Bill was read, enlarging their Authority, which tho' great, was at length ſo moderated, that the Lords paſs'd it. But the Commons rejected it; and inſtead of that, ſent up a Bill, that empower'd thirty two, who were to be nominated by the King, the one half of the Spiritualty, and the other of the Temporalty, to compile a Body of Eccleſiaſtical Laws, within the Compaſs of three Years; and that thoſe, not being contrary to the Common or Statute Law, and approv'd by the King, ſhould have the Force of Eccleſiaſtical Laws: Of the thirty two, four were to be Biſhops, and as many to be common Lawyers. Six Biſhops and ſix Divines were alſo empower'd by an Act to prepare a new Form of Ordination, which being confirm'd under the Great Seal ſhould take place after April following. On the ſecond of January, a Bill was brought in againſt the Duke of Somerſet, containing the Articles formerly mention'd, with a Confeſſion of them, ſign'd by his own Hand. But ſome objected, that they ought not to proceed, 'till they knew whether his ſigning of it was voluntary or not: Accordingly ſome were ſent to examine him, to whom he acknowledg'd that he had done it freely, but proteſted that his Errors had flow'd rather from Indiſcretion than Malice, and poſſitively deny'd all treaſonable Deſigns againſt the King or the Realm. Upon which he was fin'd in two thouſand Pounds a Year, and in the Loſs of all his Offices and Goods. He complain'd of the great Weight of this Cenſure, and earneſtly begg'd to be reſtor'd to the King's Favour, and promis'd for the future to carry himſelf ſo humbly and obedient, as ſhould make full Amends for his paſt Follies: All which was thought by ſome to be the Sign of an abject Spirit; tho' others excus'd it, for that the Power and Malice of his Enemies was ſo predominant, that he could not be ſafe, while he continu'd a Priſoner. He was diſcharg'd in the Beginning of February; ſhortly after he had his Pardon, and did ſo manage his Intereſt with the King, his Nephew, that he was brought both to the Court and Council in April. And thus the Storm paſs'd over him more gently than was expected; but his Carriage in it was thought to have ſo little of the Heroe, that after this he was never much conſider'd.

IV. After this Diſturbance and Confuſion was over, the Reformation was again carry'd on with great Vigour. The Council ſent Orders over all England, to require all to conform to the new Service, and to call in all the Books of the old Offices. To give a more publick Declaration of their Zeal, an Act paſs'd in Parliament to the ſame Effect; by which all the old Books and Images were appointed to be defac'd, and all Prayers to Saints were to be ſtruck out of the Primers publiſh'd by the late King. A Subſidy was granted, and the King gave a general Pardon, out of which all State Priſoners and Anabaptiſts were excepted. In this Seſſion it is obſerv'd, that the eldeſt Sons of Peers were firſt allow'd to ſit in the Houſe of Commons. The Committee appointed to prepare the Book of Ordination, finiſh'd their Work with common Conſent; only Heath Biſhop of Worceſter refus'd to ſign it, for which he was impriſon'd by Order of Council. While the Reformation thus ſucceeded in England, Pope Paul dy'd; and Cardinal Pool, the grand Enemy to the Work, for his great Services and Sufferings was elected Pope, in the Night Time. He did by no means aſpire to this Dignity; ſo that when a full Number had agreed, and came according to Cuſtom to adore him, he receiv'd it with his uſual Coldneſs, and ſaid, God lov'd Light, adviſing them to defer the Matter 'till the Morning. The Italians, among whom Ambition paſſes for Greatneſs of Mind, look'd on this as an unſufferable Piece of Dulneſs and Stupidity; upon which the Cardinals ſhrunk from him before Day, and choſe de Monte to be Pope, who reign'd by the Name of Julius the Third. The firſt Promotion he made was very extraordinary, for he gave his own Cardinal's Hat, to a Servant that kept his Monkey; and being ask'd what he obſerv'd in him to make him Cardinal, he anſwer'd, As much as the Cardinals had ſeen in him to make him Pope.

Cardinal Pool choſen Pope, but loſt it.

At this Time the Council was daily perplex'd concerning the Affair of Boloign; and tho' they had oppos'd the Surrender of it by the Protector, yet that great End being ſerv'd in pulling him down, they were convinc'd of the Neceſſity of doing of it, and ſo were induc'd to hearken to the Propoſition that one Guidotti, an Italian, made for a Treaty. He was imploy'd by the Conſtable Monmorancy, and gave them Aſſurances, that as ſoon as that was effected, the French King would ingage in favour of the oppreſs'd Princes of the Empire. For this End Ambaſſadors were ſent over to France, the Lord Ruſſel, and Paget now made a Lord, with ſome others, to ſettle the Treaty of Peace. They were order'd in the firſt Place to demand the Delivery of the Scotch Queen, and the Payment of the perpetual Tribute or Penſion from France to England: But the French refus'd to treat upon theſe Heads; their Maſter deſign'd to marry the Scotch Queen to the Dauphine, and would not be ſo tributary to another Prince as to pay a perpetual Penſion; but they offer'd a particular Sum of Mony for Boloign. Some Difficulties were rais'd about demoliſhing the Fortifications in Aldernay and Sark, two ſmall Iſlands in the Channel which the French expected; and about the Surrender of Roxburgh and Aymouth to the Scots, then in the Hands of the Engliſh. The Council order'd the Commiſſioners to inſiſt upon theſe Particulars, and to offer to break the Negotiation rather than yield to them; but if that had no Effect upon the French, then they were to drop them as honourably as they could. In Concluſion, the Engliſh, after a ſpecial Proteſtation, by which they reſerv'd to their King all the Rights he had at the Beginning of the War, agreed to deliver up Boloign, and all the Places about it, with all the Ordinance in it, except what the Engliſh had caſt; for all which the French were to pay four hundred thouſand Crowns, each amounting to the Value of an Engliſh Noble. Likewiſe all the Places which the Engliſh held in Scotland were to be deliver'd up, and the Fortifications demoliſh'd; and ſix Hoſtages were to be diſpos'd on both Sides for the Performance of Articles, who were the Sons of Men of the higheſt Quality. Thus was the Peace fully concluded; and the Articles were exactly perform'd on both Sides. The Council all approv'd of the Proceedings of their Plenipotentiaries; only the high Earl of Warwick, who had violently declared himſelf againſt the Delivery of Boloign, pretended Sickneſs, and abſented himſelf when the Peace was proclaim'd, on the twenty ninth Day of March.

A Treaty with France.

A Peace concluded.

And

And now the King was entring in the fourth Year of his Reign, free from all Wars, which had hitherto diſtracted his Government, ſo that the Council was more at leiſure to ſettle Affairs at home. But the Earl of Warwick beginning to form great Deſigns, reſolv'd firſt to make himſelf popular, by calling all concern'd in the King's Affairs to a ſtrict Account; and either to make them compound for large Sums, by which the King's Debts ſhould be paid, or to keep them under Power, 'till he had made them ſubſervient to his Ends. He began with the Earl of Arundel, who being charg'd with many Things, ſubmitted to a Fine of twelve thouſand Pounds, to be paid in twelve Years time. This was the more publickly obſerv'd, becauſe Southampton, Arundel and he, with Sir Richard Southwell Maſter of the Rolls, had been the chief Contrivers of the Protector's Fall: Southampton was diſappointed and driven away, Arundel was fin'd, and Southwell ſoon after impriſon'd for diſperſing ſome ſeditious Papers. This wrought much on the Vulgar, who imputed it to a ſecret Curſe, on thoſe who had conſpir'd againſt the Protector; and the Delivery of Boloign ſtill made it more apparent, that the Charge againſt him was chiefly grounded on Malice. After Arundel's Diſgrace, all the Protector's Friends made their Compoſitions, and were diſcharg'd. Sir Thomas Smith, Sir Michael Stanhop, Thomas Fiſher, and William Gray, each of them acknowledg'd they ow'd the King three thouſand Pounds; and Sir John Thynn ſubmitted to ſix thouſand Pounds Fine.

The Earl of Warwick's Deſigns.

All Things being now quieted at home, and compos'd abroad, there was a Diſcourſe on Foot of a Marriage between the King, and a Daughter of France, which griev'd the Reformers, who more deſir'd him to marry a Siſter of Maximilian's, who was believ'd to favour the Reformation, and was eſteem'd one of the beſt Men of the Age. Old Latimer upon this Occaſion preach'd at Court, and freely warn'd the King of the ill Effects of Marriages, made up only as Bargains, without Affection between the Parties, which occaſion'd ſhameful Whoredoms and Divorces: He alſo complain'd of the Luxury and Vanity of the Age, and of many call'd Goſpellers, who were concern'd for nothing but Abby and Chantry-Lands, preſſing for a primitive Diſcipline in the Church: He complain'd that the King's Debts were not paid, and yet his Officers became vaſtly rich. He preach'd this as his laſt Sermon; and therefore us'd the greater Freedom. The Reformation ſtill was carry'd on with Succeſs; and Ridley Biſhop of Rocheſter, a moſt learned and zealous Reformer, was made Biſhop of London, in the Room of Bonner depriv'd. Gardiner was ſtill kept a Priſoner, and treated with a Severity not altogether excuſable. Doctor Hooper was at this Time made Biſhop of Gloceſter, who being over Scrupulous about the Church Veſtments, unhappily gave Riſe to Diſputes and Heats about indifferent Things, which have continu'd to this Day. This Diſpute was too much promoted by John a Laſco, a German Reformer driven from his Country, who being allow'd to ſet up a Congregation in England, took an undecent Liberty in the Engliſh Affairs, and wrote againſt the Habits, and kneeling at the Sacrament. About the ſame Time, the famous Polydore Virgil, who had been now almoſt forty Years in England, growing old, deſir'd leave to go nearer the Sun, all which was allow'd; and in Conſideration of the publick Service he was thought to have done the Nation by his Hiſtory of England, he was permitted ſtill to hold his Arch-Deaconry of Wells, and Prebend of Nonnington. He is ſaid to have pillag'd the publick Libraries at his Pleaſure; and at laſt to have ſent over a whole Ship Load of Manuſcripts to Rome. At this Time the Young King, now thirteen Years of Age, began to diſplay his Parts and Abilities by means of his induſtrious Pen, which ſtill went beyond his Years: Particularly he wrote a Journal with his own Hand of his Reign, and of all Foreign Affairs; and wrote a Scheme for amending many Things amiſs in the Government; and alſo another Diſcourſe in French againſt Idolatry, with a Preface to it, dedicated to his Uncle the Protector.

The Progreſs of the Reformation.

The young King's Abilities.

A. D. 1551. Reg. 5.

The further Progreſs of the Reformation.

The Government was now free from all Diſturbances, the Coin was regulated, and Trade incourag'd; and the Faction in the Court ſeem'd to be extinguiſh'd, by a Marriage between the Earl of Warwick's Son and the Duke of Somerſet's Daughter. All which gave Opportunity for the Reformation to be carry'd on with great Vigour and Succeſs; and the Romiſh did now generally comply with every Change that was made in the Church. The Principle by which moſt of that Party were govern'd, was this; They believ'd they ought to oppoſe all the Changes, before they were eſtabliſh'd by Law, yet when once done, they might afterwards comply with them. Cranmer, who was of great Temper and Prudence, was willing to accept of any thing they offer'd, rightly judging, that whether they acted ſincerely or not, their Compliance would be a Means to quiet the Nation; and he was ſo naturally compaſſionate, that he would not uſe Extremities, againſt Men that were grown old in their Errors, and could not eaſily be wean'd from them. Only Gardiner and Bonner were ſuch deceitful and cruel Men, that he thought it more excuſable to make Stretches, for delivering the Church from them; for as Bonner had formerly loſt the Biſhoprick of London, ſo this Year Gardiner was formally depriv'd of Wincheſter, and Poinet put in his Room. About the ſame Time that eminent Reformer Martin Bucer dy'd at Cambridge, a Man of great Learning and excellent Temper of Mind; and by Order from Cranmer and Sir John Cheek, he was bury'd with the higheſt Solemnities that could be invented, to expreſs the Eſteem the Univerſity had for him. By this Time the greater Number of the Biſhops were Men that heartily receiv'd the Reformation; ſo it was reſolv'd now to proceed to a Settlement of the Doctrine of the Church. Accordingly, after ſome mature Debates and Conſiderations, they fram'd a Body of Articles, which contain'd the Doctrine of the Church of England: They were caſt into forty two Articles, and afterwards ſome few Alterations being made in the Beginning of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, they were reduced to THIRTY NINE; which continue in Uſe and Force to this Day. Altars began to be put down, and Communion-Tables were plac'd in their Room; and the Common-Prayer Book was review'd and alter'd, and put in the ſame Order and Method, in which it continues to this Day, excepting only ſome inconſiderable Variations, that have been made ſince. At this Time ſix of the moſt eminent Preachers were appointed to wait on the Court by Turns, two at a Time, and the other four were ſent as Itinerant Preachers, into all the Counties of England, in a Circuit, for ſupplying the Defects of the Clergy, who were generally very weak and faulty.

The Princeſs Mary a great Oppoſer of it.

The greateſt Oppoſer of the Reformation was the Princeſs Mary; and the Maſs conſtantly ſaid in her Chappel, was now again diſputed. The Court became leſs apprehenſive of the Emperor's Diſpleaſure than formerly, and therefore would no longer bear with ſo publick a Breach of Law; and the Promiſe they made being but temporary, and not in Writing, they were not under any further Obligation. But the Emperor aſſuring her, that he had an abſolute Promiſe for that Privilege, ſhe was ſo much incourag'd, that when the Council wrote to her to deſiſt, ſhe declar'd She would adhere to the Catholick Church, and her Father's Religion. She ſtill meeting with Oppoſition, a ſtrange Project was form'd, which was to have a Ship ready upon the Coaſt of Eſſex, to convey her ſuddenly into Flanders; and if this had taken Place, ſhe muſt have been intirely ſhut out from ſucceeding to the Crown. The Emperor ſo warmly eſpous'd her Cauſe, that he threaten'd to make War, if ſhe met with any hard Uſage; and the Engliſh Merchants having then great Effects at Antwerp, it was not thought Policy to give him a Pretence to ſeize them; ſo the Council was willing to let the Matter fall of it ſelf, and only adviſ'd her to have her Maſs ſaid privately: Yet the conſcientious King could not eaſily be induc'd to yield to that, for he ſaid He ought not to connive at Idolatry. By Order of Council, Cranmer, Ridley and Poinet went to ſatisfie him in this Point;

Point; and they convinc'd him, That tho' he ought not to conſent to any Sin, yet he was not at all Times oblig'd to puniſh it: Upon which he burſt out into Tears, lamenting his Siſter's Obſtinacy, and his own hard Circumſtances, that oblig'd him to comply with ſuch an impious Way of Worſhip. After new Meſſages to the Emperor to no great Effect, the Council ſeiz'd two of her Chaplains; and after much ſtruggling, gain'd this Point, that for the future ſhe had her Maſs ſaid ſo ſecretly, that ſhe gave no Occaſion of publick Offence. As to the King's Siſter Elizabeth, ſhe in all Things conform'd to the Laws; for her Mother at her Death had earneſtly recommended her to the Care of Doctor Parker, a great Reformer, who well inſtructed her in the Principles of the Chriſtian Religion.

The Earl of Warwick's vaſt Ambition.

While the Affairs of Religion were thus in Debate, the aſpiring Earl of Warwick began to form vaſt Deſigns of bringing the Crown into his Family: He found the King was now alienated from his Siſter Mary, and the Privy-Council had ſo nearly concern'd themſelves with her, that they would be eaſily ingag'd againſt her. The Pretence againſt both the Siſters was the ſame, that they ſtood Illegitimated by two Sentences in the Spiritual Courts, confirm'd by Acts of Parliament; ſo that it would be a Diſhonour to the Engliſh Nation to ſuffer the Crown to devolve upon ſpurious Iſſues. And ſince the Apprehenſions of the Revenge of the Princeſs Mary, made the Council willing to exclude her; he found that the only Reaſon on which they could ground that, muſt likewiſe take Place againſt the Princeſs Elizabeth. And therefore tho' the Crown was appointed to them, both by Act of Parliament, and the late King's Will; yet theſe being founded on an Error that was inſuperable, which was the Illegitimacy of their Deſcent, they ought not to take place. They being thus laid aſide, the Daughters of the French Queen by Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, ſtood next in the Act; tho' there was a ſtrong Suſpicion that they were alſo Illegitimate, by reaſon of a prior and ſecret Marriage, he was ſuppos'd to have made with one Mortimer. The Duke's two Sons dy'd both in one Day of the ſweating Sickneſs, which rag'd in England this Year: His eldeſt Daughter was marry'd to Gray Marqueſs of Dorſet, a weak and good Man, who was made Duke of Suffolk, and had three Daughters; of which the Eldeſt the Lady Jane had all the charming Qualities of her own Sex, and was judg'd to be the Wonder of both. So the Earl of Warwick projected a Match between her and his fourth Son Guilford, his three eldeſt being already marry'd; but becauſe the Princeſs Elizabeth was like to be the moſt effectual Obſtacle, a Deſign was laid to ſend her out of England, and a Match was treated for her with the King of Denmark. To amuſe the King himſelf, a moſt ſplendid Embaſſie was ſent into France with the noble Order of the Garter. The Marqueſs of Northampton carry'd it, accompany'd with three Earls, the Biſhop of Ely, five Barons, and above two hundred Gentlemen. They were to make a Propoſition of a Marriage for the King with the French King's Daughter Elizabeth. The Biſhop of Ely made the firſt Speech, which was anſwer'd by the Cardinal of Lorrain, and it was ſoon concluded; yet neither Party was to ſtand oblig'd, either in Honour or Conſcience, 'till the Lady ſhould be of Years to give Conſent. In return a magnificent Embaſſie was ſent from France to England, with the Order of St. Michael. The French Ambaſſadors deſir'd in their Maſter's Name the Continuance of the King's Friendſhip, and that he would not be mov'd by vain Rumours and malicious Reports, to break the Alliance. Upon this the wondrous young King immediately return'd this Anſwer with his own Mouth, That Rumours were not always to be credited, nor always to be rejected; for it was no leſs vain to fear all things, than to doubt of nothing: If any Differences ſhould ariſe, he ſhould be always more ready to determine them by Reaſon than Force, ſo far as was conſiſtent with his Honour.

But

But while all this was in Agitation, there was a Design laid to destroy the Duke of Somerset; who had now such Access to the King, and such Freedom with him, that the Earl of Warwick expected no less than the Ruin of his Projects. Therefore to prevent that, and to raise himself and his Friends higher, he procured a great Creation of new Honours: He himself was made Duke of Northumberland; the Blood of the Percies being then under an Attainder; Pawlet was made Marquess of Wincheſter, Herbert was made Earl of Pembroke, and a little before this, Russel had been made Earl of Bedford, and Darcy was made a Lord. There was none so likely to take the King out of the new Duke of Northumberland's Hands, as the Duke of Somerset, who was beginning to form a new Party about the King; therefore upon some Informations, both the Duke of Somerset and his haughty Dutchess, Sir Ralph Vane, Sir Thomas Palmer, Sir Thomas Arundel, and several others, of whom some were Gentlemen of Quality, and others Servants to the Duke, were all committed to the Tower. The Commitment of Palmer was to delude the World, for he had really betray'd the Duke, and was secur'd as an Accomplice, and then pretended to discover a Conspiracy: He declar'd, that the Duke design'd to have rais'd the People, and that when Northumberland, Northampton and Pembroke, had been invited to dine at the Lord Paget's, he determin'd to have set upon them by the Way, or to have kill'd them at Dinner; that Vane was to have two thousand Men in Readiness; Arundel was to have seiz'd on the Tower, and all the Gens d'Arms were to have been cut in Pieces. All these Particulars were related to the young King with such aggravating Circumstances, that he too easily believ'd them; and upon that was much alienated from his Uncle, as one really guilty of so shameful a Conspiracy. It was added by others, that the Duke design'd to have rais'd the City of London, and one Crane confirm'd Palmer's Testimony; so that both the Earl of Arundel, and the Lord Paget were also committed as Accomplices.

He is made Duke of Northumberland.

He causes the Protector to be sent to the Tower,

On the first of December, the unfortunate Duke was brought to his Trial: The Marquess of Wincheſter was Lord High-Steward, and twenty seven Peers sate to judge him, among whom were the Dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland, and the Earl of Pembroke. The Particulars charg'd upon him were, a Design to seize on the King's Person, to imprison the Duke of Northumberland, and to raise the City of London: But it seem'd prodigious to see Northumberland sit a Judge, when the Crime objected, was a Design against his Life; for tho' by the Law of England no Peer can be challeng'd in a Trial, yet by the Law of Nature no Man ought to judge where he is a Party: And what still made the Design appear worse, was that the Lord Chancellor, tho' a Peer, was left out, upon Suspicion of a Reconciliation, which he was making with the Duke. In this Trial, the Duke not being well skill'd in Law, neither objected to the Indictment, nor desir'd Council to plead for him, but only answer'd to Matters of Fact: 'He deny'd all Designs to raise the People, or to 'assassinate Northumberland; and if he had mention'd it, it was in Passion with-'out any Intention: And it was ridiculous to believe, that he with a small 'Troop should design to destroy the Gens d'Arms, who were nine hundred in 'Number. The armed Men he had about him, were only for his own Defence, 'he had done no hurt to his Enemies, tho' it was once very much in his Power; 'and he had surrender'd himself without making Resistance: He also desir'd the 'Witnesses might be brought Face to Face, and objected many Things against 'them, especially Palmer. But this last was not allow'd; and their Depositions were read. The King's Council pleaded upon the Statute against unlawful Assemblies; that to contrive the Death of Privy-Counsellors was Felony, and to have armed Men about him for his Defence was also Felony. The material Defence was unhappily omitted; for by that Statute those Assemblies were not Felonious, except the Parties refus'd to disperse themselves, after they were legally requir'd; and it did not appear that any such Proclamation had been been made in this Caſe. The Proofs of his raiſing Rebellion were altogether inſufficient, ſo he was acquitted of Treaſon, which immediately rais'd a mighty Shout of Joy, that was heard as far as Charing-Croſs; but this was ſoon allay'd when they heard he was found guilty of Felony, in intending to impriſon the Duke of Northumberland. During the Trial he carry'd himſelf with great Temper; and the Sharpneſs which the King's Council expreſs'd in pleading againſt him, did not provoke him to any indecent Paſſion. But when Sentence was given he ſunk a little under the Weight, and ask'd Pardon of the three Lords that were his Enemies, for his ill Deſigns againſt them, and made Sute for his Life, and for his Wife and Children. It was generally concluded, That nothing being found againſt him, but an Intention to impriſon a Privy-Counſellor which never took Effect, one ſo nearly related the King would not have ſuffer'd Death upon ſuch an Account. It was therefore neceſſary to raiſe in the King a ſtrong Averſion to him; accordingly a Story was brought to the King, as if in the Tower he had confeſs'd a Deſign of imploying ſome to aſſaſſinate thoſe Lords; and the Perſons nam'd for that impious Purpoſe, were alſo perſuaded to undertake it. This being unfortunately believ'd by the King, he took no further Care to preſerve him; and Aſſaſſination being a Crime of that barbarous Nature, it poſſeſs'd him with the utmoſt Horror, even againſt his Uncle; and therefore he was deliver'd up to the Rage of his Enemies.

He is found guilty of Felony.

Sir Michael Stanhop, Sir Miles Partridge, Sir Thomas Arundel and Sir Ralph Vane, were next brought to their Trials; the two firſt were not much pity'd, for they had made a very ill Uſe of their Intereſts in the Duke, during his Greatneſs; but the other two were much lamented. Arundel's Jury was ſhut up a whole Day and a Night; and thoſe who were for acquitting him, were compell'd by the Fury of the reſt; only that they might ſave their own Lives, and not be ſtarv'd. Vane had done noble Services in the Wars, but carry'd himſelf with a Magnanimity that was too extravagant: They were all four condemn'd, and Partridge and he were hang'd, and the other two were beheaded. As to the Duke himſelf, the Lord Chancellor Rich was now become a ſecret Friend to him; which was thus unhappily diſcover'd: He once went aſide at Council and wrote a Note, giving the Duke Notice of what was then in Agitation againſt him, and indors'd it only For the Duke, and ſent it to the Tower; but his Servant not having particular Directions, imagin'd it was for the old Duke of Norfolk, and not Somerſet, and carry'd it to him. This Duke, to make Northumberland his Friend, ſent it to him; upon which the Chancellor, underſtanding the Miſtake into which his Servant had fallen, prevented the Diſcovery, and went immediately to the King, and pretending ſome Indiſpoſitions deſir'd to be diſcharg'd; and upon that he took his Bed, ſo that it ſeem'd too barbarous to proceed any further againſt him; only the Great Seal was taken from him, and was given to the Biſhop of Ely.

Some Friends of his condemn'd.

Two Months had almoſt paſs'd between the Duke's Sentence of Condemnation and his Execution, in all which Time no one either did or could plead ſufficiently in his Favour; ſo that on the twenty ſecond Day of January, he was brought to his Scaffold on Tower-Hill. His whole Deportment was very compos'd, and agreeable to the melancholy Occaſion: He firſt kneel'd down and pray'd, and then riſing up he made a Speech to the People, 'Vindicating himſelf 'from all ill Deſigns againſt the King or Government: He confeſs'd his private 'Sins, and acknowledg'd the Mercies of God in granting him ſuch Time for 'Repentance: He declar'd he had acted ſincerely in all he did, in Matters of 'Religion, while he was in Power; and heartily rejoic'd for his being Inſtru-'mental in ſo good a Work: He exhorted the People to live ſuitably to the 'Doctrine receiv'd amongſt them; otherwiſe they were to expect ſignal Judg-'ments from Heaven. As he was proceeding, there was a prodigious Noiſe heard, like the blowing up of ſome mighty Fabrick; which ſo extreamly terrify'd the People, that many ran away without knowing the Reaſon. At the ſame

ſame Time Sir Anthony Brown came riding haſtily towards the Scaffold, which caus'd the People with the greateſt Acclamations to cry out, A Pardon, a Pardon, God ſave the King! by which it was perceiv'd how dear he was to the People. But this proving a Miſtake, the Duke in a compos'd Manner proceeded in his Speech. 'He declar'd his chearful Submiſſion to the Will of God, 'and deſir'd them likewiſe to acquieſce in it: He earneſtly pray'd for the King 'and the Council, and exhorted the People to continue obedient to them: And 'laſtly he ſincerely ask'd Forgiveneſs of all, whom at any Time he had offen-and Execution. 'ded. Then taking leave of all about him, he undreſs'd himſelf for the Block, without any Change of Countenance: He continu'd calling Lord Jeſus ſave me! 'till the Executioner ſever'd his Head from his Body.

His Character. Thus fell the Duke of Somerſet from the higheſt Places, Station and Titles in the Kingdom; a Perſon of extraordinary Virtues, of great Candor, and eminent Piety; who was always a Promoter of Juſtice, and a Patron of the Oppreſſed. He was really a better Captain than a Counſellor; and was too eaſie and open-hearted, to be ſo cautious, as ſuch Times, and ſuch Imployments requir'd. It was generally believ'd, that all this Conſpiracy, for which he and the other four ſuffer'd, was only a Forgery; all the other Accomplices were ſoon diſcharg'd, and Palmer, the chief Witneſs, became Northumberland's particular Confident; and the indiſcreet Words ſpoken by the Duke, and his gathering armed Men about him, was imputed to Palmer's Artifices, who had put him in Fear of his Life, and made him act and ſpeak thoſe Things, for which he loſt it. His four Friends did all end their Lives with the moſt ſolemn Proteſtations of their Innocence; and Vane added, That his Blood would make Northumberland's Pillow uneaſie to him. The People, tho' formerly diſguſted, were infinitely affected with this Execution, and many threw their Hankerchiefs into the Duke's Blood, to preſerve the Remembrance of him; and one Lady that met Northumberland, when he was led through the City in the next Reign, ſhook her bloody Hankerchief at him, crying, Behold the Blood of that worthy Man, that good Uncle of that excellent King, which ſhed by thy malicious Practice, does now apparently revenge it ſelf on thee. His Innocence as to this Crime, made others to believe this Puniſhment to be more the Hand of Heaven; particularly for the Attainder of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Death of the Earl of Surry, occaſion'd likewiſe by a Conſpiracy of their own Servants, in which he was thought to have been too active. It is hard to vindicate his ſacrilegious Attemps upon Churches and Biſhops Lands, which lay heavy upon him and his Family; but the frequent Remark made by modern Writers, that for that Reaſon he wanted a Heart to beg the Benefit of his Clergy, is founded upon a palpable Error. For in the Act by which he was condemn'd, it was particularly provided that no Clergy ſhould be allow'd.

A. D. 1552. Reg. 6. V. The pious King Edward, tho' very young, had liv'd to ſee the violent Deaths of his two Uncles, and was now in a great Meaſure thrown into the Hands of the aſpiring Duke of Northumberland, who was daily graſping at Power, Wealth and Grandeur. And now a new Seſſion of Parliament being met, and finding that Tonſtall Biſhop of Durham was impriſon'd upon ſome treaſonable Suſpicions, he caſt his ambitious Eye upon his Honours and Revenues: He deſign'd to erect a great Principality for his Family in the North; and the Acceſſion of the Juriſdiction of the County Palatine, lodg'd in that See, ſeem'd ſo conſiderable, that to make way to it he reſolv'd to ruin the Biſhop; who being a Man of Candor and Temper, tho' an Oppoſer of the Reformation, Cranmer ſtood up for him, and proteſted againſt a Bill of Attainder that was brought againſt him, by which he abſolutely loſt the Duke of Northumberland. Yet all the Popiſh Lords and Biſhops went along with it, and ſome Depoſitions being read amongſt them to juſtifie the Bill, it paſs'd in that Houſe; but when the Bill was ſent to the Houſe of Commons, they reſolv'd to put a Stop to that Way of condemning Men unheard. Therefore they ſent a Meſſage to the Lords, that he and his Accuſers might be heard Face to Face; which not being done, they let the Bill fall. By theſe Indications, it appear'd that the Houſe of Commons had no great Affection for this powerful Duke; and many of them had been oblig'd to the Duke of Somerſet: For which Reaſon it was reſolv'd to have a new Parliament; and this which had ſate almoſt five Years was diſſolv'd on the fifteenth Day of April.

The Common-Prayer Book eſtabliſh'd.

But before this happen'd, ſeveral conſiderable Acts were paſs'd: The firſt was to eſtabliſh the Common-Prayer Book as it was laſt amended; to which only one Earl, two Biſhops, and two Barons diſſented. 'By this the Book was ap-'pointed to be receiv'd in all Places of publick Worſhip from All-hallows next; and 'the Biſhops were requir'd to proceed by the Cenſures of the Church, againſt ſuch as 'did not come thither: They alſo authoriz'd the Book of Ordinations, and enacted 'the ſame Penalties againſt Offenders, that were in the Act for the former Book 'three Years before. Another Act paſs'd for the Marriage of the Clergy, with the Diſſent of four Earls and ſix Barons, 'Declaring that whereas the former 'Act concerning it was only thought a Permiſſion of it, as ſome other unlaw-'ful Things were conniv'd at; upon which the Wives and Children of the 'Clergy were reproachfully treated, and the Word of God was not heard with 'due Reverence, therefore their Marriages were declar'd valid and good. An Act alſo paſs'd, empowering Church-Wardens to gather Collections for the Poor, and the Biſhops to proceed againſt ſuch as refus'd to contribute; which tho' it was a Bill that tax'd the People, yet had its firſt Riſe in the Houſe of Lords. The Biſhoprick of Weſtminſter was by an Act reunited to London, only the Collegiate-Church was ſtill continu'd. As to Temporal Matters, a Bill concerning Treaſons paſs'd with little or no Oppoſition in the Houſe of Lords, but it was much oppos'd by the Commons; for the multiplying of Treaſons was always eſteem'd a Severity in the Government. One Bill was rejected, but another was paſs'd, 'If any call'd the King, or his Succeſſors, nam'd in the Statute of the thirty 'fifth of Henry VIII. Heretick, Tyrant, or other approbrious Name, the firſt 'Offence was Forfeiture of Goods, the ſecond a Premunire, and the third 'Treaſon; but if done in Printing or Writing, the firſt Offence was Treaſon. 'None were to be proſecuted for Words, but within three Months; and two 'Witneſſes were made neceſſary, who ſhould aver their Depoſitions to the Par-'ty's Face. This laſt ſeems to relate to the Proceedings againſt the Duke of Somerſet, in which the Witneſſes did not appear; when many Times Innocence and Guilt diſcover themſelves, by the Party's being confronted. As to this Duke, a Bill was ſent to the Houſe of Commons, ſign'd by the King, repealing the Settlement of his Eſtate, formerly made in Favour of his Children by his ſecond Wife, to exclude the Children by his firſt, from whom are deſcended the Seymours of Devonſhire; which ſome imputed to a Jealouſie he had of his firſt Wife, and others aſcrib'd it to the Aſcendant the ſecond Wife had over him. But the Commons were very unwilling to vacate a Settlement confirm'd in Parliament, and ſo for fifteen Days it was debated: A new Bill was drawn up, which was much alter'd, but was not quite finiſh'd 'till the Day before the Diſſolution of the Parliament.

Other Acts.

The End of the Reformation in this Reign.

In the mean Time the Convocation ſate and confirm'd the Articles of Religion that had been prepar'd the former Year; and thus was the Reformation of Worſhip and Doctrine now brought to ſuch Perfection, that ſince that Time there have been very little Alterations made in either. But another Branch of it was yet unfiniſh'd, and was now under Conſultation, touching the Government of the Church, and the Rules of the Eccleſiaſtical Courts. Great Pains and Induſtry was ſhewn by the moſt eminent Men of the Nation, to bring theſe Matters to Perfection; and at length they reduc'd all to a Method, and caſt the Work into fifty one Titles; which if put in Force and Practice, might have been of admirable Uſe to the Church: But the King's Death, and other Accidents, put an End to that noble Deſign, which was never after reaſſum'd. There were alſo at this Time Remedies under Conſideration, to correct thoſe Diſorders, of the Clergy, ariſing from their extream Poverty; but the Laity was ſo nearly concern'd in this, that there was no great Hopes of a Redreſs, 'till the King ſhould come of Age, and by his Authority recover a competent Maintenance for the Clergy, out of the Hands of thoſe who had devour'd their Revenues. Both Heath and Day, the Biſhops of Worceſter and Chicheſter, were this Year depriv'd of their Biſhopricks, by a Court of Delegates that were all Lay-Men; but it does not appear, for what Offences they were ſo cenſur'd. In every See, as it fell vacant, the beſt Manors were ſeiz'd by ſuch voracious Courtiers, as had the Intereſt to procure the Grant of them. It was thought by many, that the Biſhops Sees were ſo unmeaſurably inrich'd, that they could never be made poor enough; but ſuch Haſte and Heat was ſhown in pillaging them, that they were reduc'd to ſo low a Condition, that it was ſcarcely poſſible for a Biſhop to ſubſiſt in them. If what was thus taken had been converted to pious Uſes, and to the ſupplying the inferior Clergy, it had been ſome Mitigation of ſo heinous a Robbery: But their Lands were frequently ſnatch'd up by Lay-Men, who thought of making no Compenſation to the Church, for the Revenues thus ſwallow'd by them.

The Poverty of Clergy.

Many Agents call'd to an Account.

There was alſo at this Time a very ſtrict Enquiry made into the Accounts of all Miniſters and Agents, who had been employ'd in the former Part of the Reign; for it was believ'd that the Viſiters had embezell'd much of the Plate of the Churches; and theſe being the Creatures of the Duke of Somerſet, it caus'd Northumberland to examine and proſecute them with the utmoſt Strictneſs and Hatred. But on none did the Storm break more ſeverely than the Lord Paget; who was not only fin'd ſix thouſand Pounds, but was degraded from the Order of the Garter, with a particular Mark of Infamy on his Extraction; yet he was afterwards reſtor'd to it with as great a Degree of Honour and Applauſe. He had been a conſtant Friend to the Duke of Somerſet, and that caus'd his Enemies to execute ſo ſevere a Revenge upon him. Northumberland was induſtriouſly preparing for a new Parliament, and being a Man of an inſolent Temper, as abject in Adverſity, as ſwell'd in Proſperity, he thought the higheſt Severity the only Way to oblige the Nation to comply with his Adminiſtration; but this Method, tho' for ſome Time ſucceſsful, when he moſt needed its Support, turn'd violently upon his own Head: For nothing can ſo effectually prevail with a free People as Juſtice and Clemency in the Government.

The Encreaſe of Trade.

In this Year the good King proceeded in paying his Debts, reforming the Coin, and other Ways that might make the Nation great and wealthy; and a great Deſign was now ſetled, that prov'd to be the Foundation of all that Riches and Trade, that has ſince that Time ſo much flouriſh'd in the Nation. Henry III. had been much ſupported in his Wars by the Aſſiſtance he got from the free Towns of Germany, in Recompence of which he gave them great Privileges in England; where they were form'd into a Corporation, and liv'd in the Still-yard near London Bridge. They had ſometimes exceeded the Limits of their Charters, which were thereupon judg'd to be forfeited, but by great Preſents they purchas'd new ones: They traded in a Body, and ruin'd others by underſelling them; and by making Preſents at Court, or lending great Sums, they had the Government on their Side. Trade was now much increaſing, and Courts began to be more magnificent in Habits; ſo that there was a greater Conſumption of Cloath in particular, than formerly. Antwerp and Hamburgh, lying one near the Mouth of the Rhine, and the other at the Mouth of the Elbe, had then the chief Trade in theſe Parts of the World; and their Factors in the Still-yard had all the Markets in England in their Hands, and ſet ſuch Prizes as they pleas'd both on what they imported or exported, and broke all other Merchants to ſuch a Degree, that in the laſt Year they ſhipp'd forty thouſand Cloths, when all the other Traders had not ſhipp'd above a eleven eleven hundred. Upon this the Merchant-Adventurers complain'd of the Still-yard Men; and after ſeveral Hearings, it was judg'd that they had forfeited their Charter, and that their Company was diſſolv'd: Nor could all the earneſt Application of the Hanſe Towns, ſeconded by the Emperor's own Interceſſion, ever procure them a new Charter.

Cardan in England.

About this Time, Cardan, the great Philoſopher of that Age, paſs'd through England, as he return'd from Scotland; where the Arch-Biſhop of St. Andrews had ſent for him out of Italy, to cure him of a Dropſie: In this he had great Succeſs; but being much converſant in Aſtrology and Magick, he told him, That tho' he had ſav'd his Life, he could not change his Fate, which was to die upon a Gallows. He waited on King Edward as he return'd, who receiv'd him with great Honour and Civility; and Cardan was ſo charm'd with his mighty Knowledge and rare Qualities, that he always ſpoke of him as the moſt extraordinary Perſon he had ever ſeen: And after his Death, when Flattery could be no Advantage to him, he wrote a Character of him, in which for Learning, Parts and all Abilities, he repreſented him as a Miracle of Mankind.

The Affairs of Germany.

To conclude this Year, there was a great and unexpected Turn of Affairs in Germany. The Council was open'd at Trent, where the Emperor by means of the Spaniſh Biſhops, began ſo much to bear down the Power of the Court of Rome, that the Pope united himſelf to France, and reſolv'd to break the Council on the firſt Occaſion, and in order to that the Legates ſuſpended it for two Years. At the ſame Time Maurice of Saxony, who was ſet up by the Emperor, form'd great Deſigns, ſet up for the Liberty of Germany and the Proteſtant Religion, and took Ausburgh and ſeveral other Towns. The King of France alſo fell in upon the Empire with a great Power, and made himſelf Maſter of Metz, Toul and Verdun, and was near gaining of Strasburgh; while the Emperor was ſo ſurpriz'd and preſs'd by Maurice, that he fled into Italy. Thus that very Army and Prince, that had been chiefly inſtrumental in the Ruin of the Empire, did now aſſert its Freedom; and the Emperor's great Deſign on Germany was now ſo blaſted, that he could never after this put any Life into it: He was forc'd to diſcharge his Priſoners, call in his Proſcriptions, and by the Edict of Paſſaw allow the free Exerciſe of the Proteſtant Religion: And thus ended the Storm that had almoſt overwhelm'd the Princes of that Perſuaſion. The Emperor's Misfortunes increas'd upon him; for againſt all Reaſon he beſieg'd Metz in December, but after he had waſted his Army before it, he was compell'd to raiſe the Siege. Upon that he retir'd into Flanders, in ſuch Diſcontent, that for ſome Time he would admit none to come near him. Here it was believ'd that he firſt form'd that Deſign, which ſome Years after he effected, of forſaking the World, and exchanging the Magnificence of a Court for the Retirement of a Monaſtery. As to the Council of Trent, we may diſmiſs the Subject with obſerving, That this Council had been much deſir'd both by Princes and Biſhops, in hopes of compoſing the Differences of Religion, and reforming the Corruptions of Rome, which caus'd the Popes to be very apprehenſive of it: But ſuch was the Subtilty of the Legates, the Voices of the Italian Biſhops, and the Diſſenſions of the Europæan Princes, that it had Effects directly contrary to what all Sides expected. The Breaches in Religion were now put paſt Reconciliation, by the poſitive Deciſions they made; the Abuſes of the Court of Rome were confirm'd by the Proviſo's for the Privileges of the Apoſtolick See; and the World was ſo cured of the Longings for a General Council, that none has been deſir'd ſince that Time.

An Account of the Council of Trent.

A. D. 1553. Reg. 7.

We are now arriv'd at the laſt and fatal Year of this young King's Life and Reign; and the firſt thing done was a Regulation of the Privy-Council, where ſeveral Committees had proper Work aſſign'd them, and Directions given them for their Conduct; of which there remains an exact Account corrected with King Edward's own Hand. A new Parliament was alſo call'd, the ſecond in this Reign, which ſate the firſt of March; where a Motion was made for a Subſidy of two Tenths, and two Fifteenths to be paid in two Years, which was granted. At the paſſing of the Bill, a great Debate aroſe in the Houſe of Commons, which ſeems to have been concerning the Preamble; for it contain'd a high Accuſation of the Duke of Somerſet's Adminiſtration, which was promoted by the Duke of Northumberland's Party, to make the King ſenſible how well pleas'd the Repreſentatives of the Nation were with his Fall. At this Time the Sons of the Nobility and Gentry had frequently Prebends given them, under a Pretext of following their Studies, and fitting themſelves for Holy Orders; which was like to be very prejudicial to the Clergy, when ſo many Church Dignities were in Lay-Hands. Therefore the Biſhops procur'd a Bill to be paſs'd in the Houſe of Lords, that no one might hold ſuch, who was not either Prieſt or Deacon; but at the third Reading, it was thrown out by the Commons. Another Bill paſs'd for ſuppreſſing the Biſhoprick of Durham, and erecting two new Sees, the one at Durham, and the other at Newcaſtle; but tho' the Secular Juriſdiction of that See was given to the Duke of Northumberland, yet the King's Death ſtopt the further Progreſs of this Affair. Biſhop Tonſtall was depriv'd, as Heath and Day were, by a Court of Lay-Delegates, upon the Informations that had been brought againſt him of Miſpriſion of Treaſon, and was kept in the Tower 'till Queen Mary ſet him at Liberty. At the End of the Parliament the King granted a general Pardon, and ſo diſſolv'd that Body on the laſt Day of March, after but one Month's Seſſion. For it ſeems either the Duke of Northumberland was not pleas'd with the Proceedings of the Houſe of Commons, or that he was reſolv'd to call frequent Parliaments, and wholly to vary from the Meaſures of the Duke of Somerſet.

It is diſſolv'd.

Another Viſitation of Churches.

Shortly after Viſiters were ſent out to examine what Plate was in every Church, and to leave them one or two Chalices of Silver, with Linnen, for the Communion-Table and for Surplices, and to bring in all other Things of Value to the Treaſurer of the King's Houſhold, and to ſell the reſt, and give it to the Poor. This was ſtill a new Rifling of Churches, by which it appear'd ſome were reſolv'd not to deſiſt, 'till they had reduc'd them to a Primitive Poverty, as well as the Reformers deſign'd to have rais'd them to a Primitive Purity. The King himſelf ſet his Hand to theſe Inſtructions; from which ſome have ſeverely inferr'd, That he was ill principled in himſelf, when at ſuch an Age he join'd his Authority to ſuch Proceedings. But he was now in his laſt Sickneſs, and ſo weak, that it is probable he ſet his Hand to every Thing ſent him by the Council, without anxiouſly examining the Contents of it. He had now contracted great Colds by violent Exerciſes, which in January ſetled into a deep Cough; and all Medicines proving ineffectual, there was a ſtrong Suſpicion blown and ſpread over all Europe, that he was poiſon'd: But of that we find no certain and convincing Proofs.

The King's laſt Sickneſs.

During his Sickneſs, Biſhop Ridley preach'd before him, and took an Occaſion to launch out in the Subject of Charity, and the Obligations that lay on Men of high Condition to be eminent in Works of that Nature. This ſo ſenſibly touch'd the pious King, that immediately after Sermon he ſent for the good Biſhop; and commanding him to ſit down and be cover'd, he reſum'd moſt of the Heads of the Sermon, and declar'd, That he look'd upon himſelf, in his Station, to be principally concern'd in it; deſiring, as he had already given him the Exhortation in general, to direct him how to perform his Duty in that Particular. The Biſhop, aſtoniſh'd and overjoy'd at the generous Tenderneſs of ſo young a Prince, broke out into Tears and Tranſports to find ſuch noble Inclinations; and told him he muſt take time to conſult with the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen about a Matter of that Importance; upon which the King wrote by him to them to conſult ſpeedily how the Poor ſhould be reliev'd. After ſome Conſideration, the Biſhop brought the King a Scheme of ſeveral Foun-

Foundations, one for the Sick and Wounded, another for ſuch as were wilfully Idle or Mad, and a third for Orphans. Upon which he made ſeveral munificent Endowments, St. Bartholomew's Hoſpital for the Firſt, his Palace at Bridewell for the Second, and Chriſt-Church near Newgate for the Third; and alſo he enlarg'd the Grant he made the former Year, for St. Thomas's Hoſpital in Southwark. And when he ſet his Hand to theſe Foundations, which was done upon the twenty ſixth Day of June, he heartily thank'd God for prolonging his Life, 'till he had finiſh'd that good Deſign. Theſe Houſes, by good Government, and the Charities of others, continu'd to be ſo uſeful, and became ſo well endow'd, that now they may be reckon'd among the nobleſt Foundations in Europe.

His noble Foundations.

Before theſe were compleated, ſeveral Marriages were at once ſolemniz'd by means of the Duke of Northumberland: The Duke of Suffolk had only three Daughters, the eldeſt of whom was marry'd to the Lord Guilford Dudley, younger Son to Northumberland, the ſecond to the Earl of Pembroke's Son, and the third, who was crooked, to one Keys the King's Groom-Porter; and Northumberland to ſtrengthen his Family alſo marry'd his own two Daughters, the one to Sir Henry Sidney, and the other to the Earl of Huntington's eldeſt Son. Theſe Marriages at this Time were much obſerv'd; and the People were highly inflam'd againſt the inſolent Duke, for it was generally reported, that he was Sacrificing the King to his own extravagant Ambition. He ſeem'd little to regard their Cenſures, but conſtantly attending the languiſhing King, he reſolv'd to improve all the Apprehenſions he had concerning Religion, to the Advantage of his Son's Wife the Lady Jane Gray. The King was eaſily perſuaded to order the Judges and his learned Council to put ſome Articles, which he had ſign'd for the Succeſſion of the Crown, into the common Form of Law. They anſwer'd, That the Succeſſion being already ſetled by Act of Parliament, it could not be alter'd by any other Power; yet ſtill the King requir'd them to perform what he had commanded. The next Time they came to the Council, they further declar'd, That it was made Treaſon to change the Succeſſion by any Act paſs'd in this Reign, ſo they could not concern themſelves in it. Montague was Chief Juſtice, and ſpoke in the Name of the reſt; upon which Northumberland flew into a violent Paſſion againſt him, and call'd him Traitor, for not obeying the King's Commands; the common Language of an Arbitrary Miniſter who acts againſt Law. But the Judges were not ſhaken by his Threatnings; and when they were again brought before the King, who ſharply rebuk'd them for their Delays, they ſaid, That all they could do would be of no Force without a Parliament. Upon which the King ſaid, He would call a Parliament ſhortly, and have it ratify'd there; and requir'd them to do it in the beſt Manner they could. At laſt Montague deſir'd that they might have a Pardon, for what they were to do; and that being granted, all the Judges, except Goſnald and Hales, agreed to ſign the Patent, and deliver'd their Opinions, That the Lord Chancellor might put the Seal, and then it would be good in Law: Yet Goſnald was at laſt prevail'd upon to ſign it, ſo Hales was the only Man who intirely ſtood out; who tho' he was a zealous Proteſtant, yet would not give his Opinion againſt his Conſcience, upon any Conſiderations whatſoever. The Privy-Counſellors were next requir'd to ſet their Hands to it: Cecil, in a Relation he wrote of this Tranſaction, ſays, That hearing ſome of the Judges declare ſo poſitively, that it was againſt Law, he refus'd to ſet his Hand to it as a Privy-Counſellor, but ſign'd it only as a Witneſs to the King's Subſcription. Cranmer long ſtood out, he came not to the Council when it was paſs'd there, and refus'd to conſent when he was urg'd to it; for he ſaid, He would never be concern'd in the diſinheriting his late Maſter's Daughters. But the dying young King was at laſt ſet upon him, and being aſſur'd by the beſt Lawyers That he might legally Subſcribe,

He is perſuaded to leave the Crown to the Lady Jane Gray.

For which a Patent is ſign'd.

Subſcribe, he was prevail'd upon by Importunity, and the threatning Proſpects of Religion.

In the whole Courſe of the King's Sickneſs, he expreſs'd a great Submiſſion to the Will of God, and ſeem'd pleas'd at the gradual Approaches of Death; only the Conſideration of Religion and the Church ſenſibly touch'd him, and upon that account he ſaid, He was deſirous of Life. When the Phyſicians began to deſpair of his Recovery, a confident Woman undertook his Cure, and he was put into her Hands; but ſhe left him in a worſe Condition than ſhe found him; all which increas'd the Jealouſie of the Duke of Northumberland, who had introduc'd her, and remov'd his Phyſicians. At laſt to crown all his Deſigns, he procur'd the King to write to his Siſters to deſire them to come and divert him in his Sickneſs; and the Buſineſs of the Excluſion had been carry'd ſo ſecretly, that they apprehending no Danger, had already begun their Journey. Shortly after he felt Death nearly approaching, and prepar'd himſelf for it after the moſt ſolemn and devout Manner. His whole Exerciſe was in ſhort Prayers and Ejaculations; and a few Moments before his Death he was heard, with the utmoſt Reſignation to pray earneſtly, That God would deliver him out of this miſerable and wretched Life: He committed his Spirit to him, and interceded very fervently for his Subjects, that God would preſerve England from Popery, and maintain his true Religion amongſt them. Seeing ſome about him, he ſeem'd concern'd that they were ſo near, and had heard him; but then with a ſmiling Countenance he ſaid, He had been praying to God. Soon after, the Pangs of Death coming upon him, he ſaid to Sir Henry Sidney, who tenderly embrac'd him in his Arms, I am faint, Lord have Mercy on me, and receive my Spirit! And thus calmly breath'd out his pious Soul, upon the ſixth Day of July, in the ſixteenth Year of his Age, after a moſt Religious Reign of ſix Years, five Months, and nine Days.

The King's laſt Hours.

His Death.

His Character. Concerning the Perſonage of this admirable young Prince, he was of a ſtrait and well-proportion'd Body, of a ſweet and beautiful Aſpect, eſpecially in his Eyes, which ſeem'd to have a ſtarry Livelineſs and Luſtre in them. As there was a great Vivacity in his Looks, ſo the Beauties and Perfections of his Mind were incomparable for his Age. He was not only learned in the Tongues, and the Liberal Sciences, but was well skill'd in the State of his Kingdom: He kept a Table-Book, in which he had writ the Characters of all the eminent Men in the Nation; he ſtudy'd Fortification, underſtood the Mint, and knew all the Ports, Havens and Harbours in his Dominions, with the Depth of the Water and Way of Acceſs to them. He was ſo well vers'd in Foreign Affairs, that the Ambaſſadors that were ſent into England, publiſh'd extraordinary Things of him in all the Courts of Europe. He had great Quickneſs of Apprehenſion, but being diffident of his Memory, he took Notes of every material Thing he heard, in Greek Characters, which he afterwards copy'd out fair in the Journal he kept. His Virtues were admirable, being truly juſt and merciful in his Diſpoſition; and taking ſpecial Care of the Petitions that were given him by the poor and oppreſs'd. But his pious Zeal for Religion crown all the reſt; which did not proceed from an angry Heat, but from a true Tenderneſs of Conſcience, founded on the Love of God, and his Fellow-Creatures. Theſe extraordinary Qualities, adorn'd with a charming Sweetneſs and Affability, made him univerſally belov'd by all his People. Some call'd him their Joſias, others Edward the Saint, and others the Phœnix that roſe out of his Mother's Aſhes; and all concluded that the Sins of England muſt have been very great, ſince they provok'd God to ſnatch away ſo ſignal a Bleſſing from the Nation. As to the Reign it ſelf it was generally weak and tumultuous, defam'd by Sacrilege, and diſtracted by Parties and Factions. Great Complaints were made by good Men of the Vices of this Time, which were grown ſo common, that many Men became Strangers to all Shame. Luxury, Oppreſſion, ſion, and a Hatred to Religion had over-run the higher Rank of the People, who countenanc'd the Reformation meerly to rob the Church; by which and their other Practices, they became a Scandal to ſo noble a Work. Such open Offence was given by the Spoil made of ſo many rich Endowments, that they who underſtood little of Religion, labour'd under great Prejudices againſt any Thing that was advanc'd by ſuch mercenary Inſtruments. And theſe Things, as they rous'd up the Vengeance of Heaven, ſo they diſpos'd the People much to that diſmal Cataſtrophe in the following Reign.

The Reign of Queen MARY the First.

Containing 5 Years, 4 Months, and 11 Days.

A. D. 1553. Reg. 0.

I. THE mighty Changes and violent Oppoſitions made in the Reign of the late King Henry, caus'd the Engliſh Government to be much weaken'd and diſunited; and in his Son's Reign, whoſe Minority was an inſuperable Diſadvantage, the Members of that Government became ſtill more relax'd and disjointed; all which were Divine Judgments due to the Sins and Corruptions of the People. But before the Time came, that God was pleas'd to reſtore the Glory of a degenerate Nation, he thought fit to puniſh it with a Reign more calamitous and diſhonourable than the worſt Years of the two laſt; which was unfortunately introduc'd by an Interregnum, and the ſetting up a popular, but unexpected Title. For by King Edward's Death, according to King Henry's Will and an Act of Parliament, the Crown devolv'd upon his eldeſt Siſter Mary; who was now in her Way to London, in Obedience to the Letter written to her to come and viſit her Brother in his Sickneſs. She was come within half a Day's Journey of the Court, when ſhe receiv'd private Advice from the Earl of Arundel that her Brother was dead, and what was done concerning the Lady Jane's Succeſſion; and likewiſe that the King's Death was conceal'd, with a Deſign to enſnare her before ſhe knew of it; and therefore he adviſ'd her to retire. At firſt ſhe was at a great Loſs, but recollecting that the Duke of Northumberland was much hated in Norfolk, for the great Slaughter he had made of Ket's People in the laſt Reign, ſhe therefore choſe to go that way to the Caſtle of Framingham in Suffolk: Which Place being of Strength, Strength, and not far from the Sea, if her Deſigns ſhould miſcarry, ſhe might have an Opportunity from thence to fly over to the Emperor, who was then in Flanders.

But before ſhe arriv'd there, ſhe wrote on the ninth of July to the Council, and let them know She underſtood that her Brother was dead, by which ſhe was to ſucceed to the Crown, but was ſurpriz'd ſhe had no Account from them: She was ſenſible in what Conſultations they were ingag'd; but ſhe was willing to pardon all that was tranſacted, to ſuch as would return to their Duty, and proclaim her Title to the Crown. Upon this Letter, they found the King's Death could be no longer conceal'd; therefore the Dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland repair'd to Durham Houſe, where the Lady Jane lodg'd, and acknowledg'd her for their Soveraign Queen. As ſhe had a moſt tender Affection for the King, ſo his Death was a great Affliction to her; and the new Proſpect of a Crown, rather increas'd than diminiſh'd her Sorrow. She was a Lady that ſeem'd born to the higheſt Fortunes; and being ſixteen Years of Age, had all the Excellencies and Perfections both of Body and Mind. Her Tutor was Doctor Elmer, from whom ſhe learn'd the Latin and Greek Tongues to a mighty Perfection: And delighting much in Study, ſhe imbib'd the Precepts of true Morality ſo early, that as ſhe was not tainted with the Levities, not to ſay Vices of thoſe of her Age and Condition, ſo ſhe attain'd to the Practice of the higheſt Notions of Philoſophy. Roger Aſcham, Tutor to the Princeſs Elizabeth, coming to wait on her at her Father's Houſe in Leiceſterſhire, found her reading Plato's Works in Greek, while the reſt of the Family were hunting in the Park, he ask'd her, How ſhe could be abſent from ſuch pleaſant Diverſions? She anſwer'd, The Pleaſures of the Park were but Shadows to what ſhe had been in reading Plato's Phedon; and added, That ſhe eſteem'd it one of the greateſt Bleſſings God had given her, That ſhe had ſharp Parents and a gentle Schoolmaſter, which made her delight ſo much in her Studies. She read the Scriptures much, and had attain'd great Knowledge in Divinity; and yet with all theſe Advantages of Birth and Parts, ſhe was ſo humble, ſo gentle, and pious, that ſhe charm'd all Perſons that knew her, and none more than the late King, who was about the ſame Age, and with all his Abilities was judg'd inferior to her in Learning. In thoſe ſudden Turns of her Condition, as ſhe was not exalted at the View of a Throne; ſo ſhe was as little dejected, when her Palace was made her Priſon. The only Paſſion ſhe ſhew'd was that of the nobleſt Kind, in the Concern ſhe expreſs'd for her Father and Husband, who fell with her, and ſeemingly on her Account, tho' really Northumberland's Ambition, and her Father's Weakneſs ruin'd her. When the Crown was firſt offer'd by them, ſhe rejected it, declaring, She knew, that of Right it belong'd to the late King's Siſters, and ſo ſhe could not with a good Conſcience aſſume it. But it was told her, That both the Judges and Privy-Counſellors had declar'd, that it fell to her according to Law; which being join'd with the Importunities of her Husband, who had more of his Father's Temper, than of her Philoſophy, caus'd her at laſt to ſubmit.

The Council ſets up the Lady Jane Gray.

Her Character.

Upon this, Orders were given for proclaiming her Queen the next Day; and the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, with twenty more of the Nobility and Privy-Council, ſet their Hands to a Letter written to the Princeſs Mary, letting her know, That Queen Jane was now their Soveraign, according to the ancient Laws of the Land, and the late King's Letters Patents; and that the Marriage between her Father and Mother was declar'd null by the Laws of God and Man: Therefore they requir'd her to recede from her Pretenſions, and ſubmit to the preſent Eſtabliſhment; promiſing, That if ſhe ſhew'd her ſelf obedient, they would be all ready to do her any Service that was conſiſtent with their Duties. On the following Day they proclaim'd Queen Jane; in which Proclamation they ſet forth, 'That the late King had by Patent excluded both 'his Siſters, who had been illegitimated by Sentences paſs'd in the Eccleſiaſtical

She is proclaim'd Queen.

'Courts, and confirm'd in Parliament; and at beſt they were only his Siſters 'by the half Blood, and ſo not inheritable by the Laws of England. There 'was alſo cauſe to fear, that they might marry Strangers, and change the Laws, 'and ſubject the Nation to the Tyranny of the See of Rome. Next to them 'the Crown fell to the Dutcheſs of Suffolk; and it was provided, that if ſhe 'ſhould have no Sons, when the King dy'd, the Crown ſhould devolve on her 'Daughter, who was born and marry'd in the Kingdom: Upon which they 'aſſerted her Right, as ſhe promis'd to maintain the true Religion, and the 'Laws of the Land. When this was proclaim'd, great Multitudes were gather'd to hear it; but there were very few that ſhouted with the Acclamations ordinary on this Occaſion. And whereas a Vintner's Boy expreſs'd ſome Scorn, when he heard the Proclamation, he was the next Day ſet in a Pillory, and had his Ears nail'd to it; while a Herald in his Coat read the Nature of his Offence to the People, who were call'd together by the Sound of Trumpets.

Various Cenſures upon it.

Upon this Proclamation the People were in great Diſtractions, and variety of Cenſures and Opinions paſs'd upon it. Thoſe who look'd upon the King of England's Power to proceed immediately from God, ſaid it muſt deſcend only by Inheritance; and ſince the King's Siſters were under Sentences of Illegitimation, it ought to deſcend to the young Queen of Scotland, who was the next Heir. Others ſaid, that tho' a Prince were nam'd immediately by God, yet upon great Reaſons he might alter the Succeſſion from its uſual Courſe, as David preferr'd Solomon to Adonijah: But it was ſaid this did not belong to the Kings of England, whoſe Rights and Prerogatives did not ariſe from any Divine Deſignation, but from a long Poſſeſſion and the Laws of the Land; therefore as the King could by Law limit the Prerogative, ſo he could likewiſe limit the Succeſſion of the Crown; which had been the Opinion of Sir Thomas More. Others alledg'd Charles Brandon's Iſſue by the French Queen to be illegitimate, upon a Suppoſition of a prior Marriage with one Mortimer. Others demanded, if the Right of Blood could not be cut off, why was the Scotch Queen excluded? Then as to half Blood, it was ſaid to be only a Rule in Law for private Families, which did not extend to the Crown. The Power of limiting the Succeſſion by Patent or Teſtament was ſaid to be only a Perſonal Truſt in King Henry VIII. and that it did not deſcend to his Heirs, ſo that King Edward's Patents were thought to be of no Force. Then the Severity againſt the Vintner's Boy in the beginning of a dubious Title, was thought a great Error in Policy; it being a well grounded Maxim, That all Governments ought to begin with Acts of Clemency, and to affect the Love rather than the Fear of the People. And Northumberland's Proceeding againſt the late Protector, by a foul Conſpiracy, and the Suſpicions he lay under of being the Author of the late King's untimely Death, begot a violent Averſion in the People to him; which much diſpos'd them to ſet up the Princeſs Mary.

Many repair to the Princeſs Mary in Suffolk.

Queen Jane was proclaim'd in many Towns near London, yet the People were generally running to the Princeſs Mary, who now at Framingham Caſtle declar'd her ſelf Queen of England. Many from Norfolk repair'd to her, and a greater Body of Suffolk Gentlemen and others gather'd about her, who were all for the Reformation. They urg'd her to declare whether ſhe would alter the Religion eſtabliſh'd by the late King's Reign; to whom ſhe gave full and ſolemn Aſſurances, That ſhe would make no Innovation or Change, but would be ſatisfy'd with the private Exerciſe of her own Religion. Upon which they were poſſeſs'd with ſuch a firm Belief of her Sincerity, that they reſolv'd to hazard their Lives and Eſtates in the Cauſe of one, who had given them ſuch faithful Promiſes. The Earls of Bath and Suſſex rais'd Forces, and join'd with her; as likewiſe did the Sons of the Lord Wharton and Mordant, with many others. When the Council heard of this, they ſent the Earl of Huntington's Brother to raiſe Men in Buckinghamſhire, and then to join the Forces that ſhould be ſent from London to New-Market. The Duke of Northumber- land, as the moſt valiant and ſafe Commander, was order'd to be General of the Army; but he was much confounded and diſtracted in his Thoughts. He found it of equal Importance to preſerve London and the Privy-Counſellors in a ſteady Fidelity, as to conduct the Army with Exactneſs; and a Miſcarriage of either of theſe was ſure to be fatal to him. So that he could ſcarcely reſolve in what Manner to proceed; he wanted a Man of Firmneſs and Spirit to leave behind him; and yet it was abſolutely neceſſary at once to diſſipate the Forces that were daily increaſing about Queen Mary. Queen Jane and the Council were by his Means remov'd to the Tower, not only for State, according to the Cuſtom of former Princes, but alſo for Security; for here the Council were under Commmand, and in effect Priſoners. He could do no more, but lay a ſtrict Charge on the Council, to adhere firmly to Queen Jane's Intereſts; and ſo he march'd out of London on the fourteenth Day of July with ſix thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe. But as he rod through the Streets, tho' there were great Crouds of Spectators, no one cry'd out to wiſh him Succeſs; which gave a melancholy Indication how ill they were affected to him.

Northumberland marches againſt her.

In the mean Time the Council us'd all Methods for their own Security, and gave the Emperor Notice of the Lady Jane's Succeſſion, and complain'd of the Diſturbance that was rais'd by the other Competitor, and that his Ambaſſador had too officiouſly intermedled in their Affairs; but the Emperor would not ſo much as receive their Letters. Biſhop Ridley was appointed to preach upon Queen Jane's Title, and to animate the People againſt Queen Mary; which he too raſhly obey'd. At the ſame Time Northumberland being at Cambridge, where he was both Chancellor and Steward, caus'd the Vice-Chancellor to preach to the ſame Purpoſe; but he kept to ſuch general Terms, that no great Offence was given. By this Time Queen Mary had caus'd her ſelf to be proclaim'd at Norwich; and ſent Letters all over England, requiring the Peers, and others of Quality, to come to her Aſſiſtance. Some Ships had been ſent to lye on that Coaſt for intercepting her, if ſhe ſhould fly away; but thoſe who commanded them were ſo manag'd, that inſtead of acting againſt her, they declar'd for her. Sir Edward Haſtings having rais'd four thouſand Men in Buckinghamſhire, inſtead of joining the Duke of Northumberland, went over with them into her Service; and her Forces daily increaſing, ſhe was proclaim'd Queen in ſeveral Counties. All which made the Privy-Council now to ſee their Danger, and to contrive how to free themſelves: The Earl of Arundel hated the Duke of Northumberland; the Marqueſs of Wincheſter was dextrous in ſhifting Sides for his Advantage; the Earl of Pembroke's Son had marry'd Queen Jane's Siſter, which made him think it neceſſary to provide for his own Safety by a ſpeedy Turn; and to theſe many others were join'd. They now pretended that it was neceſſary to give an Audience to the foreign Ambaſſadors, who would not receive it in the Tower; and the Earl of Pembroke's Houſe was fix'd upon, he being leaſt ſuſpected. They alſo reported it was neceſſary to treat with the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, for ſending more Forces to the Duke of Northumberland, concerning which he had very earneſtly writ to them. But as ſoon as they were got out, the Earl of Arundel preſs'd them to declare for Queen Mary; laying open all the Cruelties of Northumberland, under whoſe Tyranny they muſt reſolve to be enſlav'd, if they did not now ſhake it off. Upon this they ſent for the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and eaſily perſuaded them to concur with them; and ſo they went immediately to Cheapſide, and proclaim'd Queen Mary on the nineteenth Day of July; and from thence they repair'd to St. Paul's, where Te Deum was ſung. They ſent next to the Tower, requiring the Duke of Suffolk to quit the Government of that Place, and the Lady Jane to lay down the Title of Queen; to which ſhe ſubmitted with as much Greatneſs of Mind, as her Father did with Abjectneſs of Spirit. They alſo ſent Orders to Northumberland to diſmiſs his Forces, and to obey Queen Mary; and the Earl of Arundel and the Lord Paget were ſent to carry this joyful News to her, who ſtill continu'd at Framingham Caſtle. And thus ended the Reign of Queen Jane, which continu'd no longer than nine Days. She in no manner conſented either to the Receiving, or the Poſſeſſing of her imaginary Kingdoms; but having always fear'd there ſtood a Scaffold ſecretly behind the Throne, ſhe was as well prepar'd to act her Part upon one, as ſhe did upon the other.

The End of Queen Jane's Reign.

When the Duke of Northumberland heard of this Turn of Affairs, he reſolv'd to ſwim with the Stream, and without ſtaying for Orders, he diſcharg'd his Forces, and went to the Market-Place at Cambridge, and proclaim'd the Queen, throwing his own Hat up for Joy, and crying God ſave Queen Mary! But this would not ſecure him; for the next Morning the Earl of Arundel came from the Queen to arreſt him; and when he was brought to him, he ſunk at once, and fell proſtrate at his Feet to beg his Favour, as it is uſual with a Mind ſwell'd with Ambition, which out of meaſure turns inſolent or abject, with the various Changes of Fortune. He, and three of his Sons, and Sir Thomas Palmer, who was his wicked Inſtrument againſt the Duke of Somerſet, were all ſent Priſoners to the Tower. And now all the People went to implore the Queen's Favour, and Biſhop Ridley among the reſt; but he was ſent to the Tower; for ſhe was both offended with him for his Sermon, and reſolv'd to reſtore Bonner again to the See of London. Some of the Judges, and ſeveral Noblemen were alſo ſent thither, among the reſt the Duke of Suffolk. But three Days after the laſt was ſet at Liberty; for he being a weak Man, and not very dangerous to the State, was fix'd upon as the firſt Inſtance of the Queen's Clemency at her Acceſſion to the Throne. As the Queen came towards London ſhe was met on the Way by her Siſter Elizabeth, with a thouſand Horſe, who came to ſhew their Zeal to maintain both their Titles, which in the late Conteſt had been ſo cloſely ally'd. She made her Entry into London with extraordinary Pomp and Solemnity; and coming to the Tower, ſhe gave Liberty to ſeveral conſiderable Perſons, as the old Duke of Norfolk, who hadbeen almoſt ſeven Years Priſoner; Biſhop Gardiner, who had been five Years there; the Dutcheſs of Somerſet, who had been kept there near two Years; and the Lord Courtney, Son to the Marqueſs of Exeter, who had been detain'd fifteen Years, ever ſince his Father's Attainder. So now ſhe was peaceably ſetled in the Throne, without any Effuſion of Blood; having broke through a Confederacy againſt her, which ſeem'd to be ſo ſtrong, that if the chief Head of it had not been univerſally odious to the Nation, it could not have been ſo eaſily diſſipated.

Queen Mary enters London.

A. D. 1553. Reg. 1.

II. Queen Mary was thirty ſeven Years of Age when ſhe came to the Crown; being a Lady of great Virtues, and ſtrict in her Religion even to Superſtition. Her Temper was generous, but much corrupted by Melancholy, which was partly natural to her, but much encreas'd by the croſs Accidents of her Life, both before and after her Advancement; ſo that ſhe became ſower and ſplenatick, and had too much of the Spaniſh Moroſeneſs. She adher'd ſo reſolutely to her Mother's Intereſts, that it was believ'd her Father once deſign'd to have taken her Life: Upon which her Mother wrote a very devout Letter to her, charging her to truſt in God, and keep her ſelf pure, and to obey the King in all things, except in Matters of Religion; and ſent her two Books in Latin for her Entertainment, St. Jerom's Epiſtles, and a Book of the Life of Chriſt. The King's Diſpleaſure was then ſo great, that neither the Duke of Norfolk, nor Gardiner, durſt venture to intercede for her: Cranmer was the only Man that would hazard himſelf, and did it ſo effectually as intirely to prevail with the King. But after her Mother's Death, ſhe hearken'd to other Councils; ſo that upon Anne Bolen's Fall ſhe made a full Submiſſion to him, as was formerly mention'd. She alſo in many Letters, which ſhe wrote both to her Father and to Cromwell, ſolemnly proteſted great Sorrow for her former mer Obſtinacy, and declar'd, That ſhe put her Soul into his Hands, and that her Conſcience ſhould be always directed by him: And being ask'd what her Opinion was concerning Pilgrimages, Purgatory and Relicks, ſhe anſwer'd, That ſhe had no Opinion, but ſuch as ſhe receiv'd from the King, who had her whole Heart in his keeping; and might imprint upon it, in theſe and all other Matters, whatever his meſtimable Virtue, exalted Wiſdom, and excellent Learning ſhould think convenient for her. So perfectly had ſhe learn'd the Stile, that ſhe knew was moſt acceptable to her Father. After that, ſhe was in all Points obedient to him; and during her Brother's Reign, ſhe only pleaded for that way of Worſhip, that was in uſe at her Father's Death.

Her preſent Deſigns.

But now being come to the Crown, notwithſtanding her Promiſes to the Suffolk Gentlemen to ſtand by her Brother's Religion, neither that, nor her Father's could ſatisfie her; yet when ſhe thought where to fix, ſhe was diſtracted between two different Schemes that were preſented to her. Gardiner, and all that had comply'd in the former Times, mov'd, That at firſt ſhe ſhould bring all Things back to the ſame State they had been fix'd, when her Father dy'd; and after that by eaſie and regular Steps ſhe might again return to a full Obedience to the See of Rome. But ſhe her ſelf was more inclin'd to return immediately into the Boſom of the Romiſh Church; and ſhe thought ſhe could not any other way be legitimated, but in this ſhe was in danger of proceeding too haſtily. Gardiner finding that Political Maxims made no great Impreſſion upon her, and that he was eſteem'd by her as a ſubtle temporizing Man, addreſs'd himſelf to the Emperor, who better underſtood Government and Mankind; and undertook, that if he would procure him to be Chancellor, he would ſo manage Affairs, that in a ſhort Time he would effect all things to the Queen's Deſire; and that there was no Danger but in her making too large Steps, and being ſo much govern'd by Italian Councils: For he underſtood that ſhe had already ſent for Cardinal Pool. The People had a ſtrong Averſion to the Papal Authority, and the Nobility and Gentry were apprehenſive of loſing the Abby-Lands; therefore it was neceſſary gradually and ſlowly to remove thoſe Prejudices. He alſo aſſur'd the Emperor, That he would zealouſly ſerve all his Intereſts, and ſhew'd him how neceſſary it was to ſtop the coming of Cardinal Pool, who ſtood attainted by Act of Parliament; and in this he was the more urgent, becauſe he knew the Cardinal hated him. The Emperor upon this wrote ſo effectually to the Queen to depend upon Gardiner's Counſels, that on the thirteenth of Auguſt he was made Lord Chancellor, and the Conduct of Affairs put chiefly into his Hands. The old Duke of Norfolk was alſo much regarded by the Queen, who being now at liberty, alledg'd that he was never truly Attainted, and that it was no legal Act that had paſs'd againſt him; by which Plea he recover'd his Eſtate, and all the Grants that had been made out of it, were declar'd void at Common Law.

Biſhop Gardiner's Contrivances.

He is made Lord Chancellor.

He was made Lord High-Steward for the Trial of the Duke of Northumberland, with his Son the Earl of Warwick, and the Marqueſs of Northampton. All that they pleaded for themſelves lay in two Points; the one was, Whether any thing acted by Order of Council, and the Authority of the Great Seal, could be Treaſon? The other was, Whether ſuch as were as guilty as themſelves, could ſit and judge them? The Judges anſwer'd, That the Great Seal, or Privy-Council of one that was not lawful Queen, could give no Authority, nor Indemnity: And, That all Peers who were not convicted by Record, might legally judge them. Theſe Points being determin'd againſt them, they pleaded Guilty, and ſubmitted to the Queen's Mercy; ſo Sentence paſs'd upon them: And the next Day Sir John Gates, Sir Thomas Palmer, and ſome others, were try'd and condemn'd: But of all theſe, it was reſolv'd, that only Northumberland, Gates and Palmer ſhould ſuffer. Biſhop Heath was appointed to attend on Northumberland, and to prepare him for Death: He then profeſs'd He had always been of the old Religion in his Heart, and had comply'd ply'd againſt his Conſcience; but whether it was true, or ſpoken in Hopes of Life, as it cannot be certainly known, ſo it ſhews he had but little Religion, either in his Life, or at his Death. But he was a Man of ſuch a high Temper, that it was reſolv'd to put him out of a Capacity of revenging himſelf upon his Enemies: So on the twenty ſecond of Auguſt, he and the other two were beheaded. There paſt ſome Expoſtulations between him and Gates, each accuſing the other as the Author of their Ruin; but they were ſeemingly reconcil'd, and profeſs'd they forgave one another. The Duke made a long Speech, confeſſing his former ill Life, and the Juſtice of the Sentence againſt him; 'He 'exhorted the People to ſtand to the Religion of their Anceſtors, and to reject 'all Novelties, and to drive the Preachers of them out of the Nation; and de-'clar'd he had temporiz'd againſt his Conſcience, and that he was always of 'the Religion of his Fore-Fathers. And thus dy'd the ambitious Duke of Northumberland; who was an extraordinary Man, 'till he was rais'd very high: But that tranſported him beyond Meaſure, and he was ſo ſtrangely chang'd in the laſt Paſſages of his Life, that it increas'd the Jealouſies of his having haſten'd King Edward's Death; and that the Horrors of that Guilt did ſo haunt him, that both the Judgment and Courage ſhown in the former Parts of his Life, ſeem'd now to have quite abandon'd him. However the Duke of Somerſet's Blood lay heavy upon him; and it is obſervable, That as he ſuffer'd under the ſame Fate, and upon the very ſame Block, that the other did; ſo it was his Fortune to be laid under the ſame Stone, in the ſame Grave, where they now lye like good Friends, who living were irreconcilable Enemies.

They are beheaded.

King Edward's Funeral.

As to King Edward's Death, there was no ſtrict Enquiry made after it; and all the Honour done to his Memory, was to allow him Funeral Rites. On the eighth Day of Auguſt, he was bury'd at Weſtminſter; and the Queen had a ſolemn Obſequy, and Maſſes for him in the Tower. Biſhop Day was appointed to preach the Funeral Sermon; in which he prais'd the King, but ſeverely exclaim'd againſt the Adminiſtration of Affairs under him. It had been reſolv'd to bury him according to the old Forms; but Cranmer oppos'd that, and prevail'd that he ſhould be bury'd according to the Form then eſtabliſh'd by Law. He himſelf officiated, and ended the Solemnity with a Communion; all which he perform'd with a moſt lively Sorrow, as having both lov'd the King beyond Expreſſion, and looking on his Funeral as the Burial of the Reformation, and as a great Step towards his own. This ſoon began to appear; for in a few Days after ſeveral Advances were made towards that Work. The Queen at firſt, to molifie the Proceedings, declar'd in Council, on the twelfth Day of Auguſt, That tho' ſhe was fix'd in her own Religion, yet ſhe would not compel others to it; but would leave that to the Motions of God's Spirit, and the Labours of good Preachers. The Day following, Doctor Bonner went to St. Paul's, where the Sermon was preach'd by Bourn his Chaplain; who extreamly extoll'd his Patron, and violently inveigh'd againſt the Sufferings he had ſuſtain'd. Upon this a Tumult was rais'd by the People, who could not bear any Reflexions upon the pious King Edward: Some threw Stones at him, and one darted a Dagger at the Pulpit, with ſuch Force, that it ſtuck faſt in the Wood. Rogers and Bradford, two eminent Preachers, were preſent, and ſo much in credit with the People, that they eaſily quieted them, and convey'd Bourn ſafe to his Houſe. This was a very deſirable Accident to the Romaniſts; and gave them a Colour to prohibit Preaching, by a publick Inhibition in the Queen's Name. In which ſhe declar'd, 'That 'her Religion was the ſame that it had been from her Infancy, but that ſhe 'would compel none of her Subjects in Matters of Religion, 'till publick Order 'ſhould be taken in it by common Conſent. She requir'd her People to live 'peaceably, and not to uſe the Terms of Papiſt or Heretick, or other re-'proachful Speeches; and that none ſhould preach without her ſpecial Licence: 'She alſo charg'd them not to puniſh any on the Account of the late Rebellion,

'but

'but as they ſhould be authoriz'd by her. She would be ſorry to be driven to 'execute the Severity of the Law; but was reſolv'd not to ſuffer Rebellious 'Actions to go unpuniſh'd. This gave great Occaſion for Cenſure: It ſhew'd what Religion ſhe profeſs'd, which was worſe than that of her Father: Her ſpecial Licence was an immediate Interdict upon all the Pulpits in England; and her threatning to proceed againſt ſuch as were guilty of the late Revolt, ſtruck a great Terror to the City of London; for the chief of the City were principally concern'd in it.

Now all Things began to be carry'd on with great Warmth and Violence; yet ſtill the Suffolk Gentlemen imagin'd that their Services and the Queen's Promiſes gave them a Title to own their Religion more avowedly: But Orders were ſent to the Biſhop of Norwich to execute the Queen's Injunctions, and to ſee that none preach'd without a ſpecial Licence. Upon which ſome of thoſe who had been moſt ſerviceable in her Neceſſities, came to put the Queen in mind of her poſitive Promiſe: But ſhe ſent them home with a ſevere Anſwer, That the Members ought not to rule the Head; but they were to learn to obey, and not to govern: And when one of them more confidently inſiſted upon her Promiſe, he was order'd to ſtand three Days in the Pillory, as having ſaid Words tending to defame the Queen; which was a diſmal Omen of a ſevere Government, when the claiming of Promiſes paſs'd for a Crime. Bradford and Rogers were alſo ſecur'd, upon a Pretence that the Authority they ſhew'd in quieting the Tumult, was a Proof that they had firſt rais'd it. Gardiner, Bonner, Tonſtal, Heath and Day were all reſtor'd to their Biſhopricks, and the Sentences paſs'd againſt them in the late Reign null'd. Gardiner had Authority given him to grant Prieſts Licences to preach in any Church, as he ſhould appoint; by which the Reformed were not only ſilenc'd, but their Churches and Pulpits were thrown open to ſuch as that unreaſonable Man ſhould ſend among them. This caus'd the Impriſonment of many, and particularly the two Biſhops of Exeter and Gloceſter, Coverdale, and Hooper. Images began to be ſet up, and the old Rites were in many Places renew'd, all which was incourag'd by the Government, tho' directly againſt Law. Of this Judge Hales was ſenſible, who thought his Refuſing to concur with the reſt for excluding the Queen gave him no common Privilege; therefore when he went his Circuit, in his Charge at Kent he requir'd the Juſtices to ſee to the Execution of King Edward's Laws, that ſtill continu'd in Force. But upon his Return he was for this committed to the Marſhalſea, and remov'd from Priſon to Priſon, where the good old Man was ſo terrify'd with his Enemies Deſigns, that his Brain was turn'd; and he firſt made an Attempt upon his Life with a Pen-knife, and tho' he was afterwards ſet at Liberty, his Diſorder was ſo great that he drowned himſelf. On the other ſide Judge Bromley, tho' he had made no Scruple in declaring for the Queen's Excluſion, yet ſince he profeſs'd himſelf a Papiſt, was made Lord Chief Juſtice: And Montague, who had proceeded in it with extream Averſion, yet becauſe he was for the Reformation, was impriſon'd, depriv'd of his Lands given him by the late King, and ſeverely fin'd: Tho' he had this Merit to plead, that he had ſent his Son and a Body of Men to declare for the Queen; and had this alſo to recommend him to her Pity, that he had a Family of ſix Sons, and eleven Daughters.

And of Judge Montague.

During theſe melancholy Proſpects, Cranmer, who for a while had kept himſelf quiet, was adviſ'd by ſome Friends to fly beyond Sea; but he anſwer'd, That tho' he could not diſſuade others from flying in ſuch a threatning Storm, yet it was unbecoming a Man in his Station, who was ſo deeply concern'd in the Changes formerly made. Therefore he prepar'd a Paper, 'In which he 'declar'd himſelf, with Peter Martyr, and ſome others, ready to prove the Errors 'of the Maſs, and to defend the whole Doctrine and Service publiſh'd by the 'late King, as moſt conformable to the Word of God, and the Practice of the 'ancient Church for many Ages. This being diſcover'd by an Accident, the Arch-

Arch-Biſhop was cited to the Star-Chamber, to anſwer to it: He acknowledg'd it was his, and declar'd he deſign'd to have inlarg'd it, and affix'd it on St. Paul's and other Churches. He was at this Time diſmiſs'd; for Gardiner, who ſaw the Queen deſign'd to put Cardinal Pool in his See, now us'd all Endeavours to preſerve him. Some diſcreetly mov'd that a ſmall Penſion might be aſſign'd him, and that he ſhould be ſuffer'd to live privately: For the happy Sweetneſs of his Temper had procur'd ſuch an univerſal Love from the People, that it was thought too bold a Step to proceed to Extremities with ſuch a Man. Others ſaid, he had been the chief Author of all the Hereſie in the Nation, and that it was not decent for the Queen to ſhew any Favour to him, that had pronounc'd the Sentence of her Mother's Divorce. Theſe laſt Counſels prevail'd moſt with the zealous Queen; and within a Week after, he and Biſhop Latimer, and ſeveral other Preachers were committed to Priſon. Peter Martyr, who had come over upon the publick Faith, had leave given him to depart the Nation; ſo had John a Laſco, and the German Congregation. Many of the Engliſh foreſeeing the Storm, reſolv'd to withdraw in Time; and when the Strangers were requir'd to be gone, they went under that Covert in great Numbers. But the Council underſtanding that about a thouſand had ſo convey'd themſelves away, gave Order that none ſhould be ſuffer'd to go as Strangers, but thoſe who had a Certificate from the Ambaſſador of the Princes to whom they belong'd. With thoſe who fled beyond Sea, ſeveral eminent Preachers went; among whom were Cox, Sandys, Grindal and Horn, all highly advanc'd by Queen Elizabeth.

Theſe Things began to alienate the People from the Government, therefore on the other Side, great Care was taken to molifie and ſweeten them. The Queen beſtow'd the chief Offices of her Houſhold on thoſe who had aſſiſted her in her Extremity; there being no Way more effectual to ingage all to adhere to the Crown, than the grateful Acknowledgment of paſt Services. An unuſual Honour was done to Ratcliff Earl of Suſſex, who had a particular Licence granted him under the Great-Seal to cover his Head in the Queen's Preſence. Theſe Things being ſetled, ſhe proceeded to her Coronation; and on the laſt Day of September ſhe rod in her open Chariot through London towards Weſtminſter, attended with a glorious Cavalcade in this Order. Firſt rod a great Number of Gentlemen and Knights, then Doctors, then Judges, then Biſhops, then Lords, then the Council; after whom follow'd the Knights of the Bath in their Robes, then the Biſhop of Wincheſter Lord Chancellor, and the Marqueſs of Wincheſter Lord High-Treaſurer: Next came the Duke of Norfolk, and after him the Earl of Oxford, who bore the Sword; then the Lord Mayor in Crimſon Velvet, who bore the Scepter of Gold: Then came the Queen's Chariot, follow'd by another Chariot, in which ſate her Siſter Elizabeth with the Lady Anne of Cleve; who were likewiſe follow'd by a noble Train of Ladies and Gentlewomen on Horſeback. In this Order they rode through the principal Streets to Weſtminſter, where in many Places were magnificent Pageants and Shews, and many rich Preſents were made to the Queen. The next Day ſhe was publickly crown'd at Weſtminſter, by Biſhop Gardiner, who with ten other Biſhops, all in their Mitres, Coapes and Croſiers, perform'd that Ceremony with great Pomp and Solemnity; and Biſhop Day preach'd the Coronation Sermon. But Gardiner had prepar'd a Largeſs of an extraordinary Nature for the Queen to diſtribute that Day among the People; beſides a general Pardon, he caus'd a Proclamation to be publiſh'd, ſetting forth, 'That the Queen did diſcharge her Subjects of the two Tenths, two Fif-'teenths, and a Subſidy that had been granted by the laſt Parliament: And 'ſhe alſo declar'd that ſhe would both pay her Father's and her Brother's Debts; 'and tho' her Treaſure was much exhauſted, yet ſhe eſteem'd the Love of her 'People her beſt Treaſure, and forgave their Taxes, in lieu of which ſhe de-

Heyl. &c. Not long after, on the tenth of October, a Parliament met according to Summons: In many Places of the Country Men had been choſen by Force and Threats; in other Places thoſe imploy'd by the Court by Violence hinder'd the Free-holders from coming to chuſe; in many Places falſe Returns were made; and ſome zealous for the Reformation were forcibly turn'd out of the Houſe of Commons; all which was afterwards offer'd as a Ground upon which that Parliament, and all Acts made in it, might be annull'd. There only came two of the reform'd Biſhops to the Houſe of Lords, Taylor and Harley, the Biſhops of Lincoln and Hereford; the two Arch-Biſhops, and three Biſhops were then in Priſon, and the reſt ſtaid at home. When Maſs began to be ſaid, the two reform'd Biſhops went out, as ſome report it, but were never ſuffer'd to return to their Places; others ſay, that refuſing to join in that Worſhip, they were violently thruſt out. In the Houſe of Commons, ſome of the moſt Forward mov'd, that King Edward's Laws might be review'd; but Things were not ripe enough for that Project. The Commons ſent up a Bill of Tonnage and Poundage, which the Lords ſent down amended in two Proviſo's; and the Commons did not then inſiſt upon their Privilege, that the Lords could make no Alterations in a Mony-Bill. The only publick Bill that was finiſh'd this Seſſion, was a Repeal of all late Statutes, making any Crime Treaſon, that was not ſo by the twenty fifth of Edward the Third; or Felony, that was not ſo before King Henry the Eighth: Excepting from the Benefit of this Act all that were put in Priſon before the End of September laſt; who were likewiſe excepted out of the general Pardon. The Marchioneſs of Exeter, and her Son the Earl of Devonſhire, were reſtor'd to Blood by two private Acts; and then the Parliament was prorogu'd for three Days, that it might be ſaid, the firſt Seſſion under the Queen, was meerly for Acts of Grace and Mercy.

The firſt Parliament in this Reign.

At their next Meeting, a Bill paſs'd through both Houſes in four Days, repealing the Divorce of the Queen's Mother; 'In which they declar'd the Mar'riage to be lawful; and that malicious Perſons had poſſeſs'd the King
'with Scruples concerning it; and had by Corruption procur'd the Seals of 'Foreign Univerſities condemning it: Upon which Cranmer had pronounc'd
'the Sentence of Divorce, which had been confirm'd in Parliament: They 'therefore looking upon the Miſeries that had befallen the Nation, ſince that 'Time, as Judgments from God for that Sentence, did now condemn it, and 'repeal the Acts confirming it. By this Gardiner perform'd his Promiſe in procuring her to be declar'd Legitimate, without mentioning the Pope's Authority: But in the drawing of it, he ſhew'd that he was paſt all Bluſhing, when he procur'd ſuch a Repeal of a Sentence, which he had ſo ſervilely promoted; and when he particularly knew the Falſhood of this Pretence, that the Foreign Univerſities were corrupted; as alſo that he had incourag'd it long before Cranmer ingag'd in it, and ſate in Court with him when Sentence was pronounc'd. By this Act the Princeſs Elizabeth was in effect illegitimated a ſecond Time, ſince the Ground on which her Mother's Marriage ſubſiſted, was the Divorce of the firſt: And it was upon this Pretence, or from old Reſentments, or a new Rivalry, that the Queen, who had hitherto treated her as a Siſter, began now to uſe her more ſeverely. The next Bill was a Repeal of all the Laws, made in King Edward's Reign, concerning Religion; 'By 'which, all Matters of Religion were again brought back to the ſame State
'King Henry had left them; and this was to take Place about two Months
'after, 'till when all were at liberty to uſe the old or new Service, as they 'pleas'd. Another Act paſs'd againſt all that ſhould diſquiet any Preacher for his Sermons, or interrupt Divine Offices; 'by which the Queen was empow-
'er'd to reſtore the Service in all Particulars, as it had been before her Father 'made the Breach with Rome. Another Law was made, That if any to the

Other Acts.

'Number of Twelve ſhould meet to alter any Thing in Religion, or for any 'Riot, or ſhould by any publick Notice, ſuch as Bells and Beacons, gather 'the People together, and ſhould not diſperſe themſelves, upon Proclamation, 'they and their Aſſiſtants were made guilty of Felony: And if any more than 'two met for thoſe Ends, they ſhould ſuffer a Year's Impriſonment. By this all the Favour of the former Act of Repeal vaniſh'd, and prov'd no better than Deluſion. The Marqueſs of Northampton's ſecond Marriage was annul'd, as being founded upon falſe Surmiſes; and ſo was the Attainder of the Duke of Norfolk ſet aſide by this Parliament. At the ſame time Arch-Biſhop Cranmer, Guilford Dudley, and his Wife the Lady Jane, and two of his Brothers were try'd for Treaſon: They all confeſs'd the Indictments, only Cranmer appeal'd to the Judges, who knew with what Reluctancy he had conſented to the Excluſion of the Queen, and that he refus'd it, 'till they, whoſe Profeſſion it was to know the Law, had ſign'd it. They were all attainted of Treaſon for levying War againſt the Queen, and their Attainders were confirm'd in this Parliament. Thus was Cranmer legally diveſted of his Arch-Biſhoprick; but ſince he was put into it by the Pope's Authority, it was reſolv'd to degrade him by the Forms of the Canon Law; and the Queen was willing to pardon his Treaſon, that it might appear ſhe did not act upon a Spirit of Revenge, but Zeal. In Reality, ſhe was often prevail'd upon to pardon Injuries againſt her ſelf, but was ever inexorable in Matters of Religion.

The Queen's ſecret Deſigns.

About this Time two Things began to be diſcover'd, which put the Parliament and Nation in much Diſorder: The one was the Queen's ſecret Treaty with the Court of Rome, and the other her deſign'd Marriage with the Emperor's Son Philip. As to the Firſt, when ſhe came to the Crown, the Pope's Legate at Bruſſels ſent over Commendone, afterwards a Cardinal, to try if he could ſpeak privately with her, and to perſuade her to reconcile her Kingdom to the Apoſtolick See. The Management of the Affair was left to his Diſcretion, for the Legate would not truſt his important Secret to Gardiner, nor any of the other Biſhops. Commendone came over in the Diſguiſe of a Merchant, and by Accident met with one of the Queen's Servants, who had liv'd ſome Years beyond Sea, and being known to him, by his Means he procur'd Acceſs to the Queen. She aſſur'd him of her firm Reſolution to return to the Obedience of that See, but charg'd him to proceed with great Niceneſs and Prudence; for if it were too early diſcover'd, it might diſturb her Affairs, and obſtruct the Deſign. By him ſhe wrote both to the Pope, and to Cardinal Pool, and urg'd the ſending over Pool with a Legantine Power: She alſo as'kd him, whether the Pope might not diſpence with the Cardinal to marry, ſince he was only in Deacons Orders. This prov'd the Foundation of Commendone's Advancement, and was a joyful Meſſage to the Court of Rome; where was a publick Thankſgiving for three Days, and the Pope ſaid Maſs himſelf; and gave a Largeſs of Indulgences, in which he was the more liberal, becauſe they were like to recover their former Reputation. Yet all that Commendone declar'd in the Conſiſtory, was, That he underſtood from good Hands, that Queen Mary was diſpos'd to a Re-union. Some of the ſtiffer Cardinals thought it below the Pope's Dignity to ſend a Legate, 'till an Embaſſie came firſt from the Queen to deſire that Favour; but the Secret being generally whiſper'd among them, and the Succeſs inſur'd, Cardinal Pool was appointed to go Legate, with a plenary Authority. Gardiner was very apprehenſive of this Man, and therefore adviſ'd the Emperor to ſtop him in his Journey; and to touch the Emperor in the tendereſt Part, it is ſaid that he let him know that the Queen had ſome Inclinations for the Cardinal. The Emperor had now propos'd a Match with her for his Son, tho' he was nine Years younger than ſhe; yet ſhe being but thirty ſeven, there was Reaſon ſufficient to hope for Children; and the uniting England to the Spaniſh Monarchy ſeem'd to be all that was wanting to the Ruin of the French Kingdom. The Queen found ſtrong Inducements to determine her to this this Propoſition; for ſhe found it would be difficult, if not impracticable, to make a full Eſtabliſhment of her Religion without the Aſſiſtance of a Foreign Power.

The reſtoring of the Papal Power, and the Match with the Prince of Spain, were two Things of ſuch uneaſie Digeſtion, that it was not fit to adventure on both at once; therefore the Emperor urg'd the Queen to begin with her Marriage, and by that ſhe would be enabled to carry on her other Deſigns. At length the Queen her ſelf was perſuaded to ſend to Pool, to adviſe him to ſtop his Journey for ſome Time; to whom ſhe ſent over the Acts of this Parliament, The Queen's Meſſage to him. 'To let him know what Progreſs ſhe was making, and to aſſure him ſhe 'would uſe all convenient Expedition in the Re-union: But the Parliament 'had expreſs'd ſo great an Averſion to the reſtoring the Pope's Power, and were 'ſo apprehenſive of loſing the Abby-Lands, that it would greatly prejudice 'her Affairs, if ſhe came over before her Subjects Minds were better prepar'd. To ſhew her Confidence in him, ſhe alſo deſir'd him to ſend her a Liſt of ſuch as were moſt proper to be made Biſhops, in Room of thoſe remov'd. The Cardinal was very uneaſie at his being ſtopp'd in his Journey, and wrote His Anſwer. her a long Anſwer, 'In which he rejoic'd at the Acts that were paſs'd, but ob-'ſerv'd great Defects in them: In that concerning her Mother's Marriage, there 'was no Mention made of the Pope's Bull of Diſpenſation, by which only it 'could be a lawful Marriage: The other for ſetting up the Worſhip, as it was 'in the End of her Father's Reign, was more exceptionable, for the Nation 'was then in a State of Schiſm, and ſo this had eſtabliſh'd Schiſm by a Law. 'He declar'd that he had been very frankly diſpatch'd by the Pope and the 'Conſiſtory, with many favourable Inſtructions; but if theſe were ſo deſpis'd, 'and he ſtill ſtopp'd, it might provoke his Holineſs to recall his Power. He 'was ſenſible all this flow'd from the Emperor, who perhaps would adviſe her 'to follow ſuch Political Maxims as had govern'd him; but his ill Succeſs in 'the Buſineſs of the Interim, might well diſcourage others from following 'ſuch Counſels: And he fear'd that carnal Policy might govern her ſo much, 'as ſhe would fall from her Simplicity in Chriſt. He deſir'd her to take Cou-'rage, and depend upon God; and adviſ'd her to go her ſelf to the Parliament, 'having firſt prepar'd ſome to ſecond her, and to declare, That ſhe was touch'd 'in Conſcience with a Senſe of Sin of the Schiſm, and that therefore ſhe deſir'd 'the Act of Attainder that ſtood againſt Cardinal Pool might be repeal'd, and 'that he might be invited to come over, and reconcile them to the Apoſtolick 'See: And ſhe might aſſure them, That all neceſſary Caution ſhould be taken 'to prevent the Nation's being brought under a Thraldom to the Papacy. But the Queen was prepoſſeſs'd with Gardiner's Counſels, and eſteem'd the Cardinal's Advice as more candid, than really prudent. Gardiner perſuaded her that tho' he was a good and learned Man, yet he underſtood not the preſent Genius of the Nation; and Pool look'd upon Gardiner as a Man of no Conſcience, and more converſant in Intrigues of State, than touch'd with any Senſe of Religion: But the Emperor was convinc'd that Gardiner's Methods were more ſecure, therefore he preferr'd them to thoſe of the other.

When the Treaty of the Queen's Marriage was publickly known, the Houſe of Commons were much alarm'd at it; and they ſent their Speaker and twenty of their Members, with an Addreſs to her, not to marry a Stranger; in which they ſhew'd ſo much Heat and Reſentment, that the Court judg'd it neceſſary to diſſolve the Parliament. Upon this Gardiner let the Emperor know, That the Jealouſies rais'd upon the Account of the Match were ſo ſtrong, that except very extraordinary Conditions were offer'd, it would occaſion a general Rebellion. He alſo wrote to him that large Sums muſt be ſent over both to gratifie the Nobility, and enable them to carry the Elections in the next Parliament, againſt all Oppoſers. As for Conditions, the Emperor was reſolv'd to grant any that ſhould be demanded; for he concluded that if his Son were once marry'd to the Queen, it would be eaſie for him to goven the Councils as he pleas'd: And for Mony there was no leſs than four hundred thouſand Pounds order'd to be divided in the Nation, at the Diſcretion of Gardiner, and the Emperor's Ambaſſadors, at ſeveral Times. This Mony was borrow'd by the Emperor from ſome of the free Towns of Germany; and when they were urging him for the Re-Payment of it about a Year after, he for his Excuſe alledg'd the Charge he had been at for his Son's Marriage, but that he hop'd to be re-imburs'd from England, which was thus bought and ſold by a deſigning Prelate, and a corrupted Parliament. Gardiner did alſo baſely make uſe of his Power, as Chancellor, to oblige all People to comply with him; and in his Court of Chancery no Favour or common Juſtice was ſhown to any Perſons who were not of his Intereſt.

Vaſt Bribes ſent over by the Emperor.

A. D. 1554. Reg. 1/2. In the Beginning of the following Year, a noble Embaſſie came over from the Emperor, to agree on the Conditions of Marriage between his Son and the Queen. In the managing of this Treaty, Gardiner had a principal Share; for he was the Oracle of the Council-Board, as having thirty Years Experience in Affairs, and a great Knowledge of the Courts of Chriſtendom, and of the State of England. In drawing the Articles of the Marriage, he had a double Deſign; one was, to have them ſo fram'd, as they might eaſily paſs in Parliament; and the other was, to exclude the Spaniards from having any Share in the Government of England, which he deſign'd to hold in his own Hands. Accordingly it was agreed 'That the Government, and Gift of Places, ſhould be entirely in Queen Mary; and tho' Prince Philip was to be call'd King, nam'd in all Writs, and his Image put on the Coin and Seals, yet the Queen's Hand alone was to give Authority to every Thing, without his: No Spaniard was to be capable of any Office: No change was to be made in the Law, nor was the Queen to be requir'd to go out of England againſt her Will; nor might their Iſſue go out of England, but by the Conſent of the Nobility. The Queen was to have a Jointure of forty thouſand Pounds a Year out of Spain, and twenty thouſand Pounds out of the Netherlands: If the Queen had a Son, it was to inherit Burgundy and the Netherlands as well as England; and if Philip's preſent Son dy'd, it was to inherit all the Spaniſh Dominions: If the Queen had only Daughters, they were to ſucceed to her Crown, and have ſuch Portions from Spain, as was uſually given to Kings Daughters. Prince Philip was to have no Share in the Government after her Death: And the Queen might ſtill keep up the League with France, notwithſtanding this Match. Theſe were the Conditions concluded at preſent, and afterwards confirm'd in Parliament; by which it appears that the Spaniards were reſolv'd to have the Marriage upon any Terms; not doubting, but if Prince Philip were once in England, he could eaſily enlarge his Authority at Pleaſure.

A Treaty of a Marriage between the Emperor's Son Philip, and the Queen.

It cauſes great Diſcontents.

Yet all theſe did not ſatisfie the Nation, which look'd upon them as ſo many Baits to enſnare them into Slavery. The Severities of the Spaniards Government and Inquiſition in their own Provinces, and the monſtrous Cruelties exercis'd in the Weſt-Indies, were loud in every Man's Mouth; and it was ſaid, That England muſt now preſerve it ſelf, or for ever be in Bondage. Theſe Things had great Influence upon many; but the chief Conſpirators were the Duke of Suffolk, Sir Thomas Wiat, and Sir Peter Carew: The firſt was to raiſe the Mid-land Counties, the ſecond the County of Kent, and the third Cornwall; hoping by riſing in ſuch remote Places, they might engage the Commons, who were now as much diſguſted with their Queen, as they were formerly fond of her. But before the Deſign was ripe, the Project in the Weſt was diſcover'd, upon which Carew fled into France. Wiat gather'd ſome Men about him in Kent, and on the twenty fifth of January he made Proclamation at Maidſtone, 'That he deſign'd nothing but to preſerve the Nation from the 'Yoke of Strangers; and aſſur'd the People that all England would make an 'Inſurrection upon the ſame Cauſe. The Sheriff of Kent requir'd him, under Wiat's Rebellion in Kent.

Pain

Pain of Treaſon, to diſperſe his Company, but he did not obey his Summons. One Knevet alſo rais'd a Body of Men about Tunbridge, and march'd towards him, but was intercepted and defeated by a Force commanded by the Duke of Norfolk, who was ſent with two hundred Horſe and ſix hundred Londoners to diſperſe this Inſurrection: But ſome who came over from Wiat as Deſerters, perſuaded the Londoners that it was a common Cauſe, in which they were engag'd to maintain the Liberty of the Nation; upon which they all went over to Wiat, crying out, We are all Engliſh Men! This oblig'd the Duke of Norfolk to retire back to London; and Wiat, who had kept himſelf under the Defence of Rocheſter Bridge, advanc'd forwards, ſending to the Duke of Suffolk to haſten his Deſigns. But that Duke, who was always of a mean Spirit, after a feeble Attempt to raiſe the Country, deſiſted and fled to a private Houſe, where he was taken and brought Priſoner to the Tower.

Wiat's Party increaſing, the Queen ſent an Offer of Pardon to him and his Men; but that not being receiv'd, ſhe ſent ſome of her Council to treat with him, and he being greatly ſwell'd with his ſmall Succeſs, propos'd, 'That the 'Queen ſhould come to the Tower of London, and put the Command of it 'into his Hands, 'till a new Council was eſtabliſh'd about her. Upon theſe extravagant Propoſals, there only paſs'd high Words, without any Determination. Upon which the Queen attended with many Noblemen went to Guild-Hall, and before the Citizens gave an Account of her Meſſage to Wiat, and his Anſwer: And as for her Marriage, ſhe declar'd, She had done nothing without the Advice of her Nobles; That having liv'd ſo long a Virgin, ſhe was willing to continue in the ſame Condition, if the States of the Realm thought it proper. Wiat was now four thouſand ſtrong, and march'd into Southwark, on the ſecond of February, but could not force the Bridge of London: He was inform'd that the Citizens would all riſe, if he ſhould come to their Aſſiſtance; but he could not find Boats for his Paſſage over into Eſſex, therefore he was oblig'd to go to the Bridge of Kingſton. On the fourth he came to Kingſton, where the Queen had order'd the Bridge to be cut; but his Men repairing it, he croſs'd the River that Night: And tho' he loſt much Time in mending one of his Carriages that broke by the Way, he was at Hide-Park by nine a Clock next Morning, it being Aſh-Wedneſday. The Earl of Pembroke had gather'd a conſiderable Body of Men to have attack'd him, for his own Men were now in great Diſorder; but they ſtood as Spectators, to let him throw himſelf into their Hands. He did not march by Holborn, as ſome adviſs'd, but came down to Charing-Croſs; where the Lord Clinton fell in between the ſeveral Bodies of his Men, and ſo diſperſs'd them, that he had not five hundred left about him: But with thoſe that remain'd he paſs'd through the Strand and Fleet-ſtreet, to Ludgate, where he ſtopp'd, expecting to have the Gates open'd to him. Upon his Return towards Temple-Bar, he found himſelf ſurrounded by the Earl of Pembroke's Horſe; and Clarenceaux, King at Arms, preſs'd Wiat to yield himſelf, and not by drawing the Blood of ſo many valiant Men, forfeit all Hopes of the Queeen's Mercy. His Men ſeem'd to be reſolute, but he in Deſpair yielded, and was carry'd to the Queen; who all this while ſhew'd great Courage, and would not go to the Tower, as many adviſ'd her, but went with her Women and Prieſts to her Devotions. Thus ended this Rebellion, which being raw and ill-form'd was as fortunate for the Ends of the Court, as if Gardiner had projected it; for in a weak Government, an ill digeſted Inſurrection raiſes the Power of the Prince, and adds as much Spirit to his Friends as it depreſſes the Faction againſt him; and gives a Handle to ſome Things for which otherwiſe they could neither find Colour not Inſtruments.

The Queen's Preparations againſt him.

He enters London.

He yields himſelf to the Queen.

One Effect of this was, the ſevere Proceedings againſt the Lady Jane, and her Husband the Lord Guilford, who were both order'd to prepare for Death. The admirable Lady was not much diſorder'd at the fatal Meſſage; for ſhe knew, upon the firſt Jealouſie ſhe muſt be the Sacrifice, therefore had now liv'd liv'd six Months in the continual Meditations of Death. Doctor Fecknam, afterwards Abbot of Westminster, was sent to her from the Queen, who had a long Conversation with her. But she answer'd him with that Calmness of Mind, and Clearness of Reason, that it was amazing to find so young a Person, of her Sex and Quality, look on approaching Death with so little Disorder, and talk so sensibly and judiciously of the highest Points of Religion. Fecknam left her without any Hopes of prevailing; but procur'd the Continuance of her Life for three Days longer, and waited on her upon the Scaffold. She wrote to her Father to moderate his Grief for her Death, which must needs have been great since his Actions occasion'd it; declaring, 'It was a mighty Matter of Joy to 'her, that she was near the End of her Miseries, and the Enjoyment of eternal 'Glory. There was one Harding, who had been her Father's Chaplain, and a zealous Preacher in the Reign of King Edward, and before his Death had animated the People to prepare against Persecution; yet now had fallen away himself. To whom she wrote a Letter in an extraordinary Strain, full of zealous Expostulations, and severe Threatnings, for his Apostacy; but it had no just Effect upon him. The Night before her Execution, she sent her Greek Testament she always us'd to her Sister, as the richest Present in the World; with a Letter in the same Language, in which, in the most pious and pathetick Expressions she display'd the mighty Value of the Book, and the glorious Advantages she might obtain by it. She had also compos'd a very devout Prayer for her Retirements: And these were the last Exercises of this wondrous young Lady.

Her Behaviour upon it.

Her Husband's Execution.

The dismal Morning being come, and all People melted into the tendrest Sentiments of Pity, her Husband was first led out to a Scaffold on Tower-Hill, where he suffer'd with a most Christian Meekness. He had obtain'd leave to see his beloved Spouse, and to take his last Farewel; but she declin'd that Ceremony, as a Circumstance that would more increase their Disorder, than their Consolation; declaring, That she hop'd they would shortly meet, and be united in a happier State. Yet she had such a Presence of Mind, as to look on him through the Window, when he pass'd to the Scaffold; and with an Heroick unmov'd Countenance saw his headless Body afterwards brought back to be interr'd in the Chappel of the Tower. There was no doubt but the Death of this innocent Lady would excite the highest Degrees of Compassion and Regret; therefore, since the World could not bear so moving a Sight, a Scaffold was erected within the Verge of the Tower, where she might satisfie the Severity of the Law, without any Danger to the State. As she was brought out, the Lieutenant of the Tower desir'd her to favour him with some Memorial of hers; upon which she ask'd for her Table-Book, and wrote three short Sentences in Greek, in Latin, and in English, by which she asserted her Innocency, declaring, That if her Fault deserv'd Punishment, her Youth, at least, and her Ignorance, were excusable; and that God and Posterity would shew her Favour. At last the beauteous Victim having saluted the Croud as she pass'd along, and with a charming Air of Modesty desir'd their Prayers, she mounted that Throne, where she was to receive a Crown of inestimable Value. Here she kindly embrac'd Doctor Fecknam, saying, God will abundantly requite you, good Sir, for your Humanity to me, tho' it gave me more uneasiness than all the Terrors of my approaching Death. Then turning to the Spectators, she confess'd, That she had sinn'd in assuming the Title of Queen, and that her Consent to it was unlawful; but still it was neither procur'd, nor desir'd by her. At which she wrung her Hands in Token of her Innocency. Then she declar'd, She dy'd a true Christian, and hop'd for Salvation only by the Mercy of God in the Blood of Christ: Acknowledging, That she had too much neglected the Word of God, and too much lov'd her self and the World, for which she was justly punish'd from Heaven; but she bless'd God, who by this had led her to Repentance. Having said this, she commended her self to the Divine Mercy; then caus'd her ſelf to be diſrob'd by ſome of her Ladies, who with weeping Eyes and bleeding Hearts perform'd that Office, which was no more unwelcome to her than a Preparation to Sleep. Being ready for the Block, with the ſame unconcern'd Countenance, as ſhe had acted the reſt of her Tragedy, ſhe loudly repeated the fifty firſt Pſalm; then crying, Lord, into thy Hands I commend my Spirit, ſhe ſubmitted her Neck to the Executioner; while all the People about her were cover'd with Floods of Tears.

Thus dy'd the incomparable Lady Jane Gray, on the twelfth Day of February, being about ſixteen Years of Age; whoſe Death was as much lamented, as her Life had been admir'd. It had a moſt violent Operation on Judge Morgan, who had pronounc'd the Sentence; for ſoon after he fell mad, and in all his Ravings, ſtill call'd to take away the Lady Jane from him. Indeed the Odium of her Death was generally caſt on her Father, rather than the Queen, who ſeem'd to be driven to it, rather from Conſiderations of State, than any Reſentments of her own. Her Father was ſoon after try'd by his Peers, condemn'd, and executed; and was the leſs pity'd, becauſe by his Means his Daughter was brought to her untimely End. Wiat was brought to his Trial, who begg'd his Life in the moſt abject manner; but he was condemn'd and executed. A Slander was caſt upon the Earl of Devonſhire and the Princeſs Elizabeth, as if they had promoted the deſign'd Inſurrection in the Weſt; for Wiat, in Hopes of Life, had accus'd them, but he did them Juſtice at his Death; yet ſtill they were both put in Priſon about it. Fifty eight were executed in ſeveral Places, and ſix hundred of the Rabble were appointed to come before the Queen with Halters about their Necks, and beg their Lives, which ſhe granted them. And thus was the Storm diſſipated; only the Effuſion of Blood after it was thought too liberal, and this Exceſs of Puniſhment was generally caſt on Gardiner, who by this means became hateful to the Nation, which has been always much mov'd at Acts of Severity.

III. Queen Mary being by the Death of one, and the Impriſonment of another, freed from all Fears of Rivalry as to the Crown, now proceeded after her own Way without Reſerve. She gave a ſpecial Commiſſion to Bonner, Gardiner, Tonſtall, Day and Kitchin, to proceed againſt the Arch-Biſhop of York, and the Biſhops of St. David's, Cheſter and Briſtol, and to deprive them of their Biſhopricks, for having contracted Marriage. She alſo authoriz'd them to ſummon the Biſhops of Lincoln, Gloceſter and Hereford, who held their Biſhopricks only during their good Behaviour, and to declare their Biſhopricks void. And thus were ſeven of the Reformed Biſhops depriv'd at once, without any Form of Proceſs, by an Act of meer arbitrary Government. Biſhop Goodrick dy'd this Year: Scory Biſhop of Chicheſter renounc'd his Wife and did Penance, but ſoon after fled beyond Sea; and Barlow reſign'd his Biſhoprick of Bath and Wells, and alſo fled beyond Sea. By all theſe Deprivations and Reſignations, there were ſixteen new Biſhops created, in whom the Queen confided, which made no ſmall Change in the Face of the Engliſh Church. Now the old Service was ſet up in all Places; in which Bonner us'd ſuch Precipitation, that before the Royal Aſſent was given to the Bill for it, he began the old Services and Proceſſions, which were perform'd after an extraordinary Manner. Great Numbers of the Clergy were ſummarily depriv'd for being marry'd; and of the ſixteen thouſand Clergymen then in the Nation, there were about twelve thouſand, according to Parker, turn'd out upon this Account: Moſt of them were judg'd upon common Fame, without any Proceſs but a Citation; and many of them then in Priſon, were puniſh'd for Non-Appearance. Many Books were written, numerous Reflections paſs'd, and great Diſturbances were occaſion'd. And at this Time a notorious Impoſtor was diſcover'd in London; one ſeem'd to ſpeak out of a Wall in a ſtrange Tone: Which caus'd great Numbers to flock about the Houſe, where they heard ſeveral things utter'd relating to to Religion and the State. It was found to be one Elizabeth Crofts, who by a Whiſtle ſpoke through a Hole in the Wall; for which ſhe was oblig'd to do publick Penance in St. Paul's.

The ſecond Parliament in this Reign.

On the ſecond Day of April a new Parliament met, which was the ſecond in this Reign; but the moſt conſiderable Members were before corrupted by Gardiner, who gave them Penſions, ſome two hundred, and others a hundred Pound a Year for their Voices. The firſt Act that paſs'd was Declaratory, 'That all the Prerogatives and Limitations, which by Law belong'd to the 'Kings of England, were the ſame, whether the Crown fell into the Hands of 'a Male or Female. The real Meaning of this was little known; ſome fear'd there was a pernicious Deſign in it, and that it being declar'd that ſhe had all the Authority of any of her Progenitors, it might be inferr'd that ſhe by this could pretend to a Right of Conqueſt, and like William the Conqueror, ſeize on the Eſtates of the Engliſh. But it was ſo conceiv'd, that the Queen was put under the ſame Limitations, as well as acknowledg'd to have the ſame Prerogatives, with her Predeceſſors. The Secret of this Act was afterwards diſcover'd: A projecting Man, who had ſerv'd Cromwell, and had been deeply ingag'd in the Lady Jane's Affair, and the late Inſurrection, by making a timely Application to the Emperor's Ambaſſador, obtain'd his Pardon; and for Amends he offer'd a Project to the Ambaſſador, that the Queen ſhould declare, that ſhe ſucceeded to the Crown by the Common-Law, but was not bound by the Statute-Law, which only oblig'd Kings and not Queens, by which ſhe might pretend to be a Conqueror, and rule at Pleaſure; and by that might reſtore both Religion and the Abby-Lands, without any Reſtraint. This was brought to the Queen by the Ambaſſador, who begg'd of her to keep it very ſecret. She diſlik'd the Paper, yet ſhe ſent for Gardiner, and charg'd him to give her his Opinion of it ſincerely, as he would anſwer to God for it at the great Day. He read it carefully, and told her, It was a moſt pernicious Contrivance, and begg'd of her not to hearken to ſuch Plat-Forms, which might be brought her by baſe Sycophants: Upon that ſhe burnt the Paper, and order'd the Ambaſſador to bring her no more of ſuch Projects. This gave Gardiner ſenſible Apprehenſions of the Miſchiefs that Spaniſh Counſels might bring upon the Nation, and therefore he procur'd the fore-mention'd Act to be made, by which the Queen was as much bound by the Statute-Law as her Predeceſſors. Burnet.

The Articles of the Queen's deſign'd Marriage confirm'd.

He alſo procur'd an Act to be paſs'd, ratifying the Articles of the Marriage of the Queen, with very ſtrong Clauſes, for keeping the Government intirely in the Queen's Hands; ſo that Prince Philip might not take it upon him, as Henry VII. had done, when he marry'd the Heir of the Houſe of York: For as that King ſet up a Title in his own Name, and kept the Government in his own Hands; ſo the Spaniards began now to derive a Deſcent from John of Gaunt, Father to Henry IV. which caus'd Gardiner to be the more cautious in this Matter. And it muſt be acknowledg'd, that the preſerving of the Nation out of the Hands of the Spaniards, was almoſt only owing to his Care and Wiſdom. In this Parliament ſeveral other Bills were prepar'd againſt the Lollards, and for the ſix Articles, but none of them paſs'd; nor nothing material was enacted beſides a Confirmation of former Attainders, and the Reſtoration of the Biſhoprick of Durham: So the Parliament was diſſolv'd on the twenty fifth Day of May.

The Parliament diſſolv'd.

During this Parliament, the Convocation ſate; and that they might remove the Objections that ſome made, that the chief of the Reformers were kept in Priſon, while the Cauſe was debating in the laſt Meeting, they ſent a Committee of their ableſt Men to Oxford, to diſpute with Cranmer, Ridley and Latimer, who were alſo ſent thither. When Cranmer was brought before them, they exhorted him to return to the Unity of the Church, and fell into a long Diſpute; in which Weſton the Prolocutor often call'd him an Unlearned and Impudent Man: But he carry'd himſelf with that Gravity and Mildneſs, that it drew Tears from the Eyes of many. Yet the whole Action was carry'd with ſuch indecent Hiſſing and Inſulting, and ended with ſuch Shouts of Triumph againſt Cranmer, that it was viſible there was nothing intended, but to abuſe the Ignorant People, and make them imagine he was utterly defeated. Ridley was brought out the next Day, who began with deep Proteſtations of his Sincerity, and that nothing but the Force of Truth had caus'd him to change thoſe Opinions in which he had been firſt educated. Yet the Diſpute was carry'd on with the ſame Inſultings, that had been us'd the Day before; and in Concluſion the Prolocutor bid the Aſſembly cry out with him, Truth has the Victory! Latimer was brought out the third Day, who told them he was fourſcore Years of Age, and had his Memory impair'd; and tho' he could not diſpute with the Accuracy of ſome Men, yet his Faith was firmly founded on the Word of God. They ſeem'd more to laugh than to anſwer him; and during the whole Debates, the Noiſe and Diſorder was ſuch, that it look'd more like a Country Game, than a Diſpute among Divines. At length the Committee of Convocation condemn'd them all, as obſtinate Hereticks, and declar'd them to be no Members of the Church: They appeal'd from their Sentence to the Judgment of God, and expreſs'd mighty Joy at the Hopes they had of glorifying God by Dying in his Cauſe. Cranmer ſent a Petition to the Council, complaining of the Diſorder of theſe Diſputes, which were ſo manag'd, that the World might be abus'd with the Name of a Diſputation: But this was not deliver'd, for the Deſign was to make the Nation believe, That the Champions of the Reformation were publickly baffled. It was alſo reſolv'd to carry ſome of the Priſoners to Cambridge, and in the ſame Manner to erect new Trophies in that Univerſity, as they had done at Oxford. Upon which, three of the impriſon'd Biſhops, and ſeven Divines, ſign'd a Paper, by which they declar'd, 'They would ingage in no Diſpute, but in Writing; unleſs it 'were in the Preſence of the Queen, or the Council, or before either of the 'Houſes of Parliament. For it was viſible, the Deſign of Diſputing was not 'to find out the Truth; nor could they expect any fair Dealing, where their 'Enemies were to be their Judges, who would not ſuffer them to ſpeak their 'Minds freely; and after ſo long an Impriſonment their Books and Papers be-'ing detain'd from them, they could not be furniſh'd to anſwer many Things 'objected againſt them. Then they added a ſhort Account of their Perſuaſions in the chief Points of Controverſie, which they would be ready to defend on fair and equal Terms; and concluded with a Charge to all the People, 'Not 'to rebel againſt the Queen, but to obey all her Commands, that were not con-'trary to the Law of God.

The reform'd Divines remonſtrate.

Not long after, on the twentieth of July, Prince Philip with a numerous Fleet arriv'd at Southampton; and at his firſt Landing, he drew his Sword, and carry'd it for ſome Time naked in his Hand; which was interpreted as an Omen, that he deſign'd to rule by his Sword, but his Friends ſaid, it ſignify'd, That he would draw his Sword for the Defence of the Nation. The Mayor of Southampton brought him the Keys of the Town, which he took from him, and return'd them, without the leaſt Indication of his being pleas'd with this Reſpect ſhown only to their Soveraign Prince; which being contrary to the Genius of the Engliſh Nation, which is always oblig'd at the gracious Smiles of their Kings, was thought a Sign of vaſt Pride and Moroſeneſs. The Queen met him with a noble Train at Wincheſter, where Biſhop Gardiner marry'd them with great Solemnity on the twenty fifth of July; he being then in the twenty ſeventh, and the Queen in the thirty eighth Year of her Age. Here the Emperor by his Ambaſſador reſign'd to him his Titular Kingdom of Jeruſalem, and his more valuable one of Naples: So that they were proclaim'd with a pompous Enumeration of all their Titles; at which Time they ſhow'd themſelves publickly with two Swords born before them, in regard of their diſtinct Capacities. From Wincheſter they remov'd to Baſing, and ſo to Wind- ſor, where on the fifth of Auguſt, he was ſolemnly inſtall'd Knight of the Garter. On the twelfth of the ſame Month, he made a magnificent Entry through the principal Streets of London, with all the Pomps uſual at a Coronation. The Triumphs of which Entertainment had continu'd longer, if the Court had not put on Mourning for the old Duke of Norfolk, who dy'd at Framingham Caſtle in September, to the great Sorrow of the Queen, who intirely lov'd him.

The Duke of Norfolk dies.

King Philip's ſullen Gravity was very unacceptable to the Engliſh; who ever lov'd a Medium between the Stiffneſs of the Spaniard, and the Gaity of the French; but if they were not pleas'd with his Temper, they were extreamly in love with his Bounty and Wealth: For he brought over a vaſt Treaſure with him, twenty Carts loaden with Bullion, and ninty nine Horſes and two Carts loaden with coin'd Gold and Silver; the greateſt Part of which was diſtributed among thoſe who had ſold their Country and Religion. At his Arrival at London, he procur'd the Pardon of many Priſoners, and among others, of Holgate Arch-Biſhop of York; but his moſt popular Act was his Interpoſing for the Preſervation of the Princeſs Elizabeth, and the Earl of Devonſhire. Gardiner was much fix'd againſt them, and thought the Work but half finiſh'd, while the Princeſs liv'd: Wiat had accus'd them both, in hopes of ſaving his own Life; but when that did not preſerve him, he publickly vindicated them on the Scaffold. The Earl of Devonſhire, to be freed from all Jealouſie, went beyond Sea, and dy'd a Year after in Italy, as ſome ſay, of Poiſon, being the eleventh and laſt Earl of that noble Family. King Philip at firſt took care to preſerve the Princeſs, upon a generous Account, pitying her Innocence, and hoping by ſuch a publick Act of Favour, to recommend himſelf to the Nation; but afterwards Intereſt fortify'd thoſe good and wiſe Inclinations; for when he had loſt Hopes of Iſſue from the Queen, he conſider'd that the Queen of Scotland, ſoon after marry'd to the Dauphine, was next in Succeſſion to Elizabeth; ſo that if ſhe were removed, the Crown of England might become an Acceſſion to that of France. Therefore he took particular Care to preſerve her; and probably with Hopes to have prevail'd ſo far upon her, by theſe good Offices, that if her Siſter ſhould die without Children, ſhe might be induc'd to marry him. But this was the only Act that was really grateful and acceptable to the Nation; for he affected ſuch an extravagant State, and was ſo ſullen and ſilent, that it was not eaſie for any to come within the Court, and there was no Acceſs to him without demanding it with almoſt as much Formality as Ambaſſadors us'd to Foreign Princes: And indeed his Carriage was ſuch, that the Acting him and his Spaniards was one of the great Diverſions of Queen Elizabeth's Court. This and other Matters caus'd a general Diſcontent to ſpread through moſt Places of the Kingdom; only Gardiner was well ſatisfy'd, ſince the Conduct of Affairs was put ſo intirely into his Hands. Many malicious Reports were ſpread of the Queen, particularly in Norfolk; where it was reported that ſhe was with Child before the King came over; which ſenſibly touch'd the Queen, but after ſtrict Examinations, the Rumour vaniſh'd into Air.

King Philip preſerves the Princeſs Elizabeth.

On the eleventh Day of November, the Queen's third Parliament met; and in the Writ of Summons, the Queen's Title of Supream Head of the Church was omitted; tho' hitherto ſhe had not only us'd the Name, but exercis'd the Power to the higheſt Degree. Cardinal Pool was now permitted to come ſo near as Flanders; and the Temper of the Parliament being ſoon found favourable to the Work he was projecting, the Queen ſent two Lords, Paget and Haſtings, to conduct him into England. At the opening of the Parliament, both King and Queen rod in State to Weſtminſter, each having a Sword of State, and a Cap of Maintenance carry'd before them. The firſt Bill that paſs'd, was a Repeal of Pool's Attainder, which was read by the Commons three Times in one Day; and the Bill was perfected, without making a Seſſion by by a ſhort Prorogation. He came over, and enter'd privately into London; for the Pope's Authority not being yet acknowledg'd, he could not be receiv'd as Legate. His Inſtructions were full and ample, beſides the Authority commonly lodg'd with Legates; which conſiſts in a Power to overthrow and diſpenſe with almoſt all the Rules and Canons of the Church. He made his firſt Speech to the King and Queen, and then to the Parliament, in the Name of the common Paſtor, lovingly inviting them to return to the Sheepfold of the Church. As he was delivering his plauſiable Speech, the Queen felt an unuſual Emotion of Joy within her, which ſhe judg'd to be a Child quickning in her Womb; which Belief being heighten'd by the flattering Court Ladies, the Council order'd Biſhop Bonner to ſing Te Deum at St. Paul's, which was ſucceeded with all the uſual Marks of Exultation. Both Houſes agreed upon an Addreſs to the King and Queen, 'That they would intercede with the Legate, to reconcile them to the 'See of Rome; offering to repeal all the Laws they had made againſt the Pope's 'Authority, in Token of their Repentance. Upon this the Cardinal came to the Parliament; where in a long Speech he firſt thanked them for repealing his Attainder, 'in Recompence of which, he came now to reconcile them to the Bo- 'dy of the Church: Then he inſiſted upon the Converſion of the Britains and 'Saxons to the Faith, on the Obedience they had paid to the Apoſtolick See, 'and the numerours Favours granted to the Crown by the ſame See, of which 'none was more Eminent than the Title of Defender of the Faith. The Ruin 'of the Greek Church, the Diſtractions of Germany, and the Confuſions they 'had ſuffer'd, ſince their Departure from the Unity of the Church, might con- 'vince them of the Neceſſity of intirely preſerving that Bond. In concluſion, he gave them and the whole Nation a Plenary Abſolution, which all preſent receiv'd upon their Knees; and the reſt of the Day was ſpent in ſinging Te Deum, and the Night in Boneſires.

Who in Parliament reconciles the Nation to the See of Rome.

Shortly after the famous Act paſs'd, repealing all Laws made againſt the Pope's Authority, only it met with a ſmall Impediment, by Reaſon of a Proviſo, which the Houſe of Lords inſerted for ſome Lands, which the Lord Wentworth had of the See of London. This was ſo much oppos'd by the Commons, that after the Bill had been offer'd to the Royal Aſſent, it was boldly cut out of the Parchment by Gardiner, who ſaid, Now I truly do the Office of a CHANCELLOR; alluding to the Word Cancelling, from whence he would have the Word CHANCELLOR deriv'd. 'The Bill enumerated and repeal'd all Acts 'made ſince the twentieth of Henry VIII. but all Foundations of Biſhopricks 'and Cathedrals, all Marriages, tho' contrary to the Laws of the Church, all In- 'ſtitutions, all Judicial Proceſſes, and the Settlements made, either of Church or 'Abby-Lands, were confirm'd. The Convocation had join'd their Interceſſion with 'the Cardinal, that he would confirm the Right of the preſent Poſſeſſors of thoſe 'Lands: Upon which he did confirm them, but with a heavy Charge, requiring 'thoſe who had any of the Churches Goods, to remember the Judgments of God 'upon ſuch Detainers; and that at leaſt, they would take Care that ſuch as ſerv'd 'the Cures ſhould be ſufficiently maintain'd: All which was put into the Act, and 'confirmed by it; and it was declar'd that all Suits concerning thoſe Lands were to 'be try'd in the Civil Courts; and that it ſhould be a Premunire, if any diſturb'd 'the Poſſeſſors, by the Pretence of Eccleſiaſtical Power. It was alſo declar'd, That 'the Title of Supream Head of the Church, did never of Right belong to the 'Crown, and enacted that it ſhould be left out of all Writs for the future. All 'Exemptions granted to Monaſteries, and now continu'd in Lay-Hands, were 'taken away; and all Churches were made ſubject to Epiſcopal Juriſdiction, 'excepting only the Privileges of the Univerſities, Weſtminſter, Windſor and 'the Tower of London. The Statute of Mortmain was repeal'd for twenty 'Years to come; and all Things were brought back to the State in which they 'were, in the twentieth Year of Henry VIII. The lower Houſe of Convocation gave Occaſion to many Clauſes in this Act, relating to the Reſtoration of Tithes, the burning of Heretical Books, to Pluralities and Non-Reſidence, to Simoniacal Pactions, the Payments of Firſt-Fruits and Tenths, and the Limitation of Premunires. By another Bill all former Acts againſt Lollards were reviv'd. The Commons offer'd another Bill for voiding of all Leaſes made by marry'd Prieſts, but it was laid aſide by the Lords; and thus were the Penſioners and aſpiring Men in the Houſe of Commons, either labouring to redeem former Faults, or hoping to merit great Rewards by the Forwardneſs of their Zeal. By another Bill ſeveral Things were made Treaſon; and it was declar'd, 'That if the Queen 'dy'd before the King, and left any Children, the King ſhould have the Govern-'ment in his Hands, 'till they were of Age; and during that Time, the Con-'ſpiring his Death was made Treaſon, but none were to be try'd for Words, 'but within ſix Months after they were ſpoken. Another Act paſs'd, declaring it Treaſon, for any to pray for the Queen's Death, unleſs they repented of it, and then they were to ſuffer Corporal Puniſhment at the Judges Diſcretion. A ſevere Act was alſo paſs'd againſt all that ſpread lying Reports of the King, the Queen, the Peers, Judges, or great Officers: Some were to loſe their Hands, others their Ears, and the reſt were to be fin'd according to the Degree of their Offence.

Other Acts.

The Parliament diſſolv'd.

All the Bills being finiſh'd, this remarkable Parliament was diſſolv'd upon the ſixteenth Day of January, to the great Satisfaction of Biſhop Gardiner, who had now perform'd all he had undertaken to the Queen or Emperor; and his Reputation was much rais'd for bringing about ſo vaſt a Change in ſo ſmall a Time, and with ſo little Oppoſition. Ambaſſadors were ſent to Rome to give Notice of the happy Reſtoration of England to that See; and a ſolemn Proceſſion was appointed of many Biſhops and Prieſts, where Bonner carry'd the Hoſt to thank God for reconciling the Nation to St. Peter's Chair: And this having been done upon St. Andrew's Day, that was appointed to be an Anniverſary, and was call'd, The Feaſt of the Reconciliation.

A. D. 1555. Reg. 2/3. Phil. 1/2.

IV. The Queen and her Favourites, having now obtain'd their main Cauſe, they took it into Conſideration in what Methods they ought to proceed againſt the Hereticks. Pool was an Enemy to ſevere Proceedings, he thought that a Churchman ought to have the Tenderneſs of a Father, and the Care of a Shepherd, whoſe Duty it is to reduce and not devour the ſtray Sheep: He had obſerv'd that Cruelty rather inflam'd than cur'd that Diſtemper; therefore he thought the better Way was to begin with an effectual Reformation of the Manners of the Clergy. Gardiner on the other ſide, being of an abject and cruel Temper himſelf, thought that the ſtrict Execution of the Laws againſt Lollards would be moſt ſerviceable to the Church; tho' he confeſs'd that a Reformation of the Clergy was a good Thing, but then he thought the preſent Times would not bear it. The Queen was for joining both theſe Councils together, and deſign'd to proceed at the ſame Time, both againſt ſcandalous Churchmen, and Hereticks: So that in a ſhort Time the Perſecution began, in the latter End of the Month of January. Rogers, a learned Man, who had been Prebendary of St. Paul's, was the firſt Victim, who would not fly from Perſecution, tho' he was ſtrongly induc'd by a Wife and Family of ten Children. Both he and Biſhop Hooper were brought before Gardiner, Bonner, Tonſtall, and three other Biſhops. They demanded of them whether they would ſubmit to the Church or not? but they anſwer'd, That they look'd upon the Church of Rome, as Antichriſtian. Upon which Gardiner charg'd them with reproaching the Queen; but Rogers declar'd, That he honour'd the Queen, and expected no Ill at her Hands, but as ſhe was excited by them. This caus'd Gardiner and the other Biſhops to declare, That they were ſo far from exciting the Queen in this Matter; that ſhe had commanded them to act as they did; and this was confirm'd by two Privy-Counſellors then preſent. In Concluſion, after a little Time allow'd them, they declar'd them obſtinate Hereticks, and ſo degraded them from their their Functions. Rogers was not permitted to ſee his Wife nor his Children; yet ſo little did his terrible Sentence of Burning fright him, that the Morning of his Execution, he was found in a quiet and calm Sleep. He was carry'd from Newgate to Smithfield, on the fourth of Febuary, where a Pardon was offer'd him at the Stake, if he would recant; but he refus'd it upon thoſe Terms, and anſwer'd, He would not exchange a ſhort Fire for everlaſting Burnings, declaring, That he reſign'd up his Life with Joy, as a Teſtimony of the Doctrine he had preach'd. As for Hooper, he was ſent to Gloceſter, his former Biſhoprick, at which he greatly rejoic'd, for he hop'd by his Death to confirm many in that Place. He diſcours'd with ſeveral whom he had formerly known, and ſome of them melted into Tears, which much affected the Biſhop, who ſaid, All he had ſuffer'd in his Impriſonment had not mov'd him ſo much. On the ninth of February he was brought to the Stake, where a Pardon was alſo offer'd him, but to no Effect. While he was burning a great Wind blew and hinder'd the Flame from riſing ſo high as to choak him, or deſtroy his Vitals; ſo that he was near three Quarters of an Hour in exquiſite Torment: But he ſtill continu'd calling on God, and at laſt cry'd out, Lord Jeſus receive my Spirit. Sanders, Miniſter of Coventry, and Taylor Miniſter of Hadley in Suffolk, were at the ſame Time condemn'd, and ſent to be burnt at the Places where they had ſerv'd: The former was firſt committed for Preaching without a Licence, after the Queen's Prohibition; and the latter for oppoſing ſome Prieſts, who violently broke into the Church, and ſaid Maſs in it.

Gardiner was now in hopes that theſe four Executions being made in ſeveral Parts of England, would have ſtruck ſuch a general Terror into the whole Party, that there would have been little Occaſion for further Severities: But when he ſaw ſix more apprehended on the ſame Account, and that the Spirits of thoſe call'd Hereticks, were now rather inflam'd than depreſs'd, he reſolv'd to concern himſelf no farther in thoſe Trials; and turn'd over that Judicious Task to Bonner, whoſe Temper was ſo cruel and brutal, that he chearfully undertook it, tho' the Nation ſtood amaz'd at theſe Proceedings. He had for ſome Months kept one Tomkins a Weaver in his Houſe, who was found to doubt of the Real Preſence; for which he us'd ſeveral Cruelties to him, as the tearing out the Hair of his Beard, and the holding a Candle to his Hand, 'till the Veins and Sinews buſt aſſunder: And theſe not prevailing to make a Change, he was at laſt burnt in Smithfield. One Hunter, an Apprentice, not above nineteen Years of Age, was condemn'd and burnt on the ſame Account; whom Bonner was ſo much concern'd to preſerve, that he offer'd him forty Pounds to change his Faith; ſo mercenary did he imagine were the Conſciences of ſome Men. Two Gentlemen, Cauſton, and Higbed, one Laurence a Prieſt, and two meaner Perſons, were burnt near their own Houſes in Eſſex. The Method in theſe and in all other Proceedings, during the reſt of this Reign, was ſummary, and ex officio: Upon Complaint made, Perſons were impriſon'd, and Articles were offer'd to them, which they were requir'd to anſwer; and if their Anſwers were judg'd Heretical, they were burnt without any further Objections, or Proofs againſt them. Ferrar, who had been Biſhop of St. David's, was treated in the ſame Manner, by his Succeſſor Morgan; and tho' he appeal'd to Cardinal Pool, it had no other Effect, but ſtopping his Execution three Weeks. Rawlins White, a poor Fiſherman, was condemn'd by the Biſhop of Landaffe, and afterwards burnt. Marth, a Prieſt, was burnt at Cheſter; and to the ordinary Cruelty of Burning, they added a new Invention of pouring melted Pitch on his Head. One Flower, a raſh and inconſiderate Man, wounded a Prieſt, while he was officiating at Weſtminſter; for which he was condemn'd as a Heretick, and burnt: But the Fact was diſapprov'd by all the Reformed, and he became a ſincere Penitent for it, before he dy'd. After this, for the Space of a few Weeks, there was a Stop put to theſe Severities, which gave the moſt terrible Apprehenſions to the Nation.

The uſual Way of Proſecution.

The

The Queen, to teſtifie her real Zeal, about this Time ſent for her Treaſurer, and ſome other Officers of her Revenue, and told them, That ſhe thought her ſelf bound in Conſcience to reſtore all the Lands of the Church, that were then in her Hands: And if it ſhould be objected, that the Crown was poor, and that ſhe could not maintain her Dignity without them, ſhe declar'd, That ſhe valu'd the Salvation of her Soul more than ten Kingdoms, and thank'd God that her Husband was of the ſame Mind. She thought they were unlawfully acquir'd, and that they could not be held without Sin, therefore ſhe reſolv'd they ſhould be diſpos'd as Cardinal Pool ſhould think fit. To this ſhe was much excited by a Bull of Excommunication againſt ſuch as detain'd Church-Lands, iſſu'd out by Pope Julius this Year. That Pope dy'd ſhortly after, and was ſucceeded by Marcellus; who turn'd his Thoughts wholly to the Reformation of Abuſes, of which he was ſo ſenſible, that he once cry'd out, That he did not ſee how any could be ſav'd who ſate in that Chair! Which had ſuch Effects upon him, that he dy'd within twenty two Days after his Election. Upon his Death, the Queen endeavour'd for the Promotion of Cardinal Pool, but without his Knowledge or Approbation: But at Rome they were ſo apprehenſive of another reforming Pope, that they haſten'd their Election, and ſet up Caraffa, call'd Paul the Fourth, who was the moſt ambitious and inſolent Pope, that had reign'd for many Years. Upon the Day of his Election, the Engliſh Ambaſſadors enter'd Rome in great State with a Train of a hundred and forty Horſe of their own Attendance; but the Pope would not admit them to an Audience, 'till they had accepted of a Grant of the Title of the Kingdom of Ireland from himſelf; to which they ſervilely ſubmitted. Their publick Audience was given with great Solemnity, in which the Pope declar'd, That in Token of his pardoning the Nation, he had added to the Crown the Title of the Kingdom of Ireland, by that Supream Power which God had given him to deſtroy, or erect Kingdoms at his Pleaſure. But in private Diſcourſes, he ſo much complain'd of the unpardonable Sin of Detaining the Abby-Lands, and was ſo poſitive in the Reſtitution of them, that it extreamly mortify'd the Lord Mountacute, who was one of the Ambaſſadors, and whoſe Eſtate chiefly conſiſted in thoſe Lands.

The Pride of of Pope Paul the Fourth.

In England the Court was now in mighty Expectations of the Queen's Delivery; and in May, the Envoys were nam'd that were to carry the good News to the neighbouring Courts. In the Beginning of June ſhe was believ'd to be in Labour, and the Report flew all over London that ſhe had brought forth a Son. The Prieſts had ſetled all their Hopes on that, ſo that Te Deum was ſung in all Parts; and one more officious than the reſt, made a Sermon about it, and deſcrib'd all the Lineaments of their young Prince. But they ſoon found they were abus'd; and that it was either an Abortion, or a Timpany, or ſome other Diſtemper; or, as ſome have been ready to judge, a notorious Impoſture, but defeated by the Vigilance of King Philip. However it was, from this Time all Hopes of Iſſue ceas'd, which much encreas'd the Sourneſs and Severity of her Temper; and King Philip, being ſo much younger than her, out of Averſion or Reſentment, never eſteem'd her, but in a few Months left her and the Nation. He found it was impoſſible to get England into his Poſſeſſion without Children, therefore he gave over all Deſigns about it; and having liv'd with her about fifteen Months, he thought it neceſſary to take more Care of his Hereditary, than his Matrimonial Crown, and for the future conſider'd England rather as a ſure Ally, than an additional Power. Not long after his Great Father, the Emperor Charles the Fifth, reſign'd all his Dominions to him; which Reſignation drew the wondring Eyes of all Europe upon it. This mighty Prince had enjoy'd his Hereditary Dominions forty Years, and the Empire thirty ſix: He had indur'd vaſt Fatigues, by the numerous Journies he had made; nine into Germany, ſix into Spain, ſeven into Italy, four through France: He was ten Times in the Netherlands, made two Expeditions into Africa, was twice in England, and had croſs'd the Sea eleven Times. He had unuſual Succeſs in his Wars; he had taken a Pope, a King of France, and ſome German Princes, Priſoners; and had a prodigious Acceſſion of Wealth and Empire from the Weſt-Indies. But now being much afflicted with the Gout, his Fortune chang'd, and ſeveral Deſigns blaſted, he declar'd, That there ought to be an Interval between the Affairs of the World, and the Hour of Death; he reſign'd all his Dominions with a Greatneſs of Mind, much ſuperior to his Conqueſts. He liv'd a retir'd religious Life, with a hundred thouſand Crowns Penſion; and at the end of two Years dy'd, having given the World a great Inſtance of a Mind ſurfeited with Human Glory, that ſought for Quiet in a private Cell, which in vain it had ſearch'd after in Camps and Palaces.

In England Orders were ſent to the Juſtices to look narrowly to the Preachers of Hereſie, and to have ſecret Spies in every Pariſh, for giving them Information of all Peoples Behaviour. This was thought to riſe from Spaniſh Counſels, which became very odious to the People, who grew ſo averſe to theſe cruel Proceedings, that Bonner himſelf finding their Temper, ſlack'd his Hand, and burnt none for five Weeks. Upon which the Queen wrote to him, and requir'd him to perform the Office of a good Paſtor, and either to reclaim the Hereticks, or proceed againſt them according to Law. This Admonition prov'd very agreeable to his cruel Diſpoſition; and immediately new Fires were kindled. Cardmaker, once a Prebendary of Bath, and Warne a Tradeſman, were burnt in Smithfield. Seven were burnt in ſeveral Parts of Eſſex, who were condemn'd by Bonner, and ſent down to ſuffer near the Places of their Abode. The Council wrote to the chief Men of the County, to gather many together, and aſſiſt at thoſe diſmal Spectacles; and when they heard that ſome had come of their own accord to the Burnings at Colcheſter, they deſir'd the Lord Rich to give their Thanks to thoſe Perſons for their Zeal; ſo induſtriouſly did they ſtudy to cheriſh a Spirit of Cruelty among the People. Bradford, who had generouſly ſav'd Bourne the Preacher at St. Paul's, was notwithſtanding condemn'd; and after many Methods us'd by the chief of the Popiſh Party to make him recant, he ſuffer'd at Smithfield with great Joy and a noble Conſtancy, together with a young Apprentice, whom he much incourag'd in his Sufferings. Thornton, Harpsfield and others, rais'd a Perſecution at Canterbury, tho' Cardinal Pool was averſe to ſuch Proceedings; but he durſt not now diſcover ſo much, for the Pope had an inveterate Hatred to him, and was reſolv'd to recal him upon the firſt Occaſion, and for that End he enter'd into a Correſpondence with Gardiner, who now hop'd to have been made a Cardinal, and Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury: And upon thoſe Hopes, he ſtill preſerv'd Cranmer; for tho' he now ſtood condemn'd for Hereſie, yet the See was not accounted void, 'till he was formally degraded. Some declar'd it was moſt proper to begin with him, who had been the chief Promoter of Hereſie in England: But Gardiner ſaid, it was better to try if it were poſſible to ſhake him, and it would be a mighty Blow to the whole Party, if he could be prevail'd on to forſake it; whereas if he ſuffer'd Burning with the ſame Reſolution that others expreſs'd, it would much raiſe the Spirits of his Followers. The See of Canterbury was now only ſequeſter'd in Pool's Hands, and he fearing to fall under the Pope's Rage, was forc'd to ſuffer the cruel Prebendaries of that Church to act as they pleas'd: So they burnt two Prieſts, and two Lay-men at Canterbury, and ſent a Man and a Woman to be burnt in other Places in Kent. Two that belong'd to the Dioceſes of Wincheſter and Chicheſter were condemn'd by Bonner, and were burnt near the Places of their Abode. Theſe ſuffer'd in July. In Auguſt ſeven were burnt in ſeveral Places; ſix more were burnt in one Fire at Canterbury, and four were burnt elſewhere. In September five were burnt at Canterbury, and ſeven in other Places. In October, two were burnt at Ely, by Shaxton's Means, who now compleated his Apoſtacy by his Cruelty.

Thus

Thus did the Perſecution rage in ſeveral Places, to the great Terror and Deteſtation of the People; but the moſt memorable Sufferers this Year were the two famous Biſhops Ridley and Latimer. Three Biſhops, Lincoln, Gloceſter and Briſtol were ſent to Oxford with a Commiſſion from Cardinal Pool to proceed againſt them. Ridley ſaid, he paid great Reſpect to Pool, for his Royal Extract and his Abilities, but as he was the Pope's Legate, he would ſhow no Reverence to him, nor be uncover'd before any that acted by his Authority. After a long Diſcourſe, and ſeveral Arguments, and a Night's Conſideration granted them, they were condemn'd as obſtinate Hereticks, and deliver'd to the ſecular Arm, and the Writs were ſent down for their Burning. The Night before the Execution, Ridley was very joyful, and invited the Mayor and his Wife to be at his Wedding next Day: At which, when the Mayor's Wife melted into Tears, he ſaid, He perceiv'd ſhe did not love him, but told her, Tho' his Breakfaſt would be ſharp, he was ſure his Supper would be ſweet; and was glad to hear that his Siſter would come and ſee him die; and continu'd in ſuch Compoſure of Mind, that they were all amaz'd at it. As they were led out to Execution, they earneſtly caſt their Eyes up to Cranmer's Window in the Priſon, hoping to have ſeen him; but he was then ingag'd with ſome Friars: Yet he look'd after them with the utmoſt Tenderneſs, and kneeling down pray'd earneſtly, That God would now ſtrengthen their Faith and Patience in their laſt painful Paſſage. When they came to the Stake before Baliol College, they imbrac'd each other with great Affection, and Ridley ſaid, Be of good Courage, Brother, for God will aſſwage the Flame, or enable us to abide it. Smith preach'd the Sermon, and compar'd their Dying in this Manner, to that of Judas, who hang'd himſelf. Ridley deſir'd leave to anſwer ſome Points in his Sermon; but it was told him, That he was not to be ſuffer'd to ſpeak, except he deſign'd to recant: So he turn'd himſelf to God, when he ſaw Men ſo unreaſonable to him. He ſent a Petition to the Queen in Behalf of the Tenants of the Biſhoprick of London, from whom he had taken Fines, for which they had renew'd their Leaſes; and pray'd that either their Leaſes might be confirm'd, or their Fines reſtor'd out of thoſe Goods which had been ſeiz'd when he was firſt impriſon'd. Then they both pray'd, and fitted themſelves for the Stake; Latimer crying to Ridley, Be of good Comfort, we ſhall this Day light ſuch a Candle in England, as by God's Grace ſhall never be extinguiſh'd. Being thus prepar'd, and Gun-powder hang'd about their Bodies, the Wood was fired, which ſoon put Latimer out of his Pain; but Ridley had a more lingring Torment: For they threw on ſo much Wood, that it was long before the Flame broke through it, and his Legs were almoſt conſum'd, before his Vitals were affected. Thus triumphantly did theſe two excellent Biſhops end their Days and their Miniſtry: Ridley was eſteem'd one of the Ableſt of all that promoted the Reformation, both for Piety, Learning and Solidity of Judgment: The other, who was eighty Years of Age, was regarded as a truly Primitive Biſhop, who ſeem'd to have more of the Simplicity of the firſt Ages, than the Politeneſs or Learning of the latter Times.

The Sufferings of Biſhop Ridley and Latimer at Oxford.

It was particularly obſerv'd that Gardiner was very impatient to have theſe Biſhops burnt, and he ſtaid long for Dinner that Day, 'till he underſtood that the Fire was actually kindled. When the Meſſengers arriv'd at four in the Afternoon, he went chearfully to dine: But at Dinner he was ſtruck with a remarkable Illneſs, which turn'd to a terrible Suppreſſion of Urine, and held him many Days 'till he dy'd on the twelfth of November. He went twice to the Parliament, which was open'd the twenty firſt of October, but after that was confin'd to his Houſe: He expreſs'd great Sorrow and Remorſe for his former Life, and often cry'd out, I have err'd like St. Peter, but not repented as he did! Thus dy'd this remarkable Man, who was believ'd to be of noble Extraction, tho' baſely born; for his true Father was ſuppos'd to be Richard Woodvill, Brother to Edward the Fourth's Queen, who was Grand-Mother to Henry the Eighth. He was a Man well skill'd in the Canon and Civil Laws, and moderately in Divinity; he had a good Stile in Latin, and underſtood Greek well; but his great Strength lay in a profound Diſſimulation, a Quickneſs of Apprehenſion, a nice Proſpect of Affairs, an artificial Concealment of of his Mind, and a ſubtle Way of Inſinuating himſelf into the Credit and Affections of other Perſons. He had certainly brought about great Deſigns; and now when a Cardinal's Hat was juſt falling upon his Head, Heaven ſtopp'd him in his Carreer, and all his Ambitious Projects fell with him. Only the Conſequences of his Cruelty did not ceaſe; for three Perſons were burnt in one Fire at Canterbury in November; and the famous Philpot was burnt in Smithfield in December. In all, there were ſixty ſeven burnt this Year, of whom four were Biſhops, and thirteen Prieſts.

The Fourth Parliament in this Reign.

A new Parliament was now aſſembled, by which it appear'd Mens Minds were much alienated from the Clergy, and alſo from the Queen, whoſe Deſire was to reſtore them to great Wealth and Power. It was propos'd to give the Queen a Subſidy, and two Fifteenths: Which was the firſt Aid that the Queen had ask'd, tho' ſhe was now in the third Year of her Reign; and what was deſir'd, was no more than ſhe might have exacted at her firſt coming to the Crown. Therefore ſince ſhe had forgiven ſo much at her Coronation, it ſeem'd unreaſonable to deny it at this Time; yet ſtill great Oppoſitions were made againſt it: Many ſaid the Queen was impoveriſhing the Crown, and giving away the Abby-Lands, and therefore ſhe ought to be ſupply'd from the Clergy, and not preſs upon the Laity: But it was anſwer'd, That the Convocation had given her ſix Shillings in the Pound, but that would not anſwer her preſent Neceſſities, upon which the Debate became violent; but to prevent further Heats, the Queen ſent a Meſſage declaring ſhe would accept the Subſidy without the Fifteenths, and upon that it was granted. The Queen ſent for the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, and told him She could not with a good Conſcience exact the Tenths and Firſt-Fruits of the Clergy, ſince they were given to her Father to ſupport his unlawful Dignity of being the Supream Head of the Church: She alſo thought, That all Tithes and Impropriations were the Patrimony of the Church, and therefore was reſolv'd to reſign ſuch of them as were in her own Hands. The former Part, as to Tenths and Firſt-Fruits, eaſily paſs'd in the Houſe, but great Oppoſition was made to the latter Part of her Motion; for it was thought to be a Step towards taking all Impropriations out of the Hands of the Laity; yet upon a Diviſion of the Houſe, it was carry'd by ſixty ſeven Voices. A Bill was brought in againſt the Dutcheſs of Suffolk, and ſeveral Reformers, who had gone beyond Sea to enjoy their Conſciences, requiring them to return under ſevere Penalties: The Lords paſs'd it, but the Commons threw it out; for they now began to repent of the ſevere Laws they had formerly made, and were reſolv'd to add no more. They alſo rejected another Bill, for incapacitating ſome to be Juſtices of the Peace, who were blam'd for their Remiſneſs in proſecuting Hereticks. An Act was brought in for debarring one Bennet Smith, who hired ſome Aſſaſſinates to commit a moſt execrable Murder, from the Benefit of the Clergy, which by Common Law would have ſav'd him. In this Parliament there was ſuch a Heat in the Houſe of Commons, that Sir Anthony Kingſton, an active Member, boldly took the Keys of the Houſe from the Serjeant; but when the Parliament was diſſolv'd, on the ninth of September, he was for that ſent to the Tower, but ſoon after releas'd. The next Year he and ſix others were accus'd of a Deſign to rob the Exchequer; for which they were all hang'd beſides himſelf, who dy'd before his Trial. In the Convocation, Cardinal Pool made ſome laudable Attempts to reform the ill Lives and Practices of the Clergy, in which he was oppos'd by Pope Paul, who endeavour'd to have ſet up an Inquiſition in England; and the Cardinal has been much commended for refuſing at this Time all Incouragement in England to the new Order of Jeſuits, who were making great Pretenſions to gain Poſſeſſion of the Abby-Lands.

A. D. 1556. Reg. 3/4. Phil. 2/3.

In the Beginning of the following Year, the great Victim Cranmer was offer'd up to the Zeal and Rage of the Romiſh Party. Towards the effecting of this, in September laſt, Brooks Biſhop of Gloceſter came down to Oxford, with Authority from Cardinal Pool, to judge him; with Brooks two Delegates, Martin and Scory, were ſent to aſſiſt him in the King and Queen's Name. When he was brought before them in St. Mary's Church, he pay'd the Reſpect that was due to thoſe who ſate in the King and Queen's Name, but would ſhew none to Brooks, Since he ſate there by an Authority deriv'd from the Pope, which he would never acknowledge. After that he learnedly diſcours'd againſt the Power and Uſurpations of the See of Rome. Brooks and the two Delegates objected many Things againſt him, as to his former Actions; to all which he gave diſtinct and modeſt Anſwers. After much Diſcourſe had paſs'd on both Sides, Brooks requir'd him to appear before the Pope within eighty Days, and anſwer to ſuch Things as ſhould be objected againſt him. He ſaid, He would go moſt willingly, with the King and Queen's Conſent, which he could not poſſibly do, if he was ſtill detain'd Priſoner. But the Pope not expecting his coming, in leſs than twenty Days, by Letters to the King and Queen, commanded that he ſhould receive Condemnation, and be deliver'd to the Secular Arm. Therefore in February, this Year, new Powers were granted by the Pope to Bonner and Thirleby, who were ſent to Oxford publickly to degrade him from all Things relating to his Function. In Deriſion he was cloath'd with all the Pontifical Robes made of Canvas; which were taken from him, according to the Ceremonies of Degradation, in which Bonner proceeded with all the Inſolence and Scorn that could ariſe from a Mind fill'd with Revenge; but Thirleby perform'd his Part in the Ceremony, with great Expreſſions of Sorrow, and many Tears. In all this Cranmer ſeem'd very little concern'd: He declar'd, It was a groſs Piece of Injuſtice to condemn him for not going to Rome, when he was ſhut up in Priſon; but he was not ſorry to be thus cut off, with all this Pageantry, from any Relation to that Church: He deny'd the Pope had any Authority over him, ſo appeald from this Sentence to a free General Council.

Cranmer's Sufferings.

He is degraded.

But now numerous Engines were imploy'd, to perſuade him to recant: Both Engliſh and Spaniſh Divines had many Conferences with him; he was remov'd from Priſon to the Dean's Lodgings at Chriſt-Church; he was put in hopes of Life, of Preferments and all other Favours; and all the Arguments that could be invented were us'd to procure him to ſign a Paper they had prepar'd for him. In Concluſion, as St. Peter himſelf had with Curſes deny'd his Maſter, ſo he who reſiſted almoſt three Years, was at laſt overcome; and human Infirmity, the Fears of Death, and Hopes given him, prevail'd with him to ſign a Recantation of all former Opinions, concluding it with a Proteſtation, That he had done it freely, only for the Diſcharge of his Conſcience. This was the moſt unfortunate Blemiſh of his whole Life, which was immediately Printed, to the wonderful Surprize and Dejection of all his Party. But this did not ſatisfie the furious Queen, who was reſolv'd ſtill to make him a Sacrifice to all her Reſentments: She ſaid, That his Repentance was good for his Soul; but ſince he had been the chief Diffacer of Hereſie over the Nation, it was neceſſary to make him a publick Example. Therefore a Writ was ſent down to burn him; and after ſome Stop had been made in the Execution of it, new Orders came out for doing it ſuddenly. This was kept from Cranmer's Knowledge; for they deſign'd to have carry'd him to the Stake without giving him any Notice, and ſo hop'd to make him die in a deſpairing Condition. Yet having ſome Suſpicion of their Deſign, he wrote a long Paper, containing a Confeſſion of his Faith, ſuch as had been dictated purely by his Conſcience, and not his Fears.

He recants.

The twenty first of March being fix'd for his Execution, he was brought to St. Mary's Church, and ſet in a conſpicuous Seat erected for that Purpoſe; where Cole Provoſt of Eaton, preach'd the Sermon, 'In which he exhorted 'him to perſiſt in the Faith, of which he had lately publiſh'd a Confeſſion, and 'even to Death it ſelf, which was the Will of the Magiſtrate to inflict on him 'this Day; ſince the Divine Vengeance for the Execution of More and Fiſher, 'under King Henry, could not otherwiſe be expiated. And ſince his Conver-'ſion was the immediate Hand of Heaven, nothing could be more acceptable 'to God and all good Men, than a publick Declaration of the Reality of it. It is no wonder that he was thrown into the utmoſt Conſternation at ſuch an unexpected Denunciation: But recollecting himſelf, and rouſing his former Courage, he boldly ſtood up, and made an excellent Speech to the People, 'In which 'having premis'd many Things concerning Reformation of Life and Morals, 'he exactly declar'd the principal Heads of his Faith and Doctrine, affirming, 'That the Kingdom of Anti-Chriſt was contain'd and eſtabliſh'd in the Power 'of the Pope; and finally repreſenting how hainouſly he had offended God by 'renouncing the Truth, he declar'd this ſurprizing Reſolution, That the ſame 'Right Hand that had ſo impiouſly err'd in ſubſcribing his Recantation, ſhould 'be the firſt Sufferer in the Flames. This caus'd a vaſt Confuſion in the Aſſembly; and ſome calling to him to diſſemble no more, he cry'd out, That he ever lov'd Simplicity, and excepting that Inſtance, he never diſſembled in his Life. Upon which, without ſuffering him to proceed, with great Clamours and Revilings, they immediately hurry'd him to the Place of Execution, which was the ſame where Ridley and Latimer had ſuffer'd. Here he ſtood, the moſt melancholy and piercing Spectacle in the World; the Primate of all England, lately flouriſhing in the higheſt Honours and Authority with Princes, venerable for his Perſon and Age, his Piety and Learning, and innumerable Excellencies of Mind, now by the Malice of the Romaniſts, dreſt in a ridiculous old Habit, baited with Scurrility and opprobrious Jeſts, and drag'd to a moſt inhuman and tormenting Death. When the Fire was kindled, he ſtretch'd out his Right Hand into the Flame, and with an amazing Steadineſs held it 'till it was conſum'd; ſometimes ſaying That unworthy Hand! and often crying, Lord Jeſus receive my Spirit, 'till he quite expir'd in the Torment. Tho' his Body was conſum'd to Aſhes, his Heart was found intire and untouch'd; which remarkable Accident was much obſerv'd, and if it had happen'd to one of the contrary Party, it would have caus'd his Canonization.

He recovers again.

He is burnt at Oxford.

Thus dy'd the famous Thomas Cranmer, in the ſixty ſeventh Year of his Age, and the twenty third of his Primacy: A Perſon rais'd up by God for mighty Services, and truly fitted for them by his Primitive Humility, his indefatigable Induſtry, and his inviolable Friendſhip. His laſt Fall was nobly expiated by a patient Martyrdom; and thoſe who compar'd ancient and modern Times, did not only liken him to Chryſoſtom, Ambroſe and Auſtin, the Glories of the Church in the fourth and fifth Centuries, but to the more immediate Followers of the Apoſtles, Ignatius, Polycarp, and Cyprian. No Man had paſs'd through more numerous Difficulties for above twenty Years than himſelf, which has given Occaſion to many to charge him with too much Obſequiouſneſs and Compliance, in which perhaps he cannot be ſtrictly vindicated, no more than his burning of Joan of Kent and Van Parre for Heretical Opinions, for which ſome think his own Death was a Judgment upon him. But this muſt be confeſs'd for him, and the other chief Reformers, that they were really Men, and had Mixtures of Fear and Human Infirmities with their other excellent Qualities: And indeed Cranmer was in all other Points ſuch an extraordinary Perſon, that perhaps it was fit there ſhould be ſome Ingredients in his Temper, to leſſen the Veneration, which his uncommon Worth might have rais'd too high, if it had not been for thoſe Feebleneſſes, which upon ſome Occaſions appear'd in him. On the Day after Cranmer's Execution,

His Character.

Pool made Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury.

Cardinal Pool was conſecrated Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury; which gave Occaſion to many to apply the Words of Elijah to him, Thou haſt kill'd, and taken Poſſeſſion. Three Days after, on the Feaſt of Annunciation, attended by many of the Nobility to Bow-Church, he receiv'd the Pall with great Pomp and Solemnity.

Great Numbers burnt this Year.

This Year prov'd as black and diſmal as the laſt by the Numbers that were ſacrific'd in Flames to the Romiſh Cruelty. In January, five Men and two Women were burnt at one Stake in Smithfield; and one Man and four Women were burnt at Canterbury. In March two Women were burnt at Ipſwich, and three Men at Salisbury. In April ſix Eſſex Men were burnt in Smithfield; a Man and a Woman were burnt at Rocheſter, and another at Canterbury; and ſix who were ſent from Colcheſter, were condemn'd by Bonner, without giving them more than the Afternoon to conſider of a Recantation: For he was now ſo harden'd in his Cruelty, that he grew weary of keeping his Priſoners, and uſing of Perſuaſions; ſo he ſent them back to Colcheſter, where they were burnt. He alſo condemn'd both a blind Man and an aged Cripple, and they were both burnt in the ſame Fire at Stratford. In May, three Women were burnt in Smithfield; and ſoon after two more at Gloceſter, one of them being blind. Three were burnt at Beccles in Suffolk; five were burnt at Lewes, and one at Leiceſter. But in June, Bonner gave the moſt ſignal Inſtance of his Cruelty that England had yet ſeen; for eleven Men and two Women were burnt in the ſame Fire at Stratford: The Horror of which Action ſeem'd to have ſome Operation on him, for he burnt none 'till April in the next Year. In June three were burnt at St. Edmund's Bury, and three afterwards at Newbury. This Cruelty was not confin'd to England, but it extended as far as the adjacent Iſlands: For in Guernſey, a Mother and her two Daughters were burnt at the ſame Stake: One of them was a marry'd Woman and big with Child; the Violence of the Fire burſting her Belly, the Child fell out into the Flame, which was ſnatch'd out by one more merciful than the reſt; but the other barbarous Spectators threw it back into the Fire. Two were after this burnt at Greenſtead, and a blind Woman at Darby; four were burnt at Briſtoll, and as many at Mayfield in Suſſex, and one at Nottingham. So that eighty five were martyr'd this Year, without any Regard had to Age or Sex, to young or old, to Lame or Blind; which rais'd ſuch an extream Averſion in the Nation to that Religion, that it is no Wonder, if the Apprehenſions of ſo dreadful a Yoke, broke out into moſt violent and convulſive Symptoms. Yet by theſe Means the Reformation was ſo far from being extinguiſh'd, that it daily ſpread more and more, and mightily quicken'd the Zeal of thoſe who profeſs'd it. They had frequent Meetings, and ſeveral Teachers that inſtructed them; and their Friends that went beyond Sea, and ſettled in Strasburg, Frankfort, Emden, and ſome other Places in Germany, took care to ſend over many uſeful Books for their Comfort and Inſtruction.

Which quickens the Minds of the Reformers.

A. D. 1557. Reg. 4/5. Phil. 3/4.

Nor was the Rage and Fury of theſe Times exercis'd only on the Living; for the Bones of Martin Bucer and Paul Phagius, who had been long bury'd, were dug up, formally arraign'd for Hereſie, and with much ſavage Ceremony publickly burnt in the Market-Place at Cambridge. Peter Martyr's Wife, who dy'd at Oxford, was likewiſe rak'd out of her Grave, and ignominiouſly bury'd in a Dunghil. But the Juſtices of Peace were generally ſo ſlack in their Proſecution of Hereticks, that it ſeem'd neceſſary to find out other Inſtruments; ſo the dreadful Courts of Inquiſition were deſign'd to be ſet up in England. As a Step towards it, a Commiſſion was given to Bonner and twenty more, moſt of them Laymen, to ſearch all over England for Perſons ſuſpected of Hereſie, and to proceed againſt them by Preſentments or any other politick Ways. Many other Commiſſions, ſubaltern to theirs, were iſſu'd out for ſeveral Counties and Dioceſes; which was look'd upon as ſuch an Advance towards an Inquiſition, that all concluded it would ſhortly follow. The

New Projects for Perſecution.

Burnings were carry'd on furiouſly in ſome Places, but coldly in moſt Parts, for the Deteſtation of ſuch Cruelties became almoſt univerſal. However, without naming Particulars, ſeventy nine were burnt this Year, in ſeveral Parts of the Nation, beſides Impriſonments and other Puniſhments and Severeties. But all this Cruelty did not ſatisfie the Popiſh Clergy, they complain'd that the Magiſtrates were remiſs; and negligently perform'd their Duties; upon which ſharp Letters were written to ſeveral Towns, from the Council-Board; and zealous Men were recommended to be choſen Mayors, in many Corporations. Arch-Biſhop Pool was for milder Methods, and was ready to accept of any Acknowledgment from the proſecuted Perſons, by which he might on the one Hand preſerve their Lives, and yet not be expos'd to the Rage of the Pope, as a Favourer of Hereticks on the other. Many more Burnings.

In this Year a horrible Murder of one Argol and his Son was committed by the Lord Stourton, and ſome of his Servants; who when they had butcher'd them after a moſt barbarous Manner, bury'd them fifteen Foot deep in the Ground. The Lord Stourton was a zealous Papiſt, and proteſted againſt all the Acts that had paſs'd in King Edward's Reign; yet the Queen not only refus'd to pardon him, but would not ſo much as change the infamous Death of Hanging into a Beheading. She was reſolv'd to ſhew no Favour, but only allow'd this Diſtinction, that the Lord might be hang'd in a ſilken Rope, while his Servants had common Halters. This was highly extoll'd as a worthy Inſtance of the Queen's Impartial Juſtice; and it was ſaid, 'That ſince ſhe left her Friends to 'the Law, her Enemies had no Reaſon to complain of the Execution of it up-'on them. The Lord Stourton hang'd.

Holling. Godwin. Camden. Fox. Heylin. Burnet.

V. As this Reign had been furious and calamitous at home, ſo at length it began to ſhow it ſelf feeble and diſhonourable abroad; all which had its firſt Riſe from the vaſt Pride and Inſolence of the Pope, who the laſt Year broke the Truce between France and Spain. He was highly offended at the Houſe of Auſtria, and principally at Ferdinand's aſſuming the Title of Emperor, without his particular Conſent: He was wont to ſay, That all Kingdoms were ſubject to him: That he would ſuffer no Prince to be too familiar with him; and that he would ſet the World on Fire, rather than ſubmit to act below his Dignity. It was believ'd that he deſign'd to advance one of his Nephews to the Crown of Naples, in order to which he had ſent another into France, to abſolve the King from the Truce which he had ſworn, promiſing to create what Cardinals that King ſhould nominate, if he would make War upon Spain; tho' to the Queen of England's Ambaſſadors, and all others at Rome, he declar'd, That he would mediate a Peace between the Crowns, for a Truce did not ſufficiently ſecure the Quiet of Europe. The French King was too eaſily perſuaded by the Inſtigation of the Pope, and the Houſe of Guiſe, to break his Faith, and begin the War. The Pope began it in Italy, and made ſome Levies among the Griſons, that were Hereticks; but he ſaid, He eſteem'd them as Angels, and was confident that God would convert them. It gave great Scandal to the World to ſee the Pope himſelf exciting ſo perfidious a Breach of Truce; and no leſs Wonder, to ſee a great Monarch of fifty ſix Years of Age retire to a Monaſtery, whilſt the ſame Year a Man bred a Monk, and fourſcore Years old, ſet Europe in a Flame. King Philip had a great Deſire to ingage England in this War; and the Queen had Reaſon to complain of the kind Reception given to many that fled from England into France, and it was believ'd that the French ſecretly ſupply'd and encourag'd them to embroil her Affairs. One Stafford had this Year gather'd many of them together, and landing in Yorkſhire, he ſurpriz'd the Caſtle of Scarborough, and publiſh'd a Manifeſto againſt the Queen, declaring, 'That by bringing in Strangers to govern the Nation, ſhe had forfeited her 'Right to the Crown: But few came in to him; ſo that he and his Accomplices were compell'd to ſurrender, and four of them were hang'd. At the ſame A Breach between France and Spain.

Time

Time Doctor Wotton, the Engliſh Ambaſſador in France, diſcover'd that the Conſtable had a Deſign to take Calais: For he had ſent his own Nephew to him, whom he ſecretly inſtructed, and who pretended he was ſent from a great Party in that Town, who were reſolv'd to deliver it up; at which the Conſtable was tranſported, and enter'd into a long Diſcourſe with him of the Methods of taking it. Yet all this made no juſt Impreſſions upon the Queen: All her Council, chiefly the Clergy, were againſt her ingaging; for they ſaw the War abroad would oblig'd them to ſlacken their Severities at home. Upon which King Philip, after he had been abſent about two Years, found it neceſſary to come over in Perſon, and perſuade her to it. Having ſtay'd about ſix Weeks he prevail'd with her; and after a Proclamation of War, ſhe ſent over eight thouſand Men to his Aſſiſtance, who joining the Spaniards, compos'd an Army of fifty thouſand, which immediately ſate down before St. Quintin, in Picardy. The Conſtable of France advanc'd with a great Force to raiſe the Siege; but when the two Armies were in view, the French by a Miſtake in the Word of Command, fell into Diſorder; upon which the Spaniards charg'd them with ſuch Advantage and Succeſs, that the whole Army was defeated. Two thouſand five hundred were kill'd on the Spot, and many were taken Priſoners, among whom was the Conſtable himſelf; and the Spaniards only loſt fifty Men. Had King Philip follow'd his Blow, and march'd directly to Paris, he had found all France in a great Conſternation; but he ſate ſtill before St. Quintin, which held out 'till the Terror of this Defeat was almoſt over. The Conſtable here loſt his Reputation, as well as his Liberty; and all eſteem'd it as a Judgment from Heaven upon the French King, for the plain Breach of his Faith.

England joins againſt France.

The Battel of St. Quintin.

Upon this the French Troops were call'd out of Italy, which immediately expos'd the Pope to the Spaniards, and threw him into extravagant Fits of Rage and Paſſion; and particularly he exclaim'd againſt Pool, for ſuffering the Queen to join with the Enemies of the Apoſtolick See: And having made a general Decree, recalling all his Legates and Nuntio's in the Spaniſh Dominions, among the reſt he recall'd Pool's Legantine Power; which neither the Interceſſions of the Queen's Ambaſſadors, nor the other Cardinals, could prevail with him to alter. He further requir'd Pool to come to Rome, and anſwer to ſome Complaints made againſt him, for the Favour he ſhew'd to Hereticks; and he alſo made the Queen's Confeſſor, Friar Peyto, a Cardinal, and declar'd him his Legate for England, and wrote to the Queen to receive him in that Capacity. But the Queen order'd the Bulls and Briefs that were ſent over, to be laid up without opening them, according to the Method formerly practis'd, when unacceptable Bulls were brought to Court; and ſhe ſent a Meſſage to Peyto not to come into England, otherwiſe ſhe would ſue him, and all that acknowledg'd him, in a Premunire. Cardinal Pool laid aſide the Enſigns of a Legate, and ſent over Ormaneto with ſo ſubmiſſive a Meſſage, that the Pope was much mollify'd; and Peyto dying, and a Treaty of Peace between King Philip and the Pope following, this Storm went over, and publick and ſolemn Rejoicings were made in England.

The Pope inrag'd.

But the Effects of it did not yet ceaſe; for the War being proclaim'd between England and France, the French ſent to the Scotch Queen-Regent to ingage Scotland in the War with England: All that favour'd the Reformation were for the War; but the Clergy ſo oppos'd it, that the Majority of the Convention declar'd on the ſame Side. The Queen-Regent upon this thought to draw them unexpectedly into the War, and ſent D'Oiſell to beſiege Warke Caſtle in England; but the Scotch Lords highly exclaim'd againſt it, and requir'd him to deſiſt, otherwiſe they would declare him an Enemy to the Nation: So that after ſome ſlight Skirmiſhes on the Borders, the Conteſt was ended on both Sides. Upon this the Queen-Regent wrote to France, urging the Concluſion of the Marriage between the Dauphine and the Queen of Scotland; and a Meſſage was ſent from the Court, deſiring the Scots to ſend over Commiſſioners to treat about about the Articles of the Marriage, and ſome of every State were diſpatch'd for ſetling that Affair. There was at this Time a great want of Mony in the Exchequer of England; and the Coldneſs and Uneaſineſs of the laſt Parliament made the Council unwilling to call a new one. It was try'd what Sums could be rais'd by Loans, upon Privy-Seals, and the like Methods; but theſe ſo little anſwer'd Expectations, that at length a new Parliament was ſummon'd to meet in January next. Yet in the mean Space, the Council continually receiv'd Advices of the ill Condition of the Garriſons of Calais, and the neighbouring Places, and that the French had an abſolute Deſign upon them: But either they believ'd there was no Danger during the Winter, or that the want of Mony was ſo great, that no reaſonable Care was taken for their Security. England in a low Condition.

This ſufficiently appear'd in the Beginning of the next Year, which was too much noted for the Loſs of all the Engliſh Dominions in France. For the Duke of Guiſe, being deſirous of doing ſome great Action, while the Conſtable was a Priſoner, ſuddenly ſate down before Calais, on the firſt of January. The Lord Wentworth had then the Command of it; but the Garriſon conſiſted only of five hundred Men, and there were not above two hundred of the Townſmen that could be ſerviceable in a Siege: And tho' King Philip had offer'd to put Men into it, yet the Engliſh were ſo infatuated with Jealouſies, that they left it in ſo naked a Condition, that the Governor could perform little to preſerve it. So that the two Forts about it, of which one call'd Newnambridge commanded the Avenues by Land, and the other call'd the Risbank commanded the Harbour, were taken with ſmall Oppoſition; for the Lord Wentworth could not ſpare Men enough to defend them. After this the French drew the Water out of the Ditches, and having prepar'd Inventions to paſs without ſticking in the Mire, they made the Aſſault, and carry'd the Caſtle by Storm, which was thought impregnable. After ſuch Succeſs, the Town could make no conſiderable Reſiſtance, ſo it was unfortunately ſurrender'd, and the Governour with fifty Officers made Priſoners of War. Thus in a Week's Time, and in the Winter, was this ſtrong and important Place loſt by the Engliſh, which had been glorioufly obtain'd by King Edward III. and held by the Engliſh above two hundred and ten Years, to the great Curb of France, being accounted the Key of that Nation. From this Place the Duke of Guiſe march'd to beſiege Guiſnes, which had a better Garriſon of eleven hundred Men, but they were much diſhearten'd by the Loſs of Calais: They retir'd into the Caſtle, and abandon'd the Town to the French; but yet they once beat them out of it. The French, after a long Battery, gave the Aſſault, and forc'd them to Capitulate; and the Soldiers, as at Calais, had liberty to march away, but the Officers were made Priſoners of War. The Garriſon in Hammes, that lay in a Marſh thought inacceſſible, ſeeing themſelves cut off from the Sea, abandon'd the Place before the French ſummon'd them. And thus were the Engliſh diſhonourably driven out of the Continent of France, without retaining one Foot of Land; which Mezeray ſays was the Fruit of that Alliance their Queen had made with Spain; upon which the Pope pleaſantly ſaid, That the Loſs of Calais was the Dower of that Princeſs.

The Loſs of Calais.

Guiſnes, and Hammes.

The mighty Diſcontents that this Loſs gave the Engliſh, were ſuch, that the Queen could never hope to ſurmount them; and it ſunk ſo deeply into her Mind, that it did not a little haſten her Death. Both Sides took Occaſion to draw Arguments from this great Misfortune: The Reformers ſaid, It was a Judgment upon the Nation, for the Contempt of the true Religion, and the late Cruelties practis'd againſt it: The Papiſts ſaid, That the Hereticks had found ſuch Shelter and Connivance there, that it was no wonder the Place was loſt. King Philip offer'd his Aſſiſtance to go and retake the Place, before the Fortifications were repair'd, if the Engliſh would ſend over a Force anſwerable to ſuch an Undertaking: But they, upon an Eſtimate made of the Expence of this, and of a War for the enſuing Year, found it would amount amount to above half a Million of Mony; and as the Treasury was exhausted, and could not furnish such a Sum, so they had no Reason to expect a liberal Supply from a provok'd People. The Bishops fear'd that the Continuance of War would render it necessary to proceed more gently against Hereticks, and thought it better to be quiet with the Loss of Calais than run that Hazard: They seem'd confident that within a Year, they should be able to purge the Kingdom from all Heresie; and therefore mov'd that Preparations might be made for a War to begin the Year after this.

The fifth Parliament in this Reign.

A new Parliament was open'd on the twentieth of January; for which the Abbot of Westminster, and the Prior of St. John of Jerusalem had their Writs, and sate in it. The Lords desir'd a Conference with the Commons, concerning the Safety of the Nation, which was found so weak, that a Subsidy, a Tenth, and a Fifteenth were given by the Laity; and the Clergy gave eight Shillings in the Pound, to be paid in four Years. The Abbot of Westminster mov'd, that the Privileges of Sanctuary might be again restor'd to his House; but that was soon laid aside. The Procurers of wilful Murder were now deny'd the Benefit of the Clergy; but great Opposition was made to that Act in the House of Lords. A Bill was also brought in, confirming all the Letters Patents, which the Queen had granted, or might grant for the future. This related to the Foundations of Religious Houses, which the Queen had already made; for besides the Abby of Westminster, she had founded a House for the Franciscans at Greenwich, two for the Franciscans and Dominicans in London, one for the Carthusians at Skeen, and a Nunnery at Sion. One Coxley oppos'd this Act, and insinuated, That the Confirmation of all Grants might give the Queen a Colour to dispose of the Crown from the right Inheritors. At which the House express'd great Dislike, and show'd That they would not have it so much as imagin'd, that the Princess Elizabeth should ever be excluded. He had a publick Reprimand, for speaking so much to the Queen's Dishonour: So the Parliament in March was prorogu'd to November next.

Shortly after a Proposition of Marriage was privately made by the King of Sweden to the Princess Elizabeth; but she declar'd, she could not suffer a change in her Condition, so the Motion became ineffectual. It seems her Aversion to a marry'd State was very great, otherwise her present Condition was neither so easie, nor so secure, but that she had Reason to desire to be out of her Keeper's Power; and to apprehend that her Danger increas'd, as the Queen's Health was impair'd: For many of the Bishops, fearing she would overthrow that Building, which they had cemented with so much Blood, were now offering cruel Counsels against her. To mention some of the Sufferings of this admirable Lady; she had been first sent for upon the Breaking out of Wiat's Rebellion; and tho' she then lay sick in Bed, she was forc'd to go to Court. There she was at first confin'd to her Lodgings, and was afterwards carry'd to the Tower, and ignominiously led into it by the Traitor's-Gate, where she was strictly guarded: Her Servants were all put from her, and none had Access to her, but such as were Spies upon her: Nor was she suffer'd to walk on the Leads, or have the ordinary Comforts of Air; and a Boy of four Years old was severely threaten'd, for his carrying Flowers to her. Some were put to the Rack to extort Confessions from them; but none accus'd her but Wiat, and he retracted all he had said upon the Scaffold. When it appear'd that nothing could be prov'd against her, she was sent down to Woodstock; where she was kept under severe Guards, and very roughly treated by Sir Henry Benefield, whom she usually call'd Her Jaylor. But King Philip so far molify'd the Queen by degrees, that he prevail'd with her to bring her to Court, and to admit her into her Presence. Gardiner and many others dealt very subtilly with her, to confess her Offences, and ask the Queen's Pardon; but she always stood firmly to her Innocence, as well as her Religion, declaring, She had not offended the Queen, so much as in Thought. When she was brought before the

The Sufferings of the Princess Elizabeth.

Queen late at Night, ſhe with Tears upon her Knees renew'd the ſame Proteſtations to her, and begg'd That ſhe would entertain a good Opinion of her. The Queen, tho' ſhe urg'd her much to acknowledge ſome Guilt, yet ſeem'd ſatisfy'd with what ſhe ſaid, and parted with her in good Terms; of which King Philip had ſome Apprehenſions, for he had convey'd himſelf into a ſecret Corner of the Room, to prevent a further Breach, in caſe the Queen ſhould be too much incens'd. Shortly after, her Guards were diſcharg'd, and ſhe ſuffer'd to retire into the Country; but ſhe had always ſo many Spies about her, that to avoid all Suſpicion, ſhe concern'd her ſelf in no ſort of Buſineſs, but gave her ſelf wholly to Study; in which ſhe arriv'd to a mighty Perfection. And thus ſhe paſs'd the greateſt Part of this Reign, under continual Apprehenſions of Death; which perhaps was a neceſſary Preparation for that exalted State to which ſhe was ſoon advanc'd, and which ſhe held in the longeſt Courſe of Proſperity and Glory, that ever was attain'd by any of her Sex.

More Burnings and other Cruelties.

Still the Popiſh Biſhops continu'd their Cruelties; and Cuthbert Simpſon, one in Deacon's Orders, having been taken at the Meeting at Iſlington, was rack'd with the extreameſt Severity, to make him confeſs all the Friends he had in London: But nothing was diſcover'd from him; ſo in March he and two others were burnt in Smithfield. Several Books being printed beyond Sea, and ſecretly convey'd into England, a Proclamation of a very ſtrange Nature was ſet out, 'That if any receiv'd any of theſe Books, and did not immediately 'burn them, without either reading them, or ſhewing them to any other Per-'ſon, they were to be preſently executed by Martial Law. Several others were burnt this Year, to the Number of thirty nine; and all that were burnt during the whole Reign, according to Fox, were two hundred and eighty four, tho' Grindall, who liv'd in that Time, writes, That in two Years Time eight hundred ſuffer'd at the Stake. Many more were thrown into Priſon, where ſixty of them dy'd miſerably; others, after much cruel Uſage by Whips and Tortures from Bonner's own Hands, were prevail'd on to abjure; but carry'd in their Minds a mortal Averſion to that Cruelty which had tempted them to ſuch Apoſtacy.

As to the War with France, this Year the Lord Clinton was ſent with a Fleet of a hundred and twenty Sail, and ſeven thouſand Land-men, who landed near Breſt, with a Deſign to have ſeiz'd on that Port, but was repell'd with the Loſs of ſix hundred Men; ſo that after an inglorious and expenſive Expedition, he return'd to England. The Engliſh had loſt their Hearts and Bravery, and began to believe that Heaven was againſt them; and extraordinary Accidents increas'd theſe direful Apprehenſions: A vaſt Storm of Thunder caus'd an unuſual Terror in Nottinghamſhire; the River Trent ſwell'd prodigiouſly, and with a violent Wind did great Damage: Hail-ſtones of uncommon Bigneſs fell in other Places; and which was more terrible, a contagious intermitting Feaver, not unlike the Plague, ſo rag'd through the Nation, that three Parts of four were infected with it, and in many Counties there were not Men ſufficient to reap the Harveſt. All theſe melancholy Symptoms concurr'd to increaſe the People's Averſion to the Government, which ſoon diſpos'd the Queen to hearken to Overtures of Peace. This was projected between the Biſhop of Arras, and the Cardinal of Lorrain, who were the chief Favourites of the two Kings of France and Spain: The Cardinal of Lorrain was moſt earneſt in it, becauſe the Conſtable who was the Head of the Faction againſt the Houſe of Guiſe, was ſuſpected to favour the Reformation, and his three Nephews, the Coligny's, were known to incline to it. The King of France was the more inclinable to a Treaty, becauſe he had receiv'd a ſecond Blow this Year. The Marſhal de Thermes being ſurrounded by the Count of Egmont near Graveling, where the French Army being ingag'd by the Count, and gall'd by the Engliſh Ordnance from their Ships lying near the Land, was defeated, five thouſand kill'd, and the Marſhal and other chief Officers taken Priſoners. The French King thought the Expulſion of the Engliſh out of France a Compenſation both for that, and his Loſs at St. Quintin; ſo that both Princes reckoning their own Advantages, they were diſpos'd to a Treaty, which was open'd at Cambray, but not finiſh'd in this Reign. Biſhop Godwin obſerves that all Perſons concern'd in this unjuſt War, and Breach of Faith, were puniſh'd by Heaven; and particularly Queen Mary, by the Loſs of Calais, and the other Places, at a Time when nothing but contrary Winds hinder'd her Fleet from affording them Relief.

The Dauphine marry'd to the Queen of Scotland.

After a Determination of many Years continuance, in this April the Dauphine was marry'd to the Queen of Scotland; which Marriage was adorn'd by an Epithalamium wrote by Buchanan, eſteem'd one of the moſt perfect Pieces of Latin Poetry. The Deputies ſent from Scotland were deſir'd to offer the Dauphine the Crown of Scotland, in the Right of his Wife; but they declar'd, That exceeded the Bounds of their Commiſſion, ſo they only promis'd to repreſent the Matter to the States of Scotland; but could not conceal the Averſion they had to the Propoſal. Shortly after four of the ſeven that were ſent over dy'd, and the fifth narrowly eſcap'd; it being generally ſuſpected that they were poiſon'd. When the reſt return'd to Scotland, an Aſſembly of the States was call'd, in which it was agreed to allow the Dauphine the Title of King, but with this Proviſo, 'That he ſhould have no Power 'over them, and that it was only a bare Title which they offer'd him. This was appointed to be carry'd to him by the Earl of Argile, and the Prior of St. Andrew's, who had been the moſt warm Agents for the French Intereſt, in Hopes of the Queen-Regent's Protection, againſt the Rage of the Biſhops, in Matters of Religion.

The Parliament meets.

In England, a new Seſſion of Parliament met on the fifth of November; and the Queen being ill, ſent for the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, and laid before him the feeble Condition of the Nation, and the Neceſſity of putting it in a Poſture of Defence: But the Commons were ſo diſguſted at the general Conduct of Affairs, that they could come to no Reſolution: Therefore on the fourteenth of that Month, twelve of the chief Lords of both Eſtates, came down to the Houſe of Commons, and deſir'd them to grant a Subſidy to defend the Nation, both againſt the French and Scots; but ſtill the Commons came to no Reſolution, 'till the Queen's Death three Days after put an End to the Parliament. Her former falſe Conception, her Husband's Neglect her Deſpair of Iſſue, and her melancholy Apprehenſions, which receiv'd a Surcharge from the Loſs of Calais, brought her into an ill Habit of Body, which turn'd to an incurable Dropſie. When ſome of her Viſitants endeavour'd to divert her ſorrowful Thoughts, ſhe told them, They were Strangers to her Diſtemper, but if they would diſſect her after her Death, they would find Calais next her Heart. She endeavour'd to have ſet aſide her Siſter Elizabeth, and brought in the Queen of Scotland to the Crown; but ſhe was hinder'd from proceeding in it as a Matter impracticable. Thus on the ſeventeenth Day of November ſhe ended her unfortunate Life, in the forty third Year of her Age, after a ſhort and miſerable Reign of five Years, four Months, and eleven Days. At the ſame Time, as if one Star had rul'd both their Nativities, her Cardinal Pool was alſo expiring in the fifty ninth Year of his Age, being a Perſon of Learning, Humility, Prudence and Temper; who had certainly the beſt Notions of any of his Party then in England, ſo that if his Projects had been follow'd, Popery would probably have been fix'd in the Nation. But God deſign'd another Eſtabliſhment; and the Queen, whoſe Temper and Principles were fierce and ſevere, preferr'd the bloody Counſels of Gardiner and Bonner to thoſe wiſer and more rational Methods he often propos'd. And tho' his Zeal for the Church of Rome ſtill continu'd, yet his Eyes were open'd in many Things: His being Legate at Trent, and his Retirement at Viterbo, had both enlighten'd and compos'd his Mind; which being join'd to his Probity and ſweet Diſpoſition, produc'd extraordinary Effects in him.

The Queen's laſt Sickneſs, and Death.

As

As to the Character of the Queen, we need not ſay much after her Hiſtory; only as to her Perſon, as ſhe was not very amiable, ſo ſhe was without any Deformity; nor did ſhe want Parts or Underſtanding, but had the Advantages of Learning, and a good Underſtanding in the Latin Tongue. She was a Woman of a ſtrict and ſevere Life, who allow'd her ſelf few of the Diverſions belonging to Courts; was conſtant at her Devotions, and violently addicted to the Intereſts and Humours of the Romiſh Prieſts. She had great Reſentments of her Uſage in her Father's and Brother's Reign, which eaſily induc'd her to take her Revenge, tho' ſhe colour'd it with her Zeal againſt Hereſie. She much endeavour'd to expiate and reſtore the Sacrileges of the two laſt Reigns; beſides which laudable Intention, a froward ſort of Virtue, and a melancholy Piety, are the beſt Things that can be ſaid of her. Her former Diſſimulations, her publick Breach of Faith to the Suffolk Gentlemen and others, and her barbarous Cruelties to thoſe call'd Hereticks, are inexcuſable Blemiſhes in her Character; and God thought fit to puniſh her with a barren Womb, and an untimely Death, and the World with a blaſted Name, which has made an indelible Impreſſion of Horror upon the Nation. To conclude, her Death was as little lamented, as of any that had worn the Crown, excepting by the Popiſh Clergy; and had it not been for the two worthy Foundations of Trinity and St. John's Colleges in Oxford, there had been ſcarce any Thing in this Reign to have made it memorable, beſides the Calamities and Misfortunes of it.

SECT. II.

The Reign of Queen ELIZABETH.

Containing 44 Years, 4 Months, and 6 Days.

Camden. Heyward. Heylin. Burnet. Baleus. &c.

I. THE ſhort and furious Storm that had rag'd within the Nation, being happily diſpell'd by the Deceaſe of Queen Mary, a glorious Sun-ſhine ſuddenly ſucceeded; which did not only illuminate the Engliſh Hemiſphere, but gradually diſplay'd its reviving Beams both to neighbouring and remote Regions. All which proceeded from the renown'd Princeſs Elizabeth, who without Oppoſition mounted the Throne of England by the Providence of Heaven, by Virtue of her Birth-Right, and the Act of Succeſſion made in the thirty fifth Year of King Henry the Eighth. Queen Mary's Death was conceal'd for a few Hours, 'till about nine in the Morning, the Lord Chancellor Heath with a melancholy Countenance imparted the News to the Houſe of Lords; which, as it ſtruck the Biſhops with no ſmall Fear, ſo thoſe Counſellors who had been ſevere to her Siſter, were very apprehenſive of the Treatment they might receive. Yet they all agreed to proclaim her Queen; and by the Zeal ſhown for her Acceſſion to the Crown, deſign'd to ballance the Errors to which they had been formerly driven, more in Compliance to the Soveraign's Reſentments, than any real Prejudice to her Perſon. They immediately ſent for the Houſe of Commons, to whom the Lord Chancellor ſignify'd the Queen's Deceaſe; which, he ſaid, would have been a much more ſenſible Affliction, if they had not ſuch a Succeſſor, who was the next and indiſputed Heir to the Crown, ELIZABETH, of whoſe Right and Title none could make any Queſtion; therefore the Lords were unanimouſly reſolv'd to proclaim her Queen. This was immediately reſounded and eccho'd with innumerable repeated Acclamations, God ſave Queen Elizabeth! Long and happily may ſhe Reign! They firſt proclaim'd her at Weſtminſter, and then in London, London, in Conjunction with the Lord Mayor and Aldermen; which was accompany'd with ſuch unuſual Tranſports of Joy, as gave the melancholy Prieſts juſt Cauſe to fear a new Revolution in Religious Affairs; and tho' the Queen's Death moſt ſenſibly afflicted them, yet the Joy in this Change was ſo great and univerſal, that a ſad Look was thought Criminal, and the Prieſts were forc'd to vent their Griefs in private Corners, and the moſt ſecret Receſſes.

Her Perſon and Character.

This admirable Princeſs was now twenty five Years of Age, excelling in all the Perfections of her Sex, whether of Body or Mind. Her Perſon was graceful, her Mien noble, her Shape fine, and her Stature and Gait, both agreeable and majeſtick. Her Face had not all the Regularities of a finiſh'd Beauty; yet her Complexion was perfectly fair, her Eyes lively and ſparkling, and her whole Countenance carry'd ſomething ſo bright and dazling, as cover'd all ſmaller Defects. In every Thing ſhe ſaid or did, there was an Air of Majeſty, that naturally ſtruck more Awe than Love; but ſtill at her Pleaſure ſhe could aſſume ſuch powerful Charms, as few were able to reſiſt; and there was ſuch a happy mixture of Greatneſs and Sweetneſs, that all Perſons admir'd her. Her Mind was heroical and magnanimous, her Underſtanding was pregnant and penetrating, enlarg'd and poliſh'd by all the Advantages of a moſt refin'd Education. She wrote Letters in Engliſh and Italian, when ſhe was not full four Years of Age; and before ſhe was ſeventeen ſhe became perfect in the Greek, Latin, French and Italian Tongues, and not unacquainted with the reſt of the Europæan Languages. From whence ſhe proceeded by her indefatigable Induſtry to an extraordinary Knowledge in Philoſophy, Rhetorick, Hiſtory and Divinity; not forgetting Poetry, Muſick, and other Ornaments of Converſation. Of all that ſhe read or learn'd, ſhe made the beſt and trueſt Uſe; and being of a quick Apprehenſion, and a ſtrong Memory, ſhe drew from the Annals of all Nations, the Actions of the greateſt Men, with all their Fights and Conqueſts. She would frequently ſet before her the Monuments of her Predeceſſors, the illuſtrious Triumphs and Victories obtain'd by the Engliſh at Creſſy, Poictiers, Agincourt and Vernevil, and was wont to ſay, Theſe Victories were more owing to the Aſſiſtance of Heaven, than the Arms of Men. Being thus nobly accompliſh'd, train'd up to the moſt exalted Piety, and taught by her late Afflictions the profoundeſt Humility, ſhe became truly worthy of the Engliſh Crown; which ſhe receiv'd at a Time when the Nation was moſt low and afflicted, doubly imbroil'd with the French and Scotch War, overcharg'd with the Debts of Henry the Eighth, and Edward the Sixth, the Treaſury exhauſted, the Engliſh Dominions in France loſt, the People diſtracted with different Opinions in Religion, and ſhe her ſelf deſtitute of all potent Friends, and foreign Alliance.

The preſent State of the Nation.

She was at Hatfield when ſhe receiv'd the News of her Siſter's Death, and that ſhe her ſelf was proclaim'd Queen; upon which, 'tis ſaid ſhe fell down upon her Knees, and after a ſhort Silence broke out in the Words of the Pſalmiſt, 'It is the Lord's Doing, and wonderful in our Eyes! Which Words in Latin ſhe afterwards took for her Motto in ſome of her Gold Coins. She ſoon remov'd from thence to London; and on the nineteenth of November ſhe was met at High-Gate by all the Biſhops; whom ſhe receiv'd with great Sweetneſs, excepting Bonner, who being polluted with ſo much Blood, ſhe thought that common Civility to him would give ſome Countenance to his Crimes. She was receiv'd into the City with ſuch numerous Throngs as was almoſt incredible, and ſurrounded with the loudeſt Acclamations of over-flowing Joy. When ſhe arriv'd at the Tower, upon her firſt Entrance ſhe devoutly kneel'd down and offer'd up her Thanks to God, Who had thus bounteouſly chang'd her former Priſon into a preſent Palace. She ſoon clear'd all Men's Apprehenſions as to thoſe Hardſhips ſhe had formerly ſuſtain'd, and ſhew'd that ſhe had abſolutely forgot from whom ſhe had receiv'd them; not excepting Beneſield himſelf, who had been the chief Inſtrument of her Sufferings. She gave immediate

The Queen enters London.

Notice

Notice of her Sister's Death, and her own Succession, to all Foreign Princes; and wrote particular Acknowledgments to King Philip, for the kind Offices he had done. Among the rest she wrote to Sir Edward Karn, who was her Sister's Ambassador at Rome: But the haughty Pope in his usual Stile told him, That England was a Fee of the Papacy, and that it was a high Presumption in her, to assume the Crown without his Consent, especially since she was Illegitimate: But if she would renounce her Pretensions, and refer her self wholly to him, she might expect all the Favour that could consist with the Dignity of the Apostolick See. The Queen hearing this, with no small Resentment, recall'd Karn's Power; but he being a zealous Papist, continu'd still at Rome. King Philip sent her a kinder Message, and propos'd a Marriage with her; undertaking to procure a Dispensation from Rome. But the Queen, as she continu'd her whole Life averse to that State, so she knew how unacceptable a Foreigner, especially a Spaniard, would be to her People; and she had made it the steady Maxim of her Reign, from which she never would deviate, 'To 'rule in their Affections, as well as over their Persons. Neither could she hearken to the Pope's Dispensation: For if two Sisters might marry the same Person, then two Brothers might likewise marry the same Woman; which would overthrow all the Arguments for her Father's Divorce with Queen Catharine, upon which depended the Validity of her Mother's Marriage, and her own Legitimation. Yet tho' she firmly resolv'd not to marry King Philip, she thought, that during the Treaty of Cambray, it was not fit to put him out of all Hopes: Upon which he sent to Rome for a Dispensation; but the French sent to oppose it, and set up a Pretension for the young Queen of Scotland, as the righteous Heir to the Crown of England.

She writes to Foreign Princes.

The wise Queen continu'd to imploy most of her Sister's Privy-Counsellors, as the Lord Chancellor Heath, the Marques of Winchester, and others, who had before so often turn'd in Matters of Religion, that it was very probable they would be complying at this Time. But still to ballance these she added several others of the Reformed Religion; the most celebrated of whom were Sir William Cecil, and Sir Nicholas Bacon, both of extraordinary Abilities. She order'd all who were imprison'd upon the Account of Religion to be set at Liberty: Upon which one who us'd to take an innocent Liberty with her, said, The four Evangelists still continu'd Prisoners, and that the People much long'd to see them freed: To which she as pleasantly answer'd, She would talk with them her self, and know how they stood affected. Some propos'd the annulling of all Queen Mary's Parliaments, because Force was us'd in the Election of the First, and the Writs for another were not legal, because the Title of Supream Head was omitted in the Summons; but this was thought too bold an Attempt and Precedent to annul Parliaments upon Errors in Writs, or particular Disorders. The Queen desir'd that all the Changes to be made, might be so carefully manag'd as to breed as little Division among her People, as was possible; and she was not pleas'd with the Title of Supream Head, as importing too sublime an Authority. She lov'd Magnificence in Religion, as she affected it in all other Affairs; which made her inclinable to preserve some former Ornaments, and even Images in Churches; and that the Popish Party might have the less Cause of Offence, she design'd to have the Manner of Christ's Presence in the Sacrament defin'd in general Terms, that it might comprehend all Sides. A Scheme was form'd of the Method, in which it was most advisable for the Queen to proceed, and put into Cecil's Hands. By this, 'It was judg'd 'necessary to do nothing 'till a Parliament was call'd: The Queen had reason to 'expect all the Disturbance the Pope could give her, who would certainly ex-'cite the French and Scots, and perhaps the Irish, against her. The Clergy, and 'those imploy'd in the late Reign, would oppose it, and use all Methods to in-'flame the Nation; and the greatest Part of the People lov'd the Pomp of the 'old Ceremonies. It was therefore propos'd, That the Queen on any Terms 'should

Her Designs as to Religion.

A Scheme propos'd.

'ſhould make Peace with France, and incourage the Party in Scotland, that de'ſir'd a Reformation. The Clergy were generally hated for their Cruelty, and 'it would be eaſie to bring them within the Statute of Premunire: Care was 'alſo to be taken to expoſe the former Counſellors for their ill Conduct in the 'laſt Reign, and by that Means to diminiſh their Reputation. It was likewiſe
'propos'd to examine well the Commiſſions for the Peace and Militia, and to 'inſpect the Univerſities; and ſome Learned Men were to be order'd, to conſi-
'der what Alterations were fit to be made, and by what Steps they ſhould 'proceed.

By this Time the Exiles that had fled beyond Sea, return'd home; and theſe with ſome other zealous Perſons began in many Places to break down Images, and ſet up King Edward's Service again. Upon this the Queen order'd, That the Litany, and other Parts of the Service ſhould be perform'd in Engliſh, and that no Elevation ſhould be us'd in the Maſs; but requir'd her Subjects by Proclamation, to avoid all Innovations, and uſe no other Forms, but what ſhe retain'd in her Chappel, 'till it ſhould be otherwiſe appointed in Parliament. On the fifth of December ſhe order'd her Siſter's Obſequies to be celebrated with great Magnificence at Weſtminſter: White Biſhop of Wincheſter, who preach'd the Sermon, not only extoll'd her Government, but ſeverely reflected upon the preſent State of Affairs; for which he was for ſome Time confin'd to his Houſe. And many Sees being vacant, one of the firſt Things that came under Conſultation, was the finding proper Men to ſupply them. Doctor Parker was ſelected, as the fitteſt for the Metropolitan See of Canterbury: He had been Chaplain to Queen Anne Bolen, and had been imploy'd in inſtructing the Queen in the chief Points of Religion, when ſhe was young: He was well known to Sir Nicholas Bacon; and both he and Cecil gave ſo high a Character of him, that it meeting with the Queen's particular Eſteem, it was reſolv'd to advance him. But as ſoon as he knew it; he us'd all poſſible Arguments againſt it both from the Weakneſs of his Body, and his Unworthineſs of ſo high a Charge. He deſir'd rather to be put into ſome ſmall Benefice of twenty Nobles a Year, ſo far was he from aſpiring to Wealth or Honour; and as Cranmer before him, he continu'd for many Months ſo averſe to it, that it was hard to overcome him. And it was thought no ſmall Honour to the Reformation, that the two chief Inſtruments that promoted it, Cranmer and Parker, gave ſuch Evidences of a Primitive Spirit, in being ſo unwillingly advanc'd.

A. D. 1559. Reg. $\frac{1}{2}$.

In the Beginning of the new Year, the Queen thought fit to make ſome new Promotions: Particularly Sir William Parre was created Marqueſs of Northampton; Edward Seymour was made Vicount Beauchamp, and Earl of Hartford; the Lord Thomas Howard was made Vicount of Bindon; Sir Oliver Saint John, Lord Saint John of Bletſo; and Sir Henry Carew, Lord Carew of Hundſden. They were all averſe to the Popiſh Religion; and as the Queen was not prodigal in any Thing, ſo ſhe was moſt ſparing in Diſtributions of Honour, by which ſhe advanc'd it to the higheſt Eſteem with all Men. The Seals were taken from Arch-Biſhop Heath, who could not join in the Queen's Deſigns, and given to Sir Nicholas Bacon, who was declar'd Lord-Keeper, and had all the Dignity and Authority of the Chancellor's Office, without the Title; which was perhaps an Effect of his great Modeſty, that adorn'd his other great and noble Qualities. As he was eminent in himſelf, ſo he was happy in being Father to the great Sir Francis Bacon, one of the chief Glories in the Engliſh Nation.

New Promotions.

Sir Nicholas Bacon made Lord-Keeper.

Theſe Acts of Grace and Favour being thus diſpatch'd, on the twelfth Day of January the Queen went to the Tower, in order to make a triumphant Paſſage through London to her Palace at Weſtminſter, before the Solemnity of her Coronation. As ſhe mounted her Royal Chariot at the Tower, with the profoundeſt Marks of Devotion, ſhe bleſs'd the all-powerful God, Who had ſav'd her, like the Prophet Daniel, out of the Mouths of the Lions, and preſerv'd ſerv'd her to ſee that joyful Day. As ſhe paſs'd through the City in great Splendor, ſhe was all the Way entertain'd with the moſt joyful Acclamations that could proceed from dilated Spirits; which ſhe continually return'd with the moſt charming Smiles, and often ſaying God bleſs you, my People! which was always accompany'd with ſuch a modeſt Affability, and obliging Gracefulneſs, that it drew Tears of Joy from the Eyes of many, and infinite Prayers and Thankſgivings from the Hearts of all. But nothing more endear'd her to the Spectators than her Behaviour as ſhe paſs'd under one of the Triumphal Arches; where a rich Bible was let down to her, as from Heaven, by a Child repreſenting Truth: She with great Reverence kiſs'd both her Hands, and receiving it with another Kiſs, laid it next her Heart; profeſſing, She was better pleas'd with that ſingle Gift, than all the magnificent Preſents ſhe had that Day receiv'd from the City. On the next Morning, with the like Splendor and Magnificence, ſhe was attended to the Abby-Church at Weſtminſter, where ſhe was ſolemnly crown'd, according to the Order of the Roman Pontifical, by Oglethorp Biſhop of Carliſle; with ſo much Satisfaction to the People, that afterwards, without any Command, and by an univerſal Conſent, they every Year celebrated her Coronation-Day with a Religious Joy. Yet none of the Biſhops, beſides Carliſle, would join in the Solemnity; for they ſaw the Alterations ſhe was daily making; and tho' many of them had often chang'd, yet they reſolv'd now to keep firmer to what they had lately profeſs'd, and for which they had ſhed ſo much Blood. Yet no Objection could be made to her Piety and Devotion, which was conſtant and remarkable both in private and publick, and ſhe moſt attentively heard all Sermons preach'd before her: But ſtill ſhe preferr'd the publick Prayers, and often us'd the Saying ſhe had read of her Predeceſſor Henry the Third, That ſhe had rather converſe with God in Prayer, than hear others ſpeak eloquently of him.

Her Coronation.

Abroad, the Treaty of Cambray was ſtill negotiated by the Engliſh, Spaniſh and French Commiſſioners; in which the greateſt Obſtacle was the Reſtitution of Calais; and King Philip for a long time inſiſted ſo poſitively on that Article, that he refus'd to make Peace upon any other Terms. England had loſt it by a War, in which they ingag'd on his Account, ſo that in Honour he was oblig'd to ſee it reſtor'd; but when the Hopes of marrying the Queen vaniſh'd, and he found ſhe was making Changes in Religion, he became more regardleſs of her Intereſts, and told the Engliſh Commiſſioners, that unleſs they would enter into a League for continuing the War ſix Years longer, he muſt ſubmit to the neceſſity of his own Affairs, and conclude a Peace. Upon which the Queen hearken'd to Propoſitions ſent from France; but much complain'd of the Queen of Scotland's aſſuming the Title and Arms of England: It was anſwer'd, That ſince ſhe had born the Title and Arms of France, ſhe had no Reaſon to contend upon that Account. She ſaw ſhe could not now make War with France alone, and knew that Philip had made a ſeparate Peace; and ſhe had no Deſire to begin her Reign with a War, that would probably be unſucceſsful, and certainly ſo burdenſome to her Subjects Purſes, as might indanger the Loſs of their Affections. And certainly in reſpect of her Sex, and want of Treaſure, Peace at this Time was more elegible than the juſteſt War, to her, who was wont to ſay, It was more glorious to eſtabliſh a Peace with Wiſdom, than to finiſh a War with the moſt gallant Armies. The Loſs of Calais was no Reproach to her, but fell wholly on her Siſter's Memory; therefore ſhe reſolv'd to make a Peace with France, upon the beſt Terms that could be obtain'd. So at length it was agreed, 'That the French ſhould hold Calais eight Years, at 'which Time it ſhould either be reſtor'd, or five hundred thouſand Pounds 'paid in lieu of it to the Queen of England: Yet if, during that Space, ſhe 'made War, either in France or Scotland, ſhe was to forfeit her Right to that 'Town: Aymouth in Scotland was to be demoliſh'd, and all Differences on 'the Borders there, were to be determin'd by ſome deputed on both Sides.

The Treaty of Cambray.

A Peace made with France and Scotland.

This being adjusted, a general Peace between the Crowns of England, France, Spain and Scotland was concluded; to the Dissatisfaction of many of the English, who made great Complaints against particular Persons in the last Reign.

The wise Queen having happily for her own Designs made Peace both with France and Scotland, was now more at Liberty to settle her Affairs at home. D^r Rues, &c.

The first Parliament in this Reign.

She had call'd a Parliament, which was open'd on the twenty fifth Day of January; at which the Lord Bacon made a long Speech, both concerning Matters of Religion and the State of the Nation, 'He desir'd they would examine 'the former Religion without Heat or partial Affection, that all Reproaches 'might be forborn, and Extreams avoided; and that Particulars might be so 'establish'd, as all might agree in an Uniformity in Divine Worship. He laid 'open the Errors of the former Reign, and aggravated the Loss of Calais; but 'still shew'd that it could not be easily recover'd. He made a noble Encomium 'upon the Queen, but when he shew'd under what Necessities she lay, he de-'clar'd, She would desire no Supply, but what they should freely and chearfully 'offer. After some Debates about the Title of Supream Head, that was wanting in the Queen's Writs, and came to no Effect; the first Bill that was brought to try the Temper of the Parliament, was for the Restitution of the Tenths and First-Fruits to the Crown; against which all the Bishops protested. But that was all the Opposition that was made to it; 'By which, not only that Tax 'and Imposition was again laid on the Clergy, but also all the Impropriated 'Benefices, which Mary had surrender'd, were restor'd to the Crown. After this the Commons made a modest and handsome Address to the Queen, 'Desi-'ring her to chuse such a Husband, as might make both her self and the Na-'tion happy. She receiv'd the Proposal kindly, 'Since they had neither limi'ted her to Time, nor Nation; but declar'd, That as hitherto she had liv'd 'with great Satisfaction in a single State, and had refus'd the Propositions that 'had been made to her, both in her Brother's and Sister's Reign, so she had no 'Inclination to change her Course of Life: If ever she did, she would take care, 'that it should be to the Good and Satisfaction of her People. She thought 'she was marry'd to the Nation at her Coronation, by the Ring she then re-'ceiv'd, and look'd upon her People as her dear Children; and she would be 'highly satisfy'd, if her Tombstone might tell Posterity, HERE LYES A 'QUEEN WHO REIGN'D SO LONG, AND LIV'D AND 'DY'D A VIRGIN. This Matter was soon dropt, and an acceptable Bill for the Recognition of her Title to the Crown was brought in: It was not thought necessary to repeal the Sentence of her Mother's Divorce, for it was declar'd, That the Crown purg'd all Defects; and it was thought needless to look back into a Matter, which could not be done without casting some Reproach on her Father: So it was in general Words Enacted, 'That they did assuredly be'lieve and declare, That by the Laws of God and the Realm, she was their law-'ful Queen, and was rightly and lineally descended to the Throne. This was thought a wiser Way, than if they had examin'd the Sentence of Divorce that pass'd upon the Confession of a Pre-contract; which must have reviv'd the Remembrance of Things that ought to be forgotten; which was also thought the true Reason why in all her Reign no Apology was printed for her Mother. Other Bills were brought in, and one pass'd, 'That reviv'd all Acts made against the Pope's 'Power, in King Henry's Reign, and repeal'd those made by Queen Mary:

Her Supremacy asserted.

'They enacted an Oath for acknowledging the Queen Supream Governor in all 'Causes, and over all Persons; and the Refusers of it were to be turn'd out 'of all Offices either Ecclesiastical or Civil, and to be under a Disability du-'ring Life: If any should advance the Authority of a Foreign Power, the first 'Offence was Fine or Imprisonment, the second a Premunire, and the third 'Treason: The Queen was also impower'd to give Commissions, for Judging 'and Reforming Ecclesiastical Matters, under certain Limitations. From this last was the Court, call'd the High Commission Court, founded; which in reality was nothing, but the diſtributing that Authority into many Hands, which was in one Perſon in King Henry's Reign.

During theſe Parliamentary Proceedings, great Complaints were made of Seditious Sermons, preach'd by the Popiſh Clergy; upon which the Queen follow'd her Siſter's Precedent, and forbad all Preaching without a Royal Licence obtain'd: She likewiſe ſent an Order to the Convocation, requiring that Body to make no Canons, under the Pains of a Premunire. Yet the lower Houſe inſiſting ſtill upon ſeveral Points, a publick and ſolemn Conference was appointed by the Queen, to be held between the Romiſh Biſhops and the Proteſtant Divines. This was firſt propos'd to Arch-Biſhop Heath, who was ſtill a Privy-Counſellor; and after ſome Conſultation with his Brethren, he accepted of it. Nine of each Side were appointed formally to diſpute upon theſe three Points; Worſhip in an unknown Tongue; the Power that every particular Church had to alter Rites and Ceremonies; and concerning the Propitiatory Sacrifice of the Maſs: All which were to be given in Writing. The laſt Day of March was the firſt Day of the Conference, which was held in Weſtminſter-Abby, in the Preſence of the Privy-Council, and both Houſes of Parliament, and vaſt Numbers of People who were gather'd together at ſo unuſual a Sight. The Applauſes of the Aſſembly were ſo much on the Proteſtants Side, that after the firſt Day, the other Party obſtinately refus'd to proceed according to the Form firſt agreed; and the Biſhops of Wincheſter and Lincoln ſaid, The Faith of the Church ought not to be examin'd, but in a Synod of Divines; That it gave too great Incouragement to Hereticks to diſpute with them; and that the Queen and Council ought to be Excommunicated, for ſuffering them to argue againſt the Catholick Faith before an unlearned Multitude. Upon this they were ſent to the Tower, and the Lord-Keeper diſmiſs'd the Aſſembly with this Sentence to all the Biſhops, Since you are not willing that we ſhould hear you, you ſhall very ſhortly hear from us.

A publick Conference about Religion.

This being over, the Parliament was now in a better Diſpoſition to paſs the Bill for the Uniformity of the Service of the Church: The Book of Common-Prayer was now reviſ'd, and the moſt conſiderable Alteration, that the expreſs Declaration made againſt the corporal Preſence, in the ſecond Book ſet out by King Edward, was now left out; that none might be driven out of the Communion of the Church upon that Account; therefore the Matter was left undetermin'd, as a ſpeculative Point, in which the People were at their Liberty. The Book of Ordination was not ſpecially mention'd in the Act, which occaſion'd Bonner afterwards to queſtion the Legality of Ordinations made by it; but it had been made a Part of the Common-Prayer-Book in the fifth Year of King Edward, and the whole Book, then ſet out, was now confirm'd: So that by a ſpecial Act made ſome Years after this, it was declar'd, That that Office was underſtood to be a Part of it. Great Oppoſitions, and many Speeches were made in the Houſe of Lords againſt this famous Act of Uniformity; but at length it paſs'd with the Diſſent and Proteſtations of eight Spiritual and nine Temporal Lords, and has continu'd in Force to this Day. Another Act paſs'd with greater and juſter Oppoſition, 'That the Queen might reſerve 'ſome Lands belonging to Biſhopricks to her ſelf, as they became void, giving 'in lieu of them Impropriated Tithes to the Value of them: This was moſt oppos'd in the Houſe of Commons, who reaſonably apprehended, That under this Pretence, new Spoils might be made of Church-Lands; ſo that upon a Diviſion of the Houſe, ninety were againſt it, but a hundred and thirty three being for it, it paſs'd. Another Act paſs'd with the like Oppoſition, 'By 'which all Religious Houſes founded by Queen Mary, were ſuppreſs'd, and 'united to the Crown. A private Act paſs'd, declaring the Deprivation of 'the Popiſh Biſhops in King Edward's Reign valid in Law, and all the Leaſes 'made by their Succeſſors legal. At laſt a Subſidy, two Tenths and two Fifteens were given, with the Tonnage and Poundage for the Queen's Life, and so the Parliament was dissolv'd on the eighth of May.

Shortly after, in order to put the Laws in Execution, a general Visitation was appointed, and a High Commission Court set up; by which Means the establish'd Liturgy in the vulgar Tongue, was soon brought into all Churches; Images were remov'd without Tumult, and the Oath of Supremacy offer'd to the Popish Bishops, and all other Ecclesiastical Persons, which had been taken by most of them in the Reign of King Henry the eighth. As many as refus'd the Oath, were according to Law, turn'd out of all their Preferments; and of the nine thousand four hundred Benefices, then nam'd in England, fourteen Bishops, six Abbots, twelve Deans, twelve Arch-Deacons, fifteen Heads of Colleges, fifty Prebendaries, and eighty Rectors, was the whole Number of those that were depriv'd. But it was strongly believ'd, that the greatest Part comply'd against their Consciences, and would have been ready for another Turn, if the Queen had dy'd, while that Race of Incumbants liv'd, and the next Successor had been of another Religion. All the Bishops were at first under Confinement, but they were soon after set at Liberty; only Bonner, White and Watson, were detain'd Prisoners. Many grievous Complaints were brought against Bonner, for the illegal Cruelties he had exercis'd, and the Tortures he had put to his Prisoners; but the Queen resolv'd not to stain the Beginning of her Reign with Blood; and the Reformed Divines were not for revenging themselves, but for leaving all to the Justice of Heaven. Heath liv'd privately at his own House, where he was sometimes visited by the Queen: Pates, Scot and Goldwell, had leave to go beyond Sea. A few Gentlemen, and all the Nuns went likewise out of England; and so mild and gentle was the Queen, that she deny'd that Liberty to none that asked it.

The Number of the Churchmen that were turn'd out.

The Queen proceeded next to fill up the vacant Bishopricks, and began with Canterbury; in which Affair Doctor Parker stood out for many Months, and he would not undertake so high a Charge, 'till his Friends had us'd all sorts of Arguments both Threatning and Persuasive, to induce him to comply. Upon the sending of the Conge d'eslire, he was elected by the Chapter of Canterbury; and shortly after the Queen issu'd out a Warrant for his Consecration, and after that a second, directed to Kitchin Bishop of Landaffe, the only complying Bishop in Possession, and to Barlow, Scory, and Coverdale, three Bishops depriv'd in the last Reign, and to Bale Bishop of Ossory, and two suffragan Bishops besides. Accordingly, on the seventeenth Day of December, by four of these, he was consecrated in the Chappel at Lambeth, according to the Book of Ordination, set out under King Edward, only the Ceremony of the Pastoral Staff was omitted; All which is apparent, not only from the Testimony of the Earl of Nottingham who saw it, but from the Records of the Crown, the Registers of the See of Canterbury, and the original Instrument describing all the Particulars of his Consecration, still preserv'd in Corpus Christi College in Cambridge. And this incontestably confutes the scandalous Fable of the Nag's-Head Ordination, and all other improbable Stories, afterwards invented by the Enemies of the establish'd Church of England. After this Arch-Bishop Parker proceeded regularly to consecrate many other Bishops; as Grindall, for the See of London; Cox, for Ely; Horn, for Winchester; Merick, for Bangor; Young, for St. David's; Bullingham, for Lincoln; the famous Jewell, for Salisbury; Davis, for St. Asaph; Guest, for Rochester; Berkley, for Bath and Wells; Bentham, for Coventry and Litchfield; Alley, for Exeter; and Parre, for Peterborough. Barlow and Scory, formerly depriv'd, were put into the Sees of Chichester and Hereford: And the Sees of York and Durham were kept vacant a Year, upon some Hopes that Heath and Tonstall should have conform'd; but after that, Young was translated from St. David's to York, and Pilkington advanc'd to Durham. In all these, and many other Advancements, when a Man was recommended to the Queen, as worthy of Doctor Parker made Arch-Bishop of Canterbury.

Prefer-

Preferment, ſhe uſually ask'd, If there were not others to be found, of more Learning and Piety, to whom ſhe might recommend the Care of the Church.

Thus did this excellent Queen not only reſtore Peace to the Nation, but in the Compaſs of a Year recover the Reformation of Religion; while all Chriſtendom ſtood amaz'd to ſee it effected with ſo little Commotion. And all Things were carry'd with ſuch a general Temper and Moderation, that for ten Years there was no Diſturbances about Religion, nor any ſevere Puniſhment of Roman Catholicks. By means of this Change and Eſtabliſhment, as the Politicians obſerv'd, England became the moſt free of all Kingdoms in Chriſtendom, and the Scepter deliver'd from the foreign Servitude of Rome; the Nation grew more wealthy than in former Ages, when infinite Sums were annually exported to Rome for Firſt-Fruits, Indulgences, Pardons, Appeals, Diſpenſations, Palls, and other things, to the ſtrange Impoveriſhment of the Republick. And thus having recover'd the almoſt Shipwrack'd Veſſel to a ſafe Port, the Queen was able by the Bleſſing of God both to ſettle her Religion, and to lay the Foundations of a laſting Peace at home and abroad. The Happineſs of England.

II. While England was thus ſetled, and happy at home, Scotland was diſtracted, and began to ſuffer great Convulſions; all ariſing from the Factions within its own Bowels, and the Severity and Provocations of the Queen-Dowager, who was Regent of the Kingdom, and wholly in the Intereſt of France. The real Queen of Scotland, now ſeventeen Years of Age, was ſtill in France, and this Year her Husband the Dauphine ſucceeded to the Crown, under the Name of Francis the Second. He being govern'd by the Counſel of the Guiſes, who bore the chief Sway in France, join'd with the Queen-Regent in all her violent Proceedings in Scotland. Vaſt Diſturbances were rais'd, and innumerable Outrages committed in all Parts, upon the Account of Religion and Reformation: And at length the People made ſuch a general Inſurrection, that the Queen-Regent was compell'd to retire to Dunbar Caſtle. She was once willing to refer the whole Matter to a Parliament; but two thouſand Men coming over from France, and Aſſurances being ſent her of a greater Force to follow, ſhe aſſum'd new Courage, went and fortify'd Leith, and broke her Agreement with the People, which ſhe had more than once done before, upon a Pretence, That Princes were not ſtrictly to be charg'd with their Promiſes, eſpecially when made to Hereticks. Upon which the Lords alledg'd, 'That in their Queen's 'Minority, the Government was chiefly in the States, and that the Regent 'was only the chief Adminiſtrator, and accountable to them: Therefore they reſolv'd to depoſe her from her Regency. They objected many Male-Adminiſtrations, as her Beginning a War in the Kingdom, and bringing in Foreigners to ſubdue it, her embaſing the Coin, Governing without the Conſent of the Nobility, and breaking her Faith and Promiſes to them; upon which they declar'd, That ſhe was fallen from her Regency, and ſuſpended her Power 'till the next Parliament. The Lords, now call'd The Lords of the Congregation, retir'd from Edengburgh to Sterlin; upon which the French came to Edenburgh, and ſet up the Maſs in the Churches which had been laid aſide; and ſoon after a new Supply came from France, commanded by the Marquiſs of Elbeufe, one of the Queen-Regent's Brothers, ſo that now there were four thouſand French in Scotland. By means of this Foreign Force, the whole Nation came to be united againſt the Queen-Regent, and to look on her as a common Enemy. A. D. 1559. Reg. 2. The Troubles of Scotland. The Queen-Regent depos'd

The Scots, who had been hitherto animated, and ſecretly ſupply'd with Mony and Ammunition from England, were now forc'd more openly to beg the Queen's Aſſiſtance, which occaſion'd ſeveral Debates in the Council, and many things were alledg'd to induce the Queen to join in this Affair. Particularly ſhe had been highly provok'd by the young Queen of Scotland, who together with her Husband the French King had aſſum'd and uſurp'd the Arms of England; which laid the Foundations of ſuch a Jealouſie The Scots beg Aid of the Queen of England.

as nothing but Death could extinguish. Besides it was thought highly impolitick to suffer the French to remain in Scotland, whose Designs were known to be deep and subtle, and their Ambition boundless: Insomuch that it was become a Proverb in these Days, 'That France could neither be poor, 'nor peaceable for three Years together: And Queen Elizabeth frequently us'd that Saying of Valentinian, 'Chuse the French for your Friends, but not for 'your Neighbours. It was therefore finally resolv'd, That it was just, honest and necessary, immediately to drive the French out of Scotland.

A. D. 1560. Reg. 2. The Duke of Norfolk was sent to Berwick for this Purpose, and to treat with the Lords of the Congregation, now headed by the Duke of Chastelherault. On the twenty seventh of February, they agreed upon these Conditions, 'That the Scots should be perpetual Allies to the Queen of England; and 'that after the French were driven out of Scotland, they should continue their 'Obedience to their own natural Queen. Upon which two thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot, under the Lord Gray, were sent to assist the Scots, who after some Offers to the French, invested Leith. During that Siege, there were considerable Losses on both Sides, but those on the English Side were more easily supply'd from the neighbouring Parts, than the other. And this so affected the French, that they offer'd to restore Calais to the Queen of England, if she would withdraw her Forces from Scotland: She gave them a quick Answer, That she did not value that Fish-Town, so much as she did the Quiet and Security of all Britain. But she offer'd to mediate a Peace between them and the Scots; but before that could be effected, the Queen-Regent dy'd, having first ask'd Pardon of several of the Scotch Lords for the Injuries she had done them. However, not long after, a Peace was concluded between England, France and Scotland: 'An Oblivion was granted for all that was past; 'the French and English were to be sent out of Scotland; the Queen of Scot- 'land was to quit the Arms of England and Ireland: During the Queen's Ab- 'sence, the Kingdom was to be govern'd by a Council of Twelve, all Natives; 'of whom the Queen was to nominate Seven, and the States Five: All other 'Matters were referr'd to a Parliament. Thus both English and French remov'd out of Scotland, and a Parliament met in August; in which all those Acts that favour'd the old Way of Worship were repeal'd; and the Lands and Revenues of the Church were spoil'd after an unheard of Manner. However these Articles were rejected with Scorn by the King of France, so that the Scots began to apprehend a new War; but shortly after, the Death of that King, after a Reign of seventeen Months, deliver'd them from all their Fears: And the Scotch Queen, having no longer the Support of so great a Crown, was afterwards oblig'd to return home, and govern in such a Manner, as that Nation thought fit to allow. Thus did the Queen of England separate Scotland from its ancient Dependance on France, and so united it to her own Interests, that she was not only secure on that Side of her Dominions, but rais'd so great an Interest in Scotland, that Affairs there were generally govern'd according to the Directions she sent. This Peace was accounted advantageous for all Britain, the ancient Liberty of Scotland retain'd, and the Dignity of England preserv'd, which from that Time fear'd nothing from Scotland: So that the English joyfully acknowledg'd their Queen to be the Founder of their Security, and the Scotch Protestants the Defender of their Liberty.

The Treaty of Edenburgh.

The Queen's Influence over Scotland.

She, like a true Mother of her Country, was all the while so intent upon the publick Welfare, that she left no Room in her Thoughts for the Addresses of the most potent Princes. For besides those of King Philip, formerly mention'd, the Emperor Ferdinand recommended his younger Son Charles, Duke of Austria, to her for a Husband. And when this succeeded not, John Duke of Finland, second Son to Gustavus King of Swedeland, was sent by his Father to follicit for his eldest Brother Ericus; who was honourably receiv'd, but the Match rejected. Then Adolphus Duke of Holstein, Uncle to Frederick

The many Matches offer'd to her.

King of Denmark, came into England, with great Hopes of Succeſs; but the Queen beſtow'd upon him the Honour of the Garter, and an annual Penſion, but not her own Perſon. Likewiſe James Earl of Arran was recommended to her by the Proteſtants of Scotland; but neither the Man nor the Motion prov'd acceptable. Of inferior Fortunes, there were ſome at home that pleas'd themſelves with the Hopes of obtaining her: Firſt, Sir William Pickering, a Gentleman of a noble Family, but moſt commended for his polite Studies, and ſweet Demeanor: Then Henry Earl of Arundel, exceeding rich, but now in his declining Age: Then Robert Dudley, youngeſt Son to the Earl of Northumberland, of excellent Features, and in the Flower of his Age, afterwards one of her chief Favourites. Neither theſe, nor any other could ever prevail upon this Maiden Queen; tho' ſhe was daily tempted to change her Reſolution by all the alluring Pleaſures of a Court, which ſhew'd it ſelf in Interludes, Banquets and Balls, and ſurrounded with all things that might provoke the moſt cool and languiſhing Deſires. Her Juvenile Age, and the Intemperance which ever attends a publick Court, gave occaſion to ſome injurious Reports; but ſhe eaſily waſh'd off that ſlanderous Infamy, one of the moſt raging Crimes of this Age, by the incredible Continence and Chaſtity of her whole Life, all natural Inclinations being over-rul'd by her Modeſty and Prudence. Her Maids of Honour always took a wonderful Pleaſure in her Manners, her Diſcourſes and Converſation, and wholly apply'd themſelves to imitate her, borrowing from her the moſt illuſtrious Examples of Modeſty and Chaſtity.

But all in vain.

As this Queen was courted in Marriage by many temporal Princes, ſo ſhe was courted in a different Manner by Pope Pius the Fourth, who being ſenſible of the Errors of his arrogant Predeceſſor, declar'd He would humble himſelf even to Hereſie it ſelf, in regard that whatſoever was done to gain Souls to Chriſt, did become that See. Accordingly he wrote a moſt loving Letter to her, kindly exhorting her to return to the Unity of the Catholick Church: And it is ſaid, he made her great Offers, if ſhe would hearken to his Counſel; particularly, That he would recall the Sentence pronounc'd againſt her Mother's Marriage, confirm the Book of Common-Prayer in Engliſh, and permit her People to uſe the Sacrament in both Kinds. But the Queen, according to her fix'd Motto, Semper Eadem, perſiſted conſtant in her Reſolution, to maintain that Religion, which in her Conſcience ſhe was perſuaded to be moſt agreeable to the Word of God, and moſt conſonant to the Primitive Church. Likewiſe in the following Year, when the Pope ſent the Abbot Martiningo as far as Flanders, the Queen ſent her Commands to him not to croſs the Sea but at his Peril: And tho' the Emperor and the King of Spain did earneſtly intreat that he might be heard, yet ſhe ſtood her Ground, and reply'd, That ſhe could not treat with the Biſhop of Rome, whoſe Authority was totally excluded out of England by Act of Parliament. This Anſwer ſhe return'd to give them ſome Satisfaction, but to the Pope's Nuncio, ſhe only gave a direct Denial: For ſhe well perceiv'd this Remedy did not tend to the healing of the Wounds of the Church, but to the making them incurable; and the Event juſtify'd her Conduct.

The Pope's Endeavours to gain her to his Intereſt.

The Queen being now more ſecure, that the Church might continue uncorrupted, ſhe ſet forth two remarkable Proclamations: By one ſhe commanded the Anabaptiſts, and ſuch Heterodox People, who had flock'd from Foreign Countries to the Sea-Coaſts of England, to depart the Realm within twenty Days, upon Pain of Impriſonment and Loſs of Goods. By the other ſhe reſtrain'd a Sacrilegious Kind of People, who under Colour of aboliſhing Superſtition, began to pull down ancient Monuments, to deface the Epitaphs and Eſcutcheons of the nobleſt Families, and other venerable Remains of Antiquity, and to take the Bells and Lead from the Churches. She alſo converted the famous Abby of Weſtminſter into a Collegiate-Church; inſtituting a Dean, twelve Prebendaries, a School-maſter, an Uſher, forty Scholars, with ſeveral Officers,

Her Care of the Church.

Officers, to the great Advantage of Religion and Learning. And then to the great Advancement of her Glory, ſhe began gradually to call in the Braſs Mony, and reſtore the Coin to its current and ſterling Purity, and to repair the Honour of the Kingdom, by preventing the Frauds of thoſe who adulterated the Coin both at Home and Abroad. All which ſhe happily perform'd within a few Months without Commotion; Firſt, by prohibiting the Melting down any Mony, whether Braſs or Sterling; then by reducing Baſe Mony to its juſt Value; and laſtly by purchaſing all that was bad with her own Mony, provided it was brought into the Mint at a fix'd Time. So that to Queen Elizabeth is to be aſcrib'd the Happineſs of having better and purer Mony in England than had been us'd for two hundred Years before; a great and memorable Act which neither King Edward could, nor Queen Mary durſt undertake.

She regulates the Coin.

A. D. 1561. Reg. 3/4. Theſe things happily accompliſh'd, the Queen ſent the Earl of Bedford into France, to condole the Death of King Francis, and congratulate his Succeſſor Charles the Ninth, who was then but eleven Years of Age. The Earl, together with Throgmorton the Queen's Agent, often ſollicited the Widow Queen of Scotland to confirm the Treaty of Edenburgh: But her Anſwer was always the ſame, That ſhe neither could, nor would do it without the Advice of the Nobility of Scotland. Upon which Queen Elizabeth, ſuſpecting that this Anſwer was only to amuſe her, while ſome dangerous Deſign was practiſing againſt her, ſent Sir Thomas Randolph into Scotland, to perſuade the Lords of that Country to enter into a League of mutual Amity with her, and other Proteſtant Princes; and likewiſe to uſe all juſt Methods to hinder their Queen from contracting a ſecond Marriage with a Foreign Prince; for which many convincing Reaſons were alledg'd. In the mean Time the Queen of Scotland, deſigning to return into her own Country, ſent D'Oiſely, a French Lord, to deſire Queen Elizabeth, That with a ſafe Conduct ſhe her ſelf might paſs by Sea into Scotland, and D'Oiſely paſs through England. But the incens'd Queen, in the Preſence of a great Multitude, deny'd both the one and the other, unleſs ſhe would confirm the Treaty of Edenburgh, declaring, If ſhe perform'd that, ſhe ſhould find all the Kindneſs of a Queen, a Kinſwoman, and a Neighbour, whether ſhe went by Sea or Land. The Queen of Scotland was ſenſibly affected with this Anſwer, and vehemently expoſtulated the Matter with Throgmorton, as tho' ſhe condeſcended too much in deſiring the Favour, which ſhe rather eſteem'd as a Piece of Juſtice. And now reſolving to run all Hazards, ſhe ſet Sail from Calais, and by the Benefit of a Fog, paſs'd by the Engliſh Fleet, which was thought to have ſtood ready to intercept her, and ſafely arriv'd in Scotland; where contrary to Expectation, ſhe us'd all poſſible Clemency to her Subjects, made no Changes in Religion tho' tumultuouſly ſet up, but began to govern the Kingdom by wiſe and excellent Laws. Soon after ſhe ſent Letters to Queen Elizabeth, offering all Obſervance and Readineſs to enter into a League with her, provided ſhe might by Parliament be declar'd Heir apparent to the Crown of England, in Caſe ſhe dy'd without Iſſue. This was a great Surprize to Queen Elizabeth, who expected nothing leſs than the Confirmation of the Treaty; ſo that the Subſtance of her Anſwer was, That for her Amity ſhe wiſh'd her well, but as to her Propoſal, ſhe was not yet weary of her Life. Yet to ſhow her Reſpect ſhe entertain'd her Uncles, the Dukes D'Aumarl, and D'Elbeufe, and the other French Lords that brought her home, and return'd through England, with great Splendor and Magnificence. Theſe two Queens had indeed both great Spirits, and Wiſdom, but there aroſe ſuch unhappy Jealouſies of State between them, that it kept them further aſunder in Love than in Blood, and was the Cauſe of many unkind Paſſages between them: In all which, tho' the Queen of Scotland was almoſt equal to the Queen of England in the Abilities of her Mind, yet in the Favours of Fortune ſhe was much her inferior.

And now the wise and provident Princess, tho' she found her Treasure exhausted, to secure her self and People, began to furnish her Armory with all necessary Provisions for War, expending great Sums for Arms in Germany, and casting great Numbers of Iron and Brass Pieces of Cannon; which last was happily favour'd by a Discovery of a plentiful Mine of Brass at Keswick in Cumberland, sufficient to supply England and Foreign Nations. She likewise caus'd the first making of Gun-powder in England, that she might not be oblig'd to beg or purchase it of her Neighbours. She increas'd also the Garrison of Berwick, advanc'd their Pay, and fortify'd the Town with several new Works, which were finish'd in a short Time. She sent discreet and worthy Men to rebuild the strong Castles within twenty Miles of the Borders of Scotland, and erected another upon the Banks of Medway, for the advantage of her Fleet; which she so well furnish'd and improv'd, as did not only exceed what had been seen by Britain, but Strangers worthily stil'd her, The Restorer of the Naval Glory, and the Queen of the North-Sea. The wealthier Inhabitants of the Sea-Coasts did likewise follow the Queen's Example, in building Ships of War with all imaginable Chearfulness, insomuch that the Queen's Fleet, in Conjunction with her Subject's Shipping, was able to furnish twenty thousand fighting Men for Sea Service. Moreover the Noblemen and Commons were in all Places as industrious in providing themselves Arms; so that every Nobleman's House was a compleat Armory. Frequent Musters were observ'd, and the young Men were train'd up to the Arts of War, and exercis'd in Mock-Campaigns: And the Country People, when Licence was granted for the Transportation of Corn, began to follow their Husbandry with a double Diligence, and great Advantage. For the good of the Publick, she increas'd the Salary of the Judges, and first allow'd them Provision for their respective Circuits: And tho' in many Cases she was a little sparing, yet she was never to learn where, when and how far to extend her Bounty; being really an equal Friend to Thrift, and Benefactor to Merit. In the midst of these Cares and Concerns, the tall and beautiful Spire of St. Paul's Cathedral, five hundred and twenty Foot in Height, was burnt down by Lightning from Heaven, as it was then believ'd; for which Reason it was for near seventy Years reckoned among the ordinary Epoches, or Accounts of Time, in the common Almanacks; 'till an old Plumber at his Death confess'd that it happen'd through his Negligence, in leaving a Pan of Coals in the Steeple when he went to Dinner.

While England was happy under the Government of a Masculine Queen, France became miserable under that of a Minor King. Violent Dissentions were rais'd among the Peers, who were soon form'd into two Factions, both using the glorious Pretext of Religion: Of the one, the Duke of Guise, a Papist, was Head, of the other the Prince of Conde, a Protestant; and the Professors of his Religion were most grievously afflicted, which by Degrees caus'd a War to break out, that was carry'd on for thirty Years together. Queen Elizabeth soon began to apprehend that England might feel the Heat of the neighbouring Flames: For she understood that the Guises, to allure the King of Navarre, had made a private Offer to him of that Kingdom, and the Queen of Scotland for his Wife, together with the Kingdom of England in Dowry; and all this by the Wealth of Spain, and the Authority of the Pope, who should dissolve the Marriage of Navarre with his Wife, as being an Heretick, and depose the Queen of England for the same Reason. Upon which she sent over Sir Henry Sidney, a Person of approv'd Abilities, to sound the Bottom of this Affair, and to persuade the Heads of each Party to an Accommodation. But Matters were gone too far to admit of any Remedy of that Kind; whereupon he return'd out of France, and was immediately sent to the Queen of Scotland, to defer the Enterview which she had desir'd with the Queen in England, 'till the following Year, or 'till the Wars in France were ended. All this was agreed; and Queen Elizabeth, after mature Deliberation, took into her Protection the French King's Subjects Subjects in Normandy, and made a Compact with the Prince of Conde, Rohan, Coligny and others, 'That she would pay them a hundred thousand Angels, 'and send them six thousand Men, of which one half should defend Dieppe and 'Roan; and that they should deliver into her Hands Haure-de-Grace, which 'should be held by three thousand English Soldiers, in the French King's Name, 'till Calais should be restor'd. On the same Day that this Compact was made, she by a publick Writing declar'd the Reasons of her Proceedings; and in the Month of September, one Part of the English Army, under Sir Adrian Poynings, arriv'd at Haure-de-Grace or Newhaven, to the great Joy of the Inhabitants, and the other Part at Dieppe. After the Arrival of the Earl of Warwick, General of the whole Army, they made some little Excursions into the neighbouring Parts of the Country; to prevent which the Rhinegrave came and encamp'd near them. Nevertheless several slight Skirmishes pass'd between the French and the English; and the Mariners of the Fleet in the mean Time scour'd the Seas, and almost every Day brought in rich Prizes.

Haure-de-Grace put into her Hands.

At home, several great Persons were this Year call'd in Question: Margaret Countess of Lenox, Neece to King Henry the Eighth, and her Husband the Earl of Lenox, for keeping secret Correspondence with the Queen of Scotland, were deliver'd Prisoners to Sir Richard Sackville, Master of the Rolls, and detain'd for some Time. Also Arthur Pool and his Brother, Great Grand-Children to George Duke of Clarence, Brother to King Edward the Fourth, Anthony Fortescue, who had marry'd their Sister, and others, were arraign'd, for Conspiring to withdraw themselves to the Duke of Guise in France; and from thence to return with an Army into Wales, to proclaim the Scotch Queen Soveraign of England, and Arthur Pool Duke of Clarence. All which they confess'd at the Bar, and were thereupon condemn'd to die; but their Lives were generously spar'd by the Queen, in regard they were of the Royal Blood. But the Lady Catharine Gray, Sister to Queen Jane, met with less kind Usage in the case of a smaller Fault: She having formerly been marry'd to the Earl of Pembroke's eldest Son, and soon after legally divorc'd from him, afterwards she was found with Child by Edward Seymour, Earl of Hartford, who being at that Time in France, was immediately order'd to return: And being examin'd before the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and affirming that they were lawfully marry'd, but not being able within a limited Time to produce Witnesses of their Marriage, they were both committed to the Tower, where the Lady was deliver'd of a Son. Afterwards, by Connivance or Corruption of their Keepers, being sometimes permitted to come together, she was again with Child by him; which so provok'd the Queen, that Sir Edward Warner, Lieutenant of the Tower, was turn'd out of his Place, and the Earl was fin'd five thousand Pounds in the Star-Chamber, and kept in Prison nine Years after: Tho' in pleading of his Cause, one John Hales argu'd, They were lawful Man and Wife, by Virtue of their own bare Consent, without any Ecclesiastical Ceremony. The unhappy Lady, afterwards with Grief falling into a mortal Sickness, humbly desir'd the Queen's Pardon, for having marry'd without her Knowledge, and recommending her Children to her Clemency, dy'd in the Tower.

Several great Persons condemn'd, yet sav'd.

A. D. 1563. Reg. 5.

The Practices of the Papists, and the Dangers threatning both the Queen and Kingdom, occasion'd her to call a new Parliament, which met on the twelfth of January, and particularly pass'd an Act for the Preservation of the Queen's Majesty and the Realm, and for avoiding the future Inconveniences and Dishonours, arising from the usurp'd Authority of the Bishop of Rome. 'In which it was made High-Treason for any to assert Thrice by Writing, 'Word or Deed, the Authority of any foreign Prince, Prelate or State, in Spi-'ritual Matters, in England, or any other of the Queen's Dominions; or re-'fuse the Oath of Supremacy to the Queen in Matters Spiritual, or over Ec-'clesiastical Persons, after it had been twice tender'd; yet so as that they should 'not fall under an Attainder, nor forfeit their Goods and Chattels; nor that 'this Oath ſhould be exacted of any, but ſuch who were, had been, or 'ſhould be in Holy Orders, or did then bear, had born, or ſhould bear ſome 'Eccleſiaſtical Office; or that after Warning given, ſhould refuſe to obſerve 'the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church of England; or ſhould diſhonour the 'ſame in Publick, or ſhould celebrate Maſs, &c. as may be ſeen in the Sta- 'tute it ſelf. In this Parliament ſeveral other good Laws were made, for the Relief of the Poor, the ordering of the Navy, the Support and Improvement of Tillage, beſides others for the puniſhing of Vagabonds, Forgers of Evidences, Conjurers and Fortune-Tellers, and ſuch as ſhould be guilty of Sodomy or Perjury; and one was made particularly for tranſlating the Bible into the Welſh Tongue. The Parliament moreover, as a Congratulation upon the happy Turn of Affairs, granted the Queen a Subſidy, beſides two Fifteenths and Tenths, in Conſideration that ſhe had reformed the Faith, reſtor'd Peace to her Kingdoms, reſcu'd England and Scotland from the common Enemy, refin'd the Coin, rebuilt the Navy, provided Ammunition for Sea and Land, and likewiſe the great Care ſhe expreſs'd towards France for the Security of its young King, the Safety of England, and the Regaining of Calais. So upon the tenth of April, the Parliament was prorogu'd to October, and then from Time to Time, for about three years.

The Queen's Supremacy aſſerted.

Other Acts.

The Convocation was no leſs buſily imploy'd about the Good of the Church and Publick: The Prelates had obſerv'd ſome Deviation from the Doctrine in King Edward's Reign, and ſome other Irrugularities as to Diſcipline; which they were willing to impute to the Want of ſome known Rule, by which they were to regulate their Judgments, and conform their Actions. Therefore it was thought expedient, that the Book of Articles agreed in Convocation Anno 1552, ſhould be revis'd, and accommodated to the Uſe of the Church; all which was perform'd with the greateſt and wiſeſt Conſideration. Theſe Articles were now reduc'd to the Number of thirty nine, and publiſh'd both in Engliſh and Latin, and are in full Force to this very Day. Thus was the Church of England fix'd and eſtabliſh'd upon a laſting Foundation, and the Reformation in a great Meaſure compleated; which was a noble Work, that with ſeveral Interminſions, had been carry'd on for above thirty Years, before it could be perfected.

III. Affairs were happily ſetled at home, but abroad they had a various Aſpect, and ſuch croſs and different Deſigns appear'd among the great Men in France, as requir'd a nice Politician to underſtand their Aims. The Wars and Diſturbances in that Country, caus'd the French Hoſtages, detain'd in England for the Payment of five hundred thouſand Crowns, if Calais were not reſtor'd, to prepare ſecretly to eſcape out of the Nation; but being ready to take ſhipping, they were diſcover'd, and brought back again. The Prince of Conde in his expeditious Journey to the Engliſh Auxiliaries in Normandy, was intercepted and taken Priſoner in the memorable Battel of Dreux, by the Duke of Guiſe: Which had been a great Diſappointment to the Engliſh, but the Duke of Colen join'd with him, beſieg'd Caen in Normandy and took it, together with Bayeux, Falaiſe and St. Lo. In the mean Time the Prince of Conde, drawn on with Hopes of marrying the Queen of Scotland, and to have the chief Government in France, during the King's Minority, concluded a Peace with the King and the Guiſes; ſo that now all France, both Proteſtants and Papiſts, requir'd to have Haure-de Grace deliver'd up. But the Earl of Warwick, perceiving the Unſteadineſs of the French Proteſtants, firſt to deſire his Preſence, and now upon ſo ſlight an Occaſion to require his Abſence; he ſuddenly turn'd all the Inhabitants of both Perſuaſions out of the Town, and ſiez'd on their Ships: On the other Side the French were ready to attack the Town, alledging, 'That they fought not now for Religion, but their Country; and it 'was neceſſary that both Parties ſhould join their Forces, ſince they had al'ready concluded a Peace between themſelves. And hereupon the Duke of Montmorency ſent a Trumpet to the Earl of Warwick, commanding him to ſurrender the Town; and upon Anſwer, That he would do nothing without his Queen's Leave, he inveſted the Place, and carry'd on a furious Siege. This being known to Queen Elizabeth, ſhe ſent Orders to the Earl of Warwick to ſurrender upon honourable Conditions; which was accordingly perform'd in a ſhort Time, after the Engliſh had held the Place about eleven Months: And then return'd into England, without any Diſhonour in yielding up a Town, which the Peſtilence made him no leſs unwilling than unable to hold. But what was more unfortunate than the Loſs of that Place, he brought the Plague with him into England, which rag'd throughout the Nation, and above twenty thouſand dy'd in London. The Recovery of this Town not only caus'd the French to triumph, but hereupon the Chancellor of France openly pronounc'd, that by this War the Engliſh had loſt all their Right to Calais, and were no more to require it, ſince it was one of the Conditions, that neither of the Nations ſhould make War upon the other: A Point much inſiſted upon afterwards.

The Duke of Guiſe, Uncle to the Queen of Scotland, was ſlain in the Heat of the War, upon which her Dowry-Mony was ſtopp'd, Duke Hamilton turn'd out of his Office, and the Scots excluded from being of the Life-Guard to the French King; all which that Queen highly reſented. The Cardinal of Lorrain, another of her Uncles, being apprehenſive that this might provoke her to deſert the French, and court an Engliſh Intereſt, he once mov'd a Marriage with Charles of Auſtria, and offer'd the County of Tyrol in Jointure. She civilly imparted the Affair to Queen Elizabeth, who unwilling ſhe ſhould marry any Foreign Prince, perſuaded her to take a Husband out of England, and particularly recommended to her the Lord Robert Dudley; promiſing, If ſhe conſented, ſhe ſhould by Act of Parliament be declar'd, her Siſter, her Daughter, and her Succeſſor, if ſhe dy'd without Iſſue. But when her Uncles and the Queen's Mother were inform'd of this Motion, they look'd upon it with much Diſdain, and promis'd her, That if ſhe refus'd the Match, and adher'd to the French Intereſt, all her Dowry ſhould be paid, and the Scots reſtor'd to their former Privileges in France. They further ſuggeſted to her, That Queen Elizabeth could never be in earneſt, when ſhe made this Propoſal, as expecting to have Dudley her ſelf, and deſiring that the other ſhould never marry. The Queen of Scotland came to no Reſolution in this Matter, but referr'd her ſelf to a Conference; having her Thoughts extreamly employ'd about her Affairs at home, which now were in great Confuſion and Diſorder. As for the King of Spain, he had indeed a Leiger Ambaſſador here in England, but rather by way of Compliment, and to watch Advantages, than for any real Affection; which he began to withdraw from the Engliſh, as ſuſpecting them to deſign a Trade in the Weſt-Indies.

The Queen of Scots Deſigns as to Marriage.

This being the ſixth of this Queen's Reign, prov'd a fatal Year for the Death of many great Perſons. Firſt for that of William Lord Gray, of Wilton, Governor of Berwick, a Man famous for his great Services in War, and his Incouraging the Reformation. William Lord Paget, a Man as highly uſeful in Matters of Peace, who by his great Merits had advanc'd himſelf to many great Places; and tho' he was zealous in the Roman Religion, yet he was held in great Eſtimation by the Queen to the laſt part of his Life. Next dy'd Henry Mannors Earl of Rutland, deſcended by his Mother from King Edward the Fourth. And laſtly Frances Dutcheſs of Suffolk, Daughter to Charles Brandon and King Henry's Siſter Mary; after ſhe had ſeen her eldeſt Daughter Jane proclaim'd Queen, and beheaded with her Husband; her ſecond Daughter Catharine, divorc'd from her Husband, and confin'd to the Tower; her third Daughter Mary thrown away upon an unequal Match; and her ſelf, forgetting her noble Deſcent, marry'd to Adrian Stokes, a mean Gentleman, which tho' it prov'd to her Diſhonour, ſhe did it for her Security.

In the following Year great Complaints were rais'd, that the Engliſh Merchants were injuriouſly treated both in Spain and the Netherlands, upon Pretence of civil Differences, but chiefly out of Hatred to the Proteſtant Religion. Upon which the Engliſh remov'd their Mart or Staple of Engliſh Cloaths and Commodities to Emden in Freezland. At this Time Camden aſſures us, that the Commerce between England and the Netherlands amounted to above twelve Millions of Ducats, and the Engliſh Cloaths alone to five. Therefore Goiſman the Spaniſh Agent, finding the great Damages that the Netherlands ſuſtain'd by theſe Differences, us'd all Methods to compoſe them; and upon that Affair the Viſcount Montague, Nicholas Wotton, and Walter Haddon Maſter of the Requeſts, were ſent to Bruges in Flanders; who after many Interruptions, brought the Affair at laſt to a tollerable Agreement. A. D. 1564. Reg. 6/7. Foreign Trade regulated.

But a greater Affair ſtill was tranſacted this Year: For when the Heat of the War between England and France was rather imperfectly ſmother'd, than intirely extinguiſh'd, Queen Elizabeth, having been ungratefully treated by the French Proteſtants, reſolv'd no longer to hazard her own Safety to ſecure other Mens, and began to entertain cool and ſerious Thoughts as to a Peace. This was negotiated by Sir Thomas Smith, a Perſon of great Senſe and Conduct; and Throgmorton, who was a kind of a Priſoner at large in France, was join'd with him in the ſame Commiſſion. France ſubmitted the Matter to the Management of the Biſhop of Orleans and the chief Secretary; who in April concluded a Peace at Troyes in Champain: The Subſtance of which was 'That 'there ſhould be a free Trade on both Sides; and no Rebels to be ſhelter'd, 'nor no Letters of Repriſal to be granted: That the Reſervation of all Rights, 'Titles, Claims and Demands, ſhall remain on both Sides ſafe and intire. That 'a certain Sum of Mony ſhall be paid to the Queen of England, at appointed 'Times: That the Hoſtages, for the Reſtoration of Calais, ſhould be return'd 'from England, upon the Payment of ſix hundred and twenty thouſand Crowns; 'and Throgmorton ſhould be at full Liberty. This Peace was ratify'd by Oath, both from the Crowns of England and France; and the French ſhew'd many ſignal Inſtances of their Joy and Satisfaction; and not long after the French King was inveſted with the noble Order of the Garter from England, with all the uſual Ceremonies and Solemnities. A Peace concluded with France.

Camden. Heylin. IV. A general Peace being thus eſtabliſh'd, the Queen was at leiſure to take ſome particular View of her Kingdom, and accordingly went in Progreſs to enjoy the Pleaſures of the Country, and viſited the Univerſity of Cambridge. There ſhe was receiv'd with the higheſt Marks of Honour, and entertain'd with Tragedies, Commedies and Scolaſtical Diſputations. She view'd every College, and in a Latin Oration of her own, acknowledg'd their Civilities, commended their Plenty and Variety of good Learning, and recommended the Study of it to their firſt and greateſt Care, with a Promiſe that ſhe would be always ready to promote and incourage them. At this Time, as Doctor Heylin informs us, were unhappily ſown the Seeds of thoſe Diviſions, which have ever ſince diſtracted the Church of England. For it happen'd that Mr. Preſton of King's-College, and Mr. Cartwright of Trinity-College, were appointed for two in the Divinity Diſputation; in which the firſt, by reaſon of his graceful Perſon and Demeanour, was both lik'd and rewarded by the Queen, while the other receiv'd neither Reward nor Commendation: Which, according to this Author, ſo incens'd this proud and opiniated Man, that he retir'd to Geneva, where being throughly inform'd of the Doctrine and Diſcipline of that Eſtabliſhment, he return'd home with a Deſign to repair his Credit, or to gain himſelf a Name, by raiſing ſuch Flames in the Church, as could not be extinguiſh'd but by the immediate Hand of Heaven. The Queen viſits Cambridge. The Beginnings of Presbitery in England.

At the Queen's Return, she began farther to advance her mighty Favourite Robert Dudley, the Master of her Horse; who now was made Baron Denbigh, and had receiv'd all the Possessions belonging to the Honour; and to recommend him to the Favour of the Queen of Scotland, he was the next Day made Earl of Leicester, which Honour was conferr'd upon him with the greatest State and Solemnity that ever was known. Bohun. Drake.

The Character of the Earl of Leicester.

This prodigious Man was now in the Verdure and most flow'ring Spring of his Youth, of a graceful Behaviour, a stately Carriage, a beautiful Face, a modest and grave Look, and in outward shew of a pleasant and easie Disposition; and being endow'd with all those flattering Accomplishments the City and Court could produce, he had insinuated himself into the Favour and Familiarity of the Queen, by his specious shews of Loyalty, Industry and Vigilance in her Service, and long manag'd the greatest Station in the Court, and was reputed the prime Minister of State. His Brother Ambrose, who was made Earl of Warwick, was Heir to the Estate, but he to the Abilities of his Family; for he had all the Arts and Policies of his Father: He was the most reserv'd Man of that Age, who saw all, and was invisible himself; carying a Depth not to be fathom'd but by the Searcher of Hearts. He became afterwards sullen to his Superiors, haughty to his Equals, insolent to his Inferiors, ungrateful to his Friends, and pernicious to his Enemies; and in a Word, insupportable to all but the Queen. He put himself forwards, and assum'd the distant Employments of Peace and War; was continually working to find the Studies, Abilities, Forces and Dispositions of other Men; and so great was his Application and Parts, that he rarely miscarry'd in his Enquiries. He by his Interest advanc'd his Dependants, Kindred and Relations, to all Honours and Employments; and when he found the Opportunity, he as craftily sold his Mistress's Favours, and the Employments he had taken from others. He had by his subtle Projects and Counsels ingross'd all the Rewards of Virtue, Riches, Honours, Attendants, and the first Place of Minister of State; and he manag'd them, and liv'd without any Religion towards God, or Fidelity to Men, making it his great Design to cover all Things with Luxury, Cruelties and Rapines. For a considerable Time few were call'd to the Council-Table, or admitted to Titles of Honour, but by his Commendation and Procurement; so that he seem'd not so much to be the Queen's particular Favourite, as her Partner in the Soveraign Power, and was accordingly courted and revered by the rest of the Nobility. If we may believe some Mens Characters of him, he had all the Tyranny, Insolence and most aspiring Ambition of the worst of Favourites, and all the Luxury, Treachery, and most abominable Villanies of the worst of Men; and Queen Elizabeth, with all her Virtues and Excellencies, was scarce able to secure her self from being made infamous and unfortunate by the monstrous Wickedness of this Earl.

Having his Honours heap'd upon him, in order to gain the Favour of the Queen of Scotland, he immediately accus'd the Lord Keeper Bacon to the Queen, as having interpos'd in the Succession of Scotland, and being privy to a Book in which Hales endeavour'd to derive the Title of the Crown of England to the House of Suffolk, in case the Queen dy'd without Issue. Hereupon Hales was committed to the Tower; but Bacon, tho' he deny'd it, was with much Difficulty restor'd to Favour by the Means of Cecil, who in this Point kept his Judgment first lock'd within his Breast, and so always resolv'd to do, Unless the Queen her self commanded him to deliver it. These Transactions were not hid from the Queen of Scotland, who to prevent any English Designs, sent for Matthew Stuart Earl of Lenox, who had marry'd Margaret Douglas, Neece to King Henry the Eighth by his Eldest Sister, and had been kept as an Exile in England for twenty Years. That Queen invited him into Scotland, under Pretence of restoring him to his ancient Patrimony; but in Reality to confer with him about a Marriage with his Son the Lord Darnly; for he being reputed Heir to the Crown of England, next to her self, she thought by matching ing with his Son, to ſtrengthen her own Title, and to prevent the Hopes of others. Queen Elizabeth, upon earneſt Sollicitation, gave the Earl leave to go; but ſoon after ſuſpecting the Scotch Queen's Intentions, by way of Prevention, ſhe ſent Sir Thomas Randolph, to remonſtrate to her, 'That if ſhe 'proceeded in the Match, ſhe would exceedingly injure her ſelf; for it was ſo 'highly diſlik'd by the Engliſh, that ſhe was forc'd to prorogue her Parliament, 'to prevent ſomething being enacted againſt her Right of Succeſſion: But if ſhe 'would marry the Earl of Leiceſter, ſhe ſhould then be declar'd next Heir to 'England in Parliament: Hereupon, in November, the Earl of Bedford and Sir Thomas Randolph for Queen Elizabeth, the Earls of Murray and Liddington for Queen Mary, at Berwick enter'd into a Treaty concerning the Marriage with the Earl of Leiceſter. The Engliſh Commiſſioners urg'd the great Benefits that this Match would bring to the Queen of Scotland, and her whole Kingdom: On the other ſide the Scotch alledg'd the great Diſparagement it would be to their Queen, if after her Refuſal of ſo many honourable Matches, ſhe ſhould condeſcend to ſo mean a Perſon as the Earl of Leiceſter. This Affair was long depending, partly becauſe the Engliſh Commiſſioners were ſo inſtructed by Queen Elizabeth; and partly becauſe the Scotch Commiſſioners had a Deſire to hinder their Queen from all Matches; and partly becauſe the Earl of Leiceſter, having ſtill Hopes of obtaining Queen Elizabeth, by ſecret Letters warn'd the Earl of Bedford, not too much to urge the Marriage with the Queen of Scotland, but privately to favour the Lord Darnly.

Spotſwood. Melvil. &c.

This Affair being thus protracted for a long Space, the Queen of Scotland, impatient of longer Delays, found Means to obtain Leave of Queen Elizabeth, that the Lord Darnly might go into Scotland, only for three Months, to be a Partner of his Father's Reſtoration. Accordingly in February he came to Edinburgh; and being a Gentleman of nineteen Years of Age, of a beautiful and noble Preſence, and of a fine and ſweet Diſpoſition, the Queen immediately fell in Love with him: Yet modeſtly diſſembling her Thoughts, ſhe firſt ſent to procure a Diſpenſation from Rome, becauſe of their nearneſs in Conſanguinity. And now her Inclination being grown ſo apparent, that ſhe could no longer conceal it, ſhe ſent Liddington to Queen Elizabeth to deſire her Conſent. But ſhe, by the ſly Suggeſtions of the Earl of Murray, being induc'd to believe, that the Scotch Queen deſign'd by this Marriage both to gain the Crown of England, and to introduce Popery, enter'd into Conſultation with her Privy-Council, how to hinder the Match. Here it was concluded, that the moſt effectual Means were: Firſt to have a ſufficient Number of Soldiers for Terror's ſake about the Borders of Scotland: Next to impriſon the Counteſs of Lenox, Mother to the Lord Darnly, and to recall the Earl and his Son from Scotland, upon Pain of the Loſs of all their Poſſeſſions in England: Then that thoſe Scots who were known to be averſe to the Marriage, ſhould be reliev'd and aſſiſted: And laſtly, that Catharine Gray, with the Earl of Hartford, ſhould be receiv'd into ſome Favour, as being the only Perſons whom the Queen of Scotland eſteem'd as her Co-Rivals in the Succeſſion. Hereupon Sir Nicholas Throgmorton was ſent to the Queen of Scotland to adviſe her in the Queen's Name not to proceed in the Marriage, and to ſhew her the numerous Inconveniences that would ariſe from it. But ſhe anſwer'd, That the Matter was too far gone to be recall'd, and that the Queen of England had no cauſe to be diſpleas'd, ſince ſhe had now follow'd her former Advice, Not to match with a Foreigner but an Engliſhman born.

A. D. 1565. Reg. 7 ℔.

The Queen of Scots falls in love with the Lord Darnly.

Queen Elizabeth endeavours to hinder the Marriage.

Queen Elizabeth being inform'd of this Anſwer, immediately call'd home the Earl of Lenox, and the Lord Darnly his Son, commanding them upon their Allegiance to return: The Father modeſtly excus'd himſelf by Letters; and the Son humbly begg'd of her not to be a Hindrance to his Preferment, which he vow'd to employ in her Majeſty's Service, to the utmoſt of his Power. And now to make him a more proper Match, the Scotch Queen firſt honour'd him with with Knighthood; then with the Dignities of the Lord Armanack, Earl of Roſſe, and Duke of Rothſay; which Dukedom by Birth belongs to the eldeſt Sons of the Kings of Scotland. After this, before he had been five Months in Scotland, ſhe marry'd him; and with the Conſent of many of the Peers, declar'd him King. Never did a Marriage prove more calamitous to the Parties themſelves, more diſhonourable to the Nation, or finally more ſcandalous to both Religions; and fortunate in nothing but the Birth of James the Sixth, who became the firſt Governor of both Kingdoms. Upon this the Earl of Murray and his Party were extreamly inrag'd, and began to move turbulent Queſtions, 'As whether it was lawful to admit a Popiſh King? Whether the 'Queen of Scotland could chuſe a Husband at her own Pleaſure? And whether 'the Peers of the Kingdom might not of their own Authority impoſe one upon 'her? But however they took up Arms, and had diſturb'd the Nuptials, but that the Queen levy'd an Army to oppoſe them; with which ſhe purſu'd them ſo cloſely, that they were forc'd to fly into England for Protection; where Queen Elizabeth made no ſcruple to receive them, ſince the Scotch Queen had before receiv'd Yaxley, Standon and Walſh, who were fled out of England. The politick Queen of England, tho' expreſſing an open Diſpleaſure, was not much troubled at the Marriage; partly becauſe of the mild Diſpoſition of the Lord Darnly, and the ſmall Acceſs of Strength it brought to the Queen of Scotland; but chiefly becauſe ſhe ſaw that great Troubles would ariſe in Scotland about it, which would certainly promote the Quiet of England, which, as the true Mother of her Country, was the principal Thing ſhe endeavour'd.

The Queen of Scots Marriage with the Lord Darnly.

Troubles ariſe upon it in Scotland.

Upon this Marriage, thoſe for the Proteſtant Intereſt in England, thought nothing could more effectually promote that End, than if Queen Elizabeth would be pleas'd to marry her ſelf, and ſo defeat all the Queen of Scotland's Hopes as to the Succeſſion. And very ſeaſonably for that Purpoſe, the Emperor Maximilian did now renew his former Suit for his Brother Charles of Auſtria, by his Ambaſſador Adam Smircorite. The Propoſal was much oppos'd by the proud Earl of Leiceſter, and as much promoted by the brave Earl of Suſſex, who was almoſt the only Man who durſt withſtand him: Which occaſion'd ſo great a Conteſt between them, that the Court became divided into Parties and Factions; and the Earls, whenever they went abroad, carry'd vaſt Retinues of armed Servants. But after a few Days the Queen interpos'd and reconcil'd them, or rather occaſion'd them to ſmother their Reſentments. As for the Feuds of the Nobility, and that vulgar Motto, Divide & Impera, now us'd as a mock Phraſe, the good Queen utterly condemn'd; as being of Opinion, that the Force of Authority lay moſt in the ready Inclinations of ſuch as were to obey. Every thing ſhe ſaid or did was worthy of her ſelf; and her Praiſes reſounding in all Kingdoms of the North and Weſt, did now invite Cecily, Siſter to the King of Sweden, and Wife to the Marqueſs of Baden, to undertake a tedious Journey both by Sea and Land, from the furtheſt Parts of the North, to ſee the Splendor of her Court, and obſerve the Wiſdom of her Government. While ſhe was at the Engliſh Court ſhe was deliver'd of a Son, to whom, in Requital of her Kindneſs, the Queen was God-Mother, and gave him the Name of Edward Fortunatus, beſides an annual Penſion to her and her Huſband. At this Time alſo, for the great Fame of her Wiſdom, Donald Mac-Carty, a great Potentate of Ireland, came and deliver'd into her Hands his ample Territories; and then receiv'd them again to hold them to him and his Heirs, and for want of ſuch to revert to the Queen. She likewiſe in Requital inveſted him with the Honour of Earl of Glencarn, and his Son with the Baron of Valence; and beſides many Preſents given him, ſhe paid the Charges of his Journey.

A. D. 1561. Reg. 8/9. To add to the Reputation of this mighty Queen, in the Beginning of the following Year Charles King of France ſent his Ambaſſador Ramboulet into England, with the Robes and Ornaments of the Order of St. Michael, to beſtow ſtow on which two of her Nobility ſhe pleas'd. She made choice of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Leiceſter, the one for his Nobility, and the other out of Amity; and accordingly they were inveſted with that Honour which had never been conferr'd upon any Engliſh Man, but Henry the Eighth, Edward the Sixth, and Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, tho' afterwards proſtituted with too little Diſtinction. After this the Queen took her Progreſs into the Country for her Recreation; and to ſhew her ſelf no leſs favourable to the Muſes at Oxford, than ſhe had been at Cambridge, ſhe made a Viſit to that Univerſity; where ſhe receiv'd a magnificent Entertainment, and ſtaid ſeven Days. She was extreamly delighted with the Pleaſantneſs of the Place, the Beauty of the Colleges, and the Wit and Learning of the Students, who diverted her in the Days with curious Diſputations, and at Nights with Tragedies and Comedies: For which ſhe with great Sweetneſs return'd them her Thanks in a Latin Oration, and took of them and the Place a moſt gracious Farewel.

The Order of St. Michael ſent over to her.

Beſides the Diverſions of this Year, the Queen was entertain'd with ſomething of another Nature, which gave her a Mixture of Diſquiet and Curioſity; which was the News of the Scotch Queen's Delivery of a Son, upon the nineteenth Day of June, brought her by Sir James Melvil. With all her Spirit and Greatneſs ſhe ſecretly envy'd her Rival the Honour of being a Mother before her; and could not conceal her Uneaſineſs from ſome of her Ladies, ſaying, The Queen of Scotland has brought forth a Prince, but I am a barren Tree. Yet ſhe diſpatch'd away Sir Henry Killegrew to congratulate her ſafe Delivery, and the Birth of an Heir: And being afterwards deſir'd to be God-Mother to the Royal Infant, ſhe readily ſent over the Earl of Bedford, with a noble Preſent of a Golden Font; but expreſly commanded, that neither he, nor any Engliſh Man in his Company, ſhould give the Title of King to the Lord Darnly. On the fifteenth Day of December, the Baptiſm was ſolemniz'd with great Pomp and Ceremony, and the Prince was publickly proclaim'd by his Names and Titles, CHARLES JAMES, Prince and Steward of Scotland, Duke of Rothſay, Earl of Carrick, Lord of the Iſles, and Baron of Renfrew.

The Birth of King James in Scotland.

But before this paſs'd, the Parliament of England met, after it had been ſeveral Times prorogu'd from the Year 1563. They ſoon fell into a warm Debate upon the ſubject Matter of the Succeſſion, and moving the Queen to marry; in which Points ſome proceeded ſo far as to accuſe the Queen, as one diſregarding Poſterity; to defame Cecil with Libels and Reproaches, as a great Counſellor in this Matter, but above all to curſe Dr. Huic, her Phyſician, who was thought to diſſuade her from Marriage, on Pretence of ſome ſecret Impediment. At length in the Houſe of Lords it was agreed, that the Lord-Keeper Bacon, ſhould in all their Names humbly beſeech the Queen to marry; and withal to declare a Succeſſor to the Crown, in caſe ſhe dy'd without Iſſue: For which he gave her many Reaſons, 'Laying open the great Miſchiefs that threat-'en'd the Kingdom, if ſhe ſhould die before a Succeſſor was appointed. But in the Houſe of Commons, Bell and Mouſon, two great Lawyers, and ſome others, proceeded to bolder Expreſſions, and a Diſparagement of the Queen's Authority, declaring, 'That Princes were oblig'd to appoint a Succeſſor; and 'in refuſing to do it, the Queen would ſhew her ſelf no better than a Parricide 'of her Country. The Queen was contented to bear Words ſpoken in Parliament, which ſhe would not have indur'd in another Place: But not willing to expoſtulate the matter with the whole Body, ſhe commanded thirty of the Upper Houſe, and as many of the Lower, ſhould attend her; whom ſhe qualify'd with the moſt obliging Expreſſions; and after a Reproof that carry'd a Sweetneſs mix'd with Majeſty, ſhe diverted them from their Reſolutions, promiſing them not only the Care of a Prince, but the Tenderneſs of a Mother. And whereas the Parliament had offer'd extraordinary Subſidies, on Condition ſhe would declare her Succeſſor, ſhe utterly refus'd thoſe unuſual Grants, accepted cepted of an ordinary Sum, and then remitted the fourth Part of what was granted, generously declaring, That Mony in her Subjects Purses, was as good as in her own Exchequer. And on the last Day of the Parliament, she made such an affectionate Speech to both Houses, as stifl'd all Commotions; which were so setled and compos'd by Time, that few but Malecontents and Seditious Persons appear'd sollicitous in the Business of a Successor.

Episcopacy Establish'd.

During this Parliament, besides other things for the publick Advantage, by Reason of the unjust Pretences of Benner, and some others, it was unanimously declar'd, 'That the Election, Consecration, Confirmation and Instalment of 'Arch-Bishops and Bishops of England, were Lawful; and that the said Bi-'shops were duly elected and consecrated according to the Laws and Statutes of 'the Land. And it was likewise enacted, that both they, and such as should 'be hereafter consecrated, were and should be esteem'd as rightly and duly con-'secrated, notwithstanding any former Law or Canon to the contrary. And thus the Church of England, as it were, had its finishing Stroke; and had all the necessary Advantages of a Human, as well as a Heavenly Establishment: And now having finish'd all Business, the Parliament was dissolv'd on the se-cond Day of January.

The Parliament dissolv'd.

A. D. 1567. Reg. 2/10.

V. The great Queen of England, and her Kingdom, were now in a happy and flourishing Condition; but the Scots and their Queen began at this Time to fall into infinite Troubles and Distractions; the Rise of which, among others, proceeded from the ambitious Earl of Murray. This Man was the natural Son of King James the Fifth, and so the base Brother of the Queen; made at first Prior of St. Andrews, but not pleas'd with that Religious Title, he rather affected some Temporal Honour. This being deny'd him when the Queen was in France, he in a sullen manner return'd into Scotland, where by the Advice of Knox, whom he esteem'd a great Patriarch, he so manag'd Affairs, that in an Assembly of the States, the Religion was alter'd, and the French banish'd out of Scotland. Yet as soon as the Queen was a Widow, he hasten'd into France, and so ingratiated himself with her, that she created him Earl of Murray, and promoted him to an honourable Marriage. Being thus exalted, he return'd into Scotland; where to sooth his ambitious Designs, he sow'd Seeds of Sedition, often complaining of the Miseries of a Female Government, and affirming, That Soveraignty was not to be confin'd to any Family or Kindred, but to Virtue alone, whether the Parties were Legitimate or not; by which he endeavour'd to make way for himself to the Kingdom. To this End he us'd all Methods to secure the Queen from marrying again; but that not succeeding, he was compell'd to fly into England; where notwithstanding, he still by his Agents found means to create Discord between her and her Husband. The Love that was so warm now daily diminish'd; and she that had so suddenly heap'd Honours upon him, was now as ready to withdraw them: For whereas in publick Acts, she was wont to place her Husband's Name first, now she caus'd it to be plac'd last, and in the Coining of Mony began to leave it quite out. This Unkindness between them was much fomented by one David Rizio, an Italian, whom the Queen had taken into her Service, first as a Musician, and afterwards as her Secretary for the French Tongue; and after that he became so much in Favour, that it reflected no small Dishonour upon the Queen, being often allow'd secret Conferences with her, when the King her Husband could not be admitted. The King himself, being much addicted to his Pleasures of Hunting and Hawking, did not so much resent this Indignity, as some Lords who were his Friends; who told him plainly, That it was not consistent with his Honour to suffer this insolent Man to live. Being fir'd with the Sense of Injury, at an appointed Time, the King with the Lord Ruthven and others with drawn Swords rush'd into the Queen's Appartment when she was at Supper; where finding Rizio at the same Table, he seiz'd upon on him, while he hung about the Queen's Waſte for Protection, and dragg'd him into another Chamber, where with many Wounds he was murther'd; the Queen being at that Time big with Child, and near miſcarrying with the Fright. This Fountain of Blood being open'd, a new Stream follow'd: For not many Months after, the King was firſt poiſon'd, and ſhortly after barbarouſly murther'd in his Bed at Midnight; and to make the Surprize the greater, the Houſe was blown up by Gun-powder, and his Body thrown out into an Orchard. And of the King.

The Rumour of this Murther being ſpread abroad, common Fame immediately laid it upon Murray, lately recall'd home, and upon Morton and Bothwell; and they on the other Side charg'd it upon the Queen: But we are not to give Credit to Buchanan's Account of it, who to ingratiate himſelf with the Earl of Murray, wrote moſt ſcandalouſly concerning the Queen; of all which he earneſtly repented and acknowledg'd before his Death. The King thus murther'd, and the Queen left alone to her ſelf, ſhe was ſoon adviſ'd to marry with ſome Perſon that might be able to aſſiſt her againſt all Oppoſers: James Hepburn, Earl of Bothwell, being then highly in her Favour, and eminent for his Courage and Valour; and tho' he was one who committed the Murther, yet he was by Murray and his Confederates recommended to the Queen. To this Motion, as being deſtitute of Friends, and not knowing whom to truſt in theſe dangerous Times, ſhe at laſt conſented; but upon theſe Conditions, that above all Things, Reſpect ſhould be had to her young Son; and that Bothwell ſhould firſt be legally acquitted both from the King's Murther, and from the Obligation of his former Marriage. Hereupon a Project was contriv'd, by which Bothwell was formally call'd to the Bar; and Morton being his Advocate, and Lenox his chief Accuſer not daring to appear, he was fully acquitted by Sentence of the Judges. Upon this he was created Duke of Orkney, and by the Conſent of ſeveral of the Nobility, was precipitately marry'd to the Queen; which Action increas'd the Suſpicion of many, that the Queen was an Acceſſary in the Murther, the Belief of which was the only thing they intended by the Marriage. This Suſpicion being blown up to the Heighth, Murray politickly retir'd to France; and the ſame Perſons who had acquitted Bothwell, and gave him their Conſents to marry the Queen, immediately took up Arms againſt him. But ſtill they gave him ſecret Notice to provide for himſelf; both to prevent his Diſcovering the Plot, if once taken, and alſo to make uſe of his Flight, the more plauſibly to charge the Queen with her Husband's Murther. After that they proceeded ſo far as to ſeize on her Perſon, and treated her after the moſt contemptuous Manner, and allowing her but ordinary Cloathing, they impriſon'd her at Loch-Levin, and put her into the Cuſtody of Murray's Mother; who having been Miſtreſs to James the Fifth, inſulted over the captiv'd Queen's Misfortunes, and boaſted that ſhe was the lawful Wife of King James, and that her Son Murray was his Legitimate Iſſue. All theſe Miſeries did King James bring upon his Kingdom, and unfortunate Daughter, by breaking the Precepts of Heaven with one Woman; the common Effects of unlawful Love in Princes and great Men, and naturally more fatal than in inferior Perſons. The Queen marries the Earl of Bothwell. She is made a Priſoner.

When Queen Elizabeth had Notice of this unexpected Revolution, ſhe ſent Sir Nicholas Throgmorton into Scotland to expoſtulate with the Confederates, concerning this ſtrange Uſage of their Queen, and to conſult by what means ſhe might recover her Liberty. Throgmorton found the Confederates more inſolent than had been reported: Being divided in their Opinion concerning their Proceedings with the Queen, ſome adviſ'd to have her perpetually baniſh'd into England or France; others, to have her examin'd before the Judges, committed to perpetual Cuſtody, and her Son proclaim'd King: But ſome, more inhuman, would have her at once depriv'd of Regal Authority and Life; and this was the Doctrine of Knox, and ſome other Miniſters, in their Pulpits. Throgmorton on the other Side, 'Alledg'd many Paſſages out of the Scriptures con- Queen Elizabeth interpoſes by her Agent Throgmorton.

'cerning Obedience to the higher Powers, and maintain'd, that the Queen was 'ſubject to no Tribunal under Heaven; that there was no Office nor Juriſdiction in Scotland, but was deriv'd from her Authority, and revokable at her 'Pleaſure. They again oppos'd, 'The peculiar Right of the Kingdom of Scot-'land; and that in extraordinary Emergencies, extraordinary Decrees muſt be 'made; borrowing the Arguments of Buchanan, who at that time wrote a Dialogue, in which he endeavour'd to prove, that the People have Power both to create and depoſe their King. After long Debates, all that Throgmorton could gain from them was a Writing without any Subſcription, in which they proteſted, 'They had ſecur'd the Queen for no other Deſign, but to keep her 'from Bothwell, whom ſhe lov'd ſo deſperately, that to enjoy him, ſhe regar-'ded not all their Ruins; deſiring him to reſt ſatisfy'd with this Anſwer, 'till 'the reſt of the Peers could meet. And notwithſtanding all his Arguments, they brought the Queen to a more ſevere Reſtraint, tho' in the humbleſt Manner ſhe beſought them to deal more gently with her, and let her but once have a Sight of her Son; which would not be granted her. At length, when civil Perſuaſions would not prevail to make her freely reſign her Kingdom, they openly threaten'd her to bring her to a publick Trial for Incontinence, Muther, and Tyranny; ſo that through Fear of Death, ſhe was compell'd, unheard, to ſet her Hand to three Inſtruments: By the Firſt of which, ſhe reſign'd the Crown to her Son, then ſcarce thirteen Months old: By the Second, ſhe conferr'd the Regency upon Murray, during the Minority of her Son: In caſe he refus'd it, the Third conferr'd that Power upon the Duke of Chaſtel-Herault, with the Earls of Argyle, Lenox, Athol, Morton, Glencarn and Marre. Next ſhe repreſented to the Queen of England, that ſhe reſign'd upon Force, and by the Counſel of Throgmorton, who told her that ſuch an extorted Reſignation was void of it ſelf.

Five Days after this Reſignation, Charles James the Queen's young Son was anointed and crown'd King, by the Name of James the Sixth; and John Knox preach'd the Coronation Sermon: And the Hamiltons enter'd a Proteſtation, that it ſhould not prejudice the Title of the Duke of Chaſtel-Herault to the Succeſſion, in Oppoſition to the Houſe of Lenox. But Queen Elizabeth forbid Throgmorton to be preſent at the Solemnity, leſt ſhe might be thought to give Countenance to this uncommon Proceeding by the Appearance of her Ambaſſador. Fifteen Days after, Murray himſelf return'd out of France into Scotland, and ſhortly repair'd to the Queen with ſome other of the Confederates, who charg'd her with many heavy Crimes, and urg'd her, as ſhe tender'd her Life and Honour, to obſerve theſe Preſcriptions: 'Not to diſturb the Peace 'of the Kingdom, nor deſire to be at Liberty: Not to excite the Queen of 'England, or the King of France to infeſt Scotland with any foreign or do-'meſtick War; nor to think any more of Bothwell's Love, or mediate any Re-'venge upon Bothwell's Adverſaries. Murray being now proclaim'd Regent of Scotland, bound himſelf under his Hand and Seal to act nothing concerning War or Peace, the King's Perſon or his Marriage, or the Liberty of the Queen, without the Conſent of the Confederates; and then gave Throgmorton Notice by Lydinton, not to make any further Interceſſion for the Queen's Liberty, for he and the reſt were reſolv'd to run the utmoſt Hazards rather than conſent to it. Shortly after he executed John Hepburn, Daglaſh, and ſome other of Bothwell's Servants, for being concern'd in the Murther of the King. But they, contrary to Expectation, when ready to die, moſt ſolemnly proteſted, That Bothwell had told them, that Murray and Morton were the firſt Authors of the Murther. They freed the Queen from all Suſpicion; as did Bothwell himſelf afterwards, who when Priſoner in Denmark, both living and dying, declar'd the Queen was Innocent. And fourteen Years after, Morton going to Execution, confeſs'd that Bothwell had urg'd him to conſent to the Murther; but when he refus'd, unleſs he had the Queen's Hand for his Warrant, Both- well anſwer'd, That could not be, for the Fact was to be done without her Knowledge. But as to the unfortunate Queen, notwithſtanding all the Solicitations of the Queen of England, and the King of France, they could not procure her Liberty.

As to the French Affairs, the eight Years limited for the Delivery of Calais to the Engliſh were now expired; and Sir Thomas Smith, and Sir William Winter were ſent into France to demand it; but they ſo delay'd and protracted the Debate, that by Degrees it expired in Silence, by means of Civil Wars ariſing in France. And without doubt the French never deſign'd to reſtore it, for as ſoon as it was taken, they threw down the old Forts, and built others, let out the Houſes and Lands for fifty Years, and gave ſome away for ever. While this was Negotiating in France, Count Stolberg came into England from the Emperor Maximilian, to treat of the former deſign'd Marriage with the Arch-Duke Charles; about which the Queen had lately ſent the Earl of Suſſex to the Emperor; in which Service that Earl us'd his utmoſt Endeavours, that the Queen might be marry'd to a Prince, and Leiceſter be diſappointed of his Hopes. Nothing was more frequently ſaid by Suſſex than that a Foreign Prince was to be preferr'd before the nobleſt Engliſh Man, whether we reſpect Honour, Power or Riches. Inſomuch that one of the other Party pleaſantly reply'd, That where thoſe three only were regarded in Marriage, the World and the Devil were the Match-makers. Suſſex ſtaid five Months in Auſtria, and was honourably entertain'd at the Emperor's Charge; but many Difficulties ariſing about Religion, Maintenance, Titles, and the Succeſſion, time wore out thoſe Propoſals that had been ſeven Years making by honourable Mediators. The Arch-Duke not long after marry'd the Duke of Bavaria's Daughter; yet both he and the Emperor ever after continu'd a good Correſpondence with the Queen. About the ſame time Ambaſſadors came from Muſcovy with rich Furs of Sables, and the like, and made large Offers to the Queen which were accepted; from whence the Company of Ruſſia Merchants had its firſt Eſtabliſhment. With the Ambaſſadors, Anthony Jenkinſon return'd into England, who in his Travels had made curious Obſervations of Muſcovy or Ruſſia, ſet out a Geographical Deſcription of it, and was the firſt of the Engliſh that ſail'd through the Caſpian Sea. In the ſame Year, June the eighth, Sir Thomas Sackvile was created Baron of Buckhurſt.

The Duke of Auſtria revives his Suit.

The Ruſſia Company begun.

Having before paſs'd over the firſt Act of the Queen of the Scots Tragedy, we are now arriv'd at the ſecond; having been eleven Months detain'd Priſoner, by the Aſſiſtance of George Douglaſs, to whoſe Brother ſhe was committed, ſhe made her Eſcape from Loch-Levin to Hamilton's Caſtle. Here upon the Teſtimonies of Robert Melvil, and others, in an Aſſembly of a great Part of the Nobility, a Declaratory Sentence was pronounc'd, 'That the Re-'ſignation extorted from the Queen, during Confinement, was abſolutely void 'from the Beginning. Upon which Declaration great Multitudes repair'd to her, ſo that within two Days ſhe had gotten an Army of ſix thouſand Men; but when they ventur'd to join Battel with Murray, being raw and undiſciplin'd, they were ſoon defeated. In this melancholy Condition, the Queen to ſave her ſelf, travell'd threeſcore Miles in one Day, and by Night arriv'd at the Houſe of Maxwell Lord Heris; chuſing rather to commit her ſelf to the Mercy of the Sea, and the Protection of Queen Elizabeth, than to the Loyalty of her own Subjects. From hence ſhe ſent John Beton to the Queen of England, with a Diamond Ring, which ſhe had formerly receiv'd from her, as a Pledge of mutual Amity; intimating that ſhe would come into England, and implore her Protection, if her Subjects perſiſted in their Rebellious Hoſtilities. Queen Elizabeth promis'd her all the Love and Kindneſs of a Siſter; but before the Meſſenger was return'd, contrary to the Advice of her Friends, ſhe enter'd a ſmall Bark, and with the Lord Heris and Flemming, and a few others, landed at Wirkinton in Cumberland, upon the ſeventeenth Day of May. From hence ſhe immediately wrote Letters in French with her own Hand to the Queen, importing, 'That having providentially eſcap'd out of the Hands of her inſo-'lent and rebellious Subjects, ſhe was now come into England, upon ſure Con-'fidence of her approv'd Clemency; and therefore humbly requeſted, That ſhe 'might be forthwith conducted to her Preſence. Queen Elizabeth with Let-ters ſent by Sir Francis Knolles, kindly promis'd her Protection according to the Equity of her Cauſe; but deny'd her Acceſs, as being reputed guilty of many hainous Crimes, and gave command to have her brought to Carliſle, as a Place of greater Safety. The Scotch Queen receiving this Anſwer, and find-ing Acceſs deny'd her, by another Letter requeſted, 'That ſhe might have 'leave both to unfold the Injuries ſhe had receiv'd, and to anſwer the Crimes 'objected, in her own Preſence; humbly beſeeching her, That either ſhe might 'be admitted to have Conference and Aſſiſtance, or elſe have free Liberty to 'depart out of England, to gain Supplies elſe where, and not be detain'd Pri-'ſoner in Carliſle; ſince ſhe came voluntarily into England, relying upon the 'Love ſhe had ſo often profeſs'd.

The Queen of Scots eſcapes out of Priſon.

She is defeated.

She flies into England.

Upon theſe Letters Queen Elizabeth exceedingly commiſerated her unfor-tunate Condition, and could have yielded to admit her into her Preſence, but that her Counſellors conceiv'd it to be a Matter for mature Conſultation, how to act in ſuch a nice Caſe. To detain her in England, had many Miſchiefs attending it; to ſend her into France, as many; and to ſend her back into Scot-land, many more. Therefore in Concluſion, the Majority were of Opinion to have her detain'd, as one taken by Right of War, and not to be diſmiſs'd, 'till ſhe had made Satisfaction for aſſuming the Arms and Title of England, and for the Death of the Lord Darnly her Husband, who was born an Engliſh Subject. In the mean time Murray the Regent call'd a new Parliament in Scotland, in the King's Name, and proſcribed ſome of the Queen's Adherents, and ſeiz'd on their Poſſeſſions. At which the Queen of England being highly diſpleas'd, ſent him a ſharp Meſſage by Middlemore, 'That ſhe could not per-'mit the ſacred Authority of Princes to be held in ſuch Contempt, and ſub-'mitted to the Will of factious and rebellious People; and tho' they had forgot 'the Duty of Subjects, and their Loyalty to their Queen, yet ſhe could not 'be unmindful of any Office either of Piety or Kindneſs to her Siſter and 'Neighbour; and therefore commanded him to appear before her, and give 'an Account of his Actions.

The Queen of Scots detain'd in England.

Murray having no Means to maintain his Regency in Scotland, but what depended upon England, obey'd the Summons, and came to York, the Place appointed to determine this unuſual Affair. He brought with him ſeven of his intimate Friends, as Deputies for the Infant King, James Earl of Morton, Adam Biſhop of Orkney, Robert of Dunfermelin, Patrick Lord of Lindſey, James Mac-Gilly, Henry Balnaw, and George Buchanan; together with Lidington the Secretary. And the ſame Day came Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Ratcliff Earl of Suſſex, and Sir Ralph Sadler, a Privy-Counſellor, appointed Commiſſioners for Queen Elizabeth. For the Queen of Scotland there appear'd John Leſley Biſhop of Roſs, William Lord Levingſton, Robert Lord Boyd, Gawin of Kilwinin, John Gordon, and James Cockborn. Being met on the ſeventh of October, Lidington firſt freely adviſ'd his Coun-trymen, 'Maturely to conſider what Prejudice they would draw upon them-'ſelves, by publickly accuſing their own Queen before the Engliſh, who were 'profeſs'd Enemies to their Nation. Wherefore he thought they ought to deſiſt, 'unleſs the Queen of England would enter into a mutual and firm League, 'againſt all thoſe, who under this Pretence, ſhould endeavour to moleſt them. Upon his Speech the Deputies for the Queen of Scotland made Proteſtation, 'That tho' their Queen thought fit that the Cauſes between her and her diſ-'loyal Subjects ſhould be debated before the Engliſh; yet being a free Princeſs, 'ſhe did not thereby acknowledge her ſelf ſubject to the Soveraign Command 'of Commiſſioners meet at York to hear her Cauſe.

'of any. On the contrary the Engliſh proteſted, 'That they did in no wiſe 'admit of that Proteſtation, in Prejudice to the Right, which the Kings of En-'gland have anciently challeng'd as Superior Lords of the Kingdom of Scot-'land.

The next Day the Scotch Queen's Deputies ſet forth at large, 'The injuri-'ous Proceedings of Murray, Morton and others againſt the Queen, whom they 'had by the Fears of Death compell'd to reſign her Kingdom; which therefore 'was of no Force. Murray and his Adherents made Anſwer, 'That they had 'done nothing but by the Conſent of the Peers in Parliament; and that to pro-'ſecute Bothwell, the Author of the King's Murder, whom the Queen pro-'tected; and as for her Reſignation, it was a voluntary Act of her own. All this the Queen of the Scots Deputies anſwer'd and confuted, particularly affirm-ing, 'That of the hundred Earls, Biſhops and Barons that had Voices in Par-'liament, not above four Earls, one Biſhop, two Abbots, and ſix Barons, were 'preſent in that tumultuous Aſſembly: Wherefore they pray'd, That the 'Queen of England would conſider of theſe Indignities, and take ſome courſe 'for a ſpeedy Redreſs. After this ſome new Commiſſioners from Queen Eli-zabeth were added to the former, as Bacon, Arundell, Leiceſter, Clinton and Cecil; to ſome of whom the Scotch Queen took Exception, 'Unleſs the French 'and Spaniſh Ambaſſadors might be join'd with them, her ſelf admitted to the 'Preſence of the Queen and them, and Murray be oblig'd to appear before 'them, whom ſhe was able to prove the chief Agent in the Murder of her 'Husband Darnly. This was accounted a juſt Demand by ſome of the En-gliſh Commiſſioners; upon which Queen Elizabeth, with ſome Reſentment ſaid publickly, The Queen of Scotland would never want an Advocate while Norfolk was alive. After a long Agitation of this Affair, and nothing concluded, Murray, a little before his Return into Scotland, privately propounded the Mar-riage of the Scotch Queen with the Duke of Norfolk; which he with a mo-deſt Anſwer declin'd, as a thing full of Danger. But withal, Murray the more to alienate Queen Elizabeth's Mind, caus'd a Report, That the Scotch Queen had transferr'd her Right to the Crown of England to the Duke of Anjou, and that the Tranſaction was confirm'd at Rome: He alſo ſhew'd Letters which the Queen of the Scots had written to ſome intimate Friends, in which ſhe accus'd the Queen of England for not treating her according to Pro-miſe, and boaſted of Succours ſhe expected from others. The laſt Clauſe ſomewhat diſturb'd Queen Elizabeth, who could not conjecture from whence ſuch Succours ſhould come; ſince France with the Civil Wars, and the King of Spain in the Low-Countries had ſufficient Imployment at home. But at laſt the Secret broke out, that one Ridolph a Florentine, under the Habit of a Merchant in London, was ſuborn'd by Pope Pius the Fifth, to cauſe a ſecret Commotion of the Papiſts in England againſt the Queen, which he perform'd with extraordinary Privacy and Subtilty. Whereupon the Queen of Scotland was remov'd from Bolton Caſtle, where all the neighbouring People were Pa-piſts, to Tutbury, more towards the Heart of the Country, under the Cuſtody of the Earl of Shrewsbury. As this was very hard upon Queen Mary, ſo it was not a little unfortunate to Elizabeth; who deteſted the Inſolency of the Scotch Subjects for depoſing their Queen, yet durſt not permit one Act or Step towards her Reſtoration.

Murray propoſes a Match between the Queen of Scots and the Duke of Norfolk.

And indeed the Queen began now to meet with ſome Perplexities, both in Church and State; and the Peace of the former was diſturb'd by a twofold Ene-my: Thomas Harding, Nicholas Sanders and other Fugitive Romiſh Prieſts, took upon them by Authority from the See of Rome, to grant Abſolution to the Queen's Enemies, and to corrupt her Subjects in Point of Religion and Al-legiance. On the other ſide, Coleman, Button, Hallingham and Benſon open-ly call'd in Queſtion the Diſcipline of the Church of England, and endea-vour'd to reform it after the Geneva Pattern; and this Sect did greatly in-creaſe creaſe in a ſhort Time, by means of their reſolute Temper; the Negligence of ſeveral Biſhops, and the Favour of ſome Noblemen, who were thirſting after the Patrimony of the Church; and this Sect was ſoon known by the inviduous Name of Puritans. In all theſe Troubles the good Queen took care as much as poſſible to preſerve the Peace and Unity of the Church, as likewiſe to ſuccour all diſtreſſed Proteſtants in foreign Parts. For about the ſame Time the Guiſes in France, and the cruel Duke of Alva in the Netherlands, began to endeavour the utter Extirpation of the Proteſtant Religion. In France, the Miniſters of the Goſpel were commanded to depart the Kingdom within a limited Time; when the Queen forgetting the unſteadineſs of the Proteſtants at Haure-de-Grace, once again took them into her Protection, generouſly ſupply'd them with two hundred thouſand Crowns in Mony, beſides Ammunition in Abundance, and with great Humanity receiv'd ſuch as fled into England; and the readier, becauſe they made ſolemn Proteſtation, That they did not take up Arms againſt their Prince, but only ſtood upon their own Defence. In the Netherlands, the Duke of Alva breathing nothing but Slaughter and Blood, and ſowing the Seeds of a long and dangerous War, great Numbers of the Inhabitants fled into England as into a Sanctuary. Theſe were kindly receiv'd, and by the Queen's Permiſſion, they ſeated themſelves at Norwich, Colcheſter, Sandwich, Maidſtone and Southampton, to the great Benefit and Advantage of the Engliſh Nation: For they were the firſt that brought into the Kingdom the Art of making thoſe ſlight Stuffs, call'd Bays and Says, and other Linnen and Woollen Manufactures of the ſame kind.

Queen Elizabeth aſſiſts the Proteſtants in France, and in the Netherlands.

About the ſame Time a mighty Maſs of Mony borrow'd from the Genoeſe, and other Italian Merchants, was ſent out of Spain into the Netherlands, there to be imploy'd in Bank; which being brought by Shipping, was purſu'd by the French, and forc'd to fly for Succour into the Engliſh Havens, whom the Queen commanded to be protected, as conceiving the Mony to belong to the King of Spain. But at the ſame Time, Cardinal Odeſte coming out of France into England, and giving Information to the Queen, That the Mony did not belong to the King of Spain, but to certain Italian Merchants, from whom the Duke of Alva had taken it againſt their Will, with a Deſign to employ it to the Ruin of the Proteſtants; ſhe reſolv'd to borrow it of the Merchants, and give Security for it, as Princes uſually do of Goods found in their Ports, and as the Spaniard himſelf had often done. The Detaining this Mony gave Occaſion to the Duke of Norfolk, and ſeveral of the prime Nobility, to ſhew their ſecret Hatred againſt Sir William Cecil; whom they envy'd for his great Favour with the Queen, and upon a Suſpicion that he inclin'd to the Houſe of Suffolk in the Matter of the Succeſſion. Hereupon they ſecretly conſpir'd to throw him into the Tower; and Throgmorton, his chief Emulator, ſuggeſted, That if he was once impriſon'd, they might ſoon find means to cruſh him: But the Queen, well knowing the Worth of ſuch a Miniſter, in due Time ſurpriz'd them, and by the Authority of her Royal Preſence, aw'd them out of theſe little Contrivances. But this Mony being detain'd caus'd a greater Diſturbance from the Duke of Alva, who upon Notice of it, ſeiz'd upon all the Goods of the Engliſh in the Netherlands, and kept the Men Priſoners: The Queen reſolutely did the like by the Low-Country Merchants, with much greater Advantage: Letters of Repriſal were granted on both ſides; which occaſion'd ſuch a Conteſt between the Nations, that being nouriſh'd and increas'd by ſucceeding Differences, it produc'd the famous Spaniſh Invaſion, that will be memorable to all future Ages.

Cecil in Danger.

The Beginnings of the Wars with Spain.

A. D. 1569. Reg. $\frac{11}{12}$.

The Scotch Affairs began more and more to create Troubles to England; and the Earl of Murray being return'd into Scotland, rais'd new Diſturbances in that Kingdom. He caus'd an Aſſembly to meet at Edinburgh, under Pretence of reſtoring the Queen to her Liberty; but as her Friends, Hamilton Duke of Chaſtel-Herault, who had been appointed her Vicegerent, and the Further Troubles in Scotland.

Lord Heris, were coming thither, he intercepted them, and threw them into Priſon; and immediately after, in open hoſtile Manner, he ſuppreſs'd all her chief Favourers. It is reaſonably thought, that this prevailing Earl could have willingly conſented to have the Queen freed from a Priſon; but he knew that her Liberty could not be effected without his Servitude: And Queen Elizabeth probably would gladly have had her reſtor'd to her Kingdom; but ſhe fear'd, That ſuch a Reſtoration would endanger her Security. And thus while both regarded their own Intereſts in the firſt Place, and hers but in the ſecond, ſhe had the Fortune to be pity'd, but not the Happineſs to be reliev'd: And all ſhe was able to do, was only to tye her Bonds the ſtronger; which by ſitting ſtill might have looſen'd of themſelves, but by moving would entangle her to her Ruin.

The Duke of Norfolk's Deſigns in marrying the Queen of the Scots.

The Duke of Norfolk's Intereſt being involv'd in that of this unfortunate Queen, his fatal Deſtiny began at this Time to operate. It was now ſtrongly reported that the Duke was to marry her in a ſhort Time; and in Reality Motions had actually been made, but the Buſineſs was not ſo forward as it was generally believ'd. It was firſt propos'd to the Duke of Norfolk, by the Biſhop of Roſs, and afterwards, in Pretence at leaſt, by Murray himſelf at Hampton-Court; but the Duke, before he would reſolve in the Matter, conſulted with ſeveral of the Nobility, and with Leiceſter himſelf, who all judg'd it proper for him to acquaint her Majeſty with it firſt, and then leave the Matter to her Pleaſure. Shortly after, Throgmorton meeting the Duke at Weſtminſter, adviſ'd him to move the Earl of Leiceſter himſelf to embrace the Match, ſince he had formerly ſu'd for it; but if he declin'd it, then at leaſt to take him along with him, for he believ'd that he alone would hardly be able to obtain the Queen's Conſent. Two Days after, Leiceſter himſelf propos'd the Matter to the Duke, and then communicated the ſame to the Earls of Arundel and Pembroke, who together with Throgmorton, wrote Letters to the Scotch Queen, recommending the Duke of Norfolk to her for a Husband. The Duke likewiſe wrote himſelf to her, with a particular Tender of his great Love and Reſpect to her. Upon this Articles were drawn, written by Leiceſter's own Hand, and ſent to the Scotch Queen; to which if ſhe conſented, they then promis'd to procure Queen Elizabeth's Approbation, that ſhe ſhould alſo be reinveſted in her Kingdom, and the Succeſſion be confirm'd to her. The Queen of Scotland readily accepted of the Terms, tho' her Husband Bothwell was alive, and a Priſoner in Denmark; and the Duke imparted the Matter to the Lord Lumley, and by Leiceſter's Conſent, afterwards to Secretary Cecil.

Queen Elizabeth oppoſes it.

The Report of this Marriage was ſoon brought to the Queen's Ears; which the Duke underſtanding, he earneſtly ſollicited the Earl of Leiceſter to have the Matter immediately propos'd to her Majeſty. Leiceſter treacherouſly made Delays, and pretended Cauſes to defer it; upon which Cecil fairly adviſ'd the Duke to go and acquaint the Queen with it himſelf; which Counſel Leiceſter oppos'd, promiſing to open it to the Queen, as ſhe went in her Progreſs. But while he with fair Words ſtill delay'd him, the Queen took the Duke to her Table at Farnham, and pleaſantly adviſ'd him to Beware upon what Pillow he laid his Head. After this, Leiceſter fell into a real, or pretended, Sickneſs at Titchfield; and when the Queen in a Viſit adviſ'd him to be of good Chear, he with Sighs and Tears crav'd Pardon for his Crime, and diſclos'd to her the whole Tranſaction, with all the Circumſtances. Upon which the Queen call'd the Duke into the Gallery, and ſharply reprimanded him for attempting ſuch a Marriage, without her Knowledge; and commanded him upon his Allegiance to deſiſt. The Duke made her a free and hearty Promiſe of Obedience; and added by Way of Slight to the Queen of Scotland, That his Revenues in England were not much leſs than hers in Scotland; and when he was at his Tennis-Court in Norwich, he thought himſelf not inferior to ſome Kings. But notwithſtanding, diſcovering the Queen's Anger by her Countenance, and finding finding Leiceſter in a manner alienated, and moſt of the Nobility cold and regardleſs of his Perſon, he became extreamly dejected, and immediately prepar'd to leave the Court; deſigning to ſtay at Norwich, 'till by his Friends Interceſſion, and his own ſubmiſſive Letters, the Queen's Heart might be mollify'd. At his Departure, the Queen with Indignation rejected the Scotch Ambaſſador, who ſu'd for the Enlargement of his Miſtreſs, adviſing Her to reſt ſatisfy'd, leſt ſhe ſaw ſome of her greateſt Supporters ſhorter by the Head. The Court was apprehenſive leſt the Duke ſhould raiſe a Rebellion; and if he did, it was thought the Queen of the Scots would ſuddenly be diſpatch'd. But returning again ſhortly after, and being examin'd concerning the Marriage, and his ſecret Conferences with the Biſhop of Roſs, he confeſs'd moſt of the Objections, and was committed to the Tower. Two Days after the Biſhop of Roſs was likewiſe examin'd, and together with Ridolph the Florentine, was deliver'd to the Cuſtody of Sir Francis Walſingham; and the Earl of Pembroke was confin'd to his Houſe and examin'd; but his Confeſſion was not committed to Writing, as being not able to write himſelf.

The Duke ſent to the Tower.

At this Time the Rumour of an Inſurrection in the North grew very ſtrong, by reaſon of ſome frequent Meetings between the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmorland, and others; who being for this commanded upon their Allegiance inſtantly to repair to the Queen, made dilatory Pretences, waiting indeed for Supplies, both from the Scots and the Duke of Alva. Whilſt the Earl of Northumberland continu'd in Suſpence, he was purpoſely frighted by his Friends, who in a tempeſtuous Night cry'd out, That an armed Power was ready to ſeize him, which caus'd him to riſe out of his Bed, and repair with all ſpeed to Branſpith, the Earl of Weſtmorland's Houſe, where great Numbers acquainted with the Enterprize were aſſembled. Here they broke out into an open Rebellion, being the firſt that had diſturb'd the publick Peace, after eleven Years Calm in this Reign. The chief Incendiary was Nicholas Morton a Romiſh Prieſt, ſent by the Pope to pronounce Queen Elizabeth an Heretick, and one that had forfeited all Right of Soveraignty, and immediately they publiſh'd a Writing, in which they declar'd, 'They took up Arms only to reſtore the 'Religion of their Fore-fathers, remove evil Counſellors from the Queen, and 'relieve the Duke of Norfolk, and other Loyal Noblemen now under Dif-'grace; but to the Queen they profeſs'd themſelves moſt dutiful Subjects. They alſo wrote Letters to the Papiſts throughout the Kingdom, requiring them to come to their Aſſiſtance; but they were ſo far from joining with them, that many ſent both the Letters and Bearers of them to the Queen; every one freely offering his Purſe and his Perſon againſt them, and particularly the Duke of Norfolk. So that from hence the Queen aſſuredly underſtood the great Affection of her Subjects towards her; and was not backward in acknowledging the Goodneſs of Heaven to her upon that Account.

A Rebellion in the North.

The Rebels, to the Number of four thouſand Foot and ſix thouſand Horſe, march'd directly to Durham, where they impiouſly tore and trampled upon all the Engliſh Bibles and Common-Prayer Books which they found in that Cathedral and other Churches: But when they underſtood that the Queen of Scotland, for whoſe Deliverance they took up Arms, was convey'd from Tutbury to Coventry; that the Earl of Suſſex had rais'd a powerful Army againſt them; that Sir George Bowes had a ſelect Party on their Rear, and that the Lord Scroop and the Earl of Cumberland had reinforc'd Carliſle, they return'd to Bernard Caſtle, beſieg'd and took it by Compoſition. On the ſame day they were Proclaim'd Traitors; Suſſex march'd againſt them with ſeven thouſand Men, accompany'd with the Earl of Rutland, the Lord Hunſdon, the Lord Evers, and the Lord Willoughby of Parham. Being advanc'd as far as Aukland, the Rebels fled in great Fear to Hexham, and afterwards through By-ways to Naworth Caſtle; where hearing that the Earl of Warwick and Clinton, Lord Admiral, purſu'd them with twelve thouſand Men, from the South

Parts

Parts of England, the two Earls with a ſmall Company, and unknown to their Confederates, withdrew themſelves into Scotland. Northumberland was deliver'd into the Hands of Murray; and Weſtmorland eſcap'd into the Netherlands, where he led a poor miſerable Life, even to old Age, living upon a ſlender Penſion from the Spaniards. The reſt being diſpers'd ſav'd themſelves, ſome by Flight, and ſome by hiding in ſecret Places. Threeſcore and ſix, for a Terror to others, were hang'd at Durham, and ſeveral at York and other Places. The two Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmorland, and about fifty more of the higher Birth were convicted of Treaſon, and preſcrib'd; but the reſt, who had no Eſtates, or had not fled the Land, were pardon'd. Thus happily ended this Rebellion; and Vitelli, Agent and Promoter from the Duke of Alva, before the Queen and Lords openly admir'd, but inwardly griev'd, that it was ſo ſuddenly and early extinguiſh'd, and that his coming into England was of no Effect.

The Rebels diſperſe themſelves.

Yet not long after, out of the Aſhes of this Rebellion there broke out another Flame at Nuworth in Cumberland, kindled by Leonard Dacres, Son to the Lord Dacres of Gilleſland, for the Deliverance of the Queen of Scotland. He was a Party with the Earls in their Rebellion; but they breaking out ſooner than he expected, and he at that Time being at the Court, and there tend'ring his Service to go againſt them, to that purpoſe he was ſent into his Country: But in his Journey, branding himſelf with Treachery and Diſloyalty, he conſulted with the Rebels; and encourag'd them to proceed; and by Virtue of a Letter of Credence from the Queen, he ſurpriz'd the Caſtle of Greyſtock, and other Houſes of the Dacres, and gather'd together an Army of three thouſand Men. He was attack'd by the Lord Hunſdon, whom he receiv'd with great Bravery; but being overcome, he fled into Scotland, from thence he croſs'd the Sea into Flanders, and dy'd in a miſerable Condition at Lovain; where he inherited his Father's Curſes laid upon him on his Death-Bed for his Diſobedience. The Lord Hunſdon having taken in the Caſtles, committed the Charge of them to the Duke of Norfolk's Men; and the Queen by publick Proclamation pardon'd the Multitude, whom their Leader had excited to Rebellion.

A ſecond Rebellion.

It is quell'd.

Tho' the Queen's Affairs were thus embroil'd with one Rebellion after another, yet ſhe was not at all regardleſs of the diſtreſſed Proteſtants in France: For ſtill ſhe excited the Proteſtant Princes to defend the common Cauſe, ſupply'd the Queen of Navarre with Mony, and gave leave to Henry Champernon to lead into France a hundred Engliſh Gentlemen, all brave Voluntiers; among whom was the famous Walter Rawleigh, a very young Man, who now began to launch into the World. The French King, to exhauſt the Treaſure of England, and turn the Stream into ſome other Channel, reſolv'd to raiſe a new War in Scotland againſt Queen Elizabeth, and deſign'd to ſend Sebaſtian Montigues with an Army into that Country; but he being kill'd at the Siege of St. John de Angeli, that Deſign vaniſh'd into Air. Nor was Ireland in this Year free from Rebellions, for Edmond and John Butler, Brothers to the Earl of Ormond, being aſſiſted by the Pope and the Spaniard, endeavour'd to re-eſtabliſh the Popiſh Religion, and to diſpoſſeſs Queen Elizabeth of the Kingdom of Ireland. To ſupport this Rebellion, Juan Mendoza was ſent privately out of Spain; and to put an End to it the Earl of Ormond went from England to that Kingdom, who being extreamly griev'd that any Plot ſhould fall upon his noble Family, perſuaded his Brothers to lay down their Arms, and ſubmit to the Queen's Mercy, and at his Requeſt their Pardons were granted, and the Rebellion ſoon ended.

VI. The Rebellions in England and Ireland being happily extinguiſh'd, new Accidents aroſe from Scotland, where Murray the Regent earneſtly endeavour'd to have the Queen of the Scots deliver'd into his Hands; and therefore to ingratiate himſelf with Queen Elizabeth by ſome meritorious Exploit, he march'd march'd into the Scotch Borders in queſt of the Engliſh Rebels, of whom he took ſeveral. But when he thought himſelf moſt ſecure, riding through the Streets in Lithgow, he was ſhot into the Bowels by one Hamilton, in a private Revenge for Injuries done to him, who immediately eſcap'd into France to avoid the Puniſhment. Spotſwood ſays his Death was greatly lamented by all good Men, having in a little above a Year quieted a broken and diſorder'd State; and was ſo remarkable for Devotion and Piety, that ever after he was call'd by the Title of The good Regent. However, as his Ambition was too aſpiring, ſo his Activity was too irregular to be vindicated; and Melvil was wont to tell him, He was like an unskilful Player in a Tennis-Court, ever running after the Ball, whereas an expert Artiſt would diſcern where it would light or rebound, and with ſmall Labour let it fall into his Racket.

Murray the Scotch Regent ſlain.

His Character.

After Murray's Death, the Kingdom being without a Regent, there aroſe many violent Diſorders; and Thomas Carre and Walter Scot, two principal Men in the Scotch Borders, and devoted to their Queen, made Inroads into England, waſting all Places with Fire and Sword; 'till by Forces ſent out of England, under the Command of the Earl of Suſſex, and the Lord Hunſdon, they were Defeated: In whoſe Purſuit, three hundred Villages were fir'd, and fifty Caſtles deſtroy'd. For theſe and other Services ſoon after, the Earl made ſeveral Knights, as Sir William Drury, Sir Thomas Mannors, Sir George Carie, and Sir Robert Conſtable; and now to prevent further Diſorders, the Lords of Scotland being ready to meet about the Election of a new Regent, they deſir'd Queen Elizabeth's Advice in the Matter: Her Anſwer was, That ſhe would not intermeddle in the creating a Regent, leſt ſhe might ſeem to prejudice their Queen, whoſe Cauſe was not yet decided. But ſoon after they choſe the Earl of Lenox, the King's Grandfather, to be Regent of Scotland, without any Oppoſition from Queen Elizabeth; who knew that out of natural Affection, he would be tender of his Grandſon, and affectionate to the Engliſh for the Civilities he had receiv'd; and doubted not his being at her Devotion, ſince ſhe had his Wife in her Power. In the mean time the contrary Party, Hamilton Duke of Caſtel-Herault, with the Earls of Huntley and Argyle, imploy'd the Lord Seton to the Duke of Alva in the Netherlands, to uſe all Arguments, 'That 'the ten thouſand Ducats aſſign'd the Queen of the Scots might be paid, and that 'he would aſſiſt her for the Recovery of her Liberty; alledging how acceptable 'it would be to all Chriſtian Princes, and to the whole Catholick Church. The Duke promis'd to give all neceſſary Aſſiſtance; the French King alſo ſollicited Queen Elizabeth to the ſame purpoſe; and the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, in his Maſter's Name, urg'd it with no leſs Vehemence. Queen Elizabeth, violently attack'd with all theſe Importunities, made Anſwer, That as ſhe would omit nothing that might tend to the Reconciling of the Queen of Scotland and her Subjects; ſo ſhe muſt take leave to provide for her own and her Peoples Security and Quiet, according as Nature, Reaſon, and her Princely Reputation and Honour requir'd.

The Earl of Lenox made Regent.

Endeavours to free the Queen of the Scots.

When all other Means prov'd ineffectual, the Romiſh Party in a Rage had recourſe to their laſt Effort, Pope Pius the Fifth; who having the laſt Year Excommunicated Queen Elizabeth, and excited her Subjects to a Rebellion, now caus'd his plenary Bull to be fix'd upon the Gates of the Biſhop of London's Palace, under this Title: A Declaratory Sentence of our holy Lord Pope Pius Quintus, againſt Elizabeth, the pretended Queen of England, and the Hereticks her Adherents. In which alſo her Subjects are declar'd abſolv'd from their Oath of Allegiance, and any other Duty they owe to her; and whoever ſhall henceforward obey her, are included in the ſame Anathema. In the Bull it ſelf, which is long, the Pope declares himſelf to have a Power over all Nations and Kingdoms, to pluck up, deſtroy, ſcatter, conſume, plant and build. And afterwards, pronounces Elizabeth to be a Heretick, as likewiſe all her Adherents, and Excommunicated from that Church, out of which there is no Salvation:

Pope Pius's Bull againſt Queen Elizabeth.

'And

'And further declares her to be depriv'd of all Titles, Dominions, Dignities 'and Privileges whatſoever; and commands all her Subjects that they preſume 'not to obey her, or her Orders, Mandates and Laws, upon pain of the ſame 'Sentence.

The Romiſh Subjects of England, being thus debauch'd from their Allegiance, by the Pope's Authority and Approbation, there ſoon follow'd ſeveral Seditions and Inſurrections; and ſome of the Nobility and Gentry of that Perſuaſion, who had felt all the Happineſs of the Government, in compliance with their Religion, began to be ill-affected towards their Soveraign. The firſt Inſurrection, after this Bull appear'd in England, was among ſome of the Hut-Gentry of Norfolk, who reſolving to ſet their Duke at Liberty, form'd a Plot, that when the People reſorted to a Fair at Harleſtone, they ſhould gather the Multitude together by ſound of Trumpet, under pretence of expelling the Foreigners out of England that had fled from the Duke of Alva. But their Deſigns were diſcover'd and prevented before they came to Maturity; and of the many that were condemn'd, only three were Executed, the principal of whom was John Throgmorton, who tho' he ſtood mute at the Bar, confeſs'd at the Gallows that he had been the Author of the Sedition. Not long after John Felton, that had ſet up the Pope's Bull upon the Biſhop of London's Palace, not attempting to fly, was taken, and being arraign'd, undauntedly confeſs'd the Fact, without acknowledging any Crime, and was hang'd near the Place of his Treaſon, where by his Suffering he obtain'd the Reputation of a Martyr: Tho' the more moderate ſort of Papiſts diſallow'd of the Pope's whole Proceedings, as Unjuſt and Illegal. The ſame Day that Felton was arraign'd, the Duke of Norfolk, upon his Confeſſion of having acted imprudently, and ingaging under his Hand not to concern himſelf further in the Marriage, without the Queen's Approbation, was diſcharg'd from Impriſonment. Cecil being his Friend earneſtly mov'd him to marry ſome other Perſon with all ſpeed, and ſo remove all future Suſpicion; yet ſome again thought that this Inlargement of the Duke's, was purpoſely to bring him into greater Dangers.

An Inſurrection in Norfolk.

The Duke of Norfolk ſet at Liberty.

Many Conſpiracies at the ſame Time were form'd to ſet the Queen of the Scots at Liberty; for the effecting of which, Thomas and Edward Stanley, younger Sons to the Earl of Darby, were chiefly concern'd; but the Matter being diſcover'd, they were ſoon ſuppreſs'd, and ſome ſuffer'd Death. And now the Scotch Lords of their Queen's Party, continuing to protect the Engliſh Rebels, the Earl of Suſſex once again, accompany'd with the Lord Scroop, enter'd Scotland, burnt the Villages all along the Valley of Anandale, and compell'd Duke Hamilton, and the Earls of Huntley and Argyle, under a Writing ſign'd with their own Hands and Seals, to abandon the Engliſh Rebels. Suſſex, upon his Return, Knighted ſeven Gentlemen for their Valour; and he himſelf, for his approv'd Wiſdom and Virtue, was admitted of the Queen's Privy-Council. And now the Queen being too often diſturb'd by Conſpiracies, ſent Sir William Cecil and Sir Walter Mildmay to the Queen of Scotland, then at Chatteſworth Houſe in Darbyſhire, to conſult with her by what means to make up the Breach in Scotland, to reinveſt her in her former State, and to ſecure both her Son and the Queen of England. The Scotch Queen did nothing but deplore her wretched Condition, throwing her ſelf wholly upon the Queen's Clemency; and when the Commiſſioners made to her certain Propoſitions of Agreement: Firſt, That the 'Treaty of Edinburgh ſhould be confirm'd: Then, That ſhe ſhould renounce 'her Right and Title to England, during Queen Elizabeth's Life, or any Chil-'dren of her Body lawfully begotten: And, That ſhe ſhould ſend her Son 'for a Hoſtage into England, with ſix others, ſuch as the Queen ſhould 'nominate: Laſtly, That the Caſtle of Humes and Eaſt-Caſtle, with ſome 'others, ſhould be held by the Engliſh for three Years. To theſe Articles, the Queen of Scotland for the preſent made a prudent Reply; but referr'd a more compleat Anſwer to the Biſhop of Roſs, her Ambaſſador in England, and Offers made to the Queen of the Scots.

But to no Effect.

ſome other Commiſſioners, who afterwards approv'd of ſome of the Propoſitions, but diſallow'd of the reſt: So that the Treaty drop'd, and the Matter reſted in the former State.

The twelfth Year of this Reign being happily expired, in which ſome credulous Papiſts had expected, according to the Prediction of certain Fortune-Tellers, their Golden-Day as they term'd it, all good Men throughout England triumph'd with Thankſgivings, Sermons in Churches, repeated Prayers, publick Tournaments, and feſtival Joy; and ſo ſolemniz'd the ſeventeenth Day of November, being the Anniverſary of the Beginning of her Reign, which Day, in Teſtimony of their great Affection to her, they never ceas'd to obſerve as long as ſhe liv'd. And indeed the Love of the People was ſo juſt and general, notwithſtanding ſome ſecret Enemies, that if this excellent Queen happen'd to be Sick, or a little diſorder'd in her Health, her Courtiers would be ſo allarm'd at it, that they would ſcarcely ſtir from her to eat or drink, or take any Care of themſelves: And all Degrees of People would fly in vaſt Numbers to the Churches, and with the moſt devout Prayers and Tears beg her Health and Continuance of her happy Government, 'till God had heard their Petitions, and reſtor'd her to her Health.

The Anniverſary of this Reign firſt celebrated.

A. D. 1571. Reg. 11/14. Still the Affairs of the Scots, and their Queen, was the great Concern of the Court of England; and this Year, in the Name of the King of Scotland, there came the Earl of Morton, the Abbot of Dunfermelin, and James Mac-Gilly; whom Queen Elizabeth requir'd to ſhow more clearly, for what Cauſes they had depos'd their Queen. They exhibited a large Diſcourſe, in which, with peculiar Freedom, they endeavour'd to prove, 'By the ancient Right of the 'Kingdom of Scotland, the People were ſuperior to the King; and urg'd Cal- 'vin's Authority, that Popular Magiſtrates were conſtituted for Moderation of 'the Licentiouſneſs of Princes; and that it was lawful for them, upon juſt 'Cauſes, both to impriſon and to depoſe Kings. The Queen could not read this Writing without Indignation; but gave this Anſwer to the Deputies, That ſhe ſaw no juſt Cauſe for the ſevere Treatment of their Queen; therefore ſhe order'd them to conſult immediately about Methods for healing the Diſſenſions in Scotland. Hereupon in the Houſe of the Lord-Keeper Bacon, a Propoſition was made to the Biſhop of Roſs, and the other Deputies for the Scotch Queen, 'That for the Security of the Kingdom, and the Queen of England, it was 'neceſſary, that before the Queen of Scotland ſhould be ſet at Liberty, Duke 'Hamilton, the Earls of Huntley and Argyle, the Lords Humes, Heris, and 'another Baron ſhould be deliver'd for Hoſtages, and the Caſtles of Dunbriton 'and Humes, yielded to the Engliſh for three Years. But they made Anſwer, 'That to yield up ſuch Men, and ſuch Fortifications as were demanded, was 'only to leave the miſerable Queen deſtitute of faithful Friends, and naked of 'Places fit for Guard and Defence: Yet they offer'd to give two Earls and two Barons for Hoſtages, 'till two Years were expired. This not being accepted, they immediately concluded, and publickly ſaid, That now they perceiv'd the Engliſh deſign'd to keep their Queen perpetual Priſoner, and to break off the Treaty; ſince they inſiſted upon ſuch Security as Scotland was not able to give. And now Queen Elizabeth perceiving that nothing could be effected for the Safety of her ſelf, and the King and Queen of Scotland, unleſs both the Scotch Parties conſented; ſhe held it proper that the Lords of Scotland ſhould themſelves appoint ſome ſelect Perſons to accommodate this nice Affair.

Proposals about the Queen of the Scots.

Troubles in Scotland. While theſe Tranſactions paſs'd in England, the Queen of the Scots Party were ſeverely treated in Scotland, many executed and ſeveral ſlain, the ſtrong Caſtle of Dunbriton taken, and J. Hamilton Arch-Biſhop of St. Andrew's and Brother to the Duke of Caſtle-Herault, as an Acceſſary to the Lord Darnly's Murther, was hang'd without being arraign'd according to Law. In England the Queen of the Scots had all her Servants taken from her, except ten, and a Prieſt to ſay Maſs; with which Indignities that Queen was ſo exaſperated, that ſhe caus'd a large Writing of her Counſels, with certain Love-Letters to the Duke of Norfolk, to be carry'd to the Pope, and the King of Spain, by Ridolpho the Florentine. This being firſt brought to the Duke, was copy'd out by Higford his Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber; who being commanded to burn all that he had writ, ſecretly hid the Papers under a Mat in the Duke's Bed-Chamber. Ridolpho, to induce the Duke to be Head of the diſaffected Party in England, aggravated the Injuries he had ſuffer'd; how contrary to Law he had been detain'd Priſoner, and now not ſummon'd to the Parliament: He exhibited to him a Catalogue of ſuch of the Nobility, as had promis'd to aſſiſt him: He ſhew'd 'how the Pope, to promote the Catholick Religion, 'would himſelf bear all the Charge of the War, and had already depoſited a 'hundred thouſand Crowns, of which he himſelf had diſtributed twelve 'thouſand among the Engliſh Fugitives: He promis'd alſo that the King of 'Spain would ſend four thouſand Horſe, and ſix thouſand Foot to his Aſſiſtance. To theſe Reaſons the Biſhop of Roſs added, 'That it was an eaſie Enterpriſe 'for him to ſurprize the Queen; and when he had her once in Poſſeſſion, he 'might then with no Difficulty obtain both the Liberty of the Scotch Queen, 'and a Toleration of Religion. The former Reaſons made ſome Impreſſion upon the Duke; but this Point of ſurpriſing the Queen, he abhorr'd as an impious Fact, and to be rejected as pernicious and dangerous.

A Deſign againſt Queen Elizabeth.

In France, not long before this, the Marriage was ſolemniz'd between Charles the Ninth, King of France, and Elizabeth of Auſtria, Daughter to the Emperor Maximilian: In Congratulation of which, Queen Elizabeth ſent over the Lord Buckhurſt, who was receiv'd with great Magnificence, and perhaps the greater, in regard of a Motion now to be made. For the Lord Buckhurſt having in his Retinue one Cavalcanti, a Nobleman of Florence, the Queen-Mother of France, as a Native of the ſame Place, had frequent Conferences with him, and often inſiſted upon the Happineſs that would accrue to both Kingdoms, if a Match were made between the Queen of England, and her Son Henry Duke of Anjou; and at laſt deſir'd him to recommend the Motion to Queen Elizabeth, both from her, and her Son the King of France, as highly deſirable to both. The Lord Buckhurſt return'd, being preſented by the King of France with a Golden Chain weighing a thouſand French Crowns; and Cavalcanti at his Return made the Motion to the Queen, who ſeem'd not unwilling to hearken to it; for by this Match might be added to the Kingdom of England the rich Dukedoms of Anjou, Bourbon and Auvergne, and in Poſſibility the Kingdom of France it ſelf. Upon which a Treaty was negotiated, in which the French propos'd three Articles, 'One concerning the Coronation 'of the Duke; another, concerning the joint Adminiſtration of the Govern-'ment; and a third, concerning a Toleration of his Religion. To which it was anſwer'd, 'That the two firſt Articles might in ſome Meaſure be com-'poſ'd; but the third was ſcarce practicable: For tho' a contrary Religion 'might be tolerated between Subjects of the ſame Kingdom, yet between a 'Husband and Wife it ſeem'd very incongruous and inconvenient. Yet the Matter at laſt was brought to this Concluſion, 'That if the Duke would afford 'the Queen his Preſence at Divine Service, and not refuſe to hear and learn 'the Doctrine of the Church of England, he ſhould not be compell'd to uſe 'the Engliſh Rites, but at his Pleaſure uſe the Roman, as far as was conſiſtent 'with God's Word. But upon this Punctilio, they could not come to Agreement; and the Treaty, after it had continu'd almoſt a Year, intirely broke off. It was indeed generally believ'd, That the Match was never really deſign'd on either Side, but that both pretended it to promote their own Intereſts: For the Earl of Leiceſter, who knew more of the Queen's Thoughts than any Man, wrote at this time to Walſingham the Queen's Ambaſſador in France, That he found the Queen's Inclination ſo cold in the Matter, that tho' the Point of Religion were fully agreed; yet ſhe would ſtill find one Point or other to prevent the Marriage.

A Match propos'd between the Queen and the Duke of Anjou.

The Treaty broke off.

But

A Match design'd between the Duke of Norfolk and the Queen of the Scots.

But the French King took not greater Pains for accompliſhing this Marriage, than ſome Engliſh did to haſten a Marriage between the Queen of the Scots and the Duke of Norfolk, whom they had again drawn into the Snare; which came to be diſcover'd by a Packet of Letters, ſent by Ridolpho to the Biſhop of Roſs, and by the Confeſſion of Bayliff, who brought the ſaid Letters. Upon which the Biſhop of Roſs was confin'd to the Iſle of Ely; Sir Thomas Stanley, Sir Thomas Gerrard, and Rolton, were committed to the Tower; and Henry Howard, who had aſpir'd to the Archbiſhoprick of York, was committed to the Cuſtody of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. At the ſame time the Queen of the Scots ſent Mony to her Confederates in her own Kingdom; which was by Higford, the Duke's Gentleman, deliver'd to one Brown, as only ſo much Silver: But he finding by the Weight that it was Gold, he became ſuſpicious; and thereupon went and deliver'd the Mony and Letters to the Lords of the Council. Upon this, Higford being examin'd, confeſs'd the whole Project, and withal gave Information of the ſecret Writing of the Queen of the Scots, which he had hid under the Mat, unknown to the Duke his Maſter. Two Days after, the Duke himſelf, being examin'd by the Council, and knowing nothing of what his Servants had confeſs'd, he deny'd every Particular; and thereupon was again ſent to the Tower, to the great Concern and Affliction of the People. After him Baniſter, his Lawyer, the Earls of Arundel and Southampton, the Lords Lumley and Cobham, Henry Piercy, Lowder, Powell, Goodyer, and others, were committed to Priſon; who, upon Hopes of Pardon, confeſs'd all they knew concerning this peculiar Affair. When theſe Things, and eſpecially the private Writing, which the Duke thought had been burnt, were ſhew'd him, he in Confuſion cry'd out, I am betray'd by my Confidents, being unwilling to be diſtruſtful, tho' it is the very Eſſence of Wiſdom. And then with the moſt humble Submiſſion he beg'd the Lords to mediate for him to the Queen; towards whom, he proteſted he never had the leaſt Thought of doing any Prejudice.

The Duke again ſent to the Tower.

The Biſhop of Roſs, by the Confeſſion of all the Criminals, and the Duke himſelf, being charg'd as the chief Projector of the whole Conſpiracy, it caus'd great Debates how to proceed againſt him, who was an Ambaſſador; but the learned Civilians, having upon ſome curious Queries determin'd that he had loſt the Privilege of an Ambaſſador, he was brought before the Council, and told, That by his Actions he had forfeited his Character, and ſhould be puniſh'd according to his Deſerts. The Biſhop anſwer'd, He was the Ambaſſador of an abſolute, tho' unfortunate Queen, whoſe Privileges by the Law of Nations were not to be violated. Upon which Cecil in a grave Reply ſhew'd him, That the Privilege of an Ambaſſador could not protect a Perſon in Crimes againſt the publick Majeſty of a Prince, and conſequently he was liable to Puniſhment; or elſe every wicked Ambaſſador might plot againſt the Lives of crown'd Heads without Controul. He urg'd that the Privileges of Ambaſſadors had never been violated Via Juris, but Via Facti; and adviſ'd them not to uſe harder Meaſures to him, than had been us'd to the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, Throgmorton in France, Randolph and Tamworth in Scotland; who had there rais'd Rebellions, without any other Puniſhment, than to be oblig'd to depart at a limited Time. And when Engliſh Evidences were to be produc'd againſt him, he alledg'd, as a Cuſtom obtaining the Force of a Law, That the Teſtimony of an Engliſhman againſt a Scot, or of a Scot againſt an Engliſhman, was not to be admitted. However, after ſome further Conſultations, this Biſhop was committed cloſe Priſoner to the Tower. At this very time Matthew Stuart, Earl of Lenox, and Regent of Scotland, being ſurpriz'd by the Nobility of the adverſe Party, was murther'd by Bell and Caulder, after he had carefully govern'd the Kingdom about fourteen Months; and was ſucceeded in the Regency by John Averkin, Earl of Marre; who being a Man of a mild Diſpoſition, and harraſs'd between the different Counſels of his Friends, and the Inſults of his Enemies, he ended his Days with Sorrow, after he had govern'd about thirteen Months.

D' Ewes &c. But long before this happen'd, a new Parliament was call'd, which met on the ſecond Day of April; and her Majeſty with great Splendor and Attendance, open'd it with theſe Words, which ſhe pronounc'd with a Grace that charm'd the whole Aſſembly; My right loving Lords, and you my right faithful and obedient Subjects, We in the Name of God, for his Service, and for the Safety of this State, are now here aſſembled, to his Glory I hope, and pray that it may be to your Comfort, and the common Quiet of ours, yours, and all ours for ever. And then the Parliament proceeded to Variety of Buſineſs; and among other things it was Enacted, 'That if any one affirm'd, that any other 'hath a Right to the Crown, than the preſent Queen; or that the Laws and 'Statutes cannot limit and determine the Right of the Crown, and the Succeſſion 'thereof, every ſuch Perſon ſhall be guilty of High-Treaſon. By another Statute it was Enacted, 'That whoever ſhould reconcile any Perſon to the 'Church of Rome, and thoſe alſo who ſhould be reconcil'd, ſhould incur the 'Penalty of High-Treaſon. Theſe ſevere Laws were judg'd neceſſary at this time to quel the turbulent Spirits of ſome reſtleſs Men. Therefore a Bill alſo was brought in againſt the Queen of the Scots, that if ſhe again offended againſt the Laws of England, ſhe ſhould be judg'd as the Wife of an Engliſh Peer: But here the Queen interpos'd her Authority, and would not ſuffer ſuch a peculiar Law to paſs. After ſeveral other Acts had paſs'd, the Parliament was diſſolv'd on the twenty ninth Day of May. About which time a ſolemn Tournament was perform'd at Weſtminſter; where the chief Challengers were Edward Earl of Oxford, Charles Howard, Sir Henry Lee, and Chriſtopher Hatton, Eſq; who all perform'd valliantly, but the Earl of Oxford gain'd the greateſt Honour. This was not long after ſucceeded by the Execution of Doctor John Story, who tho' he pretented to be a Foreigner, was convicted and ſuffer'd for High-Treaſon.

The third Parliament in this Reign.

Acts paſs'd.

But in the Beginning of the next Year, was try'd a more conſiderable Man, Thomas Duke of Norfolk; who became a new and ſorrowful Spectacle in Weſtminſter-Hall, ſuch as had not been ſeen for eighteen Years. He was arraign'd before George Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, conſtituted Lord High-Steward upon that Occaſion, and twenty five other Lords. The Subſtance of his Indictment was, 'That in the eleventh Year of this Reign he had traiterouſly 'conſulted to depoſe the Queen, and to bring in Foreign Forces to invade the 'Kingdom: That he treated with the Queen of the Scots concerning Marriage, 'contrary to his Promiſe, and to the Hazard of the Realm: That he ſent Mony 'to the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmorland, who had rais'd a Rebelli-'on againſt the Queen: That he implor'd Aids from the Pope, the King of 'Spain, and the Duke of Alva, for the freeing the Queen of the Scots, and 'reſtoring the Popiſh Religion: And laſtly, That he had ſent Supplies to the 'Lord Heris, and other of the Queen's Enemies in Scotland. The Duke yielding to be try'd by his Peers, firſt Barham, Serjeant at Law, then Gerrard the Queen's Attorney, and laſtly Bromeley her Sollicitor, enforc'd the Crimes objected againſt him: To all which the Duke made handſom and colourable Anſwers; but moſt of them being mov'd by ſufficient Teſtimony, he occaſionally ask'd, Whether the Subjects of another Prince, in League with the Queen, were to be accounted Enemies? To which Cataline anſwer'd, They were; and that the Queen of England might make War with any Duke of France, and yet keep Peace with the French King. After a long Trial, the Lord High-Steward demanded of the Duke, if he had any thing more to alledge for himſelf; who anſwer'd, I rely upon the Equity of the Laws. After this the Lords withdrawing a while, brought him in guilty of High-Treaſon; and the Lord High-Steward with a Flood of Tears pronounc'd his Sentence in the uſual Form. His Condemnation produc'd a new Conſpiracy from Barney and Ma- ther,

ther, who joining with one Herle, reſolv'd to kill certain of the Counſellors, and ſet the Duke at Liberty; but Herle diſcovering the Matter, the other two were both executed. As to the Duke, the greateſt Favour he begg'd was, That her Majeſty would be kind to his Children and Servants, and that his Debts might be paid.

The fourth Parliament in this Reign.

This Plot, and ſeveral other Practices to deliver the Priſoner, occaſion'd the Calling of a new Parliament; againſt which the Queen honour'd Walter D'Evereux, Viſcount Hereford, with the Title of Earl of Eſſex, and Edward Lord Clinton, with that of Earl of Lincoln; and alſo ſummon'd four new Barons to this Parliament, John Powlet of Baſing, Henry Compton, Henry Cheiney, and Henry Norris. The Parliament met on the eighth Day of May, and within ſix Weeks Time broke up, without a Diſſolution, or enacting very much beſides the preſent Security of the Nation. The principal Law paſs'd was, 'That whoever ſhould endeavour to free any Perſon impriſon'd by the 'Queen's Commandment, for Treaſon, or Suſpicion of Treaſon, before his 'Indictment, ſhould forfeit his Eſtate during Life, and be impriſon'd during 'the Queen's Pleaſure; if indicted, he ſhould incur the Pains of Death; and 'if condemn'd, the Penalty of High-Treaſon. As the Severity of this Law was only neceſſary for the Times, ſo the Parliament thought fit to make it Temporary. But ſo many Deſigns of this Nature were ſet on foot, as haſten'd the unfortunate Duke's Execution; which however was deferr'd for about four Months. For before that Time, neither the Commons in Parliament, the Counſellors at Court, nor the Importunity of Preachers, by ſuggeſting of the Greatneſs of the preſent Danger, could overcome the Queen's Clemency.

The Duke of Norfolk brought to the Scaffold

But on the ſecond of June, the great Duke was brought to a Scaffold erected on Tower-Hill, accompany'd by Nowell Dean of St. Paul's; and after Silence obtain'd, he thus deliver'd himſelf to the Multitude, It is no new Thing for Men to ſuffer Death in this Place; tho' ſince the Beginning of our moſt excellent Queen's Reign, I am the Firſt, and God grant I may be the Laſt: To which the People moſt affectionately cry'd Amen! He then acknowledg'd, 'That he was juſtly condemn'd by his Peers; and acknowledg'd he had treated 'with the Queen of the Scots in Matters of great Conſequence, contrary to his 'Soveraign's Knowledge, and after Pardon obtain'd, and Promiſes given, he 'had repeated the ſame Crime; for which he was a humble Penitent. He 'clear'd himſelf of ſome Imputations, and declar'd, That he had not been 'addicted to Popery, ſince his firſt Notions of Religion; tho' he had ſome of 'that Profeſſion among his Servants and Familiars: And if he had offended 'God, the Church, or the Proteſtants, he begg'd that all would forgive him. Then after the Recital of one or two Pſalms, he cry'd out, Lord, into thy Hands I commend my Spirit! After which tenderly embracing Sir Henry Leigh, he whiſper'd ſomething to him and Dean Nowell, who turning to the People, ſaid, The Duke deſires you all to pray to God for his Mercy to him; and when one reach'd him a Hankerchief to cover his Eyes, he refus'd it, courageouſly ſaying, I fear not Death. So devoutly falling upon his Knees, and fixing his Mind upon Heaven, he laid his Head upon the Block, which at one Stroke was ſever'd from his Body, and by the Executioner ſhown as a melancholy Sight to the weeping Spectators; whoſe Sorrows were augmented by the Conſideration of his noble Preſence and Greatneſs, his Affability and Munificence; and by the Remembrance that his Father, at the ſame Place met with the ſame Fate twenty five Years before, only for Quartering the Arms of Edward the Confeſſor with his own. But as the Crimes of his Father and Grandfather were greater, than thoſe for which they ſuffer'd; it is no Wonder if Providence extended the Puniſhment further than their Perſons.

He is beheaded.

Not long after, Thomas Piercy Earl of Northumberland, who had formerly rebell'd, and fled into Scotland, was for a Sum of Mony deliver'd by the Earl of Morton to the Lord Hunſdon, Governor of Berwick; and after that was be-beheaded at York. And now as these two great Men were fatally taken off by violent Means, so three others this Year were remov'd by a natural Death. First, William Powlet, the old Marques of Winchester, Lord High-Treasurer of England; who notwithstanding his continual Adherence to the Popish Religion, was by the wise Queen continu'd in his Place to the last; being then ninety seven Years of Age, and having seen a hundred and three Persons of the Issue of his own Body. Next dy'd Edward Earl of Darby, with whom the Glory of the English Hospitality seem'd to fall asleep, as Camden observes. Lastly Sir William Peter, a great Benefactor to Exeter College in Oxford, who from an honest Parentage rais'd himself to be Privy-Counsellor and Secretary to four crown'd Heads, Henry the eighth, Edward the Sixth, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth. The Lord Treasurer's Place was fill'd up by Sir William Cecil, whom the Queen the last Year had created Lord Burleigh; with Commendations answerable to his extraordinary Worth and Abilities.

The Earl of Northumberland beheaded.

A few Days after the Death of the Duke of Norfolk, the Lord De la Ware, Sir Ralph Sadler, Doctor Wilson, and Thomas Bromley, were sent to the Queen of Scotland to expostulate with her as to her Proceedings; 'That she 'had usurp'd the Title and Arms of the Kingdom of England, and had refus'd 'to renounce the same, contrary to the Treaty of Edinburgh: That she had 'endeavour'd the Marriage with the Duke of Norfolk, without acquainting his 'Soveraign, and had us'd all forcible Means to free him out of Prison: That 'she had rais'd the Rebellion in the North, and reliev'd the Rebels both in 'Scotland and the Netherlands; and had implor'd Aids from the Pope, the 'King of Spain, and others: That she had conspir'd with certain English Men 'to free her out of Prison, and proclaim her Queen of England: Lastly, That 'she had procur'd the Pope's Bull against Queen Elizabeth, and suffer'd her self 'publickly to be stil'd Queen of England in Foreign Countries. All which Accusations she either absolutely deny'd, or plausibly extenuated; and tho' she declar'd her self to be a free Queen, and not subject to any Creature upon Earth, yet she was content, and requested that she might make her Personal Answer in the next Parliament.

Expostulations with the Queen of the Scots.

About the same Time Charles the French King, in all Appearance, fixing his Thoughts upon the Netherland War, concluded a Peace, and enter'd into a League with Queen Elizabeth; which was to remain firm, not only during their own two Lives, but also between their Successors, if the said Successor should signifie to the Survivor within a Year, that he accepted it, otherwise to be at Liberty. It was likewise agreed what Aid by Sea and Land, they should each of them afford to the other upon Occasion. And for the Ratification of this League, the Earl of Lincoln Admiral of England was sent into France, accompany'd with the Lords Dacres, Rich, Talbot, Sands, and others. The French King likewise sent the Duke of Montmorency and Paul Foix into England, with a splendid Retinue; that the Queen in the Presence of them, and the ordinary Ambassador, might swear to the League; which she did at Westminster, on the seventeenth of May; the Day after which she honour'd Montmorency with the Order of the Garter. This Duke, while he stay'd in England, interceded in his Master's Name, That all Favour, not really dangerous, might be shown to the Queen of Scotland; and then again reviv'd and promoted the Queen's Marriage with the Duke of Anjou: But finding great Obstacles, by Reason of the Diversity of Religion, he without further Expectation return'd into France, where his Master began to grow cold and remiss as to the Scotch Queen, because she inclin'd more to the Spaniard than to him. Shortly after the Queen-Mother of France commanded the French Ambassador in England to propose a Marriage between Queen Elizabeth, and her youngest Son Francis Duke of Alenson, which he did at Kenelworth: But the Queen modestly excus'd her self, upon the Difference of Religion and Inequality of Age, he being but seventeen, and she thirty eight; yet she promis'd to con-conſider of it, ſo that Alenſon proſecuted his Suit with Vigour by the Mediation of Flerie. But at the ſame Time greater Preparations were made for a Marriage between Henry King of Navarre, and the Lady Margaret the French King's Siſter; to which great Solemnity, with profound Diſſimulation, the Queen of Navarre and the Heads of all the Proteſtants were allur'd, with Promiſes that there ſhould be a Renovation of Love, and a perpetual Peace eſtabliſh'd. The Earl of Leiceſter likewiſe and the Lord Burleigh were invited out of England, and the Sons of the Elector Palatine out of Germany, under the Colour of Reſpect and Honour; but in Reality, that they and the reſt might be inſnar'd, and that the Proteſtant Religion at one Blow might be exterminated, or receive a mortal Wound. For upon the Celebration of the Marriage, there immediately follow'd the infamous and execrable Maſſacre of Paris, and the terrible Slaughter of the Proteſtants throughout all the Cities of France. But to put a Colour of Equity upon the Fact, Edicts and Proclamations were ſet forth, importing, That the Proteſtants had conſpir'd againſt the King, and all the Royal Family; and in Memory of it Medals were ſtruck, as of an Action fortunate and honourable. But the King of France, notwithſtanding all his Shews of Piety, did not eſcape the Divine Vengeance; for before two Years were expir'd he was ſeiz'd with unnatural Diſtempers, and ſtrange Irruptions of Blood, and afterwards with long and grievous Torments ended his Life.

The Maſſacre of Paris.

The Queen, who had enjoy'd a perfect Health, fell ſick of the Small-Pox at Hampton-Court, but fully recover'd before her Illneſs was known abroad, and immediately proceeded to the Care of the Goverrntment; commanded Portſmouth to be new and ſtrongly fortify'd, increas'd the Number of the Ships; made Muſters of the Train-Bands in every County, and caus'd the Youth to be taught the Exercciſe of Arms, and all this in a time of profound Peace. And having formerly borrow'd Mony of her Subjects, ſhe now repaid it with ſuch Thanks, as won her no leſs Love, than if ſhe had given it; and at this Time ſhe gain'd further Love by iſſuing out two Proclamations; by one of which ſhe commanded the Nobility to obſerve the Laws againſt keeping many Retainers; by the other, ſhe reſtrain'd Informers, who under Colour of diſcovering Crown Lands conceal'd by private Perſons, ſacrilegiouſly ſeiz'd upon the Lands of Churches and Alms-Houſes, piouſly endow'd by the Queen's Anceſtors. What ſtill added to her Honour and Eſteem was the performing two Acts of Juſtice much deſir'd; by one ſhe ſatisfy'd the Merchants out of the detain'd Goods belonging to the Dutch, reſtor'd the reſt to the Duke of Alva, and made a full Agreement with the Merchants of Genoa, for the Mony formerly intercepted: By the other ſhe diſcharg'd England of the Debts which her Father and Brother had contracted with Foreigners, which were much increas'd by annual Intereſt, and likewiſe caus'd the Charters of London, which had been ſo often renew'd, to be now reſtor'd, to the great Joy and Satisfaction of the Citizens. In Ireland were ſome Commotions, occaſion'd by the too rigorous Conduct of Sir Edward Fitton Governor of Connaught, for which the Queen remov'd him from that Poſt, and made him Treaſurer of Ireland. In Leinſter alſo the O-Moors, a ſeditious kind of People, made an Inſurrection; but being proclaim'd Traitors, they return'd to their Duties at the Perſuaſion of the Earl of Kildare.

VII. While England was generally at Peace within it ſelf, and free from Foreign Diſturbances, the Netherlands felt all the Troubles of inteſtine Convulſions, and the Miſeries of Tyrannical Proceedings. The King of Spain, by his Ambaſſador, had complain'd to Queen Elizabeth, that the Netherland Rebels were harbour'd and entertain'd in England, contrary to the Articles of the League: Whereupon the Queen iſſu'd out a ſevere Proclamation, commanding all the Dutch, ſuſpected of Rebellion, immediately to leave the Nation; which yet turn'd little to the Advantage of the Duke of Alva or the King of Spain.

Great Troubles in the Netherlands.

Spain. For upon this, Count Vander-Mark, and other Dutch going out of England, ſoon ſurpriz'd the Brill, and then Fluſhing; and drawing other Towns to revolt, in a ſhort Time they in a manner excluded the Duke of Alva from the Sea; which was judg'd a great Error in that active Governor. Shortly after many Military Men in England, having no Imployment at home, went over to the Netherlands, ſome to the Duke of Alva, but the far greater Number to the Prince of Orange, who headed the contrary Party, who in Time caus'd himſelf to be declar'd Stadtholder to the King of Spain. The firſt who went over was Thomas Morgan, who carry'd three hundred Engliſh to Fluſhing; and then by his Procurement follow'd nine Companies more under the Conduct of Humphry Gilbert; and afterwards it became the Nurſery of all the Engliſh Soldiers. After theſe Misfortunes, the Duke of Alva, contrary to his Inclinations, began to ſhow more Kindneſs towards the Engliſh, ſo that in the Month of January this Year, the Trade which had been forbidden in the Year 1568, was now allow'd again between the Dutch and the Engliſh for two Years. But all that this Duke could do, did not hinder him from being recall'd from his Government; and Zuniga, a Man of a more peaceable Diſpoſition, was ſent in his Room. Thus were the Foundations of the Liberties of the United Provinces in the Netherlands, laid in the Blood of its Inhabitants; and at firſt as zealouſly promoted by the Popiſh Subjects, to preſerve their Civil Privileges, as by the Proteſtants to ſecure their Lives and Fortunes from the Fury of the Spaniards.

Many Engliſh go thither.

The Duke of Alva remov'd.

In France, the laſt Year, in November, a Daughter was born to the French King, to whom he requeſted Queen Elizabeth to be God-Mother; who accordingly ſent the Earl of Worceſter into France with a Font of Maſſie Gold, to ſtand as her Deputy at the Solemnity. Upon this, and the Queen's Promiſes to obſerve the League ſtrictly, the French King and the Queen-Mother began more tenderly to affect her, and the Duke of Alenſon writ ſeveral Love-Letters to her, while the French King and his Mother paſſionately interceded for the Marriage. At this Time the Queen, upon many Conſiderations, began to think it proper for her to marry; but the Courtiers, for their own Intereſt, us'd as many to diſſuade her from it. At length the Queen-Mother of France became extreamly importunate, That her Son Alenſon might have leave to come and viſit her; and ſhe being weary'd with continual Letters and Meſſages, gave her Conſent; but with this Precaution, That he ſhould not take it for any Diſhonour to him, if he return'd without obtaining his Suit. But as ſoon as ſhe underſtood that his Brother Henry was elected King of Poland, and that the King of France was dangerouſly ſick, ſhe gave Intimation to Alenſon, That he ſhould not too much haſten his Paſſage into England; but ſhould firſt procure a Peace in France, and declare by ſome memorable Action his Affection towards the Proteſtants, by which he might become a more welcome Gueſt in England. Upon this, a Peace was concluded in France, and in ſome Places the Proteſtants were allow'd to exerciſe their Religion: And then again the French King and the Queen-Mother us'd all their Endeavours to promote the Marriage; and withal, they requeſted of Queen Elizabeth, that if the Duke of Anjou took his Voyage into Poland by Sea, he might have publick Security to ſail through the Britiſh Ocean. To this laſt Requeſt, ſhe not only conſented with all Readineſs, but alſo offer'd him a particular Fleet to conduct him. In the mean Time, Alenſon fell ſick of the Meaſles, which his Mother ſignify'd to Queen Elizabeth by Count Gondy, with an Excuſe for his not coming to England as he had determin'd. The Count found the Queen at Canterbury, who receiv'd him with great Honour; and Archbiſhop Parker gave as noble an Entertainment to them both, as had been given to the Emperor Charles the Fifth, and King Henry the Eighth, at the ſame Palace in the Year 1519.

In Scotland, ſince the Death of the Earl of Marre, there had been no Regent; but now chiefly by the Procurement of Queen Elizabeth, the Earl of Morton

The Affairs of Scotland.

Morton was made Regent; who by the Authority of a Parliamentary Aſſembly, Enacted many profitable Laws, for the Defence of Religion againſt Papiſts and Hereticks, in the Name of the King: But the Protection and Keeping of the King's Perſon, was confirm'd to the young Earl of Mare, as a Right belonging to that Family; yet upon theſe Conditions, That no Papiſts nor Factious Perſons ſhould be admitted to his Preſence. In the mean Time the French King ſent his Ambaſſador to corrupt the Earls of Atholl and Huntley, with large Promiſes, to oppoſe the Regent; while Queen Elizabeth as much labour'd to defend him, and inſiſted upon the Popiſh Cruelties in the late Maſſacre of Paris. But tho' by the Management of Killigrew, ſhe had drawn Duke Hamilton, the Earl of Huntley, and the moſt Eminent of their Party to acknowledge the Regent upon indifferent Conditions; yet the Lord Grange, Governor of Edinburgh Caſtle, the Lord Humes, Biſhop Lidington and others, would by no means admit of the Regent's Government, but by Lidington's Advice, held out that Caſtle in the Name of the Queen of Scotland, relying upon the Strength of the Place, and the Promiſes of the French and Spaniards. When no Perſuaſions could prevail upon theſe Men, Queen Elizabeth ſuffer'd her ſelf to be intreated by the Regent, to ſend Forces, Guns and Ammunition, for attacking the Caſtle, upon Condition that ten Hoſtages ſhould be ſent into England, to be Security for returning all the Men and Ammunition, not loſt by the common Hazard of War. The Conditions being ſettled, William Drury, Marſhal of the Garriſon at Berwick, with ſome great Ordnance, and fifteen hundred Soldiers, and ſeveral brave Volunteers, enter'd into Scotland, and inveſted the Caſtle, which after thirty three days Siege was deliver'd up to the Regent for the King's Uſe, with all the Perſons that were in it. The Lord Grange and his Brother, with one or two more, were hang'd; tho' extraordinary Offers were made to ſave the Life of the firſt: The Lord Humes and the reſt were ſpar'd, through the gracious Interceſſion of Queen Elizabeth; Lidington was ſent to Leith, where he dy'd, not without Suſpicion of Poiſon; a Man of an excellent Wit, and great Underſtanding, but too variable in his Temper. And now from this Time Scotland began to breath, after long Civil Wars; and the Commanders, as well as Soldiers of both Parties, betook themſelves to Sweden, France and the Netherlands, where they reap'd more Laurels than they did in their own Country. As for the famous Biſhop of Roſs, he was ſet at Liberty, but commanded immediately to depart out of England; and being beyond Sea, he ſtill continu'd to ſollicite the Cauſe of his Miſtreſs, the Queen of Scotland, with moſt of the Potentates of Chriſtendom; from whom he met with many Promiſes, but no effectual Performances.

They are ſettled by Queen Elizabeth's Power.

In Ireland, many particular Inſurrections were made this Year by the O-Conors, and the O-Moors, but more eſpecially by Mac Phelim and his Adherents, who burnt Carickfergus, and committed many Outrages. Againſt theſe the valiant Walter Earl of Eſſex offer'd his Service to the Queen, and with great Expence to himſelf, went over with ſeveral brave Adventurers. But meeting with many unexpected Difficulties, for which the Earl of Leiceſter has been much condemn'd, after the waſting of a Year's Time and much Treaſure, with no anſwerable Succeſs, he obtain'd leave to return home to England. Here all Things were ſtill in a quiet Condition, only the Queen and the Eccleſiaſtical State were much tormented with the new Sect call'd Puritans, who under a Pretence of greater Purity in Doctrine and Diſcipline, endeavour'd to eradicate Things that were well eſtabliſh'd, to make way for their own Novelties; therefore the Queen, to prevent a Schiſm in the Church, commanded the Law concerning Uniformity of Publick Prayers, to be in all Places put into Execution. It was thought the more neceſſary to reſtrain all new Opinions and Notions, by reaſon of one Peter Bourchet of the Middle-Temple, who taught that it was lawful to kill any that oppos'd the Truth of the Goſpel; and and ſo ſtrictly purſu'd that Principle by his Practice, that it brought upon him the Guilt of Murder, for which he ſuffer'd Death, according to Law.

Alenſon revives his Suit.

The Duke of Alenſon, the moſt importunate of all the Queen's Suitors, by Letters and Maveiſeir the French Ambaſſador, now reviv'd his Amours, and begg'd leave he might come into England and proſecute them in Perſon; and the Queen having an Eſteem for him, and at preſent ſome Inclinations to marry, ſhe granted him a ſafe Conduct, with Demonſtrations of great Reſpect for his Perſon. But before her Anſwer came to him, it was ſuſpected by the Queen Mother, That he and the King of Navarre would remove her from the Government, and therefore they had Keepers ſet over them, and were committed to Cuſtody: For the Guiſes had ſuggeſted that Alenſon held intimate Correſpondence with Admiral Coligny, the Head of the Proteſtants in France. But Thomas Wilkes, Dale's Secretary, came privately to them both, and comforted them in the Queen of England's Name, promiſing ſhe would omit no Opportunity to relieve them: For which the ſubtle Queen Mother made ſuch Complaints to Queen Elizabeth, that Wilkes was compell'd to go into France and beg Pardon for his Fault; tho' twenty five Years after, he receiv'd the Honour of Knighthood from Navarre, when he was King of France. Queen Elizabeth ſent Thomas Randolph into France to the Queen-Mother, that if it were poſſible he might gain Reconciliation for Alenſon her Son, and for the King of Navarre: But before he landed in France, King Charles dy'd in great Torment, as was hinted before; whoſe Funeral Obſequies were ſolemnly perform'd in St. Paul's Cathedral in London. Now Henry the Third ſucceeding to the Crown of France, Queen Elizabeth ſent the Lord North to congratulate his Return out of Poland to his own Inheritance, and deſir'd him to reſtore Alenſon into Favour, but the Ambaſſador effected nothing material; for France, puſh'd on by its own fatal Deſtiny, ran deſperately into a Civil War. Nevertheleſs, the new King and his Mother ſent Le Garde into England, again to promote the Marriage with the Queen, and to divert the young Duke from War and Faction at home.

The King of France dies.

Exceſs in Apparel reſtrain'd.

In theſe Times, Camden obſerves, That an extraordinary Exceſs in Apparel had ſpread it ſelf over all England, and the Habit of the Country, by a peculiar Vice incident to an imitating Nation, grew into ſuch Diſeſteem, that Men by their New-faſhion'd Garments, and gaudy Attire, diſcover'd the Deformity and Weakneſs of their Minds, while they ſhin'd in their Silks laced or imbroider'd with Silver and Gold. The Queen obſerving, that to maintain this Exceſs, large Sums were yearly exported to buy Silks and other Foreign Ornaments, to the impoveriſhing of the Republick; and that many of the Nobility that might be ſerviceable to the State, and others of noble Extract, not only waſted their Eſtates, but alſo ran ſo much into Debt, as to be tempted to raiſe Commotions in the Nation; ſhe therefore commanded them by Proclamation, That all Perſons ſhould within fourteen Days conform themſelves in Apparel to a certain preſcrib'd Faſhion, leſt they incurr'd the Severity of the Laws made under Henry the Eighth and Queen Mary: And ſhe began the Example her ſelf in her own Court. But ſtill through the Untowardneſs of the Times, both the Proclamation and the Laws by ſeveral ſteps gave way to the Pride of the People; which alſo began to be attended with luxurious Banquets, and Prodigality in Buildings. For at this Time more large and magnificent Buildings were erected, than in any other Age before, to the great Ornament of the Kingdom, but as our Author ſays, to as great Decay of the glorious Hoſpitality of the Nation.

A. D. 1575. Reg. 17/18.

The ſecond Seſſion of the fourth Parliament of this Reign.

The Conſideration of ſome of theſe Matters was one Occaſion of the Meeting of a new Seſſion of Parliament, upon the eighth Day of February; which was the very ſame Parliament that laſt broke up in the Year 1572, and is not mention'd by Camden, and the common Hiſtorians, either for the Shortneſs of the Seſſions, or the ſmall Importance of the Acts. Here one Subſidy, two Fifteenths and Tenths were granted the Queen, without any Oppoſition; and the Houſe House of Commons again desir'd, That her Majesty would make the Nation happy in her Marriage. To which she answer'd by the Mouth of the Lord-Keeper Bacon, That tho' in her own private Thoughts she was no ways dispos'd towards Matrimony, yet for their Sakes, she would surmount her Aversion; when all things should concur agreeable to the Majesty of her Person, the Dignity of the State, and the Advantage of Religion. This Speech was the last made by this great Man in Parliament, in which, in the Presence of both Houses, he among other Things declar'd, That her Majesty's Affections were so great to her People, that if the Virtues of all the Princes in Europe were united in her Person, she would gladly employ them to their Good; and she wish'd that the Benefits they receiv'd from her were Treble in Number, and Quadruble in Greatness and Goodness. Then as to the Aids they had granted, She esteem'd their Readiness to give, and the Heartiness of their Love, more than ten Subsidies; and she was ready to return all back to them, with the same Alacrity it was granted, if the Necessities of the Realm, and their Security would permit it. After this Speech, this Parliament was Prorogu'd on the fifteenth Day of March from Time to Time, during five Years, 'till the Year 1580.

The Lord Keeper's Speech.

Notwithstanding the Queen of Scotland was still a Prisoner, all was calm and quiet in England for this Year; only a Difference arose between Sir John Forster Governor of Berwick, and John Carmichill Warden of Liddesdale in Scotland. In composing of which, the Regent himself having displeas'd the Queen of England, was oblig'd to come unarm'd before the Earl of Huntington the English Commissioner at Bondenrod; and thus the Matter was compos'd, and the Regent ever continu'd constant in observing the Queen's Pleasure, and to his great Commendation restrain'd the Free-Booters of the Borders, to the Peace and Prosperity of both Kingdoms. In Ireland, the Earl of Essex having resign'd up his Command in Ulster to the Lord Deputy, as unable to prosecute his Designs with the small Number allow'd him, he was commanded to re-assume it; but he had scarce march'd against Turlogh, but he receiv'd other Orders to finish the War, and make as honourable a Peace as he could. Which being soon effected, he march'd against the Hebredian Scots, who had seiz'd upon Clandeboy, and drove them into the retiring Places; and by the skilful Conduct of Norris attempted the Isle of Rachlin, put four hundred of the Inhabitants to the Sword, forc'd the Castle, and garrison'd it with English. But in the midst of his Victories and Successes, he was again, contrary to Expectation, commanded to resign his Authority; only as an ordinary Captain he had the Command of three hundred Men given him, and by the wicked Contrivances of the Earl of Leicester was ever cross'd in his good and honourable Designs.

The Earl of Essex in Ireland.

In the Netherlands the Troubles and Commotions were greater; where Zuniga, Successor to the Duke of Alva, was wholly resolv'd to recover the Command of the Seas, which Alva had neglected: But not being sufficiently provided with a Navy, he sent Boischoit into England, that with the Queen's leave he might take up Ships and Seamen to act against the Hollanders and Zealanders; but this she would not grant. Next he desir'd, That the Queen would not take it amiss, if the English Exiles in the Netherlands serv'd the King of Spain by Sea against the Hollanders; and that they might have free Access to the Ports of England, to buy Provisions for ready Mony. This being also refus'd, he then requested, That the Dutch, who were Rebels to the King of Spain, might be driven out of England; but neither would she consent to this, as being an Action void of Humanity, and contrary to the Laws of Hospitality. Yet because she would not be thought to violate the old Burgundian Alliance, she commanded by Proclamation, That such Dutch Ships as were in the English Ports should be stopp'd, and those Dutch who had taken up Arms against the King of Spain should be hinder'd from entering the Ports of England, in which was nam'd the Prince of Orange, and fifty others of his Party. All this she did with the more Readineſs, becauſe Zuniga, at Interceſſion of the Engliſh Ambaſſador, had remov'd the Earl of Weſtmorland, and other Engliſh Fugitives out of the Spaniſh Dominions; and had alſo diſſolv'd the Engliſh Seminary at Doway; tho' inſtead of that, the Guiſes, through the Procurement of Pope Gregory the Thirteenth, eſtabliſh'd another at Rheims.

And now the Politick Prince of Orange finding his Forces but ſmall, and having little Hopes of Aſſiſtance from England, enter'd into a grand Conſultation with the Confederate States, to whoſe Protection they could moſt ſecurely betake themſelves: They knew the Princes of Germany were not all of one Opinion, parted from their Mony with Difficulty, and could not unanimouſly concur with them in their Religion; therefore they were not Perſons proper for their Purpoſe. Next they ſaw the French were involv'd in a Civil War, and had ſufficient Imployment at home; beſides the Remembrance of the old Reſentments and Feuds between them and the Dutch; therefore neither were they thought proper for this critical Juncture. There remain'd then only the Engliſh, if they might be obtain'd, as beſt for their Deſigns, of the ſame profeſs'd Religion, and of a Language not much different, ſtrong in Shipping, and rich in Merchandize. After a full Conſultation, they ſent over an honourable Embaſſie of ſeveral Perſons, with Doctor Melſen; who in an eloquent Oration offer'd the Countries of Holland and Zealand to be poſſeſs'd or protected by the Queen, as being deſcended from the Princes of Holland, by Philippa, Wife to the great Edward the Third, Daughter of William of Bavaria, Count of Hannault and Holland; by whoſe other Siſter, the Hereditary Right of thoſe Provinces came to the King of Spain. To this Offer the Queen took time to reply, and after mature Conſideration, her Anſwer was, That ſhe was not yet ſatisfy'd how ſhe might with her Honour and a ſafe Conſcience take thoſe Provinces into her Protection, much leſs into her Poſſeſſion; but promiſs'd to deal earneſtly with the Spaniard to procure them a happy Peace. Shortly after Zuniga the Governor of the Netherlands dy'd; upon which the States of Brabant and Flanders, and the other Provinces, aſſum'd the ancient Adminiſtration and Authority in the Republick; which the King of Spain was compell'd to confirm to them, 'till ſuch time as Don John of Auſtria was come among them, whom he deſign'd for their Governor. In the mean time Queen Elizabeth, in behalf of the King of Spain, ſent William Daviſon as Ambaſſador to thoſe Provinces, to exhort them to a peaceable and quiet Condition; which prov'd of no great Effect, by reaſon of the continual Outrages of the Spaniſh Soldiers.

A. D. 1576. Reg. 18/19.

Great Troubles in the Netherlands.

Theſe daily increas'd, and the Inhabitants were roughly treated and harraſs'd with all manner of Injuries; Antwerp, the moſt beautiful and famous Place of Trade in all Europe, was miſerably pillag'd, and the Houſe of the Engliſh Merchants rifled; inſomuch that the States were driven to take up Arms, and Emiſſaries were ſent to all neighbouring Princes. To Queen Elizabeth was ſent Monſieur D'Aubigny, both to repreſent the juſt Reaſons they had for taking up Arms, and likewiſe to borrow a large Sum of Mony, to enable them to reſiſt the Spaniard; but ſhe being certainly inform'd, That they had firſt ſu'd to the French King for Aid, deny'd the Requeſt, yet promis'd earneſtly to intercede with the King of Spain for a Peace. And to that Purpoſe ſhe ſent Sir John Smith, who was Couſin-German to King Edward the Sixth, a Man of Spaniſh Behaviour, and well known to that King, who honourably receiv'd him at his Court; where this Ambaſſador with ſuch Diſcretion retorted the detracting Speeches of the Arch-Biſhop of Toledo and the Spaniſh Inquiſitors, who would not admit the Queen's Title of Defender of the Faith, that he obtain'd Thanks from the King of Spain himſelf, who deſir'd him not to mention the Matter to his Queen, and gave ſtrict Command that the Title ſhould be admitted. At this time Don John of Auſtria, natural Son to the Emperor Charles the Fifth,

Fifth, came into the Netherlands with Supream Power; to whom Queen Elizabeth ſent Edward Horſey, Governor of the Iſle of Wight; to congratulate his Arrival; and offer him Aſſiſtance in caſe the Confederate States call'd the French into the Netherlands. Yet at the ſame time, as a compleat Politician, upon the great Importunity of theſe States, ſhe ſent them twenty thouſand Pounds Sterling, upon Condition they ſhould neither change their Prince nor Religion, receive no French into their Country, nor yet refuſe a Peace, if Don John ſhould condeſcend to reaſonable Conditions: But if he enforc'd a Peace, then the Mony ſhould be paid to the Spaniſh Soldiers, who were ready to Mutiny for want of Pay. So careful was this great Queen to retain theſe wavering Provinces in their Fidelity and Obedience to the King of Spain.

England was at this time in a pleaſant Calm and Quiet, and the Trade between the Engliſh and Portugueze was inlarg'd; and at this time ſome Studious Heads, excited with a laudable Deſire to diſcover the more remote Regions of the World, undertook a Voyage to try if they could find any Sea upon the North Parts of America, leading to the wealthy Coaſt of Cathay, by which might be join'd in one Commerce the Riches of both the Eaſt and Weſt Parts of the Globe. In this Voyage was imploy'd Martin Forbiſher, who ſet Sail from Harwich the eighteenth Day of June; and the ninth of Auguſt, enter'd into that Northern Bay or Sea, but could paſs no further by reaſon of the Snow and Ice. The like Expedition was undertaken two Years after, but with no better Succeſs. In this Year 1576, dy'd Maximilian the Emperor, a Prince who had merited much from Queen Elizabeth and the Engliſh; and thereupon the famous Sir Philip Sidney was ſent to his Son Rodolphus King of the Romans to condole his Father's Death, and congratulate his Acceſſion to the Empire; as alſo to do the like to the Elector Palatine, Frederick the Third, with his ſurviving Son.

The Emperor's Death. Rodolphus ſucceeds.

As Germany had a great Loſs from the Death of theſe Princes, ſo England and Ireland, in Proportion, had no leſs from that of Walter Earl of Eſſex; who by the Envy of wicked Leiceſter was recall'd from Ireland, and by his Fears ſent back again with the empty Title of Earl Marſhal of Ireland; where with Grief, a bloody Flux, and probably with ſomething worſe, he ended his Days in great Torments. In the midſt of his Pains, by a kind of a prophetick Spirit, he deſir'd his Friends about him, to admoniſh his Son, who was then ſcarce ten Years of Age, To have always in his Thoughts the thirty ſixth Year of his Age, as the utmoſt Boundary of his Life, which neither he nor his Father could paſs, and to which his Son could never arrive, as will be ſhew'd in its proper Place. He likewiſe ſaid to young Hommes his Page, We have been both poiſon'd, you have only loſt your Hair, but I muſt loſe my Life. This was believ'd to have been effected by one Crompton, by the Procurement of Leiceſter; which Suſpicion was much increas'd by that Earl's Behaviour immediately after his Death, who having by large Promiſes and Mony put away Douglaſs Sheffeild, by whom he had a Son, openly marry'd Eſſex's Widow. For tho' it was reported that he had already marry'd her in private, yet Sir Francis Knolles her Father, who was well acquainted with Leiceſter's raving Amours, would not believe him in earneſt unleſs he himſelf was preſent at the Marriage, and had it teſtify'd by a publick Notary. At this time alſo dy'd Sir Anthony Cook, a learned Man, who had been School-Maſter to King Edward the Sixth, who had given ſuch a learned Education to his five Daughters, above their Sex, that he marry'd them all to Men of great Note and Honour: The firſt to the great Lord Burleigh, the ſecond to the Lord-Keeper Bacon, the third to Sir Thomas Hobby who dy'd Ambaſſador in France, the fourth to Sir Ralph Roulet, and the fifth to Sir Henry Killigrew.

A. D. 1577. Reg. 19/20. Hitherto the Papiſts in England had met with nothing but fair and calm Weather, and by a tender Connivance enjoy'd their own Way of Worſhip in their Houſes in a manner without Puniſhment; and tho' they were prohibited by by the Laws of the Land, yet the merciful Queen thought that Violence was not to be offer'd to their Conſciences. But after the Thunders of the Vatican were levell'd againſt the Queen, this fair Seaſon turn'd gradually into Clouds and Tempeſts, and caus'd a ſtrict Law in 1571 againſt any who ſhould bring any Bulls from Rome, or any Marks of Papal Obedience, or ſhould reconcile any Perſon to the Church of Rome. Yet there was no Man in ſix Years time proceeded againſt upon that Law, tho' ſome were apprehended who had broken it: But this Year, Cuthbert Main, a Prieſt, was the firſt who felt the Severity of it; who being an obſtinate Maintainer of the Pope's Authority againſt his Prince, was put to Death at Launſton in Cornwall; and one Tragion a Gentleman, who had harbour'd him, was condemn'd to loſe his Eſtate, and to perpetual Impriſonment.

Laws firſt put in Execution againſt Papiſts.

The Queen was every Day more neceſſitated to be ſtrict and vigilant, in relation to thoſe of the Romiſh Religion, by reaſon of their many Plots and Conſpiracies, not only at home, but alſo in Scotland and the Netherlands. In which laſt Country, Don John, the Governor, tho' he pretended nothing but Peace and Gratitude to Queen Elizabeth, yet through a reſtleſs and treacherous Diſpoſition, he ſecretly treated with the Pope to deprive her of her Kingdom, and himſelf to marry the Queen of Scotland, and to invade England both from Ireland and Scotland; of all which Deſigns the Prince of Orange gave her the firſt Intelligence. Upon which, finding the Spaniard's deep Diſſimulation, the great Hardſhips of the Confederate States, and the Dangers threatning the Proteſtant Religion, ſhe enter'd into a League with the ſaid States, for mutual Defence both at Sea and Land, upon certain fix'd Conditions; by which ſhe was to aſſiſt them with one thouſand Horſe and five thouſand Foot, whoſe Engliſh Commander ſhould be admitted into the Council of the Eſtates. But becauſe ſhe would not be ſlander'd with aſſiſting Rebels againſt their Prince, ſhe ſent Thomas Wilkes to the King of Spain with theſe Informations: 'That ſhe had always endeavour'd to preſerve the Netherlands 'in Obedience to the King of Spain; and had us'd both Perſuaſions and Threat-'nings to the Prince of Orange to accept of a Peace: But withal, if the King 'of Spain expected to have his Subjects obedient to him, ſhe requeſted him to 'do Juſtice to his afflicted People, and reſtore their Privileges; and likewiſe to 'remove Don John from his Government, who was not only her mortal Ene-'my, but labour'd by all Methods to reduce the Netherlands to an intire Ser-'vitude. If this were granted by the King of Spain, ſhe then faithfully pro-'mis'd, That if the States perform'd not their Allegiance to him, as they had 'oblig'd themſelves by Ingagements to her, ſhe would utterly abandon them, 'and uſe all her Forces to compel them. While Wilkes remonſtrated theſe Matters in Spain, Don John on the other Side ſent his Ambaſſador to Queen Elizabeth, highly accuſing the States for their unreaſonable Diſobedience, and making a large Apology, and an Enumeration of the Reaſons why he had again taken up Arms. Thus Queen Elizabeth ſate as an Heroical Princeſs and Arbiter between the Spaniards, French, and Confederate States: Which was very agreeable to what an Author who wrote in thoſe Times obſerv'd, That France and Spain were the Ballances in the Scale of Europe, and England the Beam to turn them either Way; for they ſtill prevail'd, to whom ſhe adher'd.

Her Declaration.

Great Numbers went out of England into the Netherlands about this time, particularly John North, Eldeſt Son to the Lord North, John Norris, ſecond Son to the Lord Norris, Henry Cavendiſh, and Thomas Morgan, Colonels, with many Volunteers, to learn Military Experience. There came alſo Caſamire the Elector Palatine's Son, with an Army of German Horſe and Foot, at the Queen of England's Charge. Upon their Arrival Don John, aſſiſted by the Prince of Parma, and other chief Spaniſh Commanders, being aſſur'd of Victory, ſet furiouſly upon them, before they expected him, yet after a long Fight was forc'd to retreat: Then wheeling about, and endeavouring to break through certain Hedges and Coverts, where the Engliſh and Scotch Volunteers had plac'd themſelves, he was again repuls'd; for the Engliſh and Scotch were ſo violently hot in the Conflict, that throwing away their Garments, they fought bravely in their Shirts faſten'd about their Thighs. Norris the Engliſh General, fighting valiantly, had three Horſes ſlain under him, and gain'd great Reputation; as alſo did Stuart a Scotchman, Pingham Lieutenant to Cavendiſh, and William Markham. To comfort the afflicted Provinces, Ambaſſadors were ſent from the Emperor, and the French King, and laſtly from the Queen of England, with Commiſſions to procure Conditions of Peace; but they return'd without effecting any thing; by reaſon that Don John refus'd to admit the Proteſtant Religion, and the Prince of Orange refus'd to return into Holland. About this time Egremond Ratcliff, Son to the Earl of Suſſex, who had been a violent Man in the Rebellion in the North, and now ſerv'd under the Spaniard, was accus'd by the Engliſh Fugitives, that he was ſecretly ſent to aſſaſſinate Don John; but whether it was true or falſe, he was thereupon apprehended and put to Death. The Spaniards affirm'd that at his Execution he confeſs'd, That he was freed out of London Tower, and mov'd by Walſingham's large Promiſes to commit this Fact; but the Engliſh that were preſent deny'd that he confeſs'd any ſuch thing, tho' the Engliſh Rebels us'd all means to extort this Confeſſion from him. Shortly after Don John himſelf dy'd, as ſome ſay of Grief, for being neglected by the King of Spain his Brother; a Man of an inſatiable Ambition, who firſt aim'd at the Kingdom of Tunis, and then that of England, and who without the Privity of the Kings of France or Spain, had made a League with the Guiſes, for the Defence of both Crowns.

The Death of Don John.

In the mean time new Alterations began to be made in the Kingdom of Scotland, where the Earl of Morton ſtill govern'd as Regent; who tho' he was a Man of great Wiſdom and Valour, was now ſo overcome with Avarice, that he became univerſally hated. Whereupon, with the joint Conſent of the Nobility, the Adminiſtration of the Government was transferr'd to the King, tho' he was yet but twelve Years of Age; and twelve of the principal Lords were appointed to attend in Council, three of them by Courſe for three Months; among whom the Earl of Morton was one, that he might not ſeem to be totally laid aſide. The young, but underſtanding King, having aſſum'd the Adminiſtration to himſelf, immediately ſent the Earl of Dumferlin to Queen Elizabeth, acknowledging her great Favours to him, and deſir'd to have the Treaty of Edinburgh confirm'd; and withal, That his ancient Patrimony in England, deſcending from his Grandfather and Grand-mother, the Earl and Counteſs of Lenox, might be deliver'd to him, as neareſt Heir. The Queen readily promis'd to grant the former Demands, but a little heſitated on the latter; for ſhe would not grant, That Arbella, Daughter of Charles the King of Scotland's Uncle, and born in England, was next Heir to the Lands in England; nor would ſhe allow the Ambaſſadors Proof out of Hiſtory, that the Kings of the Scots, born in Scotland, did anciently hold the Earldom of Huntington by Right of Inheritance. Yet ſhe commanded a Sequeſtration to be made of the Revenues of thoſe Lands by Burghly Maſter of the Wards; and ſignify'd to the Ambaſſador, That the King ſhould ſatisfie his Grand-mother's Creditors out of the Lands of the Earl of Lenox in Scotland. For ſhe took it unkindly that the King had recall'd the Infeoffment of the Earldom of Lenox made to his Uncle and his Heirs, and to the Prejudice of the Lady Arbella; tho' it was a Privilege of the Kings of Scotland to revoke prejudicial Donations made in their Minority. The Earl of Morton in the mean time, not enduring the Diſgrace of being remov'd from his Regency, regarded not the Form of Government lately made, but drew the Adminiſtration of all Affairs to his own Perſon, and kept the King in his own Power at the Caſtle of Sterling, admitting none to his Preſence, but whom he pleas'd. The Lords being exaſperated at this Preſumption, made the Earl of of Atholl their Commander, and in the King's Name levy'd a powerful Army, and prepar'd to ingage the Earl of Morton: But by the Interceſſion of Bave, the Engliſh Ambaſſador, they were reſtrain'd from Blood-ſhed; and Morton, as weary of Employment, withdrew himſelf to his own Houſe, but the Earl of Atholl ſoon after dy'd not without Suſpicion of Poiſon.

The Pope and King of Spain combine againſt England.

While all Things ſeem'd ſafe and ſecure in England, the King of Spain and Pope Gregory the Thirteenth held ſecret Conſultations, to invade at once both England and Ireland, and to work the abſolute Ruin of their moſt formidable Enemy Queen Elizabeth. Religion was the main Pretext, yet the Pope's chief Deſign was to gain the Kingdom of Ireland for his Son James Boncompagni, whom he had made Marqueſs of Vincola; and the King of Spain's Intention was ſecretly to relieve the Iriſh Rebels, as Queen Elizabeth had aſſiſted the Dutch, while Amity in Expreſſions was all the Time maintain'd on both Sides. Theſe two well knowing, that the greateſt Strength of England conſiſted in the Royal Navy, and Merchant Ships, projected, that the Italian and Low-Country Merchants ſhould hire what Veſſels they could for long Voyages; while they were abſent the Queen's Navy might be ſurpriz'd by a Superior Fleet; and at the ſame Time Thomas Stukeley, an Engliſh Fugitive, ſhould join himſelf to the Iriſh Rebels with new Forces. For he by his large and ſpecious Promiſes to the Pope, of procuring the Kingdom of Ireland for his natural Son, had ſo inſinuated himſelf with the ambitious old Man, that he adorn'd him with the glorious Titles of Marqueſs, Earl, Viſcount and Baron, of the principal Places of that Kingdom; and made him Commander over eight hundred Italian Soldiers, to be employ'd in the Iriſh War. With theſe Forces Stukely ſet ſail from Civita Vecchia, and at length arriv'd at Portugal; where he and his Forces were by the Divine Providence diverted another Way. For Don Sebaſtian King of Portugal, the chief Commander in the deſign'd Expedition againſt England, being firſt to diſpatch a War in Africa, in favour of Mahomet the Son of Abdalla King of Fez, perſuaded Stukely to accompany him firſt with his Italian Forces, into Africa, after which they would both join againſt Ireland. To this Motion Stukely ſoon conſented, and therein met with his Deſtiny; for in that memorable Battel where three Kings were ſlain, both he and Sebaſtian loſt their Lives. Had not Sebaſtian's Fate diverted the Spaniard's Mind from the Invaſion of England, to the Hopes of gaining the Kingdom of Portugal, a violent Storm of War had fallen upon England. But upon Notice of this great Change, the Engliſh Fleet which waited for Stukely upon the Coaſts of Ireland was call'd home; and Sir Henry Sidney, who had been Lord Deputy about eleven Years, reſign'd his Place to Sir William Drury, Preſident of Munſter; leaving a Reputation behind him anſwerable to the Greatneſs of his Wiſdom and Valour.

The Deſign defeated.

A. D. 1579. Reg. 21/22.

In the following Yeat John Caſimire, Son to Frederick the Elector Palatine, came into England to excuſe himſelf about ſome Miſcarriages in the Netherlands, for which the French were chiefly blamable. He was moſt honourably receiv'd, and conducted with great Pomp into London, with lighted Torches by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and to the Court by the chief of the Nobility; where he was entertain'd with Tiltings, Tournaments and magnificent Banquets, and honour'd with the Order of St. George, the Queen her ſelf putting on the Garter about his Leg: And after the ſetling of an annual Penſion on him, and many Preſents made to him, he return'd into the Netherlands, where Alexander Farneſe, Prince of Parma, was now made Governor. Not long after Queen Elizabeth ſupply'd the States with large Sums of Mony; for which William Daviſon, the Queen's Agent, brought into England the ancient Jewels and rich Plate of the Houſe of Burgundy, mortgag'd by Matthias of Auſtria, and the Confederate States.

The Prince of Parma Governor of the Netherlands.

In the midſt of theſe Times of Action, ſtill the Duke of Alenſon, lately made Duke of Anjou, purſu'd his Amours with Queen Elizabeth. For the Alenson revives his Suit with Queen Elizabeth.

Proſecution of which, the laſt Year two ſeveral Ambaſſadors were ſent into England, and after that a third call'd Simier, a compleat Courtier, and exquiſitely vers'd in all the Arts of Love, who came accompany'd with a great Number of the French Nobility; whom the Queen entertain'd in ſuch an obliging Manner, that Leiceſter began to rage, as if his Hopes were now quite blaſted. And about this Time, when Aſhley a Lady of the Bed-Chamber, covertly commended that Earl to her for a Husband, ſhe with Reſentment reply'd, Do you think me ſo unlike my ſelf, and ſo regardleſs of my Royal Dignity, as to prefer the Servant I made my ſelf, before the greateſt Princes of Chriſtendom? Simier never ceas'd by all inſinuating and amorous Inventions to perſuade the Queen to marry the Duke of Anjou; in which he gain'd ſo much Ground, That Leiceſter reported he wrought by the Power of Love-Potions, and other Infernal Arts. And Simier on the other Side us'd his utmoſt Endeavours to remove Leiceſter from the Queen's Favour, and firſt diſcover'd to her his Marriage with the Earl of Eſſex's Widow: Which ſo provok'd the Queen, that ſhe confin'd Leiceſter to the Caſtle at Greenwich, and deſign'd to have ſent him to the Tower, had not the generous Earl of Suſſex, tho' his greateſt Adverſary, diſſuaded her, declaring, That none ought to be moleſted for contracting a lawful Marriage. Nevertheleſs Leiceſter was ſo incens'd at his Confinement, that he turn'd all his Thoughts upon Revenge; and ſome ſay he hir'd one Teuder of the Queen's Guards to aſſaſſinate the French Ambaſſador. It is certain that the Queen by Proclamation commanded, That no Perſon ſhould offer any Affront to the Ambaſſador, or any of his Attendants. About which Time it happen'd,

The Queen in Danger.

That while the Queen for her Pleaſure was rowing in her Barge upon the Thames, in the Company of Simier, the Earl of Lincoln, and her Vice-Chamberlain Hatton, a young Man out of a Boat diſcharg'd a Gun, and ſhot one of the Queen's Bargemen through both his Arms. At which the Queen, who ſat near him, generouſly threw him her Scarfe for his Wounds, without any fear of her own Perſon; and when the offending Party was brought to his Trial, and ſo to the Gallows, upon his Proteſtation that he had no malicious Intent, ſhe freely pardon'd him. Some would have perſuaded her, that it was deſign'd againſt her Majeſty or the French Ambaſſador; but ſhe was ſo far from ſuſpecting her Subjects, that ſhe often ſaid, She would not believe any Thing againſt them, which a Mother would not believe againſt her Children. A few Days after, the Duke of Anjou himſelf came into England Incognito, and unexpectedly addreſs'd himſelf to the Queen at Greenwich, where they had ſome ſecret Diſcourſes together; and then without being known but to a very few, he return'd into France. After a Month or two the Queen commanded all her great Men, Burleigh Lord Treaſurer, Suſſex, Leiceſter, Hatton, and Walſingham to conſider and draw up all the ſeveral Miſchiefs and Advantages that would accrue from this Marriage; which being nicely enumerated and examin'd, the Balance was ſo even, that nothing was determin'd by them.

Alenſon comes Incognito.

As in England there began to be ſeveral Fears from this French Man, ſo there were in Scotland at the ſame Time from another call'd Eſme Stuart, Lord D'Aubigny, who now came into Scotland to viſit the young King his Couſin. He was the Son of John Stuart, Brother to Matthew Earl of Lenox the King's Grand-father, and had Denomination from Aubigny in France, which Title Charles the Seventh King of France had anciently conferr'd upon John Stuart of the Family of Lenox, who being General of the Scotch Army in France, vanquiſh'd the Engliſh in one Battel, and was ſlain by them in another; and from that Time the Title belong'd to the younger Brothers of that Houſe. This Eſme Stuart was imbrac'd by King James with great Affection, made Lord Chamberlain of Scotland, Governor of Dunbriton Caſtle, and created firſt Earl and then Duke of Lenox. The Fears from this conſiderable Man aroſe from his being devoted to the Guiſes, and the Popiſh Religion; and what ſtill increas'd them was his applying himſelf to the Earl of Morton's Enemies, and his contriving to call home Thomas Carre Lord of Ferniſhuſt, who of all Men was moſt in the Intereſt of the Scotch Queen. In the ſame Year a Grant was procur'd from the Turkiſh Emperor, That the Engliſh Merchants might exerciſe a free Trade in all Places of his Dominions, as well as other neighbouring Nations: Upon which was erected the remarkable Company of Turkey Merchants; managing a moſt gainful Trade to Conſtantinople, Smyrna, Egypt, Aleppo, Cyprus, and other Parts, for Spices, Cottons, Raw-Silks, Tapeſtries, Indico, Currants, and other Commodities. About the ſame Time dy'd the Lord-Keeper, the famous Sir Nicholas Bacon; a Man of ſingular Wiſdom, admirable Eloquence and Memory, and a great Support in the Queen's Privy-Council: In whoſe Place ſucceeded Sir Thomas Bromley, the Queen's Sollicitor, with the Title of Lord-Chancellor of England. Bacon's Death was follow'd by that of Sir Thomas Greſham, Citizen of London and the Queen's Merchant; who for an Ornament to his Country, and for the Benefit of Merchants, built a noble Walking-Place in London, which the Queen nam'd The Royal Exchange; and gave a large Houſe he had in the City to the Profeſſors of ſeveral Sorts of Learning, ſince call'd Greſham-College.

VIII. There was now a general Calm throughout the Queen's Dominions, only ſome Diſturbances were rais'd in Ireland by Fitz-Morris, and by the Landing of ſome Spaniſh and Italian Soldiers, all which were ſoon ſuppreſs'd. But about this Time there aroſe other Kinds of Diſquiets in the Nation from the reſtleſs Endeavours of many of the Romiſh Party, and from the Management and Contrivances of Foreign Seminaries, which had been formerly erected to propagate their Religion in England. In theſe Seminaries, among other Diſputations, it was concluded, 'That the Pope had ſuch a Pleni-'tude of Power, by Divine Right, over the whole Chriſtian World, both 'in Eccleſiaſtical and Secular Matters, that by Vertue thereof it was lawful for 'him to Excommunicate Kings, abſolve their Subjects from their Oaths of Al-'legiance, and deprive them of their Kingdoms. From theſe Seminaries this Year there came two Emiſſaries into England, Robert Parſons, and Edmund Campian, both Engliſhmen and Jeſuits. Parſons was a Somerſetſhire Man, of a furious and violent Temper, and of an ungenteel Behaviour; Campian was a Londoner, well bred, and of a ſweet and elegant Tongue; and both of them had been bred up in the Univerſity of Oxford, and had profeſs'd the Proteſtant Religion. Theſe Men, upon their coming over into England, appear'd ſometimes in a Military Habit, ſometimes in the Dreſs of Gentlemen, at other Times in the Habits of the Clergy, and ſometimes like Apparators, and frequented the Country Houſes, and Seats of the Popiſh Nobility and Gentry. Parſons was ſo warm with ſeveral of them for the direct depoſing the Queen, that ſome of them were ſtrongly inclin'd to deliver him into the Hands of the Magiſtrates. But Campian, more moderate, made it his chief Buſineſs to convert the People by his Writings, which were ſolidly anſwer'd by Doctor Whitaker. However theſe two Emiſſaries caus'd no ſmall Diſturbances; nor were there others wanting of the ſame Party, who publiſh'd in Print, That the Pope and King of Spain had reſolv'd to conquer the Kingdom of England; and this to inſpire their own Faction with Courage, and to terrifie others from their Allegiance to their Prince and Country. The Queen being thus attack'd both by the Arms and Artifices of the Pope and Spaniard, publiſh'd a ſharp Proclamation in which ſhe caution'd theſe Kind of Men To behave themſelves prudently and modeſtly, and not to irritate her Juſtice any farther againſt them; for ſhe was now reſolv'd not to be cruel to her ſelf and good Subjects any longer, by ſparing ſuch Miſcreants, as they had ſhown themſelves.

Towards the ſuppreſſing of theſe Emiſſaries, a new Seſſion of Parliament met on the ſixteenth Day of January; which was the ſame Parliament that firſt met in the Year 1572, and a ſecond Time in the Year 1575, and is not mention'd in the right Year by Camden and the Common Hiſtorians. In this Parliament an Act was made for the retaining the Queen's Subjects to their Obedience, chiefly againſt thoſe of the Romiſh Religion; in which it was again made Treaſon for any to reconcile themſelves or others to the Church of Rome, and all Abſenters from the Church of England were condemn'd to pay twenty Pounds a Month. It was likewiſe unanimouſly reſolv'd to grant the Queen one Subſidy, two Fifteenths, and one Tenth of all the Revenues of the Kingdom. After which, the Parliament was prorogu'd on the eighteenth Day of March, from Time to Time, 'till it was finally diſſolv'd in the Year 1583, after it had continu'd in Being, by fourſcore ſeveral Prorogations, near twelve Years.

Captain Drake's Voyages.

In this Year 1580, was the Return of the famous Captain Francis Drake, who after a three Years celebrated Voyage round the Tereſtrial Globe, and many wonderful Adventures and Diſcoveries, arriv'd at Plymouth, where he firſt took Shipping, with vaſt Quantities of Gold and Silver, taken from the Spaniards, in ſeveral Parts of America. The Queen receiv'd him very graciouſly, and ſecur'd the Treaſure he brought by Way of Sequeſtration, that it might be ready, if the Spaniard ſhould demand it. His Ship was drawn up into a little Creek near Deptford upon the Thames, as a Monument of his fortunate ſailing round the World; where with great Ceremony he entertain'd the Queen, who conferr'd upon him the Honour of Knighthood. But Mendoza, the King of Spain's Ambaſſador in England, ſoon ſhew'd his Reſentments, and vehemently demanded Reſtitution of the Goods, and further complain'd, That the Engliſh had ſail'd upon the Indian Ocean. To whom it was anſwer'd, 'That the Goods were already ſequeſter'd, and ready to make the 'King of Spain Satisfaction, notwithſtanding the Queen had expended more 'Mony againſt the Rebels incourag'd by him in England and Ireland, than 'what Captain Drake had brought home: And as for his Sailing on the In'dian Ocean, That was as lawful for the Queen's Subjects as his own, ſince 'the Sea and Air were common to all Men. Notwithſtanding all which, a great Sum of Mony was repaid to Pedro Sebura, the King of Spain's Agent in this Buſineſs, which was not reſtor'd to the legal Owners, but employ'd againſt the Queen's Intereſt in the Netherland Wars, as was diſcover'd afterwards, when it was too late to remedy the Miſchief.

A. D. 1581. Reg. 23/24.

About theſe Times new Commotions aroſe in Ireland from the Family of the O-Conors; but this Conſpiracy was timely ſuppreſs'd by the great Care of Arthur Lord Grey, Deputy of the Kingdom, who by terrifying others, brought Turlogh Lenigh to Terms of Peace, who had rais'd Diſturbances in Ulſter, and reduc'd the O-Brians, and the O-Moors to Submiſſion. About the ſame Time, great Feuds alſo aroſe among the Scotch Nobility; one Party having terrible Jealouſies of Lenox Lord D'Aubigny, leſt he ſhould abuſe the extraordinary Favours of the young King, by inducing him to marry into France, and bring back the Popiſh Religion into Scotland. Lenox by his Letters purg'd himſelf to Queen Elizabeth, and openly profeſs'd himſelf of the Proteſtant Religion; yet ſtill many Endeavours were us'd to remove him from the King's Perſon; but they were ſo far from taking Effect, that on the contrary the Earl of Morton, the laſt Regent and Head of the contrary Party, was ſhortly after accus'd by the Earl of Arran of being acceſſary to the Murder of the Lord Darnly the King's Father, and thrown into Priſon. Notwithſtanding all the Means the Queen could uſe to ſave him, not long after he was publickly beheaded at Edinburgh; becoming a memorable Inſtance of the Mutability of Fortune, who from the Height of Grandeur, came to this fatal End: A Man who tho' he had many noble Qualities, yet by his ambitious Practices, had occaſion'd many violent Convulſions, and the Loſs of much Blood in his own Country.

The Earl of Morton beheaded in Scotland.

In the Netherlands, about this Time, the Count Rhinberg proceeded victoriouſly for the King of Spain, and inveſted Steenwick in Freezland; againſt whom the States ſent the Engliſh General Norris, who worſted Rhineberg's Party, and rais'd the Siege: But afterwards ingaging with Verdago the Spaniard at Northone, even when the Victory was almoſt gain'd, the Fortune of the Battel turn'd, Norris was defeated and wounded, and a great Number of his Men ſlain; among whom were Cotton, Fitz-Williams, and Biſhop, all valiant Commanders. Here Camden aſſures us, That in theſe Dutch Wars, the Engliſh, who were the ſobereſt of all the Northern Nations, firſt learnt to be Drunkards, and brought the ſcandalous Vice ſo far to over-ſpread the Kingdom, that in the next Reign Laws were firſt made to reſtrain the Miſchief. But while the King of Spain and the States contended about a few Towns in the Netherlands, the former ſeiz'd upon the whole Kingdom of Portugal, upon the Death of King Henry, as being Son to his eldeſt Siſter. In ſeventy Days the Duke of Alva gain'd Poſſeſſion of that rich Kingdom, and put Don Antonio to Flight, whom the People had elected for their King. The Queen of France, who pretended a Title to that Kingdom, now enviouſly beholding the King of Spain's Dominions thus enlarg'd, by a new Acceſſion of Portugal, and ſeveral Parts of the Eaſt Indies, adviſ'd Queen Elizabeth, among other Princes, to conſider of a timely Reſtraint of that King's exceſſive Greatneſs and Power. Whereupon the Queen receiv'd Don Antonio, and generouſly reliev'd him, as a Kinſman deſcended of the Royal Blood of England, and of the Houſe of Lancaſter.

Drunkenneſs propagated in England.

Portugal ſeiz'd by Spain.

And withal the Queen of France, and the King her Son, for a Foundation of a ſtricter Amity with Queen Elizabeth, urg'd more earneſtly than ever for the Marriage with the Duke of Anjou. In order to which a glorious Embaſſie was diſpatch'd of ſeveral of the greateſt Men in France; who were receiv'd after an extraordinary Manner, and magnificently treated in a ſpacious Edifice purpoſely erected in Weſtminſter, richly and royally furniſh'd; and then entertain'd with Tilts and Tournaments perform'd at a vaſt Expence by the Earl of Arundel, the Lord Windſor, Sir Philip Sidney, and Sir Fulk Grevil, who challeng'd all Comers; not to mention many other Courtly Sports, and ſplendid Diverſions. The Engliſh Commiſſioners for this Affair were the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, the Earls of Lincoln, Suſſex, Bedford and Leiceſter, Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, and Secretary Walſingham: By whom Articles of Marriage were at length concluded; 'Firſt that the Duke of Anjou and the Queen of England, 'within ſix Weeks after the Ratification of the Articles, ſhould contract a Marriage; 'and the reſt were moſt of them ſuch as were formerly agreed in the Marriage 'between King Philip and Queen Mary, conſiſting chiefly in conferring Ho-'nour upon the the Duke, but Power upon the Queen. It was alſo agreed, 'That all Particulars ſhould be ratify'd within two Months, by the faithful Pro-'miſe and Oath of the French King, for him and his Heirs; and a Reſervation 'was alſo added apart, That Queen Elizabeth is not bound to perfect the 'Marriage 'till ſhe and the Duke have given each other Satisfaction in ſome 'Particulars, and have certify'd the French King of the ſame within ſix Weeks. Before the ſix Weeks were expir'd, John Somers, Clark of the Council, was ſent into France, to require the French King's Confirmation: The King would not hear him, but preſs'd to have the Marriage accompliſh'd, as it was contracted. Somers on the other ſide, ſhew'd by the Articles, That a League Offenſive and Defenſive muſt firſt be concluded; which being diſclaim'd by the French King, Walſingham was immediately ſent to compoſe this Difference, who jointly with the Lord Cobham, Ambaſſador in ordinary, and Somers, alledg'd theſe Particulars to the French King: 'That Queen Elizabeth conſented to marry for 'no other Reaſon, but for the Satisfaction of her People; and ſince many Im-'pediments were come in the Way ſince the firſt Treaty, as the Civil Wars in 'France, and the Duke's Ingagement in a War with Spain, which now made 'the wiſeſt of her Subjects averſe to the Marriage; it had caus'd her to deferr the 'Accompliſhment of it, tho' her Affection was ſtill conſtant towards the Duke.

'For this Cauſe the Queen would have no further Treaty to be held, 'till the 'Duke of Anjou be freed from the Spaniſh War, and a League of mutual 'Offence and Defence be concluded. The French King promis'd willingly to enter into a League of Defence; but would conſent to no Offenſive League, 'till the Marriage was ſolemniz'd.

Alenſon comes a ſecond Time into England.

Not long after the Duke of Anjou himſelf came into England, having ſucceſsfully rais'd the Siege of Cambray; and was receiv'd with as much Honour and Affection as he could expect, and nothing omitted, by which he might judge himſelf truly welcome. Inſomuch that in November, as ſoon as with great Pomp ſhe had celebrated her Coronation-Day, ſhe was ſo far carry'd by the Force of modeſt Love, that in the midſt of Amorous Converſation, ſhe drew her Ring from her Finger, and put it upon his, upon certain Conditions between themſelves. All that were near unanimouſly concluded the Marriage in effect compleated, which variouſly affected the Minds of the Courtiers; ſome were tranſported with Joy, ſome ſeiz'd with Admiration, and others were dejected with Grief. Leiceſter, Hatton and Walſingham violently exclaim'd, as if the Queen, the Kingdom and Religion were all at once ruin'd. The Ladies and Maids of Honour, moſt intimate with her Majeſty, were fill'd with Sighs, and cover'd with Tears; and they ſo terrify'd and diſcourag'd her that ſhe could enjoy no Reſt that Night. The next Day ſhe ſent for the Duke of Anjou, and cauſing all Company to depart, ſhe held a long Diſcourſe with him in private. At length he withdrew himſelf to his Chamber, where in a Rage throwing the Ring from him, and taking it again, he with ſome ſevere Scoffs exclaim'd againſt the Levity of Women, and the Inconſtancy of Iſlanders. The Queen was perplex'd with a thouſand Thoughts and Difficulties, ariſing from the Conſequences both of the Marriage, and the French King's Alliance; and was much incens'd at a ſevere Book publiſh'd, Entituled, The Gulph wherein England will be ſwallow'd by the French Marriage. Upon which John Stubbs of Lincolns-Inn, the Author, William Page the Diſperſer, and Singleton the Printer of this Book, were apprehended; and Sentence paſs'd againſt them, That their Right Hands ſhould be cut off, by vertue of a Law made in the Reign of Queen Mary, againſt the Authors and Diſperſers of ſeditious Writings. Hereupon Stubbs and Page were brought to a Scaffold, erected in the Market-Place at Weſtminſter; where with a terrible Formality they loſt their Right Hands, but the Printer was pardon'd. When Stubbs Right Hand was cut off, he immediately uncover'd his Head with the other, and cry'd out God ſave the Queen! to the great Amazement of all the Spectators.

The Match believ'd to be concluded.

Severities againſt Stubbs and Page.

Next, the Queen, to remove the Fears of many, That Religion would be alter'd, and Popery tolerated, by the importunate Suit of her Council, permitted that Edmund Campian formerly mention'd, with two or three more Prieſts, ſhould be arraign'd at the Bar; where being Indicted upon the Statute of the twenty fifth of King Edward the Third, for plotting the Ruin of the Queen and Kingdom, for adhering to the Pope the Queen's Enemy, and coming into England to raiſe Forces againſt the State, they were condemn'd of High-Treaſon; and obſtinately perſiſting to defend the Pope's Authority againſt the Queen, were Executed. For Campian, being demanded after Condemnation, Firſt, whether Queen Elizabeth was a lawful Queen, refus'd to anſwer; but when ask'd, Whether he would join with the Queen or the Pope, if he ſhould ſend Forces againſt her, he openly profeſs'd, and teſtify'd under his Hand, That he would join with the Pope. Such were the preſent Times, that the merciful Queen, who always declar'd, That Mens Conſciences ought not to be fore'd, often complain'd ſhe was driven by Neceſſity to purſue ſuch Methods, unleſs ſhe would ſee the Ruin of her ſelf and Subjects, upon ſome Mens Pretence of Conſcience and the Catholick Religion. Suſpicions were alſo daily increas'd by the great Numbers of Prieſts, who were induſtriouſly inſinuating and ſuggeſting, 'That Prin-'ces Excommunicated by the Pope were to be depos'd, and ſuch as profeſs'd not

A. D. 1582. Reg. 24. 25.

The Duke of Anjou, after three Months continuance in England, began his Journey towards the Netherlands in February, accompany'd by the Queen her ſelf as far as Canterbury; who commanded the Earl of Leiceſter, the Lords Howard, Hunſden, Willoughby, Windſor and Sheffield, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Thomas Ruſſel, and ſome other eminent Knights, to wait upon him as far as Antwerp. And here ended the famous Courtſhip between this Foreign Prince and the Engliſh Queen, after it had continu'd with ſeveral Intermiſſions about ten Years. Being arriv'd at Antwerp he was made Duke of Brabant, Limburg, Lorrain, &c. for the States had long before thrown off the King of Spain's Government, and quitted the People from the Oaths of Allegiance, that it might be in their own Power to chuſe any other Prince. Here the Duke gave free leave to exerciſe the Romiſh Religion, to as many as would ſwear Fealty to him, and abjure the King of Spain's Authority; but after all his Endeavours, having expended a mighty Maſs of Mony, which he receiv'd from England, and obſerving that only bare and empty Titles were conferr'd upon him, while the States retain'd all the Authority in their own Hands, he raſhly enterpriz'd an Aſſault upon Antwerp and ſome other Places, and ſhortly after departed, with almoſt as little Succeſs in War, as he had in Courtſhip.

Alenſon leaves England.

He is unſucceſsful.

And now the Queen, to ſtrengthen her ſelf abroad againſt the Spaniard, receiv'd into the Order of the Garter Frederick King of Denmark; and to inveſt him with it ſhe ſent over the famous Peregrine Bertie, whom ſhe had lately made Lord Willoughby of Eresby in Lincolnſhire. In Scotland, to prevent the Duke of Guiſe's Deſigns in that Kingdom, who was thought to uſe the Favourite Duke of Lenox's Aſſiſtance to turn the King of Scotland's Affections from the Engliſh; William Reuthen, whom the King had lately made Earl of Gowry, with others, endeavour'd by all Methods to remove Lenox and the Earl of Arran from the King. Accordingly, while Lenox was perſuaded to go to Edinburgh from Perth, where at that Time the King reſided, and Arran was abſent upon a Journey, the Earls Gowry, Marre, Lindſey, and others, taking this Opportunity, invited the King to the Caſtle of Reuthen, and there detain'd him againſt his Will, and ſo terrify'd him that he durſt not ſtir abroad. They remov'd all his faithful Servants from him, threw Arran into Priſon, enforc'd the King to call home the Earl of Angus, and to ſend away Lenox into France, who being a Man of a ſoft and gentle Diſpoſition, readily conſented to this Hardſhip for the King's Safety. But not ſatisfy'd with all this, they further compell'd the timorous King to approve of this Confinement in his Letters to Queen Elizabeth, and to declare an Aſſembly of the Eſtates ſummon'd by them to be juſt and legal. Yet they could by no Method induce Buchanan to approve of this Fact, who now with great Sorrow repented of many of his former Actions, and ſhortly after dy'd; having been one of the chief Maſters to the young King, of great Abilities, a polite Pen, and an admirable Latiniſt and Poet.

The King of Scotland confin'd.

In the mean Time the moſt unfortunate Queen of Scotland daily bewail'd her own hard Fate, and the Diſtreſs of her Son King James; and now languiſhing with the Calamities of a long and hopeleſs Impriſonment, ſhe writ a ſolemn pathetick Letter to the Queen of England, in which ſhe largely enumerated the various Miſeries of her Life, and among other things declar'd, That ſhe had harder Treatment than the vileſt Malefactors and Priſoners, who were allow'd their Defence, and had their Accuſers Face to Face. Therefore ſhe conjur'd her by the Croſs and Paſſion of Chriſt our Redeemer, that after ſo long languiſhing in Priſon, her Liberty might be reſtor'd upon reaſonable Conditions, that ſhe might refreſh her decay'd Body, now ſuffering under much Weakneſs, and ſeveral Diſtempers, and wanting common Neceſſaries and Attendants. At length ſhe concludes in this manner, Recall your ſelf to your innate Tenderneſs and Lenity, oblige your ſelf to your ſelf, and as you are a Princeſs, ſoften your Spirit, and lay aſide all Diſpleaſure towards me a Princeſs ſo nearly related to you in Blood, and ſo affectionate to you; that theſe Matters being compos'd between us, I may quietly depart this Life, and the Groans and Sighs of my afflicted Soul may not aſcend up to God. Queen Elizabeth was ſtrangely affected with this Letter, and ſent to her Robert Beal Clark of the Council, to expoſtulate with her concerning her querulous Letters, and jointly with the Earl of Shrewsbury to treat of the ſetting her at Liberty, and to aſſociate her with her Son in the Government of Scotland. And indeed ſerious Conſultations were held at the Council-Table about this Matter, where moſt were of Opinion, That upon certain Conditions ſhe ſhould have her Liberty; but the Scotch of the Engliſh Party ſo violently oppos'd it, that nothing was effected.

A. D. 1583. Reg. 25/26.

Shortly after, King James ſent Colonel William Stuart and John Colvill to Queen Elizabeth, offering all manner of Reſpect and Obſervance, and begging her Advice for appeaſing the Commotions in Scotland, and alſo for his contracting of Marriage. At which time News was brought, that the Duke of Lenox dy'd at Paris, and to the laſt Moment of his Life, had made ſolemn Profeſſion of the Proteſtant Religion; by which he confuted thoſe who had maliciouſly traduc'd him for a Papiſt. After whoſe Death, when thoſe who ſurpriz'd the King were elevated with their own Projects, and concluded him ſecure; he, tho' ſcarce eighteen Years of Age, found Means to convey himſelf ſuddenly with a few Followers to the Caſtle of St. Andrews, to whom the Nobility immediately repair'd, with an armed Force, apprehending ſome Danger to his Perſon. Afterwards in civil Terms he advis'd ſome of his Surprizers to retire from the Court, for avoiding of Tumults, and promis'd them their Pardons, upon a full Submiſſion. But only Gowry ask'd Pardon, and ſubmitted, but with this Diſtinction, That he had not offended in Matter, but only in Form; and then the King ſent for the Earl of Arran to the Court, and reſpected him as his beſt Friend, and imploy'd him to compoſe the Differences among the Nobility, and to purge the Kingdom and his own Court from all Civil Diſſenſions.

The King of Scotland gains his Liberty.

During this laudable Care of the State, Sir Francis Walſingham came from the Queen of England, to adviſe him not to be miſs-led by evil Counſellors to the great Danger of both Kingdoms; and he found the King attended with the Flower of his Nobility, and a more promiſing Appearance of things in Scotland than he expected. At his Audience, he reminded the young King of what Queen Elizabeth, out of Iſocrates, in private Letters had formerly admoniſh'd him; That a Prince ought to be ſuch a Lover of Truth, that more Credit may be given to his Word, than to another's Oath; and in many Words adviſ'd him now in his Youth to be cautious of evil Counſellors, and to continue always like himſelf. The King readily anſwer'd, That he was an abſolute Prince, and would not have others to appoint him Counſellors, of whom he did not approve; but however he had long ſince devoted the Firſt-Fruits of his Amity to the Queen of England his dear Siſter, and did willingly now make Offer of the ſame. Walſingham next deſir'd him, 'Not to impute the late Com-'motions in Scotland to Queen Elizabeth's Actions; ſhowing how beneficial 'to him, and to both Kingdoms, Amity had formerly been, and would ſtill 'remain, if not neglected; and that the ſame might be more effectually con-'firm'd, if the Feuds between the Nobility were laid aſleep by an Act of Obli-'vion in Parliament, and the Peers now remov'd from Court again recall'd, 'Religion inſpected, and a firm League concluded between both Kingdoms. The King made Anſwer, That he gladly would embrace Amity with England, and that he would conſtantly defend the Religion already eſtabliſh'd. Afterwards the King lovingly diſmiſs'd this great Man, tho' he accounted him no true Friend to him, or his unfortunate Mother; and carefully viewing his Affairs, with an Underſtanding above his Years, propos'd and proferr'd Reconciliation to thoſe who had ſurpriz'd and detain'd him, if within a limited Time they ask'd Pardon; in which they were ſo far from complying, that they enter'd into new Conſultations how to intercept him again. Upon which they were commanded within a ſet Time to leave the Kingdom; whereupon Marre, Glames, Paſlet, and ſome others, betook themſelves to Ireland; Boyde, Zeſter, Weems and Lochlevin, into the Netherlands, and Dunfermelin into France: The Earl of Angus was confin'd to his own Country; and only Gowry, forming new Contrivances, after the limited Time, ſtaid behind to his own Ruin. Several of the Nobility leave Scotland.

About this time there happen'd a Conteſt, and thereupon a War, between the Emperor of Muſcovy and the King of Sweden, who apprehending himſelf unable to encounter the powerful Emperor, ſent a Royal Embaſſie to Queen Elizabeth, begging her to intercede for him to the Emperor. The Queen immediately undertook the Work, and by her Ambaſſador brought the Muſcovite to a Peace upon honourable Conditions. But this Emperor dying ſhortly after, and his Succeſſor Theodorus granting a free Trade to Merchants of all Nations into his Country, the Queen importun'd him to admit of none but Engliſh, and requir'd him to confirm the Privileges which his Father had granted them. To which by way of Anſwer, he order'd a Free Trade for all the Engliſh Subjects, ſaying, It was not fit that a ſmall Company ſhould hold a Monopoly, and all others be excluded: But as for the Cuſtoms, he promis'd to take leſs by one Moity of that Company than of any other, becauſe they firſt open'd the Way for Trading into his Country. The Queen treats with the Muſcovite.

This Year prov'd mortal to ſeveral great Men; for firſt dy'd Thomas Ratcliff, Earl of Suſſex, a Man of a noble Spirit, and great Fidelity to his Country: Next dy'd Henry Wriotheſly Earl of Southampton, one extreamly devoted to the Romiſh Religion, and a great Favourer of the Queen of Scotland, which caus'd both Queen Elizabeth's Diſpleaſure, and his own Impriſonment. There dy'd alſo Sir Humphry Gilbert, who was caſt away at Sea, in his Return from the North Parts of America, whither he lately ſail'd with five Ships, in hopes of planting a Colony in that Part of the World. Laſtly there dy'd Edmund Grindall, who had been near eight Years Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, a grave and pious Prelate, who ſtood highly in the Queen's Favour, 'till he was wrought out by the Artifices of Leiceſter, who hated him for diſallowing a Marriage between Julio an Italian Phyſician and another Man's Wife, which he had vehemently promoted. He was ſucceeded by Doctor John Whitgift Biſhop of Worceſter, a very pious and learned Man, who finding that the Puritans had made a great Diviſion in the Church, and that the Papiſts highly inſulted upon that Occaſion, and by that means drew many to their Party, this good Prelate to remove theſe Differences, and reſtore the Unity of the Church, propos'd three Articles to be ſubſcrib'd by the Miniſters. 'Firſt, That the 'Queen had Supream Power over all Perſons born in her Dominions, and that 'no Foreign Prince or Prelate hath, or ought to have, any Power Civil or 'Eccleſiaſtical within her Dominions. Secondly, That the Book of Common-Prayer, and that of Ordination, contain'd nothing contrary to the Word of 'God; and that all ſhould uſe that, and no other Form, either of Prayer or 'Adminiſtration of the Sacraments. Thirdly, That they approv'd the Articles 'of the Synod at London, publiſh'd in the Year 1562, and believ'd the ſame to be 'conſonant to God's Word. It is almoſt incredible to believe what Controverſies and Diſputes, what Hatred and opprobrious Speeches he ſuſtain'd from ſome Factious Miniſters, and what Troubles and Injuries he ſuffer'd from ſome Noblemen, who by promoting undeſerving Perſons caus'd Diſtractions in the Church, or by thirſting after its Revenues, ſought to divide and deſtroy it. Nevertheleſs by his Conſtancy, Courage and Patience, he overcame all Difficulties, The Deaths of ſeveral great Men. Diſturbances in the Church. Whitgift's Management.

culties, and at length reſtor'd the Church to Peace and Uniformity. At the ſame time, certain Popiſh Books written againſt the Queen, and Princes Excommunicate, withdrew divers from their Allegiance, and ſo intoxicated one Somervill a Gentleman, that he went privately to the Court, and breathing out nothing but Deſtruction to the Proteſtants, ſet upon one or two with his drawn Sword, intending, as he confeſs'd, to have murther'd the Queen. Hereupon, he with Edward Arden his Father-in-Law, Arden's Wife, their Daughter, Somervill's Wife, and Hall a Prieſt, were brought to the Bar, and all condemn'd; Somervill as Principal, the reſt as Acceſſary. Three Days after Somervill was found ſtrangled in the Priſon; Arden was executed and quarter'd, and the Women and Prieſt ſpar'd. The miſerable End of this Gentleman, who was drawn in by the Artifice of the Prieſt, and caſt by his Evidence, was generally imputed to the Malice of Leiceſter; becauſe he had often taken the Liberty to call him Adulterer, and other ill Names he had too much deſerv'd.

Troubles from the Papiſts.

In Ireland, the famous Rebel Girald Fitz-Girald, the eleventh Earl of Deſmond of this Family, having by long abſconding eſcap'd the Engliſh, was now by a common Soldier found in a poor Cottage and ſlain; and his Head was ſent into England, and fixt upon London Bridge. He poſſeſs'd large Territories, and had of his own Name and Race above five hundred Gentlemen at his Command; who almoſt all loſt their Lives within three Years Space, after they had been excited to Rebellion by certain Romiſh Prieſts. Of whom the chief was Nicholas Sanders an Engliſhman, one of the greateſt Defamers of the Reformation and the preſent Queen, who at the ſame time dy'd of Famine, after a miſerable and unheard of Manner; being found with a Scrip fill'd with certain Orations and Letters written to encourage the Rebels with Promiſes of large Rewards from the Pope and King of Spain. Upon the Rebels ill Succeſs, the Viſcount Baltinglas fled into Spain, where he miſerably pin'd away with Grief. He out of Zeal to the Romiſh Religion had lately taken up Arms with the Rebels; and writing a ſhort Letter to his Neighbour the loyal Earl of Ormond, who deriv'd his Deſcent from a Siſter of the famous Thomas Becket, he us'd theſe Words to perſuade him, Had not bleſſed Thomas of Canterbury dy'd for the Church of Rome, thou hadſt never been Earl of Ormond: For King Henry the Second, to expiate the Murther of Thomas Becket, had given large Poſſeſſions to his Anceſtors in Ormond.

Sander's Death.

Affairs in Scotland.

In the Beginning of the following Spring, ſeveral of the Scots, together with Earl Gowry, again plotted to ſeize the King, pretending only a Care for Religion, and to remove evil Counſellors from his Perſon; but the King having Intelligence of their Deſigns, us'd Means by Colonel Stuart, to have Gowry apprehended and impriſon'd. Whereupon Marre, Glames, Angus, and other of the Confederates, late return'd into Scotland, fled into England, and begg'd of the Queen to commiſerate their Condition, who had incurr'd the King's Diſpleaſure, only for ſerving her and the Kingdom of England. On the other ſide King James accus'd them to the Queen of hainous Crimes, and requir'd to have them deliver'd into his Hands as Rebels; while ſome about him adviſ'd him to deal favourably with ſuch great Men, alledging, That Terror and Violence were weak and unſucceſsful Supports of Power. But Secretary Walſingham, who really favour'd theſe Men, ſent Letters with a Command, That they ſhould be ſafely admitted into Lindisferne, or the Holy Iſland; where Hunſdon being Governor, and intirely in the Intereſt of the King of Scotland, reſiſted Walſingham's Command, alledging that he could not ſatisfie the Secretary in this Point, unleſs he had the expreſs Commands of the Queen her ſelf. Hereupon there aroſe a Diſpute, whether a Secretary of State might not tranſact Buſineſs of State, without ſpecial Commiſſion from his Prince. It is uncertain how the Caſe was determin'd, but we certainly find that theſe Men never came there, tho' they had ſome Favour ſhown them in England. In the mean time Earl Gowry was try'd by his Peers at Sterling, where being accus'd of many Acts of Treaſon, tho' he gave plauſible Anſwers to every Particular, yet he was found guilty, condemn'd, and beheaded. He was heard to make the common Regret which many great Men have done on the like Misfortunes, That if he had ſerv'd God as faithfully as he had done the King, he had not come to that End.

IX. The unfortunate Queen of Scotland had now languiſh'd under a tedious Impriſonment of about ſixteen Years, without ſo much as once ſeeing that Queen from whom ſhe had implor'd Protection; all which Miſeries were but the Fore-runners of a more diſmal Tragedy, which at this time began terribly to threaten her. For new Projects were now form'd againſt Queen Elizabeth in favour of this diſtreſs'd Princeſs, which only ſerv'd to fix and haſten her Ruin; in which Francis Throgmorton, eldeſt Son to a Juſtice of Peace in Cheſhire, became firſt ſuſpected, by reaſon of ſome intercepted Letters directed to her from him. Upon his Apprehenſion, the Lord Paget, and Charles Arundel a Courtier, privately fled into France, grievouſly complaining againſt Leiceſter and Walſingham, for alienating the Queen from them, and uſing ſuch profound Artifices, as ſcarce any Man was able to live in Safety. The Earls of Northumberland, and Arundel were confin'd to their Houſes, and the Counteſs of Arundel committed to Sir Thomas Shirby's Cuſtody; William Howard the Earl's Brother, and Henry Howard their Uncle, were examin'd about Letters from the Queen of Scotland, and many Stratagems were carry'd on, dangerous to ſome particular Perſons, but thought neceſſary for the Security of the Queen. And certainly now the Malice of the Papiſts broke out more violently againſt her Majeſty than ever before; for in printed Books they excited the Queen's own Servants to attempt the like upon her, that Judith did upon Holofernes. The Author of theſe Books could not be found; but the Suſpicion lay chiefly upon one Gregory Martin, formerly of Oxford; and Carter a Bookſeller, who printed them, was executed. And whereas the Papiſts maliciouſly traduc'd the Queen for Cruelty, ſhe, deſirous always to leave a glorious Name behind her, highly blam'd the Commiſſioners againſt the Papiſts, as uſing Severities injurious to her Honour. Inſomuch that they were forc'd to purge themſelves in a printed Declaration, proteſting, 'That they queſtion'd no Man barely for his Religion, but only for dangerous Attempts againſt the Queen and State; and 'that Campian himſelf was never ſo rack'd, but that he was immediately able 'to walk, and ſubſcribe his Confeſſion. But all this did not give the Queen Satisfaction, but ſhe commanded the Commiſſioners to forbear Tortures, and the Judges other Puniſhments; and not long after, when no leſs than ſeventy Prieſts were taken, and ſome of them condemn'd, and the reſt in the ſame Danger, ſhe caus'd them all to be ſhipp'd off, and ſent out of England.

A. D. 1584. Reg. 26/27.

New Projects for freeing the Queen of the Scots.

The Queen's Clemency.

At this time Mendoza, the turbulent Spaniſh Ambaſſador, was commanded to leave the Nation, for joining with Throgmorton in his Treaſon againſt the Queen: Whereupon Sir William Wade was ſent to the King of Spain to ſatisfie him how ill Mendoza had diſcharg'd the Office of an Ambaſſador in England. The King being diſguſted, refus'd him his Preſence, but in a ſlighting manner turn'd him over to his Council; upon which Wade with a juſt Indignation boldly affirm'd, That it was a declar'd Cuſtom among Princes, tho' in the Height of War, to give Audience to all Ambaſſadors, and return'd into England without being heard. The principal Matters charg'd upon Mendoza were learnt from Throgmorton's Confeſſion; for when he was in Danger of being apprehended, he ſent to Mendoza a Box of Writings; and when his Cheſts were ſearch'd, there were found two Catalogues, in one the Names of the Ports of England, and in the other the Names of the Nobility and Gentry of England that favour'd the Romiſh Religion. Theſe being produc'd in the Preſence of Throgmorton, he declar'd they were Counterfeit, and ſtood firmly upon the very Rack; but being brought a ſecond Time to the Rack, he then then confeſs'd all: 'That Morgan, by Letters out of France, had given him 'Information that the Catholick Princes had determin'd to invade England, 'and with the Aſſiſtance of the Duke of Guiſe, to free the Queen of Scotland; 'and that nothing was now wanting but Mony and Aids in England: For the 'procuring of which, Charles Paget, under the feign'd Name of Mope, was 'ſent into Suſſex, where the Duke of Guiſe deſign'd to land; and that he had 'imparted all this Matter to Mendoza, and intimated the Names of the Ports, 'and the Noblemen that ſhould aſſiſt. But being arraign'd at the Guild-Hall, he deny'd all this again, declaring, He only made that Confeſſion to prevent being rack'd a ſecond Time. Yet being condemn'd to die, he flying to the Queen's Mercy, made almoſt the ſame Confeſſion a ſecond Time; and then being brought to the Gallows, he again went about to deny all that he had ſaid. So falſe is a Man's Mind to it ſelf, while it is divided between Hopes and Terrors, and lyes under the Burden of ſome hainous Guilt.

His Execution.

The Matter did not end here; for Sir William Wade being return'd from Spain, was now imploy'd to the Queen of Scotland concerning the Treaty begun two Years before: To whom the diſtreſs'd Queen ſincerely profeſs'd, 'That ſhe had devoted her Service and her ſelf to the Queen of England; and 'made ſolemn Promiſe, that if the former Treaty might proceed, ſhe would 'mediate with the King her Son to receive the Earl of Angus, and the other 'Scotch Lords into Favour, and would command the Biſhop of Roſs and 'Glaſco, her Agents in France, to have no further Concern with the Engliſh 'Fugitives. Theſe Things were gladly heard by Queen Elizabeth, who thereupon ſent Beal to the Queen of Scotland, who jointly with the Earl of Shrewſbury ſhould ſignifie to her, 'That if ſhe continu'd in the ſame Thoughts ſhe 'had deliver'd to Wade, Sir Walter Mildmay ſhould come immediately to her, 'and treat concerning her Liberty: But withal, ſhe commanded Mildmay and Beal carefully to ſound her, to diſcover all the Practices that were carrying on by the Duke of Guiſe. To what ſhe had ſpoken to Sir William Wade, the Scotch Queen gave a very cautious Anſwer; but to that concerning the Duke of Guiſe, ſhe plainly confeſs'd; 'That being ſickly her ſelf, and weak of Bo-'dy, ſhe had committed her ſelf, and her Son to the Protection of the Duke 'of Guiſe, her dear Couſin, of whoſe Deſigns ſhe knew nothing; nor if ſhe 'did, would ſhe diſcloſe them, unleſs ſhe might be ſure of her own Liberty. 'Laſtly ſhe requeſted, That being a free and abſolute Prince, ſhe might not be 'worſe treated, than Queen Elizabeth her ſelf was when ſhe was a Subject, 'and detain'd in Priſon by her Siſter. Theſe Particulars had a Hearing, but not the expected Effect, and the rather becauſe of a ſtrange Accident: For Creighton a Scotch Jeſuit, being, as he was ſailing from the Netherlands, taken by Dutch Pirats, had certain Papers which he tore and threw Over-Board, which by the Wind were blown back into the Veſſel, and brought to Sir William Wade, who patching them together with much Labour and Art, diſcover'd by them ſome new Deſigns of the Pope, the King of Spain and the Guiſes, concerning the Invaſion of England. Whereupon, and upon divers other Rumors, the better to provide for the Security of the Queen, a great Number of her Subjects, of all Ranks and Conditions, having the Earl of Leiceſter at the Head of them, mutually bound themſelves to each other by their Oaths and Subſcriptions, to perſecute all ſuch to Death, who ſhould attempt any thing againſt the Queen: Which League of theirs they call'd The Aſſociation.

New Propoſals by the Queen of the Scots.

They are ineffectual.

An Aſſociation.

This was a new Blow to the Queen of Scotland, who immediately apprehended that this Aſſociation aim'd at her Deſtruction; therefore by her Secretary Narve, ſhe propos'd to the Queen and Council; 'That if ſhe might have her 'Liberty granted, and be aſſur'd of the Queen's Love, ſhe would comply in 'all Things, and enter into a ſtrict League and Amity with her; and paſſing 'by all Matters of Diſpleaſure, eſteem and honour her above all the Princes 'of the Chriſtian World: And, ſaving the ancient League between France and Scotland,

The Queen of the Scots ſubmits.

'Scotland, ſhe her ſelf would be comprehended in the Aſſociation, and a League 'Defenſive, againſt all who ſhould endeavour to injure the Queen. Queen Elizabeth was highly pleas'd with this Submiſſion, and in all Probability did fully deſign to give her her Liberty; but was prevented by the Clamors of ſome in England, and a far greater Number in Scotland, who exclaim'd, That Queen Elizabeth could be no longer in Safety, if Queen Mary was at Liberty: That both Kingdoms were intirely ruin'd, if ſhe was allow'd any Share in the Government of Scotland; and that the Reform'd Religion lay a bleeding, if Papiſts were admitted within the Court Walls. Nor was this all; for the Scotch Miniſters in their Pulpits, loaded their Queen with all manner of Calumnies, and moſt rudely ſlander'd the King himſelf, and his Council. And being cited to appear before him, they refus'd, declaring, That the Pulpits were exempt from all Regal Authority, and that Eccleſiaſtical Perſons were not to be cenſur'd by the Prince, but by their own Conſiſtory. Which was directly contrary to the Laws made this Year in the Scotch Parliament, 'By which the 'King's Authority over all Perſons, whether Eccleſiaſtical or Secular, was 'confirm'd; That the King and Council were Supream Judges in all Cauſes, 'and whoever refus'd to be try'd by them, ſhould be guilty of High-Treaſon: 'All Presbyterian and Lay Conventicles were forbidden, Parity of Clergy re-'mov'd, and the Authority of Biſhops reſtor'd, whoſe Function the Presbyte-'ries had condemn'd as Wicked and Antichriſtian: And laſtly all Scurrilous 'Libels againſt the King or his Mother were prohibited, of which ſome were 'nam'd in the Act.

But all in vain.

At this time, upon the various Suggeſtions of her Adverſaries, the Scotch Queen was taken from the Earl of Shrewsbury, who had faithfully kept her for fifteen Years, and committed to the Cuſtody of Sir Amias Powlet, and Sir Drue Drury; and that purpoſely, as ſome were perſuaded, to drive her into Snares and deſperate Attempts. This gave her new Terrors, and now ſhe became more importunate with the Pope and King of Spain, to haſten their Deſigns, whatever Miſchiefs befel her; which were like to be great indeed, if what ſome ſay be true, that Leiceſter ſent ſome Aſſaſſinates to murther her, but Drury deteſting the Villany, would not grant them Acceſs. And now intirely to alienate Queen Elizabeth from her, it was ſtrongly infus'd into her, 'That Allen for the Catholicks of the Clergy, Ingleſield for the Laity, and 'the Biſhop of Roſs for the Queen of Scotland, with the Approbation of the 'Pope and King of Spain, had mutually conſpir'd to depoſe her, and to bar the 'King of Scotland from his Hereditary Right to England, and to marry the 'Queen of the Scots to an Engliſh Nobleman of the Romiſh Religion, whom 'the Engliſh Catholicks ſhould chuſe King of England, and the Pope confirm 'the Election. All this was believ'd upon the Credit of Hart a Prieſt; but who was the Engliſh Nobleman, Walſingham inquir'd with all imaginable Diligence, but could never diſcover it. But the Suſpicion fell upon Henry Howard, the Duke of Norfolk's Brother who was unmarry'd, and in great Eſteem among the Romaniſts.

The Queen of the Scots remov'd.

New Fears concerning her.

In this Year the Traiterous Earl of Weſtmorland ended his Life obſcurely in a miſerable Exile, being the laſt of his Family, which had formerly been fruitful in Nobility. In England dy'd Edmund Plowden, the famous common Lawyer: In France, dy'd the Duke of Anjou, of a Sickneſs contracted by Grief and Uneaſineſs; and in Holland dy'd William Prince of Orange, being treacherouſly ſhot with three Bullets by Balthazar a Burgundian.

D^r Ewr. &c. In the midſt of theſe buſie Times a new Parliament was call'd, which firſt met on the twenty third Day of November 1584, and continu'd ſitting for about three Months at two ſeveral Meetings, between which was one Adjournment of about forty Days ſpace. In this Parliament, when a Bill was read againſt the Jeſuits in the Houſe of Commons, William Parry a Welſhman, and Doctor of the Law, ſingly ſtood up, and exclaim'd againſt it as a cruel and bloody bloody Law; and his Reaſons being demanded, he ſtoutly refus'd, unleſs requir'd by the Lords of the Council. Upon which he was committed to the Gate-Houſe; but upon his Submiſſion he was again receiv'd into the Houſe. Shortly after, he was accus'd by Edward Nevil, for holding ſecret Conſultations about deſtroying the Queen; which at firſt he confidently deny'd, but being confronted by Nevil, and ſent to the Tower, he voluntarily confeſs'd That the reading of Allen's Book againſt the Juſtice of Britain, in which he taught Princes Excommunicate for Hereſie might be depriv'd of Life, had put him upon the Attempt: And tho' he had often Opportuities to effect it, yet the bright Majeſty of the Queen's Preſence quite aw'd and diſarm'd him. He likewiſe in his Letters to the Queen, the Lord Burleigh and the Earl of Leiceſter, acknowledg'd his Crime, and crav'd Mercy. A few Days after he was call'd to the Bar at Weſtminſter-Hall, where he confeſs'd himſelf guilty, and receiv'd Sentence of Condemnation; upon which Sentence he cry'd out, My Blood be amongſt you, and in a Fury cited the Queen to the Judgment-Seat of Heaven. Five Days after he was plac'd upon a Hurdle, and drawn through the City to Weſtminſter, where at the Gallows he made a vain boaſting of his Fidelity to the Queen, but not ſo much as in one Word commended himſelf to God; and in the great Palace-Yard at Weſtminſter was executed as a Traitor.

Parry's Trial and Execution.

In this Parliament great Attempts were made by ſome to reſtrain the Epiſcopal Juriſdiction, and diminiſh Eccleſiaſtical Power; but the Queen utterly rejected ſuch Projects, as tending to the weakning of the eſtabliſh'd Church, and the Supream Authority granted her in Eccleſiaſtical Matters. The Aſſociation formerly mention'd was univerſally approv'd, and Enacted in this Form; 'That twenty four, or more of the Queen's Privy-Council, and Peers of the 'Realm, ſhould be ſelected and authoriz'd under the great Seal of England, 'To make Enquiry of all ſuch Perſons as ſhall attempt to invade the King-'dom, or raiſe Rebellion, or ſhall attempt any Evil againſt the Queen's Perſon, 'for whomſoever, and by whomſoever that lays Claim to the Crown of England; 'and that Perſon for whom, or by whom they ſhall attempt any ſuch Thing, 'ſhall be altogether incapable of the Crown, proſecuted to Death, &c. For the Security of the Queen's Majeſty, new Laws were alſo made againſt Jeſuits and Popiſh Prieſts, who ſhould ground any Deſigns upon the Bull of Pope Pius Quintus: In which ſome Caſes were made Treaſon, others Felony, and others a Premunire. Many other Laws being paſs'd, and Aids granted, the Queen with an obliging Speech, in which ſhe vindicated the Clergy of the Church of England, prorogu'd the Parliament upon the twenty ninth of March, and diſſolv'd it the following Year.

The Aſſociation confirm'd.

The Laws againſt the Roman Catholicks prov'd a great Mortification to their Party, and had ſuch Effect upon Philip Earl of Arundel, the Duke of Norfolk's eldeſt Son, whom the Queen had reſtor'd to Blood, that he reſolv'd to travel into Foreign Countries: For having been once or twice cited before the Lords of the Council, and confin'd to his Houſe, after ſix Months Liberty, he wrote a Letter to the Queen, 'Recounting the fatal Misfortunes of his 'Great-Grand-Father, Grand-Father, and Father, and declaring, That for the 'Service of God, and his Soul's Health, he deſign'd to leave his Country, but 'not his Loyal Affections towards her Majeſty. But as he was taking ſhipping, by the Treachery of his own Servants he was diſcover'd, apprehended, and committed to the Tower. In which fatal Place lay the Earl of Northumberland, Brother to him who ſuffer'd at York, a Man of great Vivacity and Bravery, who was made a Priſoner for his ſecret Contrivances with Throgmorton, the Lord Paget and the Guiſes, for invading England, and freeing the Queen of Scotland. Not long after, in the Month of June, he was found dead in his Bed, ſhot into the Body with three Bullets, in his right Breaſt, and the Door ſecur'd on his Side. The Coroner's Inqueſt declar'd, he had murther'd himſelf; and three Days after, the Lords meeting in the Star-Chamber,

Bromley

Bromley, Lord Chancellor, declar'd this Fact of the Earl's, and then commanded the Attorney-General to publiſh the Cauſe of his Impriſonment, and the Manner of his Death. Whereupon, Popham firſt, and then Egerton the Queen's Sollicitor, in long Orations lay'd open all his Treaſons, and how for fear of his Family, he had laid violent Hands upon himſelf.

And now the Queen knowing that the Seeds of theſe Treaſons proceeded from abroad, ſhe ſought to ſtrengthen her ſelf by Foreign Alliances: And firſt to oblige the French King, whom the Year before ſhe had choſen into the Order of the Garter, ſhe ſent the Earl of Derby into France to inveſt him with the Robes and Ornaments, with great Pomp and Solemnity. And then underſtanding that the Guiſes had engag'd in a dangerous League againſt the Proteſtant Religion, the French King and her ſelf, ſhe reſolv'd to enter into another with the Princes of Germany: And to this Purpoſe ſhe ſent Sir Thomas Bodley to the King of Denmark, to the Elector Palatine of the Rhine, to the Dukes of Saxony, Wittenberg, Brunſwick and Lunenburgh, to the Marqueſs of Brandenburgh, and the Lantgrave of Heſſe; and into Scotland, ſhe ſent Sir Edward Wotton, to let the King underſtand how ſincerely ſhe ſtood affected to him, and withal to perſuade him into a League of mutual Defence and Offence, and to recommend to him the King of Denmark's Daughter in Marriage. The King was very inclinable to the Subſtance of the League, but at preſent the Negotiation was interrupted by the Death of Francis Ruſſel, Son to the Earl of Bedford, ſlain at a Meeting appointed to compoſe a Difference between the Borderers, by a ſudden Tumult of the Scots, but the Author of the Fact was unknown. The Engliſh charg'd it upon the Earl of Arran, and the Lord Fernihurſt Governor of the Middle-Borders. Whereupon at the Queen's Complaint, the Earl of Arran was confin'd, and Fernihurſt committed to Priſon at Dundee, where he dy'd; being a Man of great Valour and Reſolution, and one who was always firm to the Intereſt of the Queen of Scotland.

The Queen's Alliances.

But Queen Elizabeth not thus ſatisfy'd, by way of Contrivance gave leave to the Scotch Lords, the Hamiltons, Angus, Marre, Glames, and other Exiles in England, to return ſecretly into Scotland, ſupplying them with Mony to ſuppreſs the Earl of Arran. For Maxwell, lately made Earl of Bothwell, Baron Humes, and others in Scotland, had already promis'd them their Aſſiſtance, even in the very Court; where by Wotton's Policy, Sir Patrick Gray, Belenden the Juſtice-Clerk, and Maitland the Secretary, were perſuaded to join againſt Arran. The Exile Lords, upon their firſt Entry into Scotland, commanded all Perſons in the King's Name, to aid them for Conſervation of the Truth of the Goſpel, for freeing the King from corrupt Counſellors, and for maintaining of Amity with the Engliſh; ſo that they were ſoon join'd with about eight thouſand Men. The Earl of Arran hearing of this, haſten'd to the King, and accus'd Patrick Gray as Author of this Commotion; but while Arran was making Proviſion for the Defence of the Town, his Enemies were ready to ſcale the Walls: Upon which Arran being inform'd, that they only aim'd at his Head, he ſecretly fled with one Servant, and the reſt retir'd to the King in the Caſtle; from whence the King ſent Gray to demand the Reaſon of their Coming; they anſwer'd, To ſubmit themſelves, and moſt humbly to kiſs the King's Hand. The King offer'd Reſtitution of all their Poſſeſſions, if they return'd in Peace; but they deſir'd to be admitted into his Preſence, which was granted upon theſe Conditions: 'That they ſhould not attempt any Thing 'againſt the King's Perſon, or thoſe he ſhould nominate, nor make any Inno-'vations in the Government. They proteſted themſelves ready to ſacrifice their Lives for the King's Safety; and of any Innovations, they had not ſo much as a Thought; only they requeſted to have their Adverſaries, and the Forts of the Kingdom, put into their Hands. After a Days Conſultation, they were admitted into the King's Preſence; and immediately the Earl's of Montroſs, Crawford and Rothes, Colonel Stuart, Downs, Arran's Brother, and others, were deliver'd into their Hands: The Earl of Arran, who had fled into the Weſtern Iſlands, was call'd home; and themſelves were pardon'd, and pronounc'd good Subjects. Hamilton was made Governor of Dunbritton, Humes of Edinburgh Caſtle, Angus of the Caſtle of Tontallon, Marre of Sterlin, and Glames Captain of the King's Guard. Upon this all Proſcriptions and Outlawries againſt all Perſons ſince the King's Inauguration, except ſome few by Name, were call'd in; and with an unanimous Conſent of all Parties, the Treaty of a League with the Queen of England was determin'd, and Commiſſioners nominated for that Purpoſe.

A great Commotion in Ireland.

In Ireland likewiſe was a great Commotion this Year; firſt the Burks, provok'd by the ſevere Government of Richard Bingham Governor of Connaught, rais'd a Rebellion; but this was ſoon ſuppreſs'd, for Thomas Burk dy'd fighting, and his two Brothers were taken and executed. After this the Clan-Gibbons, the Clan-Donels, and the Joyes, combin'd in great Numbers, and openly declar'd, That they would have one of the Burks to rule over them, or ſome other Lord out of Spain, and thereupon harraſs'd all the Country with Fire and Sword: And neither by the Perſuaſions of the Arch-Biſhop of Tuam, nor by the Intreaties of the Earl of Clan-Richard, would they be appeas'd, 'till John Bingham, the Governor's Brother, follow'd them into the Woods, drove away five thouſand Head of their Cattle, ſo that after forty Days, half ſtarv'd, they came forth and ſubmitted themſelves. But the Diſturbances did not end here; for now the Governor underſtood, That two thouſand Scotch Iſlanders were landed, and ready to break into Connaught; upon which he gather'd his Men to give them Battel: But they flying into Bogs and Woods, he retreated with all the Signs of Fear, 'till drawing them out into firm Ground, he with his whole Force ſet upon their increas'd Body, and kill'd to the Number of three thouſand Men; among whom were the two Sons of James Mac-Conel, who had long diſturb'd theſe Parts, and the reſt of the Burks who were the Authors of this Rebellion. This was a famous Victory, for the Good of the preſent and future Times; for by this the Name of the Mac-Williams, or principal Lord in Connaught was utterly extinct, and the inſolent Attempts of the Scotch Iſlanders abſolutely ſuppreſs'd.

Happily ended.

In the Netherlands at this Time the Confederate States were under great Difficulties; ſo that they held a ſolemn Conſultation, whether to fly for Protection, to the French King, or the Queen of England. The French Ambaſſador ſhew'd many Advantages, and gave many Reaſons, why they ſhould rather fly to the French King; the Engliſh on the other Side urg'd as many Arguments why they ſhould addreſs themſelves to the Queen of England: But in Concluſion, they had firſt Recourſe to the King of France, and afterwards being neglected by him, to the Queen of England. Therefore in England it was nicely conſulted and debated, Whether it was convenient to protect them; in which the Council was divided: Some were of Opinion, 'That it was neceſſary to relieve them, 'for that the Spaniard by conquering them, would greatly indanger the Kingdom 'of England: Others again thought, They were to be accounted no better 'than Rebels to their lawful Soveraign, and therefore unworthy of Aſſiſtance. So that after a long debate upon the Matter, the Queen refus'd them her Protection; Yet nevertheleſs to raiſe the Siege of Antwerp, then inveſted by the Prince of Parma, ſhe was willing to ſupply them with four thouſand Soldiers, provided the Town of Sluce, with all the Ordnance, were given into her Hands: But while this was diſcuſſing, the City of Antwerp was forc'd to ſurrender to the Spaniard. This gave new Concern to the generous Queen, who more ſeriouſly conſidering the Conſequences, partly as fearing the Growth of the King of Spain's Power, and partly in Commiſeration of the diſtreſſed Condition of the Proteſtants, ſhe at laſt reſolv'd to undertake their Protection, 'and 'to ſupply them with five thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe, under a ſuffi-'cient General, and to pay them during the War: Upon Condition on their ſide,

'Side, that by way of Pledge and Security for Repayment of all Charges, they 'ſhould deliver into her Poſſeſſion the Town of Fluſhing, and the Caſtle of 'Ramekins, and the Iſle of Brill, with the City and two Forts. All which was concluded; and the Queen ſet forth a large Declaration to juſtifie her Actions. Thus the Heroick Queen openly undertook the Protection of the Netherlands, while all the Princes of Chriſtendom admir'd at ſuch Female Fortitude, which durſt provoke ſo puiſſant a Monarch: Inſomuch the King of Sweden ſaid, That Queen Elizabeth had now taken the Crown from her Head, and adventur'd it upon the doubtful Chance of War.

The wiſe Queen knowing how much ſhe had incens'd the King of Spain, judg'd it beſt to turn his Anger to diſtant Regions; and thereupon ſent out Sir Francis Drake and Chriſtopher Carliſle, with a Fleet of twenty one Sail towards the Weſt-Indies, in which were two thouſand Volunteers and Mariners. Theſe firſt ſurpriz'd the Town of St. Jago, afterwards St. Domingo, where twenty five thouſand Crowns were given them to ſpare the Town from burning, and after that Cartagena, which they held ſeven Weeks, 'till the Spaniards redeem'd it for a hundred and ten thouſand Crowns. After this the Calenture growing hot, and diminiſhing their Forces, they return'd towards England, paſſing by Virginia, a Colony that Sir Walter Rawleigh had there planted, from whence Drake brought home with him Ralph Lane, who was the firſt that brought Tobacco into England, which the Indians took againſt Crudities in the Stomach. In this Expedition were loſt about ſeven hundred Men, who chiefly dy'd of Calentures; and their Booty amounted to threeſcore thouſand Pounds Sterling, beſides two hundred and forty great Braſs and Iron Pieces of Cannon. Theſe Things were tranſacted under the Torrid Zone in America; when at the ſame time Captain Davis with two Ships, at the Expence of William Sanderſon and other Citizens of London, found out a Way to the Eaſt-Indies, by the Northern Parts of America, under the Frigid Zone.

Expedition againſt the Spaniſh-Indies.

During theſe Maritime Adventures, the Earl of Leiceſter, fired with Ambition of Command and Glory, and fearing his many Enemies at home, obtain'd Liberty of the Queen to go over into Holland with the Title of General of the Queen of England's Auxiliary Forces. He was accompany'd with the young Earl of Eſſex, the Lords Audley and North, Sir William Ruſſel, Sir Thomas Shirley, Sir Arthur Baſſet, Sir Walter Waller, and Sir Gervaſe Clifton, beſides five hundred Gentlemen. Landing at Fluſhing, he was firſt entertain'd by his Nephew Sir Philip Sidney the Governor, and after that by the Towns of Zealand and Holland, after a moſt magnificent Manner: And coming to the Hague in January, the States by Patent committed to him the Command and abſolute Authority over the United Provinces, with the pompous Titles of Governor and Captain General of Holland, Zealand, and the Confederate Provinces. So that now being attended with a noble Guard, call'd by all Men Your Excellency, ſooth'd with Flatteries, and ſeated in the higheſt Degree of Honour, he begun ambitiouſly to aſſume the Port and Behaviour of a real King. But Queen Elizabeth, who knew how to check the Exorbitancies of her greateſt Favourites, to allay his Aſpirings, poſitively wrote to him, That ſhe admir'd how a Man, whom ſhe had rais'd out of the Duſt, ſhould ſo contemptuouſly violate her Commands; and therefore charg'd him upon his Allegiance, ſtrictly to obſerve the Injunctions ſhe ſent him by Heneage her Vice-Chamberlain. In the other Letters ſhe expoſtulated with the States, That to her great Diſhonour, they had thrown upon the Earl of Leiceſter, her Subject, the abſolute Command over the United Provinces, without her Privity, when ſhe had refus'd it her ſelf; and therefore directed them to diveſt him of that abſolute Authority, to whom ſhe had ſet ſuch Bounds, as he ſhould not paſs. The States return'd Anſwer, That they were heartily ſorry they ſhould incur her Diſpleaſure, by conferring ſuch Authority upon the Earl, without her Knowledge, but begg'd her to conſider the Neceſſity of it; ſince to avoid Con- fusion, that Authority must be thrown upon some Person. Nor was there any thing shocking in the Word Absolute, since the Power and Government still rested upon the People. By these Letters, and Leicester's artificial Submission, the Queen was gradually appeas'd.

His Actions in the Netherlands.

The Earl of Leicester all this time receiv'd Contributions and Rewards from all Provinces, and made Martial Laws; and endeavouring likewise to raise new Customs upon Merchandize, he incurr'd great Dislike among the common People. His first Service was to relieve Grave, a Town in Brabant, which Count Mansfield had besieg'd; to which Place he sent Count Hohenlo a German, and Norris General of the English Foot, but notwithstanding all their good Service, the Town at length was taken; but Hemart the Governor, for his cowardly Submission, lost his Head. After this, the Prince of Parma march'd into Gelderland, and sate down before Venlo; where Skenk a Frieslander, and Roger Williams a Welshman perform'd a great Exploit; yet that Town was also taken shortly after. But in the mean time, the Lord Willoughby, Governor of Bergen-op-Zome, cut off the Enemies Convoys, and seiz'd their Provisions; and Sir Philip Sidney, and Maurice Son to the Prince of Orange, upon a sudden Attack bravely took Axel, a Town in Flanders. From Venlo, the valiant Prince of Parma march'd to Berke, garrison'd by twelve hundred English, under the Command of Colonel Morgan, and laid Siege to the Place; which the Earl of Leicester came to raise, but finding his Numbers too small for the Attempt, by way of Diversion he invested Duisburgh, which he took before the Prince of Parma could come to relieve it. And now the Prince of Parma, fearing lest Zutphen should be in Danger, commanded Provisions to be sent thither, which the Spaniards carrying in a Fog, the English by chance met them, defeated a Troop of their Horse, slew Hannibal Gonzaga, and several others. But in this Skirmish they lost the Glory of the English Nation, Sir Philip Sidney, who having his Horse slain under him, and mounting another, was shot into the Thigh, and after twenty five Days Torture he dy'd in the Flower of his Age, using these last Words to his Attendants, Govern your Will and Affection by the Will and Word of your Creator; in me behold the End of this World and all its Vanities. He had all the admirable Qualifications and Accomplishments, that could belong to a Man, a Soldier, a Schollar, a Gentleman and a Christian: His Obsequies were magnificently solemniz'd at St. Paul's Cathedral, James King of Scotland made his Epitaph, and both the Universities display'd the utmost of their Wit and Parts in celebrating his Memory.

The Death and Character of Sir Philip Sidney.

After this the Earl of Leicester, full of Sorrow for his Nephew's Loss, attack'd the Sconces near Zutphen, where setting upon a Fort he took it after a peculiar manner: For one Edward Stanley, catching hold of a Spaniard's Launce with which he had charg'd him, held it so fast, that he was drawn up by that into the Fort; which so terrify'd the Spaniards, that immediately they quitted it. The Earl Knighted Stanley for this Act, gave him forty Pounds in present Mony, and an annual Pension of a hundred Marks during Life. And now the Season being far advanc'd, Leicester would not lay a formal Siege to the Place, but thought it sufficiently block'd up by the Garrisons in the Towns surrounding it. Therefore he return'd to the Hague, where the States receiv'd him with great Complaints, 'That their Mony was not carefully manag'd, that the Numbers of the English Supplies were not compleat, 'that Foreign Soldiers were levy'd without their Consent, that the Privileges of the United Provinces were disregarded, and new Projects for Contributions invented; for all which Mischiefs, they requested him to provide 'some present Remedy. And now designing for England, he gave a friendly Answer to these Complaints; but upon the very Day of his Departure, he first intrusted the Government of the Provinces to the Council of State, and at the very same Instant privately made another Act of Restriction, reserving to himself ſelf the whole Authority over the Governors of Provinces, Cities and Forts; and beſides, took away the uſual Juriſdiction from the Council of the States, and Preſidents of the Provinces; and then ſail'd over into England upon the third Day of December.

He returns into England.

At home the active Queen was very careful for the Preſervation of the Proteſtant Religion; and ſhe caus'd the Earl of Arundel, who had been in a Priſon a whole Year, to be brought to the Star-Chamber, where being charg'd with harbouring of Prieſts, correſponding with Allen and Parſons the Jeſuit, and offering to leave the Kingdom without Licence, he was fin'd ten thouſand Pounds, and condemn'd to Impriſonment during the Queen's Pleaſure. At the ſame Time the Queen ſupply'd the King of Navarre with a large Sum of Mony, through whoſe Side the Guiſes endeavour'd to wound the Reform'd Religion in Scotland. But her moſt intentive Care was how to unite England and Scotland in one intire Friendſhip: To which End ſhe ſent Thomas Randolph into Scotland, who making Propoſals to the King, concerning a League Offenſive and Defenſive, tho' the King at firſt requir'd ſome Additions, and the French Ambaſſador violently oppos'd the whole, yet at laſt he conſented to it. And in July following, there met at Berwick, Edward Earl of Rutland, William Lord Ewer, and Thomas Randolph for the Queen of England; and Francis Earl of Bothwell, Robert Lord Boyde, and Humes for the King of Scotland. Here the Scotch miſs-liking the Word Offenſive, the League was concluded under the Name of The League of ſtrict Amity, containing ſeveral Articles; Firſt for the maintaining of the Reform'd Religion, and then other ſuch Articles, as were uſual in the moſt friendly Alliances.

A League between England and Scotland.

X. We have hitherto ſeen the Queen of Scotland languiſhing under the Miſeries of eighteen Years myſterious Confinement; but now, when all Things ſeem'd in a peaceable Condition, a new Accident occurr'd, which brought this unfortunate Queen to the laſt Act of her fatal Tragedy; and this was the Diſcovery of a dangerous Conſpiracy againſt the Queen and Nation. The Beginning was from one John Savage, who by the Perſuaſion of Gifford, a Doctor of Divinity, and others, was induc'd to believe, That it was a meritorious Work to take away the Lives of Princes Excommunicate, and thereupon vow'd to kill Queen Elizabeth. But to throw the Queen and Council into a State of Security, at the ſame Time they wrote a Book, exhorting the Papiſts in England to attempt nothing againſt their Prince, and to uſe only the Chriſtian Weapons of Tears, Prayers, Watching and Faſting. About Whitſontide, one Ballard a Seminary Prieſt of Rheims, being acquainted with Savage's Vow, having treated in France with Mendoza and Charles Paget, about invading England, came over in the Habit of a Soldier, and was by a feign'd Name call'd Captain Foſcu. Here he diſcover'd the whole Deſign to one Anthony Babington, a hopeful young Gentleman of Derbyſhire, who by the Biſhop of Glaſco, the Scotch Queen's Ambaſſador in France, had been recommended to her, as one worthy of her Affection; ſo that between that Queen and him, there often paſs'd Letters in unknown Characters. In a ſhort Time, Babington by his Management had drawn into the Plot ſeveral other Gentlemen, zealous for the Romiſh Religion; as Edward Windſor, Brother to the Lord Windſor, Thomas Salisbury, of a good Family in Devonſhire, Charles Tilney one of the Queen's Penſioners, Chydiock Tichburn of Hampſhire, Edward Abington Son to the Queen's Cofferer, Robert Gage of Surrey, John Travers and John Charnock of Lancaſhire, John Jones, Barnwel of a noble Family in Ireland, Henry Dunne, Clerk in the Firſt-Fruit Office, and Savage formerly mention'd. One Pollie alſo inſinuated himſelf into their Company, a Man throughly acquainted with the Affairs of the Scotch Queen, who was thought daily to reveal all their Conſultations to Walſingham. To theſe Gentlemen Babington communicated his Affairs, but not all the Particulars to every every one; to Ballard, Tichburn and Dunne, he ſhew'd the Letters that paſs'd between him and the Queen of Scotland; Tilney and the reſt were to be his Aſſiſtants. The Conſpirators often met at Taverns, where they every Day conſulted Expedients, and drunk and feaſted highly, pleaſing themſelves with the Expectations of great Honours, and were arriv'd to ſuch an extream Vanity, that the Men appointed to be the Aſſaſſins, were pictur'd to the Life, and Babington in the midſt of them, with theſe Words, Quorſum hæc alio properantibus. This Picture was ſaid to be privately ſhown to the Queen, who knew none of their Faces but Barnwell's, who had been often in Court. It happen'd when the Queen was once walking abroad, ſhe eſpy'd this Barnwell, and turning to Hatton, Captain of the Guard, ſaid, Am not I well guarded, that have not a Man in my Company that wears a Sword? Thus much Barnwell himſelf told the reſt of the Company, and ſhew'd how eaſie it had been to have diſpatch'd her if the reſt had been preſent.

Their Proceedings.

This Plot did not continue long undiſcover'd, which was firſt done by the fore-mention'd Doctor Gifford. This Perſon was a Gentleman of a good Family at Chellington in Staffordſhire, not far from Chartley, where the Scotch Queen was now kept Priſoner; and was lately ſent by the Engliſh Fugitives into France, under the feign'd Name of Luſon, to remind Savage of the Vow he had made, and to convey Letters between them and the Queen of Scotland. But being now troubled in Conſcience, corrupted with Mony, or terrify'd with Fear, he went privately to Walſingham, diſcover'd who he was, for what End, and by whom he was ſent into England. The ſubtle Walſingham entertain'd him very courteouſly, and ſent him into Staffordſhire, to perform the Work he had undertaken: Here Gifford with a few Pieces of Gold bribing the Brewer of the Houſe, where the Scotch Queen was lodg'd, ſo projected the Matter with him, that by a Hole in the Wall, uſually fill'd up with a looſe Stone, he ſhould give in and receive out Letters; all which by Meſſengers purpoſely laid in the Way came directly to Walſingham's Hands, who broke them open, and copy'd them out; and by the ſingular Skill of one Thomas Philips diſcover'd the Meaning of the private Characters, and by the nice Art of Arthur Gregory ſo curiouſly ſeal'd them, that no Man could imagine them to have been open'd, and always ſent them to the Parties to whom they were ſuperſcrib'd. In the like manner were the former Letters from the Queen of the Scots to Babington intercepted; as alſo other Letters written at the ſame Time to Mendoza the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, Charles Paget, the Arch-Biſhop of Glaſcow, Francis Engleſield, and others.

The Plot diſcover'd.

Walſingham's rare Management.

As ſoon as the Queen by theſe Letters underſtood what a dreadful Storm hung over her Head, both at home and abroad, ſhe commanded Ballard firſt to be apprehended, who was ſuddenly taken in Babington's Houſe, when he was ready for France. Hereupon Babington became toſs'd with a thouſand Uncertainties of an unreſolv'd Mind, and at laſt repair'd to Walſingham, with whom he had long been a Suitor, for a Licence to go into France, promiſing to perform great Services in diſcovering the Practices of the Fugitives. Walſingham with ſubtle Promiſes drove the young Gentleman off from Day to Day; and at length perſuaded him to lodge at his own Houſe at London for a ſmall Space 'till he could get his Licence ſeal'd, where they might have ſecret Intercourſe without Suſpicion. Thus far had Walſingham ſpun the Thread alone, without acquainting the reſt of the Queen's Council; and would have drawn it longer, but the Queen would not permit it, Leſt, as ſhe ſaid, by not avoiding Danger when ſhe might, ſhe ſhould rather ſeem to tempt, than to truſt Providence. Whereupon Walſingham ſent a Note to his Man Scudamore, that he ſhould more ſtrictly obſerve Babington; which Note was deliver'd in ſuch a Manner, that Babington ſitting by a Table when Scudamore read it, overlook'd him, and read the ſame. Hereupon ſuſpecting all was diſcover'd, the following Night, when he and Scudamore with two more of Walſingham's Servants had ſupp'd plentifully in a Tavern, he aroſe ſuddenly from the Board, and leaving his Cloak and Sword behind him, haſten'd in the Dark to Weſtminſter, where Gage chang'd Cloaths with him, and immediately put on thoſe of Charnocks; and then they withdrew themſelves into Sir John's Wood near the City, whither alſo Barnwell and Dunne made their Retreat. In the mean Time they were proclaim'd Traitors all over England; which drove them into Woods and private Receſſes: They ſhav'd Babington's Head, and diſfigur'd his natural Beauty with the Rind of green Wallnuts; and when they were half ſtarv'd, they repair'd to the Houſes of the Bellamies, neat Harrow on the Hill; where they were hid in Barns, and put in Country Habits. But notwithſtanding all their Shiftings, they were diſcover'd within ten Days, and brought to London, to the great Joy of the Citizens, who publickly expreſs'd their Satisfaction for the Safety of their beloved Queen. The other Accomplices were ſoon after apprehended, moſt of them in the Suburbs of the City; Salisbury and Travers in Cheſhire, and Jones in Wales, and Bellamy, who had harbour'd them in his Houſe, after he knew they were proclaim'd Traitors, was likewiſe taken; only Windſor was never found. Many Days were ſpent in their Examinations, whilſt they ruin'd each other by their Confeſſions, and diſcover'd the whole Truth of the Conſpiracy.

Babington and the reſt are taken.

All this buſie Time, the Queen of Scotland and her Servants were ſo ſtrictly obſerv'd by Powlet, that ſhe knew nothing of all theſe Tranſactions. As ſoon as the Conſpirators were apprehended, and in ſafe Cuſtody, Thomas George was ſent to acquaint her with the whole Affair; which he did not perform, 'till ſhe was mounted on Horſeback to ride a Hunting, and was not then permitted to return, but under a ſhew of Honour, was led about to ſee the Houſes of the neighbouring Gentry. At the ſame Inſtant, Sir John Manners, Sir Edward Aſton, Sir Richard Bagot, and William Wade, ſeiz'd upon Narve and Curle, the Scotch Queen's Secretaries, and the reſt of her Servants, and deliver'd them to ſeparate Keepers and Places, that they might have no Diſcourſe between themſelves, nor with their Lady the Queen of Scotland. Next they broke open all Doors and Locks, and upon ſuch Desks and Boxes as had Papers in them, they ſet their Seals, and ſent them to the Queen: In which, before her Majeſty's Preſence, were found a great Number of Letters from Foreign Parts, likewiſe the Copies of Letters ſent to ſeveral Perſons, and at leaſt ſixty Alphabets of private Characters; as alſo, Letters to her from ſome of the Engliſh Nobility, containing great Proffers of Love and Service: All which Queen Elizabeth diſſembled in Silence, according to her uſual Motto, Video & Taceo, I ſee, and ſay nothing. Gifford, who had all this Time ſerv'd their purpoſe, was now ſent into France, as if he had been baniſh'd out of England: But before his Departure, he left an indented Paper with the French Ambaſſador in England, with Inſtructions, that he ſhould deliver no Letters from the Queen of the Scots or the Engliſh Fugitives, but to that Perſon who ſhould ſhow the Counter-part thereof; which Counter-part was privately ſent by him to Sir Francis Walſingham.

The Scotch Queen's Servants and Papers ſeiz'd.

On the thirteenth of September ſeven of the Conſpirators were arraign'd, and confeſs'd their Crime, viz. Ballard, Babington, Savage, Barnwell, Tichburn, Tilney and Abington; and the other ſeven, two Days after, pleaded not guilty, but were condemn'd upon Trial: Only Pollie, tho' he was privy to all Paſſages, yet, becauſe he had diſcover'd many Things to Walſingham, was not call'd in Queſtion. Babington was executed with great Severity, and while he was cutting up, cry'd out, Parce mihi, Domine Jeſu! Savage broke the Rope, and was cut up alive without any Hanging; which two, with Ballard, Barnwell, Tichburn, Tilney and Abington, were executed with great Rigour, on the twentieth of September, in St. Gile's Fields. The next Day the other ſeven at the ſame Place were executed with more Mercy, the Queen deteſting the cutting them up alive, as had been done the Day before: Theſe were Salisbury, Dunne, Dunne, Jones, Charnock, Travers, and Gage, and with them Bellamy, who had conceal'd Babington after he was proclaim'd Traitor, whoſe Brother had ſtrangled himſelf in Priſon. When theſe Men were executed, the Scotch Queen's two Secretaries, Narve a Frenchman and Curle a Scotchman, were examin'd concerning the Letters, the Copies of Letters, and private Characters found in the Queen of the Scots Cloſet; and they under their own voluntary Subſcriptions acknowledg'd, that they were their own Hand-writings, dictated in French by the Queen her ſelf, taken by Narve, turn'd into Engliſh by Curle, and copy'd out in ſecret Characters. Hereupon Sir Edward Wotton was ſent immediately into France, to lay before the King the whole Order of the Conſpiracy, and ſhew him the Copies of the Queen of the Scots Letters, confirm'd by the Teſtimony of ſeveral of the Engliſh Nobility; ſo that the French King might be ſenſible to what Dangers the Queen of England had been reduc'd by the Practices of Morgan, Paget, and others in France.

The Queen of the Scots accus'd by her Servants.

After the Puniſhment of inferior Perſons and Subjects, a grand Debate aroſe how they ſhould proceed againſt a crown'd Head, the Soveraign Queen of Scotland, as ſhe was accounted by all her Friends; in which thoſe of the Council had various Sentiments. Some conceiv'd it was hard and improper to uſe any rigorous Courſe againſt her, but only to detain her in ſafe Cuſtody; both becauſe ſhe was not the Author of the Conſpiracy, but only an Acceſſary, and becauſe ſhe was infirm, and not like to live long. Others, out of a peculiar Care of Religion, were of Opinion, that ſhe ſhould be arraign'd and executed according to Law; and Leiceſter, according to his Methods, adviſ'd to have her poiſon'd, and ſent a Divine to Walſingham to prove it lawful, but he honourably proteſted againſt all ſuch Actions. Next there aroſe a Difference in Council, concerning what Law they were to uſe againſt her; whether the Statute of the twenty fifth of Edward the Third, 'That pronounc'd all guilty 'of Treaſon who plotted the Deſtruction of the King, rais'd Wars in his Do-'minions, or adher'd to his Enemies; or elſe by the twenty ſeventh of the preſent Queen, enacted a Year before. At length it was carry'd by thoſe who thought ſhe was rather to be try'd by this laſt Act, as being made for this very Purpoſe and Occaſion, and therefore to be put in Execution. Whereupon, above forty of the Nobility and chief Men of the Nation were authoriz'd by the Queen's ſpecial Commiſſion, 'To inquire by virtue of that Law, and paſs 'Sentence againſt all ſuch as rais'd Rebellion, invaded the Kingdom, or at-'tempted any Violence againſt the Queen: All which ſolemn Commiſſion was deſign'd for to hear and determine the famous Cauſe of the Queen of Scotland.

The Commiſſioners meet at Fotheringay.

Accordingly theſe great Commiſſioners, with many Lawyers and Attendants, upon the eleventh Day of October, repair'd to Fotheringay Caſtle in Northamptonſhire, where the Scotch Queen was then detain'd Priſoner. The next Day they ſent to her Sir Walter Mildmay, Powlet, and Edward Barker a publick Notary, who deliver'd her the Queen's Letters; which ſhe receiv'd with a compos'd and majeſtick Countenance, and anſwer'd to this Effect, That it was very ſurpriſing, that the Queen ſhould lay her Commands upon her, to ſubmit to a Trial, as tho' ſhe were a Subject, when ſhe was a Queen, no leſs abſolute than her ſelf; therefore ſhe would never act any thing prejudicial to Perſons of her Dignity, nor to her Son the King of Scotland. The next Day ſome Deputies from the Commiſſioners came to her, with Perſons learned in the Civil and Canon Law, to demonſtrate to her, 'That neither her Impri-'ſonment, nor her Royal Prerogative, could exempt her from anſwering in the 'Kingdom of England, and therefore adviſ'd her to hear what would be ob-'jected againſt her: Otherwiſe they threaten'd, That by the Authority of the 'Law, they could and muſt proceed againſt her, tho' ſhe was abſent. To which ſhe anſwer'd, That ſhe was no Subject, and would die a thouſand Deaths before ſhe would acknowledge her ſelf to be one; by which ſhe ſhould both injure the Majeſty of Princes, and ſubject her ſelf to the Laws, and even to the Religion of England. Nevertheleſs, ſhe was ready to anſwer in a full and free Parliament; but as for this Aſſembly, it was, as ſhe perceiv'd, contriv'd againſt her, to give ſome Colour to a legal Proceeding; but ſhe deſir'd them to examine their Conſciences, and remember, That the Theatre of the whole World was larger than the Kingdom of England. After ſeveral Meſſages and perſonal Conferences, Hatton the Vice-Chamberlain deliver'd himſelf after this plauſible manner; Madam, you are accus'd, but not condemn'd: You ſay you are a Queen, be it ſo; the Royal Dignity is not exempted from anſwering, either by the Civil or Canon Laws, nor by the Laws of Nations and Nature: If you are Innocent, you injure your Reputation in declining a Trial: You proteſt your ſelf Innocent, the Queen fears to the contrary with the deepeſt Sorrow and Affliction. To examine your Innocency are theſe honourable, prudent and upright Commiſſioners appointed, who will all rejoice to find you guiltleſs. The Queen her ſelf will be tranſported with Joy, who affirm'd to me at my Departure, That ſhe never met with a greater Affliction, than to find you charg'd with ſuch a Crime. Wherefore, laying aſide the bootleſs Claims of Royal Dignity, which now can be of no uſe to you, appear in Judgment, and diſplay your Innocence; leſt by avoiding Trial, you draw upon your ſelf a Suſpicion, and ſtain your Reputation with an indelable Aſperſion. This Speech, with ſome others, had ſuch Influence upon her, that at laſt with great Reluctancy ſhe ſubmitted to a Trial. Yet at laſt ſubmits to a Trial.

Upon this the Commiſſioners aſſembled themſelves in the Preſence-Chamber, where at the upper End was plac'd a Chair and Canopy of State for the Queen of England; and over-againſt that, below and at ſome diſtance, ſtood a Chair for the Queen of Scotland. By the Walls on both ſides were plac'd Benches, upon which, on the one ſide ſate the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treaſurer, the Earls of Oxford, Kent, Darby, Worceſter, Rutland, Cumberland, Warwick, Pembroke and Lincoln, and Viſcount Montague; on the other ſide the Lords Abergavenny, Zouch, Morley, Stafford, Gray, Lumley, Stourton, Sandes, Wentworth, Mordant, St. John, Compton and Cheiney. Nigh theſe ſate the Knights of the Privy-Council, Sir James Crofts, Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, Sir Francis Walſingham, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Walter Mildmay, and Sir Amias Powlet. Right before the Earls ſate the two Chief Juſtices, and the Lord Chief Baron; on the other ſide the two Barons, and the other Judges, with Dale and Ford, Doctors of the Civil Law; and at a Table in the midſt, Popham the Queen's Attorney-General, Egerton her Sollicitor, Gawdy her Serjeant at Law, the Clerk of the Crown, and two Publick Notaries. With this Formality, and to this remarkable Aſſembly, the Queen of Scotland preſented her ſelf with all Majeſty and Decency; and being plac'd in her Seat, and Silence proclaim'd, Bromley Lord Chancellor declar'd to her, That the Queen of England had appointed theſe Commiſſioners, to hear what ſhe could anſwer to the Crimes laid to her Charge; aſſuring her, That nothing could cauſe more real Joy to the Queen, than to hear that ſhe had prov'd her ſelf Innocent. Upon this, ſhe riſing up ſaid, That tho', as an abſolute Princeſs, ſhe could not be compell'd to appear before theſe Commiſſioners, yet to manifeſt her Innocency, ſhe did condeſcend to appear. Then Serjeant Gawdy open'd every Specialty of the Law lately made, againſt which ſhe had taken Exceptions; and ſhew'd at large by Babington's Confeſſion, by Letters paſs'd between them, by the Confeſſions of Ballard and Savage, by the Confeſſions of her Secretaries Narve and Curle, That ſhe was privy to their Conſpiracies, and conſented to the Invaſion of England, and the Deſtruction of the Queen. She readily and acutely anſwer'd to all Particulars, tho' very numerous, and alledg'd, That Letters might be counterfeited, her Secretaries might be corrupted, and her condemn'd Accuſers, in hopes of Life, might be induc'd to confeſs more than the Truth; and in this ſhe peremptorily inſiſted, 'That ſhe never conſented to any At'tempts againſt the Queen's Perſon, and whatever ſhe had done was to free 'her ſelf from the Miſeries of a long and unjuſt Impriſonment. After many other Charges by the Commiſſioners, and as many Replies, which ſhe made with no leſs modeſt Behaviour than Preſence of Mind, ſhe in Concluſion requeſted, 'That ſhe might be heard in a full Parliament, or before the Queen 'her ſelf, and her Council.

After this the Court was adjourn'd 'till the twenty fifth of October to the Star-Chamber at Weſtminſter, where the Commiſſioners met; and after Narve and Curle had upon Oath Vivâ Voce, voluntarily avow'd, affirm'd and juſtify'd, all the ſeveral Letters, and Copies of Letters before produc'd, to be true and real, Sentence was pronounc'd againſt the Queen of Scotland, confirm'd under the Seals and Subſcriptions of the Commiſſioners, and the Reaſon for it recorded to this Effect, 'That ſince the firſt Day of June, in the twenty ſeventh 'of this Reign, divers Matters had been compos'd and imagin'd within the 'Realm of England, by Anthony Babington and others, with the Privity 'of the ſaid Mary, pretending a Title to the Crown of England, tending to 'the Hurt, Death and Deſtruction of the ſaid Lady the Queen of England. 'And alſo the aforeſaid Mary had alſo her ſelf compos'd and imagin'd divers 'Matters tending to the Hurt, Death and Deſtruction of the Queen of En-'gland, contrary to a Statute ſpecify'd in the foreſaid Commiſſion. This Sentence, which depended chiefly upon the Credit of the Scotch Queen's two Secretaries, occaſion'd variety of Diſcourſe and Cenſure; while ſome thought them Perſons worthy of Belief, and others of no Credit in this Matter. However the ſame Day a Declaration was publiſh'd by the Commiſſioners and the Judges of the Land, 'That the ſaid Sentence did not prejudice James King of Scotland, in 'his Title or Honour; but that he was in the ſame Place, Degree and Right, 'as if the ſaid Sentence had never been pronounc'd.

Sentence paſs'd againſt her.

The ſixth Parliament in this Reign.

A few Days after, upon the twenty ninth of October, a new Parliament met at Weſtminſter, which was begun by Authority from the Queen, deriv'd to the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, the Lord Treaſurer, and the Earl of Darby; and that not without former Precedents. At this Parliament the Proſcriptions of the Lord Paget, Charles Paget, Sir Francis Ingleſield, Francis Throgmorton, Anthony Babington, and the reſt of the late Conſpirators, were confirm'd, and their Goods and Poſſeſſions adjudg'd Confiſcate. The Eſtates of the Realm, having by their Votes approv'd and confirm'd the Sentence given againſt the Queen of Scotland, unanimouſly preſented a Petition to the Queen by the Hand of the Lord Chancellor; in which they earneſtly beſought her, 'That for the 'Preſervation of Chriſt's true Religion, the Quiet and Security of the Realm, 'the Preſervation of her Majeſty's Perſon, and the Safety of themſelves and 'their Poſterity, the Sentence given againſt Mary Queen of Scotland according 'to Law might be publiſh'd. The more to induce her, they call'd to her Remembrance the terrible Examples of God's Vengeance upon King Saul for ſparing of Agag, and upon Ahab for ſparing the Life of Benhadad. The Queen with great Majeſty both of Elocution and Countenance, anſwer'd to this Effect, 'That ſhe acknowledg'd God's miraculous Preſervation of her, and ſhe rejoic'd 'that after twenty eight Years Poſſeſſion of the Throne, ſhe found the Love 'of her People the ſame, if not greater than ever, which if ſhe once loſt, ſhe 'might be ſaid to breath, but not to live. And tho' her Life had been dan-'gerouſly ſtruck at, yet ſhe proteſted that nothing ſo ſenſibly griev'd her as 'that one of the ſame Sex and Quality, and of the ſame Race and Blood, ſhould 'fall into ſuch a Miſdemeanor. Therefore if her own Life alone depended 'upon it, and not the Safety and Welfare of her dear People, ſhe would wil-'lingly pardon her, and if England might by her Death obtain a more flou-'riſhing Condition, and a better Prince, ſhe would gladly lay down her own 'Life; but for her People's ſakes ſhe only deſir'd to live. After this ſhe pro-'ceeded to tell them a Secret, That lately with her own Eyes ſhe had ſeen an 'Oath wherein ſome bound themſelves to kill her within a Month. Yet after 'all, ſhe deſir'd ſome Space to conſider and weigh a Matter of ſo great Nicety 'and Importance, concluding, That whatever the beſt of Subjects might ex- 'pect from the beſt of Princes, that they might always expect to receive from her.

She is under great Conflicts about it.

Twelve Days after, having often revolv'd the Matter in her Mind, diſtracted with doubtful Thoughts and Cares, and in great Conflicts how to proceed in ſo difficult an Affair, ſhe ſent Meſſengers to both Houſes of Parliament, 'Deſiring them again to conſider of this important Cauſe, and find out a 'more grateful Expedient, by which both the Queen of Scotland's Life might 'be ſpar'd, and her own Security preſerv'd. After long and ſerious Debates, judging that both the Welfare and Detriment of their Queen concern'd all the Subjects, they unanimouſly concurr'd in their former Opinion, declaring, 'That the Queen's Life could not be in Safety, while the other Queen liv'd; 'unleſs the other repented and acknowledg'd her Crimes, or were kept in ſtrict 'Cuſtody, or bound by Oaths and Obligations, or gave Hoſtages, or laſtly de-'parted the Kingdom: And ſince none of theſe would probably be Remedies, it 'remain'd that only her Death could be the Nation's Security: Repentance in 'her was little to be expected, who would not own her ſelf guilty; cloſe Im-'priſonment, Obligations, Oaths and Hoſtages, would all vaniſh, if the Queen 'of England once loſt her Life; and if ſhe departed the Kingdom, ſhe would 'ſoon find Means to Invade it. Theſe Reaſons were urg'd to the gentle Queen by the Lord Chancellor and Puckering Speaker of the Houſe of Commons; and ſhe being harraſs'd with various Thoughts and melancholy Apprehenſions, proteſted, 'That her moſt earneſt Deſire had been, That for her People's Security, 'and her own Safety, ſome other Expedient might have been invented, than 'what they had propos'd; but ſince it was now evident, that her own Safety, 'without the other's Deſtruction, was altogether precarious, ſhe was violently 'affected with inward Sorrow; That ſhe, who had pardon'd ſo many Rebels, 'and by Connivance or Silence had neglected ſo many Treaſons, ſhould be 'compell'd at length to exerciſe Cruelty againſt a near Kinſwoman and a Queen. 'Therefore conſidering the great Conflicts in her Breaſt, ſhe deſir'd them to 'accept of an Anſwer without an Anſwer; concluding her Speech in theſe 'Words: If I ſhould ſay I will not anſwer your Deſires, I might perhaps ſay 'more than I intend; and if I ſhould ſay I will do it, I might plunge my ſelf 'into as great Inconveniences as you endeavour to prevent; which I am con- 'fident your Wiſdoms will not deſire, when you conſider the Circumſtances of 'Place, Time, and the Manners and Conditions of Mankind. After this the Parliament broke up for a few Days.

The Parliament urge her again.

Her uncertain Anſwer.

About the ſame Time the Lord Buckhurſt and Beal were ſent to the Queen of Scotland to inform her, 'That Sentence was pronounc'd againſt her, and 'confirm'd by Authority of Parliament as juſt and lawful, and that the Execu-'tion of it was inſtantly deſir'd by the States of the Realm, out of due Regard 'to Juſtice, Security, and Neceſſity; and therefore they perſuaded her, That 'before her Death ſhe would acknowledge her Offences againſt God and the 'Queen, For if ſhe liv'd, the eſtabliſh'd Religion in England could not ſubſiſt. At this ſhe ſeem'd to triumph with more than uſual Joy, thanking God, and congratulating her own Felicity, That ſhe ſhould be accounted an Inſtrument for the Re-eſtabliſhing Religion in this Iſland; and earneſtly requeſted, That ſhe might have a Catholick Prieſt allow'd her to direct her Conſcience, and adminiſter the Sacraments to her. A Biſhop and a Dean being recommended to her for that purpoſe, ſhe utterly rejected both, and ſeverely retorted upon the Engliſh Nation, That they were accuſtomed to put their Kings to Death, no Wonder therefore if they exercis'd their Cruelty upon her who was of the ſame Blood. At the earneſt Deſire of ſome Courtiers, in December the Sentence againſt her was firſt proclaim'd in London, and then throughout all the Kingdom; in which Proclamation the Queen ſolemnly proteſted, 'That this Pro-

'mulgation of the Sentence was extorted from her againſt her own Inclina-
'tions, by the Importunity of the whole Body of the Kingdom. The Scotch Queen being inform'd of this, ſeem'd no ways dejected; but writing to Queen Elizabeth, without any Interceſſion for her Life, in the moſt pathetick Terms begg'd of her, 'That ſhe might be oblig'd to her, and none elſe, for three par'ticular Favours: Firſt, That when her Adverſaries had ſatiated themſelves
'with her innocent Blood, her Body might be convey'd into ſome Catholick 'Land for its Burial, particularly into France, where her Mother ſlept un-
'diſturb'd; for in Scotland the Tombs of her Anceſtors were violated, and the 'Churches prophan'd; and in England, where lay both their common Progeni-
'tors, all Catholick Rites would be deny'd her: So might her Body at laſt reſt
'in Peace, which while it was join'd with the Soul, could never find Reſt or 'Quiet. Secondly, That ſhe might be put to Death in private, without her 'Knowledge, but in the Sight of her Servants and others, who might give Teſti'mony of her Behaviour, and prevent all Aſperſions of her Memory. And 'Thirdly, That her Servants might freely and peaceably depart whether they 'pleas'd, and enjoy thoſe Legacies which ſhe had bequeath'd them by her Will
'and Teſtament. But whether this Letter ever came to Queen Elizabeth's Hands, is uncertain.

She writes to Queen Elizabeth.

The Condemnation of the Queen of Scotland became the Subject of every Mouth and Tongue in the Nation, which caus'd vaſt Variety of Opinions and Cenſures; and as the Thing was ſtrange and ſurpriſing, it ſoon ſpread to diſtant Nations, and Interceſſions arriv'd from many Countries; and firſt from Scotland, where King James labour'd daily to ſave her Life, and omitted nothing that became a pious Son, and a prudent King. But the Scots were at this Time torn by inteſtine Factions, and more at that Time favour'd the Reigning than the Captive Queen; inſomuch that ſome of them ſecretly ſollicited Queen Elizabeth by Letters to haſten her Execution, which had been deferr'd above two Months, ſince Sentence was firſt paſs'd. The King of Scotland's Agents were daily interceeding, and all Arguments were us'd that might perſuade her Reaſon, or move her Pity: To which he anſwer'd, That ſhe was unmeaſurably ſorry that no Means could be found to ſave the Life of their Queen, and to ſecure her own. But afterwards when they began to mix Threatnings with their Intreaties, ſhe with ſome Warmth ſaid, Tell your King what I have done for him, to keep the Crown on his Head ſince he was born, and that for my Part, I deſign to keep the League between us; which if he break, it ſhall be a double Fault. Sir Robert Melvil, finding her in a Paſſion, requeſted for eight Days Reſpite of Execution; to whom ſhe reply'd, Not an Hour. The French King alſo became an Interceſſor for the unfortunate Queen, and by his extraordinary Ambaſſador propos'd ſome Expedients, but to no Effect.

Great Interceſſions made for her from abroad.

A. D. 1587. Reg. 29/30.

A new Plot againſt Queen Elizabeth.

And now when the Neceſſities of the State, and the grand Stream of the Nation, ſeem'd to obſtruct and over-bear all Means for Clemency and Pity, the French Ambaſſador L'Aubeſpin fell from Arguments to Actions, and thought no way ſo effectual for ſaving the Life of one Queen, as taking away that of the other; and thereupon he firſt dealt ſecretly with William Stafford, a young Gentleman, prone to ambitious Expectations, whoſe Mother was of the Bed-Chamber to the Queen, and his Brother at this Time Lieger Ambaſſador in France; and afterwards proceeded more openly with Trappe his Secretary, to murther Queen Elizabeth. This Stafford, tho' not daring enough to act ſuch a Villany himſelf, yet recommended one Moody to him, a reſolute and deſperate Man, who for Mony would certainly effect it. Upon this Stafford brought Trappe to Moody, who was then in the Common Jail, and upon Trappe's Offers undertook the Attempt: But then the Conſultation was, by what Means it ſhould be effected. Moody propos'd Poiſon, or elſe to lay a Bag of Gunpowder under the Queen's Bed, and ſuddenly fire it; but Trappe approv'd of neither of theſe Methods, but choſe rather to have it done, as the bold Perſon did who ſhot the Prince of Orange. But while they were thus conſulting about the Means of performing the Infernal Exploit, Stafford diſcover'd all to the Lords of the Council: Whereupon Trappe, who was ready for France, was ſuddenly apprehended, and upon Examination confeſs'd the whole Plot. This alſo caus'd the Ambaſſador to be ſent for to Cecil-Houſe, on the twelfth Day of January; where by the Queen's Appointment he was met by the Lord Burleigh, the Earl of Leiceſter, Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, and Daviſon, one of the Secretaries; who acquainted the Ambaſſador with every Particular that Stafford, Moody and Trappe his Secretary had confeſs'd. As ſoon as Stafford was brought forth, and began to ſpeak, the Ambaſſador interrupted him, and with Reproaches and Aſſeverations declar'd, that Stafford had firſt propos'd it to him; when Stafford falling upon his Knees, made fearful Imprecations, that the Ambaſſador firſt propos'd it himſelf. After Stafford had withdrawn, Burleigh gently reprov'd the Ambaſſador for being conſcious or acceſſary to ſo vile a Fact; to which he immediately reply'd, That if he had known of any ſuch thing, yet being an Ambaſſador, he ought to give no Notice of it but to his own King. After much Reaſoning, Burleigh admoniſh'd him to beware how he offended hereafter in this Kind, and provoke the Clemency of a Queen, who knew how to puniſh an ill Ambaſſador; and that he was not acquitted from the Guilt, tho' the Queen might at this Time ſpare his Puniſhment.

It is diſcover'd.

Upon this new Conſpiracy, the Scotch Queen's Enemies rais'd many Terrors in Queen Elizabeth's Mind, forming Reports, 'That the Spaniſh Fleet was 'arriv'd at Milford Haven; that the Scots had made an Irruption into En-'gland; that the Duke of Guiſe with a numerous Army was landed in Suſſex; 'that the Queen of the Scots was eſcap'd out of Priſon, and had rais'd an Ar-'my; that the Northern Parts were up in Rebellion, with other ſuch formidable Relations. With ſuch terrifying Arguments as theſe, they ſo gain'd upon the Queen's wavering and perplexed Mind, that ſhe ſign'd a Warrant for putting the Sentence of Death in Execution; and one of the Perſons that puſh'd her upon this Extremity, was ſaid to be Patrick Gray, a Perſon ſent by the King of Scotland to diſſuade her from it, yet he was frequently uſing this Expreſſion, Mortua non mordet, The Dead never bite. The Queen notwithſtanding, began to weigh with her ſelf, Whether it was really better to free her ſelf from her, or elſe to ſpare her Life; and many remarkable Reaſons offer'd themſelves on both Sides; but thoſe for ſparing of her were generally Speculative, while thoſe for deſtroying her were Practical, and enforc'd by great Numbers. The Courtiers were continually urging the ſame Point; ſome Preachers, more ſeverely than became their Functions, aggravated the Matter; and the vulgar Sort, out of Hope or Fear, inſolently exercis'd their Wits and Pleaſure upon the ſame deplorable Subject.

Queen Elizabeth ſigns a Warrant for the Execution of the Queen of the Scots.

In the midſt of theſe fluctuating and perplex'd Imaginations the Queen abandon'd her ſelf to a ſolitary and melancholy Life, ſitting in a ſilent and thoughtful Poſture, and often Sighing out, Aut fer, aut feri, Either bear, or ſtrike: At length from this Sentence, Ne feriare, feri, Strike, leſt you be ſtricken, ſhe deliver'd a Writing ſign'd with her own Hand to Daviſon, one of her Secretaries, commanding a Warrant under the Great Seal of England to be drawn up for the Execution; but only to lye in Readineſs, if any Commotion ſhould ariſe, and commanded him to diſcover it to no Man. But the next Day, while Fear made her apprehenſive of her own Thoughts, her Mind chang'd, and ſhe commanded Daviſon by William Killigrew that the Warrant ſhould not be drawn; but Daviſon came to the Queen, and told her Majeſty, It was already drawn, and under the Seal. The Queen ſeem'd extreamly concern'd, and blam'd him for his haſty Officiouſneſs: Notwithſtanding, he acquainted the Council with the Warrant and the whole Matter, and eaſily perſuaded them them, who were ready to believe what they desir'd, that the Queen had commanded it should be executed. Hereupon Beal, who in Respect of Religion, of all others was the Scotch Queen's greatest Enemy, was without Delay sent down with one or two Executioners, and a Warrant, wherein Authority was given to the Earls of Shrewsbury, Kent, Derby, Cumberland, and others to see her executed: And all this without the Queen's Knowledge, nay expressly against her Order; for she had told Davison, That she would take another Course with the Queen of the Scots, yet he would not command Beal to desist and return: And this carries us to the last Act of this fatal Tragedy.

The Warrant sent without her Knowledge.

As soon as the Earls were arriv'd at Fotheringay, they together with Sir Amias Powlet and Sir Drue Drury, her chief Keepers, came to her, read over the Warrant, and in few Words admonish'd her to prepare her self to die the next Day. She with an undaunted and compos'd Spirit, made this Answer: I did not think the Queen my Sister would have consented to my Death, who am not subject to her Laws; but since it is her Pleasure, Death is most welcome to me; for I account that Soul unworthy of everlasting Joys, whose Body cannot bear one Stroke of the Executioner. She desir'd to have Conference with her Almoner, her Confessor, and Melvil the Master of her Household; but her Confessor was positively deny'd her, and the Bishop and Dean of Peterborough recommended to comfort her. Upon her Refusal of these, the Earl of Kent in a vehement Zeal, broke out into these Words, Your Life will be the Death of our Religion, and your Death will be the Life of it. When the Earls were departed from her, she commanded Supper to be hasten'd, and sitting down eat after her usual temperate Manner. Then observing her Servants, both Men and Women, weeping and deploring her hard Fate, she comforted them with a brave Courage and Magnanimity, commanding them, Rather to rejoice that she was soon to be freed from a World of Miseries. Towards the End of her Supper, she drunk to all her Servants, who pledg'd her in Order upon their Knees, mingling Tears with their Wine, begging Pardon for their Neglect of their Duty, as she also in like manner did of them. After Supper she perus'd her Will, read over the Inventory of her Goods and Jewels, and wrote down the Names of those to whom she gave any Legacies. She put the Gold she had in as many little Purses as she had Servants, more or less in every Purse, according to their Qualities and Merits. She wrote a Letter to her Confessor, that he would make Intercession for her to God in his Prayers; and also wrote Letters of Recommendations for her Servants to the French King and the Duke of Guise. At the ordinary Hour she went to her Repose, and slept quietly some Hours; and then Waking, she spent the rest of the Night in Prayer.

The Queen of the Scots Behaviour.

The fatal Morning being come, which was on the eighteenth of February, she dress'd her self in State, as she us'd upon the highest Festivals; and calling her Servants, order'd her Will to be read, praying their Acceptance of the small Legacies she had given them, having no Ability to extend her Kindness in greater Matters. Then retiring to her Oratory, she continu'd in Sighs, Groans and Prayers, 'till Thomas Andrews, Sheriff of the County, about eight a Clock, acquainted her, That all was ready: She answer'd, I am so likewise, and came forth in State, with a majestick and compos'd Countenance, a chearful Look, and in a modest Habit; her Head cover'd with a Linnen Veil hanging down to the Crown, her Beads at her Girdle, and an Ivory Crucifix in her Hand. In the Porch she was met by the Noblemen, where Melvil her chief Servant, falling on his Knees, and melting into a Flood of Tears, bitterly deplor'd his miserable Fate, that he must be the unhappy Messenger to Scotland, of the most unfortunate End of his Queen and Mistress. She comforted him, and bad him Rejoice for he should presently see Mary Stuart freed from all her Miseries. Then she order'd him to tell them, That she dy'd constant in her Religion, and firm in her Affection towards Scotland and France: And she ſhe appeal'd to the omniſcient God, how greatly ſhe deſir'd that the Kingdom of England and Scotland might be united in one. Next ſhe deſir'd him to pray her Son to ſerve God, defend the Catholick Religion, govern his Kingdom in Peace, and never put himſelf into the Power of another, as ſhe had done; to certifie him that ſhe had done nothing prejudicial to the Crown of Scotland, and to deſire him to keep Friendſhip with the Queen of England. With theſe Words, and ſome Tears falling from her Eyes, ſhe urg'd him To be a faithful Servant to her Son, and bad him ſeveral Times Farewel.

Then turning to the Lords, ſhe deſir'd that her Servants might be civilly us'd, and quietly enjoy the Legacies ſhe had given them; that they might ſtand by her at her Death, and afterwards be ſafely convey'd into their own Country. When the Earl of Kent ſcrupled their being preſent at her Death, for fear of ſome ſuperſtitious Ceremony, the Queen ſaid, Fear it not, theſe harmleſs Souls only deſire to take their laſt leave of their Miſtreſs; and I know my Siſter Elizabeth would not deny the Preſence of my Women, for the Honour of our Sex. I am her near Kinſwoman, deſcended from her Grandfather, Queen Dowager of France, and the anointed Queen of Scotland. Then it was granted that ſuch of her Servants ſhould be preſent, as ſhe ſhould pleaſe to name, which were Melvil, Burgoign her Phyſician, her Apothecary, her Surgeon, two of her Women and others; among whom Melvil bore up her Train. Thus, the Gentlemen, two Earls, and the Sheriff of the County going before her, ſhe came to the Scaffold, which was two Foot high, and twelve broad, erected in the Middle of the Hall; on which was plac'd a Chair, a Cuſhion and a Block, all cover'd with black Cloath. Here Beal read the Warrant, and Fletcher Dean of Peterborough began a long Speech, concerning the Condition of her Life paſt, preſent and future. But the Queen interrupted him once or twice, deſiring him not to trouble himſelf, and proteſting ſhe was immovably fix'd in the Roman Catholick Religion, and now came to ſhed her Blood for it. When the Dean perſuaded her to a ſincere Repentance, and by Faith to rely upon the Merits of Chriſt, ſhe anſwer'd, That in that Religion ſhe was born and educated, and now would die in it. The Lords then ſaid they would pray for her, to whom ſhe reply'd, I ſhall thank you heartily if you will pray with me; but for me to join in Prayer with you, who are of another Perſuaſion, would be a hainous Sin. Then the Lords order'd the Dean to pray, with whom, while the Multitude in the Hall were praying, ſhe fell upon her Knees, and holding the Crucifix before her, pray'd in Latin with her Servants, out of a Book call'd The Office of the Bleſſed Virgin Mary. When the Dean had finiſh'd his Prayers, ſhe in Engliſh recommended the Church, her Son, and Queen Elizabeth to God's Protection and Benediction; forgave all her Enemies, and kiſſing the Crucifix, and ſigning her ſelf with the Croſs, ſhe ſaid, As thy Arms, O Chriſt, were extended upon the Croſs, ſo, Lord, receive me with the extended Arms of thy Mercy, and forgive me my Sins. Then beginning to diſrobe her ſelf, the Executioners offer'd their help; but ſhe put them back, ſaying, She was not accuſtom'd to be ſerv'd by ſuch Grooms. While her Women with melting Eyes were performing that Office, ſhe affectionately kiſs'd them, ſign'd them with the Croſs, and with a pleaſant Countenance bid them forbear their Womaniſh Lamentations, for now ſhe ſhould reſt from all her Sorrows. Having cover'd her Face, and laying her ſelf down to the Block, ſhe repeated the Pſalm, In thee, O Lord, do I put my truſt, let me never be confounded; then ſtretching forth her Body, ſhe many Times ſaid, Into thy Hands, O Lord, I commend my Spirit! And at two Strokes her Head was ſever'd from her Body, which appear'd to be ſomewhat gray, tho' ſhe was but forty five Years of Age. At the ſame Moment the Dean cry'd out, So let the Enemies of Queen Elizabeth periſh! The Earl of Kent anſwer'd Amen; but the Multitude reply'd with nothing but Sighs and Lamentations. Her Body was Embalm'd, and with Regal Obſequies interr'd in the Cathedral Church of Peterborough; but her Cloaths, the the Block, and every thing elſe that had receiv'd a Drop of her Blood, were burnt, to prevent ſuperſtitious Conſequences.

Her Character. This deplorable End had Mary Queen of Scotland, a Lady firm and conſtant to her Religion, of ſingular Piety towards God, invincible Magnanimity of Mind, Wiſdom above her Sex, and admirable Beauty; yet toſs'd and croſs'd with the Frowns and Varieties of Fortune beyond all the former Examples of crown'd Heads; which ſome believ'd to have proceeded from the Vengeance of Heaven, for ſuch ſecret Crimes of hers, as perhaps can never be either excus'd or prov'd 'till the great Day of Judgment; and others, for her violent Adherence to Superſtition, and Severity to thoſe of a contrary Perſuaſion. But tho' we cannot nicely determine this myſterious Affair; yet we may here preſume, with a great Man, to obſerve and admire at the wiſe Diſpoſition and Ordering of the Divine Providence. For thoſe very Things which both the Queens moſt of all deſir'd, and propos'd to themſelves in all their Councils, were by this Means effected and accompliſh'd. Queen Mary, as ſhe declar'd at her Death, deſir'd nothing more ardently than that the divided Kingdoms of England and Scotland might be united in the Perſon of her dear Son: And there was nothing which Queen Elizabeth more induſtriouſly endeavour'd, than the Preſervation of the Proteſtant Religion, and the Safety and Security of her People: And that the great God granted both their Prayers, England ſaw with unexpected Satisfaction.

Queen Elizabeth afflicted. The Death of this Princeſs however reflected upon the Fame and Conduct of Queen Elizabeth, who little imagin'd ſuch Severity had been acted; and ſhe receiv'd the News with ſuch a Mixture of Grief and Indignation, that her Countenance grew pale, her Speech faulter'd, her Spirits fail'd, and ſhe was under ſuch an Aſtoniſhment and Confuſion that ſhe had no Enjoyment of her Life, Company ſeem'd a Burden to her, inſomuch that ſhe abandon'd her ſelf to Grief and Melancholy, put on deep Mourning, ſhed abundance of Tears, ſeverely rebuk'd her Council, commanded them out of her Preſence, and order'd Daviſon to be try'd in the Star-Chamber. Thus ſhe continu'd for ſome Space; but as ſoon as Grief would give her leave, ſhe wrote a Letter in haſte with her own Hand to the King of Scotland, and ſent it by Sir Robert Cary, beginning in theſe Words: My deareſt Brother, Would to Heav'n you knew, but not felt, the inexpreſſible Grief that overwhelms my Mind, upon this deplorable Accident, which has happen'd contrary to my Meaning and Intention; which ſince my Pen trembles to mention, you will fully underſtand by this my Kinſman. I requeſt you, that as God and many others can witneſs my Innocency in this Matter, ſo you will alſo believe, that if I had commanded it, I would never deny it.——That as I know this has happen'd deſervedly on her Part; ſo if I had intended it, I would not have charg'd it upon others.——There is not any that loveth you more dearly, and taketh more Care for the Good of you and your Affairs.——God preſerve you long in Health and Safety.

She writes to the King of Scotland.

Daviſon cited in the Star-Chamber. While Cary was on his Journey to Scotland, Daviſon was cited to the Star-Chamber, before the two Arch-Biſhops and ſeveral Lords and Judges of the Land, appointed Commiſſioners for that purpoſe; where he was charg'd with Contempt of the Queen's Majeſty, and a Violation of his Truſt, in cauſing the Execution of the Queen of Scotland, without the Knowledge and Conſent of his own Soveraign; which Charge was much aggravated by the Pleadings of Popham, Egerton, Gawdy and Puckering. Daviſon anſwer'd, That if he ſhould confeſs himſelf guilty of the Crimes objected againſt him, he ſhould injure his own Reputation, which was dearer to him than his Life; and if he ſhould conteſt with the Queen in his own Defence, he ſhould do what was misbecoming the Obedience of a Subject, the Behaviour of a Servant, and the Truſt and Office of a Secretary. He proteſted before God and the Commiſſioners, That he had acted nothing in this Matter, but what he had perſuaded ſuaded himſelf was the Queen's Will and Pleaſure; in which, if he had wrong'd himſelf either through Ignorance or Negligence, he could not but be exceedingly afflicted, and patiently ſubmitted himſelf to the Cenſures of the Commiſſioners. After many Debates, the Commiſſioners generally agreed That Daviſon was an honeſt Man, and that in this Act he had done the Nation great Service; but for the Manner and Management of it without the Queen's Knowledge, they fin'd him ten thouſand Pounds, and Impriſonment during the Queen's Pleaſure; and he never could recover her Favour, but only ſometimes to have his Wants reliev'd. Thus was Daviſon, an ingenious Man, but a Stranger to the Artifices of Courts and Courtiers, brought upon the Stage, as ſome thought, purpoſely to ſerve a Turn; but miſcarrying in the laſt Act, was thruſt off again, and not without the Pity of many thinking Men, detain'd a long Time in Priſon.

He is fin'd and impriſon'd.

By this Time Sir Robert Cary, who was ſent with the Queen's Letter, arriv'd at the Borders of Scotland, but was not permitted to ſet Foot in that Kingdom: King James would ſcarce hear him by a third Perſon, and with much Difficulty receiv'd his Letters: He likewiſe recall'd his Ambaſſador from England, and breath'd out nothing but Reſentments and Revenge. Upon which the Queen labour'd by her able Miniſters and Agents, which ſhe never wanted, to appeaſe his Mind, and divert him from the War he intended. Theſe working with Art and Privacy upon the King's chiefeſt Counſellors, and thoſe of his Chamber which he moſt affected, they kept him off from breaking out into open Hoſtility, which was every Day expected. Firſt Secretary Walſingham by a long Letter to the Lord Thirlſtane, who was then moſt in Credit, and had the chief Adminiſtration of Affairs, propos'd divers weighty and important Conſiderations to divert the King from violent Reſolutions. Soon after the Lord Hunſdon, Governor of Berwick, admoniſh'd the King, 'How 'dangerous it would be for him now to begin a War againſt England, and 'what little Aids he could juſtly expect from either Spain or France: But if 'he continu'd his Amity with England, he might be ſure that Queen Eliza-'beth would moſt lovingly account him as her own Son. Then that he might be aſſur'd that the Queen his Mother ſuffer'd without her Privity, ſhe ſent him the Sentence againſt Daviſon, under the Hands of all the Commiſſioners, and atteſted under the Great Seal of England; and likewiſe another Inſtrument ſign'd by the Judges of England, in which they averr'd, That the Sentence againſt the Queen of Scotland could no ways prejudice his Right to the Succeſſion. All theſe gradually gain'd upon his Reaſon and Judgment; and he ſoon began to be ſatisfy'd with Arguments of Walſingham and Hunſdon, the fair Promiſes of the Queen, and the Hopes of being a Succeſſor in England; which laſt, conſidering his preſent Circumſtances among a divided Nobility, a factious Clergy, a diſcontented People, and a barren Country, was alone an anſwerable Argument to induce that King to conſult his own Intereſt, and compound the Matter without the Hazards of an unequal War.

XI. The mighty Queen Elizabeth was now freed from her Rival in Government, and the Head of a contrary Religion, who at different Times had given her great Diſquiets for near thirty Years: But theſe Domeſtick Storms were ſcarce allay'd, when others more formidable threaten'd the Nation from abroad, ariſing from the ſwelling Ambition and ſuperſtitious Reſentments of the moſt powerful Monarch in Europe, the King of Spain. This Prince, upon ſeveral Pretences, had many Times form'd Deſigns of invading the Kingdom of England; but at this Time he began to exert his utmoſt Power, and made ſuch vaſt Preparations, as both ſurpriz'd and kept all Europe in Suſpence, not knowing over what Nation the Storm would break, tho' it was moſt generally thought to be deſign'd againſt the Netherlands. For the Diſcovery of this great Secret, Walſingham employ'd his niceſt Faculties and Endeavours, and with anſwerable Succeſs. This great Stateſman was famous for his Spies, his ſecret Intelligence, and wondrous Management; and is believ'd to have laid the Foundation of the Civil Wars both in France and the Netherlands, ſo advantageous to England in this Reign: Upon which he told the Queen, That tho' the Spaniard had a ſtrong Appetite and a good Digeſtion, he had given him ſuch a Bone, as would take him twenty Years to manage, and break his Teeth at laſt. But now his Buſineſs was to diſcover the preſent Aims of the King of Spain, which were unknown to any but himſelf; 'till this Year he had Intelligence from Madrid, that King Philip had told his Council, That he had diſpatch'd an Expreſs to Rome, with a Letter writ with his own Hand to the Pope, acquainting him with the true Deſign of his Preparations, and begging his Bleſſing upon it; which for ſome Reaſons he could not yet diſcloſe to them, 'till the Return of the Courier. The Secret being thus lodg'd with the Pope, Walſingham, by the Means of a Venetian Prieſt retain'd at Rome as a Spy, got a Copy of the Original Letter, which was ſtolen out of the Pope's Cabinet by a Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, who took the Keys out of the Pope's Pocket while he ſlept. After this, by his dextrous Management, he caus'd the Spaniſh Bills to be proteſted at Genoa, which ſhould have ſupply'd them with Mony for theſe extraordinary Preparations; by which Means he happily retarded this threatning Invaſion for a whole Year.

Walſingham's Policy.

In the mean Time to divert and moleſt the Spaniard, the Queen ſent out the famous Captain Drake, with four of her Royal Ships and ſome others, to the Coaſt of Spain, to ſurprize and deſtroy his Ships in his Havens, and intercept his Proviſions. Drake faithfully perform'd his Office, and entering into the Port of Cales, ſunk, took and fir'd about a hundred Sail of Ships, in which were great Quantities of Ammunition and Proviſions: Then returning to Cape St. Vincent, he ſet upon three Forts, and compell'd them to ſurrender: Thence ſetting Sail to the Weſtern Iſlands, call'd the Azores, by good Fortune he met with a vaſt and rich Carack, call'd St. Philip, returning from the Eaſt-Indies, and eaſily took it; whereupon the Seamen on both Sides, from the Name of Philip, judg'd it portentous to the King of Spain. At the ſame Time Thomas Cavendiſh of Suffolk, in the other Part of the World, who two Years before had ſet Sail from England with three Ships, paſſing through the Straits of Magellan, along the Coaſts of Chile, Peru, and New-Spain, fir'd a great Number of Spaniſh Towns, and took and plunder'd nineteen great Ships, and among them a rich Ship of the Spaniſh King's nigh California, in North America; and ſo by the Philippine Iſlands, the Moluccos, the Cape of Good Hope, and the Iſland of St. Helen, return'd home this Year, being the ſecond after Magellan that had ſail'd round the Globe.

And Cavendiſh

As Drake and Cavendiſh at this Time gain'd great Fame and Renown, ſo two other Engliſhmen in the Netherlands purchas'd as much Infamy and Diſgrace; theſe were William Stanley and Rowland York. This laſt was a Londoner, an audacious Man, and of looſe Behaviour; noted for firſt bringing in the Uſe of the Rapier into England, whereas before Sword and Buckler were the only Weapons in Duels, and it was thought cowardly either to turn the Point, or ſtrike below the Girdle. He ſuffering ſome Affront from the Earl of Leiceſter, fled, and for a Time ſerv'd under the Spaniards in the Netherlands, 'till being reconcil'd to Leiceſter, he was made Governor of the Fort near Zutphen; but being brib'd, he not only ſurrender'd the Place to the Enemy, but alſo by the like Treachery drew in William Stanley to betray Daventer to the Spaniards, a rich and ſtrong Town. As a Reward of their Treaſons, the Spaniards ſet York and Stanley at Variance, and poiſon'd the former and ſeiz'd his Effects, whoſe Carcaſs was three Years after digg'd up by the States, and hang'd upon a Gibbet 'till it rotted: Stanley went into Spain in Hopes of Advancement, but no Man would truſt him, according to a Saying in that Country, It is ſometimes lawful to give Honour, but never Credit to

to a Traitor. Theſe treacherous Proceedings brought the Earl of Leiceſter into much Envy with the Confederate States, becauſe the Traitors were intimate with him; and in long Letters to Queen Elizabeth, they accus'd her Favourite for his publick Miſmanagement of Mony and Merchandize, as well as Military Affairs, and imputing the Miſchiefs ariſing from York and Stanley all to his Credulity. The Queen, for the examining and compoſing the Matter, ſent over, Thomas Sackvile, Lord Buckhurſt, Norris and Bartholomew Clerk: But when the officious Diligence of Buckhurſt ſeem'd to bear hard upon Leiceſter's Reputation, his Favour with the Queen prov'd of that Force, that Buckhurſt at his Return was confin'd to his Houſe for ſeveral Months.

Afterwards Sluce being inveſted by the Prince of Parma, the States ſent to the Earl of Leiceſter into England to come and relieve it. The Town being furiouſly batter'd with ſeventeen thouſand great Shot, and a large Breach made, was defended for a while by Sir Roger Williams, Sir Francis Vere, and Captain Nicholas Baskervile, with great Valour and Reputation; but when Leiceſter, who came to its Succour, thought fit to retire, it ſurrender'd to the Prince of Parma. And indeed the States durſt not commit any great Army to Leiceſter's Command, who they knew had a Deſign to ſeize Leyden, and ſome other Towns into his own Hands, and to make himſelf abſolute Governor of thoſe Parts. Whereupon the States us'd ſuch Means with Queen Elizabeth, that Leiceſter was call'd home with Diſgrace; being ſucceeded by Maurice of Naſſaw, Son to the Prince of Orange, now but twenty Years of Age. Peregrine Lord Willoughby, a worthy Commander, was by the Queen made General of the Engliſh Forces in the Netherlands, to whom ſhe gave Command to reduce the Engliſh Factions to the States Obedience; which by the Aſſiſtance of Prince Maurice he eaſily effected. And now the haughty Leiceſter being come home, derided and exploded for his Title of Excellency, and perceiving that Accuſations were preparing againſt him by Buckhurſt, and others; he privately with Servile Tears caſt himſelf at the Queen's Feet, and begg'd, That as ſhe had ſent him out with Honour, ſhe would not receive him back with Diſgrace; and that ſhe would not bury him alive, whom ſhe had rais'd from the Duſt. This ſo far prevail'd upon her, that the next Day being call'd to Examination before the Lords, he took his Place amongſt them; and when the Secretary began to read the Heads of his Accuſation, he interrupted him, ſaying, That the publick Inſtructions he had receiv'd were limited with private Reſtrictions; and making his Appeal to the Queen, eluded the whole Complaint, to the great Diſappointment of his Adverſaries. Thus was the mighty Favourite reſtor'd, and gain'd ſo much Ground, that ſhortly after he procur'd a Patent to be Vice-Gerent in the Kingdoms of England and Ireland; but Burleigh and Hatton prevented this aſpiring Attempt, by ſhewing the Queen the Danger of it. And being diſappointed of his ambitious Deſigns, he retir'd into the Country, and dy'd the next Year; having his Goods ſeiz'd on by the Queen's Order, and publickly ſold for the Payment of Debts due to the Crown. And this was the End of this prodigious Man; who is deſcrib'd as the moſt ſubtle and impious Courtier, and the moſt aſpiring and prevailing Favourite that England ever ſaw. Tho' as to the latter Part, this great and wiſe Queen knew how to humble and reduce him; and once told him with a ſevere Frown and Oath, That he muſt not expect to Monopolize her Favours, but ſhe would give and take back as ſhe pleas'd; and as ſhe had no Maſter her ſelf, ſhe would make him know that he had a Miſtreſs.

Leiceſter goes into the Netherlands.

His Death and Character.

This Year 1587 was noted for the Death of ſeveral other great Perſons, as Henry Nevil Lord Abergaveny, Great Grand-Child to Edward Nevil, who in the Reign of Henry the Sixth, gain'd that Title in the Right of his Wife; Anne Stanhope, Dutcheſs of Somerſet, ninety Years of Age, who was the Wife of Edward Seymour Duke of Somerſet and Protector of England; Sir Ralph Sadler, Chancellor of the Dutchy, and the laſt Banneret of England, in Camden's and Baker's Time; and laſtly Thomas Bromley Chancellor of England, who was ſucceeded in his Place by Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, who for his Honeſty and Senſe of Equity was preferr'd before more able Lawyers.

A. D. 1588. Reg. 30 31.

We are arriv'd at the thirtieth Year of this renown'd Reign, Eighty Eight, which a Koningsberg Aſtronomer above a hundred Years before, foretold ſhould be a Year of Wonders, and the German Chronologers preſag'd would be the Climacterical Year of the World. The Rumours of Wars, which had been feeble and remote, now daily encreas'd, and reſounded through the World, That a moſt prodigious Navy was rigg'd and prepar'd in Spain againſt England; and that the moſt famous Captains, renowned Commanders and expert Soldiers were ſent for from Italy, from Sicily, and from as far as America, to manage this vaſt Enterprize. Yet at the ſame Time a Treaty of Peace was depending between England and Spain in the Netherlands: The Earl of Darby, the Lord Cobham, Sir James Croſs, Dale and Rogers, Doctors of Law, were Commiſſioners for Queen Elizabeth; the Count Aremberg, Champignie, Richardot, Mais and Garvyer, were for the Prince of Parma and the Spaniard; and all had their continu'd Meetings near Oſtend. But it appear'd that the Spaniſh Commiſſioners deſign'd more to lull the Engliſh into a Security, that they might make no Proviſions for War, than that they had any Intentions of real Proceedings; ſince they rejected all reaſonable Conditions that were offer'd, and trifled and protracted Time, 'till the Spaniſh Fleet was come upon the Coaſt, and the Sound of the great Guns from Sea broke up the Aſſembly, and diſmiſs'd the Engliſh Commiſſioners.

The great Year Eighty Eight.

The great Spaniſh Armada.

The Preparations of the King of Spain were extraordinary, his Fleet conſiſting of a hundred and thirty four Sail; whereof ſeventy two Galeaſſes and Galleons, vaſt bulky Ships like floating Caſtles; in which were about twenty thouſand Soldiers, eight thouſand Mariners, two thouſand Gally-Slaves, and two thouſand ſix hundred and thirty Great Guns; beſides prodigious Quantities of Bullets, Powder, Field-Pieces, Muskets, Pikes, Halberts, Carriages, Horſes, Mules, Torches, Lanthorns, Canvas, Hides, Lead, Chains, Whips, Butchering-Knives, and whatever elſe could ſerve for Oſtentation or Terror. In this Fleet were alſo about a hundred Monks and Jeſuits, under the Superintendency of Cardinal Allen an Engliſhman, who took care to tranſlate the Pope's Bull into the Engliſh Tongue: And there were above a hundred and twenty Noble Men Volunteers of great Account; nor was there a Noble Family in Spain, but had a Son, Brother, or Nephew in this Expedition, in Hopes of Riches and Revenues in England. For the greater Holineſs of the Action, twelve of their Ships were call'd by the Name of the Twelve Apoſtles; and their Cauſe and their whole Force were recommended to the Pope, and the Prayers of all good Catholicks, and ſet forth in a Book in Print, in which all their Preparations were recited; which were ſo extraordinary throughout all Spain, Italy and Sicily, that the Spaniards themſelves were amaz'd at the Fleet, and with the utmoſt Confidence ſtil'd it, The Invincible Armada. As this Pope Sixtus Quintus had Excommunicated Queen Elizabeth, abſolv'd all her Subjects, and conſecrated the Expedition, as a Croiſado againſt Turks and Infidels; it occaſion'd the Duke of Savoy, and ſome other Catholick Princes, to liſt themſelves Volunteers in ſo meritorious an Enterprize. Nor was this all, for the Prince of Parma in the Netherlands had made his utmoſt Preparations for the ſame Attempt, and was appointed to be ready with fifty thouſand old Soldiers, with all other Accoutrements to join the Armada on the Coaſt of Flanders, and by his Shipping to tranſport the whole Army, and land them at the Mouth of the Thames.

The Queen's Preparations.

On the other ſide, the undaunted Queen, with indefatigable Induſtry, made all ſuitable Preparations againſt ſuch a formidable Invader, which ſhe manag'd with a Maſculine Skill and Bravery. The Command of the Fleet was given to the Admiral the Lord Charles Howard of Effingham, a Man Man nobly qualify'd for ſuch a Work, who with the valiant Sir Francis Drake the Vice-Admiral, was appointed to be ready at Plimouth: And the Lord Henry Seymour, ſecond Son to the Duke of Somerſet, was order'd to lye upon the Coaſts of Flanders, with forty Engliſh and Dutch Ships, to hinder the Prince of Parma from coming out with his Forces. Twenty thouſand Soldiers were diſpos'd along the Coaſts for the Land-Service: Beſides which, two Armies were rais'd of well-experienc'd Men; the one conſiſting of twenty two thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe, under the Earl of Leiceſter, which incamp'd at Tilbury; and the other under the Lord Hunſdon, conſiſting of thirty four thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe, to guard the Queen's Perſon. Arthur Lord Gray, Sir Francis Knolls, Sir John Norris, Sir Richard Bingham, Sir Roger Williams, and other excellent Soldiers, were choſen to make a Council of War, and conſult about the ordering of the Land-Service. Theſe declar'd, among other Particulars, That the Places moſt convenient for the Enemies Landing, as Milford Haven, Falmouth, Plimouh, Portland, the Iſle of Wight, Portſmouth, the Downs, the Thames Mouth, Harwich, Yarmouth, Hull, and ſuch others, ſhould be well mann'd and fortify'd: That the Train'd Soldiers of thoſe Shires, which lay near the Sea-Coaſt, ſhould defend thoſe Places, and be ready at the Alarm to hinder the Enemy from Landing; and if they did Land to lay the Country waſte, that they might find no Subſiſtance, and by continually crying Arm, Arm, give the Enemy no reſt; but yet they were not to give Battel, 'till more Commanders and their Soldiers were come up. At the ſame Time, many fearing the Papiſts at home, no leſs than the Spaniards abroad, perſuaded the Queen to take off the Heads of ſome of the chief of them; but ſhe generouſly deteſting ſuch Cruelty, only took Order, that ſome of them ſhould be confin'd to Wiſbich Caſtle. And having her piercing Eyes and capacious Mind every way, ſhe quicken'd the Confederate States, ſecur'd the Affairs of Ireland, and procur'd the King of Scotland to ſtand againſt the Power of the Spaniard.

All things being in Readineſs on the Spaniard's Side, the wondrous Armada ſet Sail from the Mouth of the Tago, on the twenty ninth Day of May, under the Command of Don Alphonſo Duke of Medina, and under him John de Recalde, an experienc'd Sea Captain. Never did the Weſtern Ocean behold ſuch a pompous and magnificent Spectacle before it appear'd with all the Ornaments of Delight, and Horrors of Deſtruction. But this vaſt moving City, as it was call'd, was ſuddenly diſpers'd by a great Storm; ſo that with great Difficulty they met ſome few Days after near the Groyne in Gallicia, but could not proceed in their Voyage before the twelfth Day of July. Before which Time, the Engliſh Fleet ſet forwards out of Plimouth, ſtanding towards the Coaſt of Spain; but partly by reaſon of contrary Winds, and partly upon Advice that the Spaniards were return'd, and upon ſome Doubt alſo, that they might paſs by them towards England, while they were ſeeking them at a Diſtance, they return'd back to Plimouth. At which Time, a confident tho' falſe Report came to the Admiral, that the Spaniards could not poſſibly proceed in their Deſign this Year; upon which the Engliſh Officers were in Expectations of being disbanded, and many of the Men went a Shoar; when ſuddenly the famous Armada was diſcover'd near the Mouth of the Britiſh Channel. Upon which the Lord Admiral, finding the Winds contrary, tow'd out the Fleet into the main Sea, with ſingular Diligence and Induſtry, and with admirable Alacrity of the Seamen, whom he encourag'd, by performing their meaneſt Offices with his own Hands. The next Day the Engliſh diſcover'd the mighty Navy, with prov'd Turrets like Caſtles, in Front like a Half-Moon, with Wings extending ſeven Miles in Length, creeping with ſlow Pace, tho' with full Sails; as tho' the Winds grew faint with moving them, and the Ocean groan'd under the Vaſtneſs of the Burden.

The

The Engliſh Admiral wiſely ſuffer'd them to ſtalk by him, that he might chace them in the Rear with a full Wind; and on the twenty firſt of July, ſending a Pinnace before call'd the Defiance, denounc'd War by diſcharging her Ordnance, and without fearing their Numbers immediately fell in and thunder'd with the utmoſt Fury upon the Spaniſh Admiral, as he thought, tho' it prov'd to be de Leva's Ship. He was bravely ſeconded by the gallant Commanders, Drake, Hawkins and Forbiſher, who pour'd in ſuch Vollies and Broad-ſides upon the hindmoſt Squadron, commanded by Recalde, that he was ſoon forc'd to fly to the main Fleet for Succour; finding that the Engliſh had a great Advantage, not only in the Wind, but in the Lowneſs of their Ships, and their extraordinary Celerity in tacking and moving as they had Occaſion. The Night following a vaſt Ship of Biſcay, where the King of Spain's Treaſure was kept, took Fire by Chance or Treachery, but was timely extinguiſh'd by other Veſſels, and the Treaſure remov'd. This fell into the Hands of the Engliſh next Day, and a great Galleon with four hundred and fifty Men, having broken her Fore-maſt, was taken by Sir Francis Drake, and fifty five thouſand Ducats in Gold which he found in her were diſtributed among his own Men. On the twenty third Day of the Month, there was a ſecond Engagement, with terrible Thunders on both Sides, in which moſt of the Spaniſh Shot flew over the Engliſh Ships without Damage; only Cock an Engliſh Captain dy'd valiantly, who with his little Veſſel bravely charg'd into the midſt of his Enemies. The next Day they reſted on both Sides; in which Time the Engliſh Admiral rang'd his whole Fleet into four diſtinct Squadrons; the firſt commanded by himſelf, the ſecond by Drake, the third by Hawkins, and the fourth by Forbiſher. Thus on the twenty fifth Day they came to a third Engagement, in which the Engliſh by their extraordinary Management and Bravery, had again the Advantage: So that from this Time the Spaniards held on their Courſe, and diſpatch'd a Meſſenger to the Prince of Parma, requiring him immediately to join with the Armada, and withal to ſend them Bullets. The Day following, the Lord Admiral Knighted Thomas Howard, the Lord Sheffield, Roger Townſend, John Hawkins, and Martin Forbiſher, for their brave Services; and holding a Council of War, they reſolv'd not to attack the Enemy, 'till they came to the Strait of Calais, where the Lord Henry Seymour, and Sir William Winter, with a new Squadron waited for their Arrival. And now the Engliſh were ſo far from being terrify'd with this Invincible Navy, that many of the Nobility and Gentry hir'd Ships at their own Charges, and came to the Admiral; as the Earls of Oxford, Northumberland and Cumberland, Thomas and Robert Cecil, Henry Brook, Charles Blunt, Walter Raleigh, William Hatton, Robert Cary, Ambroſe Willoughby, Thomas Gerard, Arthur Gorge, and others of conſiderable Note.

The Armada anchors before Calais.

On the twenty ſeventh of this Month, the grand Armada came to Anchor before Calais, and was follow'd within Cannon-ſhot by the Engliſh Admiral, to whom Seimour and Winter join'd their Ships; ſo that the Engliſh now conſiſted of a hundred and forty Sail, all nimble and ſerviceable Veſſels, and furniſh'd with active and courageous Seamen; yet only fifteen of them did chiefly ſuſtain the Brunt of the Engagement. And now again the Spaniards ſent repeated Meſſengers to the Prince of Parma, to ſend them forty Fly-Boats, without which they were not able to fight with the Engliſh, by Reaſon of the Bulk and Unweildineſs of their Ships; and they urg'd him immediately to put to Sea with his great Army. But he was unprepar'd in many Reſpects, and his Flat-bottom'd Boats were leaky, and his Men not gather'd together; and beſides, the Hollanders lay cruiſing before the Ports of Dunkirk and Newport, in ſuch a Manner and Condition, that he durſt not venture out. And yet, being an expert and induſtrious Commander, he ſeem'd to omit nothing that lay in his Power, through the vehement Deſire he had to conquer England.

But

But Queen Elizabeth's wiſe Foreſight prevented both his Diligence, and the credulous Hopes of the Spaniards: For by her Command, the Day after the Spaniards had caſt Anchor, the Admiral made ready eight of his worſt Ships, cover'd with Wild-Fire, Pitch and Roſin, and fill'd with Sulphur, and other combuſtible Matter, and ſent them flaming down the Wind among the Spaniſh Fleet in the darkeſt Time of the Night, under the Command of Young and Prowſe. This unuſual Sight, which repreſented the Ocean and Skies in one Conflagration, rais'd a prodigious Fear in the Spaniards, as tho' theſe Ships were fill'd with unheard of Engines of Deſtruction; and with a diſmal Outcry, they cut all their Cables, and put to Sea with the greateſt Precipitation and Confuſion. One of the largeſt Ships broke her Rudder, and floating without Command, was the next Day taken by Preſton, Gerrard and Harvy, who ſlew the Commander Moncada, and four hundred Soldiers, deliver'd three hundred Gally-Slaves, and took fifty thouſand Ducats in Gold; but the Veſſel and Ordnance became Wreck to the Governor of Calais. Drake and Fenner in the mean Time perceiving the Spaniſh Fleet gradually to gather together before Graveling, attack'd them with great Bravery, and began a fourth Engagement; and being join'd by the Admiral, and ſeveral other Commanders, they did vaſt Damage to the Enemies tall Ships, without receiving any conſiderable Hurt themſelves. The Galleon call'd St. Matthew was ſeverely batter'd by Seymour and Winter; driven towards Oſtend, attack'd by the Zelanders, and at laſt taken by the Fluſhingers. And now the inſulting Armada, wanting ſeveral Neceſſaries, and loſing all Hopes of the Prince of Parma's Aſſiſtance, reſolv'd to return by the North to Spain; in which Paſſage they loſt many Ships and Men; the Engliſh Fleet ſtill following their Rear, 'till they were forc'd to deſiſt for want of Powder.

The Armada diſpers'd by Fireſhips.

The Armada retires.

While theſe things paſs'd at Sea, the Heroick Queen came to Tilbury, and with a maſculine Spirit view'd her Camp and Army; and riding about through the ſeveral Ranks, with a Commander's Truncheon in her Hand, it was incredible what Fires were blown up in her Soldiers Breaſts by her obliging Behaviour, and her invigorating Speeches. But in a ſhort time there was no further Occaſion for her Preſence; for the Spaniards having met with the moſt mortifying Diſappointments and Encounters, put their whole Safety in their Flight. And this terrible Armada, which made all Europe tremble, and was four Years in preparing with infinite Expence, was in the Space of one Month many Times attack'd by the undaunted Engliſh, and at laſt overthrown, with great Slaughter and Damage on their Side, and with the Loſs of only a hundred Men, and one ſmall Veſſel on the Engliſh: And after It had been driven round about all Britain by Scotland, the Orcades and Ireland, thrown out all the Mules and Horſes, grievouſly toſs'd, and extreamly diſtreſs'd, impair'd and mangled by Storms and Wrecks, and endur'd all manner of Miſeries, at length return'd home with the greateſt Shame and Diſhonour. Of the hundred and thirty four Ships that ſet out from Spain, fifty three only return'd; about one half of the Men were loſt, and there was not a Family of Note in Spain but ſuffer'd in this Expedition, having loſt a Son, or a Brother, or ſome near Kinſman. But King Philip himſelf receiv'd the News with an aſtoniſhing Calmneſs: He was writing a Letter in his Cloſet, when he receiv'd Intelligence of the Ruin of his Armada, upon which he cooly ſaid, He ſent his Fleet to fight againſt the Engliſh, and not againſt the Winds; and without Change or Emotion, continu'd to finiſh'd his Letter.

The Loſſes of the Spaniards.

For the glorious Succeſs and Deliverance this Year, the pious Queen commanded publick Prayers and Thankſgivings to be us'd throughout all the Churches in England, and ſhe her ſelf was carry'd in a triumphant Manner, in an open Chariot, through the Streets of London to St. Paul's Cathedral, being attended by a gallant Train of Noblemen and others, and receiv'd with all the Pomp, Splendor and Exultation, that the whole City could demonſtrate.

Reg. 31.

A general Thankſgiving in England.

Being

Being arriv'd at the Weſt Door of the Cathedral, where all the Enemies Banners were hung up and diſplay'd, ſhe proſtrated her ſelf to the Ground, and audibly return'd her Thanks to Heaven; afterwards ſhe heard a Sermon, wherein all the Glory of the Deliverance was given to God alone. On the Lord Admiral ſhe ſetled a conſtant Revenue for his happy Services, and frequently commended him and the Captains of her Ships, as Men born for the Preſervation of their Country. The reſt ſhe courteouſly ſaluted by Name as oft as ſhe ſaw them, which extreamly endear'd her to the People; and thoſe who were indigent or wounded, ſhe reliev'd with noble Penſions. In Memory of this Victory ſeveral Coins were ſtruck, with a Fleet flying with full Sails, and the Motto, Venit, vidit, fugit; and others to the Honour of the Queen, with Fire-ſhips and a Fleet all in Confuſion, inſcrib'd Dux Fœmina facti. The learned Men, both at home and abroad, congratulating the Victory with tranſported Hearts, wrote Triumphal Poems in all Languages upon this glorious Subject.

The King of Scotland true to the Engliſh Intereſt.

The publick Joy was augmented by the Arrival of Sir Robert Sidney out of Scotland, who brought Intelligence from thence, that the King had over-paſs'd all Injuries, was lovingly affected to the Engliſh and the eſtabliſh'd Religion, and deſir'd to imbrace a ſincere and perfect Amity with Queen Elizabeth. For as for the King of Spain, he pleaſantly told the Ambaſſador, That he expected no other Favour from him, than what Polyphemus promis'd Uliſſes, That after all the reſt were devour'd, he ſhould be ſwallow'd laſt. So that the mighty Queen was in the Height of all her Glory both at Home and Abroad; belov'd by her Friends, and fear'd by her Enemies, who were never after in a Condition to attack her Kingdom the ſecond Time; but found it difficult to defend their own againſt her, and her brave Martial Commanders. Thus, with the Death of the Earl of Leiceſter, formerly mention'd, and ſome inferior Tranſactions, ended the famous Year Eighty Eight; a Name doubly to be remember'd by the Engliſh Nation to all ſucceeding Generations.

A. D. 1589. Reg. 31/32.

The ſeventh Parliament in this Reign.

Camden. Baker. Davila. Murray. Rabun. &c.

XII. The mighty Queen having over-paſs'd two threatning Storms, the one from the Queen of the Scots at home, and the other from the Spaniard abroad, began now to think of Repriſals, and to act more offenſively againſt her moſt formidable Enemies. Towards which Deſign a new Parliament was call'd, which is not mention'd by Camden and the common Hiſtorians. It met upon the fourth Day of February, and continuing no longer than the twenty ninth Day of March, it was then diſſolv'd. Here for the publick Safety of her Majeſty and her Realms, the Houſe of Commons with the utmoſt Alacrity aided her with the unuſual and extraordinary Gift of four Fifteenths and Tenths, and two entire Subſidies, to which the Clergy added two Subſidies of their own. In the Concluſion, the Parliament deſir'd her to proclaim open War againſt the King of Spain, who had ſo lately invaded her Dominions, whom they concluded to have been the Root and Fountain of all the Conſpiracies practis'd, and of all the Rebellions rais'd againſt her Majeſty, and the Proteſtant Religion. This appear'd about the ſame Time; for the Spaniards had another Plot againſt England, deſigning to invade it by way of Scotland. In which Affair they employ'd Bruce a Prieſt, and Chreiton and Hays Jeſuits, who eaſily drew into their Party the Earls of Huntley, Arrol, and Crawford, Zealots for the Romiſh Religion, and Bothwell, a Man of an unſteady and diſloyal Temper. Their chief Deſign was to ſeize upon the King's Perſon, to let in Foreign Troops, to reſtore Popery, to invade England, and to revenge the Death of the Queen of Scotland: But King James by a ſpeedy March againſt them, overthrew that Deſign in Scotland; and Queen Elizabeth by apprehending, trying, and condemning Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel, who eſpous'd the Spaniſh Party, tho' ſhe mercifully gave him his Life, put an End to the whole Enterprize.

The Papiſts Deſigns in Scotland.

This being ſetled at home, the Queen gave leave to Sir John Norris and Sir Francis Drake to undertake an Expedition into Spain at their own private Charges; who being allow'd ſome Ships of War, they took along with them Anthony the Baſtard, who laid Claim to the Kingdom of Portugal, with eleven thouſand Soldiers, and fourteen hundred Seamen. On the fifth Day of April they ſet Sail from Plimouth, and arriv'd at the Groyne in Galicia; where with ſingular Valour they firſt took the lower Town, and afterwards the higher: And from thence ſailing towards Portugal, they met the brave Earl of Eſſex, who thirſting after Glory, had put to Sea without the Queen's Knowledge. After two Days they arriv'd at Penycha a Town of Portugal, which they took, and left the Caſtle to Don Antonio; and from thence they march'd by Land towards Lisbon, ſixty Miles diſtant. The Foot Companies led by Norris, whom Drake promis'd to follow with the Fleet, being arriv'd at the Weſt Suburbs of Lisbon, they found no People but a few poor diſarm'd Portugueze, who cry'd out God ſave King Antonio! The Day following the Spaniards made a Sally, in which Encounter, Brett, Carſey and Carre, ſtout Commanders, and ſome common Soldiers were ſlain; yet the Earl of Eſſex bravely drove the Spaniards to the very Gates of the City. And now having tarry'd two Days, without being aſſiſted by any Revolt in the Portugueze, according to Antonio's Aſſurance, and finding freſh Supplies come into the Town, their own Army ſickly, Proviſions and Powder failing, and what was moſt material, Drake not bringing up the great Ordnance; they departed from the Suburbs of Lisbon towards Caſcaes, a little Town at the Mouth of the River Tago, which Town was in the mean Time taken by Drake, who excus'd his not coming to Lisbon, by Reaſon of the Flats he had to paſs, and the Caſtle of St. Julian, fortify'd with fifty Pieces of great Cannon. Near this Place they found ſixty Veſſels belonging to the Hanſe Towns of Germany, laden with Corn and all manner of Ammunition, which they took as lawful Prize towards their Charges; in regard the Queen had forbidden thoſe Towns to carry Proviſions or Ammunition to the Spaniard. From hence they ſet ſail to Vigo, a Place famous for a glorious Expedition in this Age, which they fir'd; and having waſted all the Country, they return'd into England with a hundred and fifty Pieces of great Cannon, and a very rich Booty, of which ſome Part was divided among the Seamen. This private Expedition prov'd a great Mortification to the Spaniards, and rais'd the Reputation of the Engliſh Valour; but it coſt the Lives of about ſix thouſand Soldiers and Seamen, not from the Hands of the Enemy, but by their eating of ſtrange Fruits, and from the Diſtempers of the Climate.

An Expedition into Spain.

The Succeſs of it.

It now nearly concern'd the Good of England to look into the Affairs and State of France; for while theſe Things were tranſacted between Spain and England, the Popiſh Princes of France, under Pretext of defending the Catholick Religion, enter'd into a famous Combination, which they call'd The Holy League: The Deſign of which was, To root out all Proteſtants, and to divert the Right of Succeſſion to the Crown of France; for which they bound themſelves by Oath, to ſuffer none but a Catholick to be King of France; which was directly to exclude the King of Navarre and the Prince of Conde, if the preſent King dy'd without Iſſue. The Head of this remarkable League was the Duke of Guiſe, who having given ſome Defeats to the German Forces that came into France in Relief of the Proteſtants, was unmeaſurably extoll'd by the Clergy and others; and arriv'd to ſuch a Height of Reputation, that entering into Paris, he forc'd the King to leave the City, and oblig'd him in an Aſſembly at Blois to make him great Maſter of the French Cavalry, and to conſent by Edict to exterminate the Proteſtants. So that the King dreading his Greatneſs, at length us'd ſuch Means as he procur'd him to be aſſaſſinated in the very Court; and ſhortly after his Brother the Cardinal to be ſtrangled: Upon which ſo vaſt a Confuſion follow'd, that the People broke through all Obedience to Magiſtrates, and pillag'd the Palace Royal in Paris. The Confederates immediately made a new Seal, uſurp'd the Regal Authority, ſeiz'd the ſtrongeſt Places, intercepted the King's Revenues, call'd in Spaniſh Soldiers, and denounc'd War againſt their King. Inſomuch that the King was compell'd to fly to the Proteſtants, whom he had alſo diſoblig'd; upon which the Leaguers, by a deteſtable Villany, procur'd him to be murther'd by the Hands of James Clement a Monk. The King at his Death declar'd the King of Navarre his lawful Succeſſor; but the Confederates were for excluding him as a Heretick, yet could not well agree upon another Perſon: Some would have the Duke of Lorrain, ſome the Duke of Savoy, others the Duke of Guiſe's Brother, and others the King of Spain; but the greateſt Part gave their Votes for the Cardinal of Bourbon, who was one Degree nearer ally'd to the ſlain King, than his Nephew the King of Navarre. He therefore was proclaim'd King of France, by the Name of Charles the Tenth: But he being a Prieſt, the King of Navarre was proclaim'd King of France, by the Name of Henry the Fourth, and continu'd at Dieppe in Normandy, in no ſmall Danger of his Adverſaries.

The French King murther'd.

His Succeſſor Henry IV. implores Aid of Queen Elizabeth.

The King of Navarre being thus rais'd in Dignity, but weak in Supports, implor'd Aſſiſtance of the generous Queen of England, and offer'd to enter into a League Offenſive and Defenſive. Upon which, out of Reſpect to a Proteſtant King, renown'd for his Martial Acts, the Queen immediately ſent him twenty two thouſand Pounds of Engliſh Mony in Gold, ſuch a Sum of Gold Coin as he declar'd he had never ſeen at once; and withal ſupply'd him with four thouſand Soldiers, under the Command of the Valiant Peregrine Lord Willoughby; appointing for Colonels, Sir Thomas Wilford Marſhal of the Field, Sir John Boroughs, Sir William Drury, and Sir Thomas Baſkeville, with a Month's Pay advanc'd. Hereupon the Confederates, whom the King beyond Expectation had juſt defeated at Argues, began to ſink and give Way, and upon the Arrival of the Engliſh to vaniſh out of Sight. With this Addition of Forces, the new rais'd King march'd to Paris; and being ready to enter the City, he caus'd a Retreat to be ſounded, being unwilling to have that Capital City plunder'd, which he hop'd would ſhortly be his own. After that by the good Service of the Engliſh, he recover'd Mans, Alenſon, Falaiſe, Luxon, and Honfleur; and being fatigu'd with all the Inconveniences of a Winter Expedition, and five hundred Miles March, the Engliſh were diſmiſs'd, and ſent home with grateful Acknowledgments.

The Succeſs of it.

As Queen Elizabeth deſir'd to eſtabliſh Navarre in the Kingdom of France, ſo ſhe alſo deſir'd to marry his Siſter the Lady Catharine to the King of Scotland; but finding that that King had before plac'd his Affections upon Anne, the Daughter of Frederick King of Denmark, ſhe deſiſted and approv'd of his Choice. Accordingly they were marry'd by Proxy in the Month of Auguſt; but the Lady ſailing for Scotland, by prodigious Storms was driven back to Norway, and ſo long detain'd, that the King, firſt adviſing with Queen Elizabeth, who ſent him noble Preſents towards the Celebration of the Marriage, he ſail'd over into Norway in an extream cold Seaſon, and there conſummating the Marriage at twenty three Years of Age, he continu'd in thoſe Parts 'till the following Year and Month of May. Many were of Opinion that theſe extraordinary Storms were rais'd by Magick and Witchcraft; which Belief was confirm'd by the Confeſſion of ſome impious Perſons, reputed Magicians, who declar'd they did it to hinder the Queen from Landing in Scotland, and that Bothwell had conſulted with them about the King's Death. For which he was thrown into Priſon, and eſcaping in a ſhort Time, he occaſion'd new Commotions in Scotland.

The King of Scotland marries Anne of Denmark.

The Deaths of ſeveral Perſons.

In this Year ſeveral Noble Perſonages departed this Life; as Frances Counteſs of Suſſex Siſter to Sir Henry Sidney; Sir Walter Mildmay, Chancellor and Vice-Treaſurer of the Exchequer; William Somerſet Earl of Worceſter, ſo numerous merous in his Progeny, that he could reckon more Children of both Sexes; than all the Earls in England: Alſo John Lord Sturton, Henry Lord Compton, and the Lord Paget and Bruſſels. The two firſt of theſe are worthily remember'd as the pious Founders of two Colleges, Sidney and Emanuel, in the Univerſity of Cambridge, call'd the two Proteſtant Foundations.

A. D. 1590. Reg. 32, 33.

The wiſe Queen now ſpent much of her Time in fortifying of Places, in managing her Treaſure to the beſt Advantage, and ſending Relief to her diſtreſſed Neighbours; for which ſhe expended large Sums both in France and the Netherlands. Inſomuch that many admir'd how her Revenues could ſerve ſo many great Ends; ſince ſhe was clear of all Debts, and was able to defend her ſelf and her Allies without any Foreign Helps, which none of her neighbouring Kings could do. But in reality ſhe was frugal with true Wiſdom and Underſtanding; and never ſpar'd when there was a juſt Occaſion, either for the Maintenance of her Royal State, the Defence of her Kingdom, or the Relief of her Neighbours. She took particular Care of her ſtanding Revenues, in which Burleigh her Treaſurer was an admirable Manager; yet this Year ſhe exceeded him and the reſt of her great Men; and at the Information of a ſubtle ordinary Man, call'd Caermarden, ſhe rais'd Sir Thomas Smith, the Farmer of ſome Cuſtoms, from fourteen to forty two thouſand Pounds, and then to fifty thouſand Pounds a Year. And when Burleigh, Leiceſter and Walſingham firſt blam'd her Majeſty for hark'ning to Caermarden, an inconſiderable Informer, ſhe wiſely anſwer'd, It was the Duty of a Prince to carry an equal Hand between the Higheſt and Loweſt; That ſuch as raſhly accus'd Magiſtrates and Counſellors, without being able to prove their Charge, were to be puniſh'd; but thoſe who accus'd them juſtly, were to be heard and incourag'd.

The Queen's Care of her Revenues.

Her Glory was now ſpread abroad, and her Reputation extended to remote Countries; having this Year obtain'd of the Grand-Signior Reſt and Quiet for the Vaivod of Moldavia, who had been miſerably harraſs'd by the Turks, and a Peace for the Polonians, who were threaten'd by them with a dangerous War; which was afterwards moſt gratefully acknowleg'd by them. In the mean Time to confirm Amity with the King of Scotland, ſhe ſent the new Earl of Worceſter to congratulate his Marriage and ſafe Return out of Denmark, and to ſignifie to him, That he, together with the French King, were choſen into the Society of the Order of the Garter; and withal to urge him timely to ſuppreſs the Popiſh Faction, which grew ſtrong in Scotland. King James receiv'd him very graciouſly, and to maintain the Amity with England, and declare his great Affection to the publick Peace, he ſent Colonel Stuart into Germany, that Care might be taken with the King of Denmark and the Ambaſſadors of the Princes there met, for renewing the Peace between England, Spain and France. As to France, that Country was now violently torn by a Civil War, rais'd by the Leaguers, of which Queen Elizabeth could not be an unconcern'd Spectator, but perform'd all the Parts of a wiſe Prince and a pious Chriſtian; tho' ſhe was adviſ'd by many not to aſſiſt the new King of France. When ſome ſuggeſted to her, That while the Leaguers and the Spaniards were endeavouring to ſhare France between them, and cantonize it into ſeveral Principalities, ſhe might alſo ſeize upon the Maritime Countries of Picardy and Normandy, alledging what Charles of Burgundy was wont to ſay, That the Neighbouring Nations would be happy when France ſhould be ſubject to twenty petty Kings; She heard it with Diſlike, and rejected it with Indignation, ſaying, The laſt Day of the Kingdom of France, when ever it comes will certainly be the Eve of the Deſtruction of England.

The Queen's Policy.

In this Year dy'd ſeveral great Men, as Ambroſe Dudley Earl of Warwick, George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, Sir Thomas Randolph, who had been imploy'd in many Embaſſies, Sir James Crofts Comptrollor of the Queen's Houſehold, and the Lord Wentworth, the laſt Engliſh Governor of Calais. But the moſt remarkable Man was Sir Francis Walſingham, principal Secretary of State, Walſingham's Death and Character.

State, Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaſter, and of the Order of the Garter; one of the moſt refin'd Politicians, and penetrating Stateſmen, that ever that Age produc'd. He had an admirable Talent both in diſcovering and managing the ſecret Receſſes of Human Nature; and had his Spies in moſt Courts in Chriſtendom, and allow'd them a liberal Maintenance; for his great Maxim was, Knowledge is never too dear. Accordingly he ſpent his whole Time and Faculties in the Service of the Queen and Publick; ſo that the Queen was heard to ſay, That in Diligence and Sagacity he exceeded her Expectation. This great Man after all his mighty Services to the Publick, gave a remarkable Proof at his Death, how far he preferr'd that to his own Intereſt; for he dy'd ſo poor that his Friends were oblig'd to bury him privately in the Night, leſt his Body ſhould be arreſted for Debt. He left only one Daughter, famous for having three Husbands of the greateſt Note; firſt Sir Philip Sidney, ſecondly Robert Earl of Eſſex, and laſtly the Earl of Clan-Richard, who was afterwards made Earl of St. Albans.

A. D. 1591. Reg. 33, 34.

In the following Year the City of London was much diſturb'd by the prodigious Behaviour of one Hacket, born at Oundle in Northamptonſhire, a mean Perſon of no Learning, who ſuddenly took upon him a Shew of wonderful Sanctity, hearing Sermons, getting Scriptures by heart, and counterfeiting Revelations from God, and extraordinary Calls. By which Means he was highly extoll'd by certain zealous Miniſters of the Geneva Diſcipline, eſpecially by two call'd Coppinger and Arthington; and they accounted him as ſent from Heaven, and a greater Prophet than Moſes or John Baptiſt; and finally that he was Chriſt himſelf, come with a Fan in his Hand to judge the World. This they proclaim'd in Cheapſide, making report that Hacket participated of Chriſt's glorify'd Body, by his ſpecial Spirit, and was now come to propagate the Goſpel over Europe, and ſettle a true Diſcipline in the Church of England; and that they themſelves were two Prophets, the one of Mercy, the other of Judgment, with many ſuch incredible Blaſphemies. Whereupon Hacket was apprehended and arraign'd, and at laſt hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, continuing at his very Death in his blaſphemous Aſſertions, to the great Horror and Amazement of the Spectators. Coppinger a while after ſtarv'd himſelf to Death in Priſon; Arthington repented, and made his Recantation in a publick Writing. Beſides theſe extravagant Managers, others alſo at this Time oppos'd the eſtabliſh'd Government of the Church of England, exclaiming againſt the Function and Calling of Biſhops; with whom join'd ſome common Lawyers, affirming that the Queen could not depute, nor theſe Men exerciſe ſuch Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction. But the Queen conceiving that ſhe was ſhot at through the Sides of the Prelates, ſuppreſs'd them as much as poſſible, and ſtrictly maintain'd the former Eſtabliſhment.

Hacket's Blaſphemy and Execution.

And now Enmity daily increaſing between Spain and England, two Proclamations were ſet forth; one prohibiting upon pain of High-Treaſon, to carry Proviſions or Ammunition into any of the King of Spain's Dominions: Another forbidding all Perſons to entertain any in their Houſes, 'till Enquiry be made what they were; leſt they ſhould entertain Popiſh Prieſts, who became very numerous in England, by reaſon the King of Spain had lately founded a Seminary at Valadolid for the Engliſh. About this Time, the Lord Thomas Howard, with ſix of the Queen's Ships, having waited at the Azores ſix whole Months, for the Arrival of the Spaniſh Fleet from America, was at laſt attack'd by Alphonſo Baſſano, with fifty three Ships, ſent for the Convoy of the ſaid Fleet; where Richard Greenvile, Vice-Admiral, being in the Revenge, and ſeparated from his Company, was ſo hemm'd in by the Spaniſh Ships, and ſo batter'd with large Shot, that moſt of his Men being ſlain, his Main-Maſt cut off, himſelf much wounded in the Head, he commanded to ſink the Ship, that it might not fall into the Spaniards Hands; but this being countermanded by moſt Votes, it was agreed to yield it to the Spaniards, upon Condition that the Men Men ſhould be ſet at Liberty. Greenvile himſelf was carry'd to the Spaniſh Admiral, where within two Days he dy'd; not without the Commendations of his Enemies. Thus the great Ship call'd the Revenge was yielded, but had ſo many Leaks in the Keel, that ſoon after it was caſt away in a Storm: And the Loſs of this one Ship was ſoon made good upon the Spaniards, by taking many of theirs.

The Affairs of France.

But the Queen's greateſt Care was now for the State of France, and particularly that Bretaign ſhould not fall into the Spaniards Hands; wherefore by Edmund York ſhe promis'd the French King to ſend him new Forces to preſerve that Province, if he would name ſome Towns, as Places of Retreat and Safety. Hereupon he nam'd Cherbourg, Granvile or Breſt, as moſt convenient; and it was agreed that three thouſand Engliſh ſhould be ſent into Bretaign and Picardy: But in the mean Time Henry Palmer was ſent to Sea with a Squadron, and ſeiz'd on thirteen Spaniſh Ships, as they were returning from New France. And now Sir Roger Williams, with a Company of ſix hundred Soldiers, paſs'd over to Dieppe in Normandy; and ſhortly after Sir John Norris, with the reſt of the Forces, haſten'd into Bretaign. Sir Roger Williams with his own ſix hundred Men, and the Aſſiſtance of Charter Governor of Dieppe, bravely defeated the Leaguers, who had block'd up the Paſſages; whoſe Valour was highly applauded by the French King in his Letters to Queen Elizabeth. Whereupon increaſing in Courage, and neglecting his Charge at Dieppe, he accompany'd the King to the very Suburbs of Paris, where in Honour of his Nation, he ſent a Challenge to the Spaniards, to ingage two hundred Pike-men and a hundred Musketeers of the Engliſh, againſt the ſame Number of Spaniards, in the open Field.

The Earl of Eſſex ſent thither.

Shortly after the French King acquainted Queen Elizabeth, that he deſign'd to take in Roan or Havre-de-Grace, before the Prince of Parma ſhould come into France, and thereupon requeſted her to ſend four thouſand Engliſh into Normandy, which upon certain wiſe Conditions ſhe granted; and ſent them under the Command of the brave Earl of Eſſex, accompany'd by Thomas Leighton and Sir William Killegrew, as Counſellors and Aſſiſtants. When the Earl arriv'd in France, he found that the King was at Noyon, and in Normandy no Preparation made for the War, which much perplex'd him; but ſoon after Sir Roger Williams came to him from the King, requeſting him to go to Noyon, there to conſult about managing the War. The Earl made a tedious Journey to that Place, and at his Arrival the King inform'd him, That of Neceſſity he muſt go himſelf into Champaign; but promis'd to ſend Marſhal Biron, and the Duke of Montpenſier immediately to him, to lay Siege to Roan. Hereupon the Earl return'd to his Camp, expecting their Arrival, but neither of them came, which made the Earl more uneaſie than ever; ſo that being weary of an unactive Life, and inflam'd with Courage, he himſelf made an Approach to Roan, where his Brother Walter Devereux was unfortunately ſlain. Indeed the French King's Affairs were at this Time upon ſuch uncertain Terms, that before he could act what he had reſolv'd, ſomething ſtill interven'd that diverted him: For which by his Letters he excus'd himſelf to Queen Elizabeth; and by the Mediation of the Earl, and Mornay Lord du Pleſſie, who came into England, he obtain'd new Supplies, and then inveſted Roan. After a tedious Winter's Siege, the Earl of Eſſex challeng'd Monſieur Villars the Governor to a ſingle Combate; but being refus'd, and finding himſelf ill ſupported, he return'd into England, being call'd home by the Queen, whoſe Favour, by his long Abſence, began to be much in Danger. And now the French King, hearing that the Prince of Parma was coming into France, was once again compell'd to fly to the Queen of England for Succour, to whom upon certain Conditions ſhe granted an Army of four thouſand Men, and ſome great Guns, with which Sir John Norris was ſent into France; which yet was not employ'd by the French King according to Agreement, to the great Diſpleaſure ſure of the Queen. The Prince of Parma's coming into France was prevented by his Death, after he had govern'd the Spaniſh Netherlands fourteen Years; a Prince of many excellent Qualifications, and whom Queen Elizabeth never mention'd but with Honour.

A. D. 1592. Reg. 34/35.

The Prince of Parma's Death.

Perrot's Trial.

To return to England; at this Time Sir John Perrot, who had been Deputy of Ireland, and done great Service in that Country, was yet by the Malice of his Adverſaries, of whom Hatton was one, call'd in Queſtion before ſome of the Lords and Judges: His Accuſations were, Firſt, That he had ſpoken opprobrious Words againſt the Queen, ſaying, She was Illegitimate and Cowardly: Secondly, That he had harbour'd notorious Traitors and Popiſh Prieſts: Thirdly, That he had held Correſpondence with the Prince of Parma, and the Queen's Enemies. To the firſt of which he confeſs'd, That in his Paſſion he had ſpoken unadviſedly of the Queen, for which he was infinitely ſorry; but deny'd all the reſt; and all Men knew he was never Popiſhly affected. His Accuſers were Philip Williams, ſome time his Secretary, O-Roghan an Iriſh marry'd Prieſt, whoſe Life he had ſav'd, and one Walton, a Man of no Worth or Reputation. Yet his Crimes being urg'd againſt him by Popham and other Lawyers, 'till almoſt Midnight, he was at laſt condemn'd of High-Treaſon; and Sentence was after twenty Days pronounc'd at the Inſtance of his Adverſaries. Upon which Day Burleigh is ſaid to have wept for the Gentleman's hard Fortune, and ſighing, ſaid, The more unjuſt is Hatred, it is ſo much the more cruel.

His Death.

But Perrot dy'd a natural Death in the Tower, when he had ſome Hopes given him of his Life, the Queen's Diſpleaſure being appeas'd. For at this Time ſhe was often heard to commend that Reſcript of ſome of the Roman Emperors; When any Man ſpeaks Ill of the Emperor, if it proceeds from fooliſh Levity, it is to be contemn'd; if from Madneſs, to be pity'd; if from Injury and Malice, to be pardon'd. Thus did a deſerving and noble Gentleman procure his own Ruin by the unbridled Laviſhneſs of his Tongue; which commonly leaves a deep and dangerous Impreſſion in the Minds of Princes.

Raleigh's Expedition.

And now the wiſe Queen, conſidering that the King of Spain's chief Strength was in his Gold of America, ſent out the valiant Sir Walter Raleigh with a Fleet of fifteen Ships of War to intercept the Spaniſh Flota; Sir Walter paſſing by a Promontory of Spain, receiv'd certain Intelligence, that the Spaniſh Flota was not to come out from America this Year. Whereupon he divided his Navy into four Parts; one of which he committed to Sir John Boroughs, and another to Sir Martin Forbiſher. Having diſpos'd themſelves for other Opportunities, a mighty Spaniſh Carack came in View, call'd The Mother of God, which was a hundred and ſixty five Foot in length from the Stem to the Stern, and ſeven Decks in Height, laden with rich Merchandize, and with ſix hundred Men on Board. This bulky Veſſel they took, and in it to the Value of a hundred and fifty thouſand Pounds Sterling, beſides the great Quantities which the Commanders and Seamen imbezell'd. In that matter, no Orders from the Government nor Oaths could reſtrain them, boldly ſaying, They had rather truſt their Souls to a merciful God by Perjury, than their Fortunes to the Hands of unmerciful Men.

The Queen goes to Oxford.

This Year the Queen in her Summer Progreſs, paſs'd through the Univerſity of Oxford, and ſtay'd there ſeveral Days; where ſhe was agreeably entertain'd with eloquent Orations, Plays and learned Diſputations, and with a ſplendid Treat by the Lord Buckhurſt Chancellor of the Univerſity. At her Departure ſhe courteouſly took her leave of them in a Latin Speech, profeſſing, That ſhe preferr'd the Cordial Reſpects of that learned Body to all their Entertainments, tho' they were highly pleaſing to her; for which ſhe return'd them all hearty Thanks, made a ſhort Prayer, and left ſome good Advice with them. The Prayer was, That as ſhe deſir'd nothing more earneſtly, than the Safety, Honour and Happineſs of the whole Kingdom; ſo ſhe pray'd that the Univerſity, one of the great Lights of it, might flouriſh, and daily riſe to a greater Luſtre. Her Advice was, That they would first ſerve God, not after the curious and novel Faſhions of ſome, but according to the Laws of God and the Land; that they would not run before the Laws, but follow them; not diſpute the Goodneſs, but obſerve the Authority of them, and obey their Superiors, and embrace each other in Brotherly Piety and Unanimity.

D' Ewes, &c. In the following Year, upon the nineteenth Day of February, a new Parliament met at Weſtminſter, and enacted ſeveral Laws, for Reſtraining of Schiſmaticks and Popiſh Recuſants; concerning the Lands and Poſſeſſions of Monaſteries inveſted in King Henry the Eighth; for relieving of diſtreſſed Soldiers and Seamen, and concerning divers other Matters. And when they had ſeriouſly conſider'd how obſtinately the Enemies were reſolv'd upon the Deſtruction of England, by ſuppreſſing its Allies in France, Scotland and the Netherlands, and ſeizing the moſt convenient Places for the Invading the Kingdom, they thought it neceſſary to grant the Queen ſufficient Supplies. Therefore, 'Acknowledging and extolling the great and Heroick Magnanimity of their Queen; 'a Woman, together with her provident Care, and ſingular Goodneſs towards 'her Subjects, who had in a War carry'd on with ſuch happy Succeſs againſt 'a rich and powerful Nation, expended more Mony out of her own Treaſury, 'than any of her Predeceſſors, not only in defending her own Kingdom, but 'alſo in juſtly relieving her Confederates; they with moſt thankful and ready 'Hearts granted two entire Subſidies from the Clergy, and three from the 'Laity, with ſix Fifteenths and Tenths. On the laſt Day of the Seſſion, her Majeſty after a moſt graceful and charming Manner, made an eloquent Speech to both Houſes, in which ſhe declar'd, That tho' this Kingdom had been bleſt with many noble and victorious Princes, to whom in Wiſdom and Fortitude ſhe would not compare her ſelf; yet in Love, Care, Sincerity and Juſtice, ſhe would compare her ſelf to any that ever did or ſhall ſit upon the Throne. Then to ſhow that ſhe wanted not Courage, having been inform'd, that upon the Spaniſh Invaſion ſome upon the Sea-Coaſts forſook their Towns, and left the Country naked, ſhe ſwore by the living God, If ſhe knew thoſe Perſons, or any that would do the ſame again, ſhe would make them know and feel what it was to be fearful in ſo urgent a Cauſe. Then thanking them for their Bounty and Loyalty, and paſſing fourteen publick Bills, ſhe diſſolv'd the Parliament on the tenth Day of April.

A. D. 1593. Reg. 35 36.

The Eighth Parliament in this Reign.

The Queen's Speech.

The Queen was ever careful of the Happineſs of her own Subjects at home, and her Reputation abroad; and at this Time, by reaſon of her Correſpondence with the Turk, to preſerve a free Trade in thoſe Parts, it was maliciouſly reported by ſome, that ſhe had excited the Turk to a War againſt the Chriſtians. This caus'd her to write to the Emperor, ſhewing him the Falſeneſs of this Report, in which ſhe gave him full Satisfaction. But her greateſt Concern at this Time was for the King of France, of whom ſhe heard a Report, that he had already, or would certainly embrace the Romiſh Religion. Upon which diſcouraging News ſhe immediately ſent over Thomas Wilks into France, with Reaſons to divert him from it, if it were not already too late. But before his Arrival, the King had actually and openly profeſs'd the Romiſh Religion in the Church of St. Denis in Paris; of which Change he declar'd the Cauſes and Reaſons to him at large, and laid before him the Neceſſity of it, unleſs he would ſuffer himſelf to be entirely driven out of his Kingdom. In the mean Time Morlante inform'd the Queen of the ſame, and with the moſt ſpecious Expreſſions offer'd her all Kindneſs in Behalf of his Maſter. She being extreamly diſquieted for one ſhe had ſo great an Honour, ſnatch'd up her Pen, and wrote thus to him, Alas! what deep Sorrow, what vehement Grief, what Sighs have ſeiz'd my Heart, for the News that Morlante brought? Was it poſſible that any ſecular Conſideration could move you to lay aſide the Fear of God? Can any Happineſs ſucceed ſuch a Fact? Or could you think that he, who has hitherto with his Right Hand ſupported and preſerv'd you, would now abandon you?

you? It is a dangerous Expedient to do Evil that Good may come of it. In the mean Time I will pray for you, and beg of God, that the Hands of Eſau may not loſe you the Bleſſing of Jacob. To allay this Grief ſhe us'd the Holy Scriptures, the Writings of the Fathers, and even the Books of Philoſophers; tranſlating about that Time for an Amuſement, Boetius de Conſolatione Philoſophiæ, into elegant Engliſh. As to the French King he acknowledg'd himſelf oblig'd to her both for the Safety of his Perſon and Royal Dignity, and promis'd to take the Proteſtants into his ſpecial Care and Protection.

Still the Queen took care of her People againſt the Spaniards, and ſtrengthen'd the Iſle of Silly with a new Fort, as alſo the Iſles of Garnſey and Jerſey, and other Places with great Charge, and much Willingneſs, tho' the Times were ſomewhat ſad and diſcouraging. For all this Year London was grievouſly afflicted with the Peſtilence; of which almoſt eighteen thouſand Perſons dy'd: Bartholomew Fair was not kept, and Michaelmaſs-Term was held at St. Albans, twenty Miles from London. At which Town one Richard Hasket was condemn'd and executed for Treaſon; who being privately ſent by the Engliſh Fugitives, perſuaded Ferdinand Earl of Derby to aſſume the Title to the Crown, deriving his Right and Claim from his Great-Grand-Mother Mary, Daughter to King Henry the ſeventh, and made him large Promiſes of Men and Mony from the Spaniard; likewiſe threatning the Earl with ſudden and aſſur'd Deſtruction, if he did not join in the Propoſal, and conceal it. But the Earl, fearing leſt ſome Snare was laid for him, impeach'd Hasket; who by his own voluntary Confeſſion acknowledg'd his Crime at the Bar, deteſting and curſing thoſe who had given him the Counſel. However his Threatnings were too prophetically verify'd, for the Earl dy'd about four Months after, in a moſt deplorable Manner, with all the Infernal Appearances of Magick and Poiſon.

A Plague.

A. D. 1594. Reg. 36/37. The mutual Love and Amity between the Queen of England and King of Scotland, the immovable Conſtancy of the latter in Matters of Religion, which could not be overcome by all the Intreaties, Promiſes and Arts of the Papiſts, and the granting of Supream Authority to the King by the Eſtates of Scotland, did all ſo damp the Hopes of reſtoring the Popiſh Religion in Scotland and England, that ſome in England, who had formerly been great Aſſerters of King James's Title, began to think of ſubſtituting ſome Engliſh Papiſt into the Succeſſion. When they could not agree upon a proper Perſon of their own Religion, they caſt their Eyes upon the Earl of Eſſex, who always appear'd a very moderate Man: And him they pretended to have ſome Right to the Crown, by Deſcent from Thomas of Woodſtock, Son to King Edward the Third. But the Engliſh Fugitives were all for the Infanta of Spain; and deſiring to ſet the King of Scotland and the Earl of Eſſex at Variance, they publiſh'd a Book, dedicated to Eſſex, under the Name of Doleman, but was written by Doleman's great Adverſary Parſons the Jeſuit, Cardinal Allen, and Francis Englefield. The Scope of which Book was, to exclude from the Succeſſion all Perſons, tho' never ſo near ally'd to the Crown, that were not Roman Catholicks; contending further for the Right of Iſabella Infanta of Spain, as being deſcended from Conſtance, Daughter of William the Conqueror; from Eleanor eldeſt Daughter to Henry the Second, marry'd to Alphonſo the Ninth King of Caſtile; and from Beatrix, Daughter to King Henry the Third: Titles obſolete, miſtaken, and exceeding the Bounds of Heraldry to diſcuſs. But while theſe Fugitives were finding an Heir in Spain, God ſent a Son to King James in Scotland on the nineteenth of February; who was chriſten'd by the Name of Henry, and Queen Elizabeth her ſelf was his God-Mother, who ſent over the Earl of Suſſex for her Deputy.

A new Deſign of the Papiſts.

As ſome ſtudy'd by their Pens to advance the Infanta of Spain to the Crown of England, ſo others of their Religion were making the ſame Uſe of their Swords, ſending certain Aſſaſſins to murther Queen Elizabeth, while ſome Spaniards attempted to poiſon her. The Spaniards not daring to truſt the Engliſh in a Matter of that Conſequence, apply'd themſelves to Roderick Lopez a Jew, and Phyſician to the Queen, with Stephen Ferreira, Emanuel Loyſie, and other Portugueze, who were numerous in England, upon the Account of Don Antonio the exil'd King. Theſe being diſcover'd by intercepted Letters of theirs, were arraign'd at Guild-Hall, and by their own Confeſſions convicted of Conſpiring againſt the Life of the Queen; they were all condemn'd and executed at Tyburn; where Lopez profeſs'd he lov'd the Queen as well as he lov'd Jeſus Chriſt, which coming from the Mouth of a Jew, mov'd the Laughter more than the Pity of the Spectators. The next Day after them was condemn'd Patrick Cullen, an Iriſh Fencing-Maſter, ſent over by the Engliſh Fugitives to Aſſaſſinate the Queen, who was immediately executed, tho' he was ready to die of a languiſhing Sickneſs. Thus the Engliſh Fugitives, as well Prieſts as other villainous Perſons, out of a pernicious Principle, That Princes Excommunicate are to be deſtroy'd, and the Spaniſh Miniſters out of a virulent Hatred, did by all Means and Inventions ſet themſelves to effect the Ruin of the Queen. But ſhe continu'd undaunted, and with a maſculine Courage, and provident Caution, contemn'd their treacherous Practices; often reflecting upon that Paſſage of the Royal Pſalmiſt, Thou art my God, my Times are in thy Hands.

A Plot diſcover'd and puniſh'd.

About this Time, Sir John Norris having ſuſtain'd a vigorous Conflict at Sea againſt the Spaniard, where the valiant Sir Martin Forbiſher receiv'd his Death's Wound, was now call'd home, with a Deſign to ſend him into Ireland. Before which Time, Richard Hawkins Son to Sir John Hawkins the famous Sea-Captain, had been ſent forth with three of the Queen's leſſer Men of War, and two hundred Men in them; of which one of them at the Iſle of St. Anne was fir'd by Chance; another of them, ſeparated by Storms, return'd into England; himſelf in the third, paſs'd the Straits of Magellan, being the ſixth Perſon, according to the Spaniſh Account, that had perform'd that Voyage. And having ſail'd into the vaſt Southern Ocean, he took five Spaniſh Ships laden with Merchandize, one of which he carry'd away, and the reſt were ſuffer'd to ranſom themſelves for two thouſand Ducats. But at laſt making toward Arica, he was attack'd by Bertrand di Caſtro, ſent out by the Vice-Roy with eight Ships againſt him; and after three Days ſevere Battery, he yielded upon honourable Terms; yet nevertheleſs, he was ſent into Spain, and kept Priſoner for ſeveral Years. But James Lancaſter had better Succeſs in another Part of America; for being ſent out by ſome London Merchants with three Ships and a long Boat, he took thirty nine Spaniſh Ships. Then joining with Venour an Engliſhman, and others, at Fernambuc in Braſil, where the Riches of an Eaſt-Indian Carack were lately unloaden, he deſperately ventur'd on Shoar, held the Place thirty Days, loaded fifteen Ships with the Treaſure of the Carack, and with Sugar, Braſil-Wood, and other Merchandize, and then ſafely and victoriouſly return'd into England..

Several leſſer Expeditions.

About this Time a conſtant Rumour was blown abroad from all Parts of Europe, that the Spaniards were again preparing an Expedition againſt England, with a far greater Fleet than that in Eighty Eight, and that it was ready to put to Sea: Whereupon Soldiers were levy'd with all Diligence, and plac'd on the Sea-Coaſts; two Navies were made ready, one to wait for them in the Engliſh Channel, and the other to go for America under the Conduct of Drake and Hawkins. But this Rumour ſoon began to ſink and vaniſh, and no greater Fleet appear'd than four Spaniſh Ships, who coming from the Coaſts of France, and landing early in a Morning in Cornwall, fir'd a Church ſtanding alone in the Fields, and three Villages of Fiſhermen, Mouſe-hole, Neulin and Penſans, and then immediately retir'd, without taking or killing any one Perſon: And theſe were the firſt and laſt Spaniards that ever made any Hoſtile Landing in England. So that the Queen had no further Fear from the Spaniard this Year, for all her Concern was from France, where Miſchiefs daily increaſing, many perſuaded that King to conclude a Peace with Spain, and the Queen her ſelf began to be apprehenſive of ſuch a Deſign, eſpecially having lately receiv'd Intelligence out of the Pope's Conclave, that he was receiv'd into the Boſom of the Church of Rome, with the Pope's particular Benediction, and upon Conditions prejudicial to the Proteſtants in general.

And therefore at this Time were promoted ſeveral Expeditions of the Engliſh againſt the Spaniard: The firſt was undertaken by Sir Walter Raleigh, now Captain of the Queen's Guards, who having ſeduc'd a Maid of Honour, whom he afterwards marry'd, had loſt the Queen's Favour, and was kept in Priſon for ſome Months: But being ſet at Liberty, tho' baniſh'd the Court, he undertook a Voyage to Guiana in the Weſt-Indies. Setting Sail from Plimouth in February, he arriv'd at Trinidado, where he took St. Joſeph's Town, but found no Mony in it. From hence with Boats, and a hundred Soldiers, he enter'd the vaſt River Orenoque, and rang'd up into Guiana four hundred Miles; but gain'd little more than Experience and new Diſcoveries. In his Return he fir'd Cumana, and ſome other Places, that refus'd to redeem themſelves with Mony. In like manner, Amyas Preſton and Somers, plunder'd ſeveral of the Spaniſh Towns in thoſe Parts; and three Ships of the Earl of Cumberland ſet upon a vaſt Carack, which in the Battel took Fire and conſum'd all the Goods and moſt of the Men. Theſe and ſome other Exploits were perform'd by private Men: But the Queen being inform'd that great Quantities of Treaſure for the King of Spain's Uſe were convey'd to Porto-Rico, in St. John's Iſland, ſent out Hawkins, Drake and Baskervill, with Land-Forces; furniſhing them with ſix Ships out of her own Navy, and twenty other Men of War. Theſe ſet Sail from Plimouth the laſt of Auguſt, and twenty ſeven Days after arriv'd at Grand-Canary, which being ſtrongly fortify'd they did not think fit to attack. A Month after they arriv'd at the Iſle of St. Domingo; where five Spaniſh Ships being ſent out to watch the Engliſh, fell in with one of the ſmall Engliſh Ships, ſtray'd from the Company, and putting the Maſter and Seamen to the Torture, underſtood by them that the Engliſh Fleet was bound for Porto-Rico. Whereupon they us'd all poſſible Speed to give Notice to the Place, that they might put themſelves in a Poſture of Defence. And thereupon, as ſoon as the Engliſh had caſt Anchor in the Road of Porto-Rico, the Spaniards thunder'd upon them from the Shoar with unexpected Succeſs; and Sir Nicholas Clifford and Brute Brown dy'd of their Wounds. Hawkins himſelf, and alſo Drake, partly of Sickneſs, and partly out of Grief for their ill Succeſs, dy'd ſhortly after. At the End of eight Months, the Fleet return'd home, after they had fir'd ſome few Towns and Ships, but receiv'd infinite Damage themſelves; and loſt two ſuch Sea Captains, as were not left perhaps in England or all Europe. For the Spaniards having of late Years ſuſtain'd great Damages from the French and Engliſh, had now better ſecur'd themſelves with Fortifications not eaſily and ſuddenly taken.

Raleigh's Expedition.

The Death of Drake and Hawkins.

During theſe remote Tranſactions, the frugal Queen laid before the Confederate States of the Netherlands the immenſe Sums ſhe had expended in relieving them ten Years ſucceſſively; for which ſhe expected ſome conſiderable Recompence. The States acknowledg'd all their Safety and Happineſs to have riſen from her, but alledg'd their great Expences in the Year Eighty Eight, and ſince by repelling the Spaniards in her Cauſe; but however to prevent any Miſapprehenſions, they were content to eaſe the Queen of her uſual Charges in their Country, and to allow ſome reaſonable Retribution; but yet for the preſent nothing material was concluded. Likewiſe at this Time the Hanſe Towns in Germany made complaint to the Emperor, and the Princes of the Empire, That the Immunities from Cuſtoms anciently granted them by the Kings of England, began to be antiquated, and that a Monopoly of Engliſh Merchants was erected in Germany: To which the Queen by Sir Chriſtopher Perkins, firſt ſhewing the Cauſe of the Original Grant, and the Reaſon of Queen Mary's ſucceeding Prohibition, gave them ſo ſatisfactory an Anſwer, that thoſe very Hanſe-Towns that had complain'd, brought into England at this Time Quantities of Corn, it prevented a Mutiny which was like to have happen'd in London, through the Scarcity of that Commodity.

In this Year dy'd Philip Earl of Arundel, who was condemn'd in 1589, and pardon'd by the Queen, William Lord Vaulx a zealous Papiſt; Sir Thomas Heneage Vice-Chamberlain, and Chancellor of the Dutchy; Dr. William Whitaker, Maſter of St. John's College in Cambridge, and the Queen's Profeſſor of Divinity; and laſtly Sir Roger Williams and Sir Thomas Morgan. So that this Year was noted for the Deaths of two great Lords, one exquiſite Courtier, one profound Scholar, and two famous Soldiers. and of ſeveral great Men.

XIII. For ſeven Years together, after the famous Eighty Eight, the Spaniards had receiv'd and ſuſtain'd mighty Damages from the Engliſh, in ſeveral Parts of the World; but thoſe were generally in the Nature of private Expeditions: But this Year it was thought neceſſary by the Queen to make a more publick Attempt againſt that inveterate Enemy, which had been many Years plotting the Ruin of the Queen, often join'd with the Rebels in Ireland, and had lately become more formidable by taking of Calais from the French. Therefore to divert the King of Spain from farther Attempts, the Queen and Council judg'd it moſt proper to make an Invaſion of his Dominions. Whereupon a noble Fleet of a hundred and fifty Sail was made ready, of which ſeventeen were Capital Ships, and twenty two Dutch Men of War. In theſe were above ſix thouſand Soldiers under Pay, one thouſand Volunteers of the Nobility and Gentry, and almoſt ſeven thouſand Seamen, beſides thoſe of the Netherlands. Robert Earl of Eſſex, and Charles Howard Lord Admiral of England, who were at great Expences themſelves, were made Commanders in chief with equal Authority, under the Title of Generals; yet ſo that the Admiral ſhould be ſuperior at Sea, and the Earl of Eſſex at Land. To theſe were join'd for a Council of War, the Lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Francis Vere, Sir George Carew, and Sir Coniers Clifford. The whole Fleet was divided into four Squadrons; the Admiral commanded the Firſt, the Earl of Eſſex the Second, the Lord Thomas Howard the Third, and Sir Walter Raleigh the Fourth. The Officers of the Army were Sir Francis Vere Lieutenant-General, Sir John Wingfield Quarter-Maſter-General, Sir George Carew Maſter of the Ordnance, and Sir Coniers Clifford Serjeant-Major. The Colonels were Robert Earl of Suſſex, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, Sir Thomas Gerard, Sir Richard Wingfield; Sir Edward Wingfield was Commander of the Volunteers, and Anthony Aſhley, Secretary to the Council of War, was to Regiſter their Acts and Conſultations. The Commiſſions being drawn, the Queen gave them excellent Inſtructions, diſplaying both her Piety and Policy, and withal deliver'd them a ſhort Prayer of her own Compoſing, to be daily us'd in every Ship. A. D. 1596. Reg. 38, 39. A grand Expedition againſt Spain under the Earl of Eſſex, &c.

This powerful Fleet ſet Sail from Plimouth at the beginning of June, with ſecret Orders not to be open'd 'till they had paſs'd Cape St. Vincent, near which Place they met with an Iriſh Ship, the Maſter of which inform'd them, That at Cales they were under no Apprehenſions; that there was only a ſmall Garriſon in the Place, and that in the Harbour were ſeveral Galleons, Gallies, Men of War, and many Merchants Ships laden for the Indies. On the twentieth Day of June, they caſt Anchor on the Weſt Side of the Iſland of Cales, and within two Days after they agreed to attack the Spaniſh Ships, at which the Earl of Eſſex, full of youthful Ardour, threw up his Hat for Joy. This Enterprize was allotted to the leſſer Ships, becauſe the Road was too ſhallow for the reſt. They attack Cales.

The Gallies ſoon gave way, and creeping along the Shore, all but one or two ſecur'd themſelves by Flight; but the Spaniſh Men of War that lay at the Point of Land call'd Puntal, turn'd their Broad-ſides, and a furious Fight began, which laſted from Morning 'till Noon. The Bravery of Eſſex and the Engliſh ſoon prevail'd, and the Galleons being miſerably torn and ſhatter'd, and many Men ſlain, the Spaniards reſolv'd to fire all their Veſſels, or run them on Ground. The Admiral of the Spaniards, a Ship of fifteen hundred Tun, was burnt by a Moor, and two other Ships near her took Fire, and periſh'd together. A diſmal Confuſion aroſe, great Numbers of Seamen threw themſelves overboard, ſome gain'd the Shore, ſome were taken, and ſome drown'd; others as they ſwam cry'd out for Quarter, whom out of Pity the Engliſh Admiral ſav'd; and by his particular Care took and ſecur'd the two great Spaniſh Ships call'd the St. Matthew and the St. Andrew.

The Sea-Fight being ended, the valiant Eſſex landed eight hundred Men at the Puntal, a League from the Town of Cales; and advancing within half a Mile of the Town with ſeveral brave Commanders, the Spaniſh Horſe and Foot ſhew'd themſelves, and ſoon retir'd; but ſhortly after came out in greater Numbers. Upon which the Earl order'd his Forces to make a fair Retreat, and by that means having entic'd out his Enemies, he turn'd upon them with ſuch an impetuous Torrent, as drove them to the very Gates of the Town. Eſſex immediately got upon a new Work lately rais'd near the Gate, from whence he diſcover'd an Entrance into the Town, but ſo high and ſteep, that the Men muſt leap down a Pike's Length. To excite their Courage therefore, he threw down his own Colours into the Place; upon which Evans Lieutenant to Suſſex, Savage Captain of the Earl's Company, Bagnal, Pooly, and others leap'd down; while Sir Francis Vere broke down the Gate, and ruſh'd into the Town with the General and the reſt. After a ſharp Fight in the Streets, wherein many of the Engliſh were hurt from the Tops of Houſes, in half an Hour they made their way into the Market Place, where Sir John Wingfield was ſhot in the Head, and Savage and Bagnal cover'd with Wounds and Blood, were Knighted in the Place. At the ſame Inſtant the Lord Admiral and the reſt entering the Town, the Spaniards deſiſted, and retir'd to the Caſtle and Town-Houſe. The next Day they yielded, upon Condition 'That the Citizens ſhould depart in Safety with their 'wearing Garments, and the reſt ſhould go to the Soldiers for Plunder; that 'four hundred and twenty thouſand Ducats ſhould be paid for their Ranſom, 'and for Security, forty of the principal Citizens ſhould be ſent as Hoſtages in-'to England. Shortly after Proclamation was made, that no Violence ſhould be offer'd to the Spaniards, who were all convey'd in Engliſh Veſſels to Port St. Mary; the Ladies and Gentlewomen firſt, who were ſuffer'd to depart in their richeſt Apparel and Jewels: And the Generals in Perſon ſtood by the Water-ſide to ſee them ſhipp'd off, without Violence or Diſhonour from the ruder ſort of Soldiers.

Eſſex enters the Town.

Which yields

In the mean Time Sir Walter Raleigh was commanded with his Veſſels to fire the Merchant Ships lying at Port-Real; upon which they immediately offer'd two Millions of Ducats to redeem them: But this Offer was rejected by the Admiral, who ſaid, He was ſent to deſtroy Ships, not to ranſom them for Mony; and accordingly they were all burnt, to the infinite Damage of the Merchants. Thus in an Inſtant a Fleet full of Men, Merchandize, Proviſions, Armour, and twelve hundred Pieces of Ordnance, all valu'd by themſelves at twelve Millions of Ducats, was ſuddenly ſunk, conſum'd or taken; and the Town alſo was plunder'd, every Soldier bringing ſome Portion of its rich Spoils into England, to ſhew the Service he had perform'd at Cales. They laid the Town in Aſhes, except the Churches, batter'd the Walls, demoliſh'd the Towers, pillag'd and burnt the Iſland it ſelf, and laid all waſte before them, leaving the Rubbiſh to declare the Ruins the Engliſh had made in Spain. The whole Damage that the Spaniard ſuſtain'd from this Expedition, was farily computed at no leſs than twenty Millions of Ducats; and all this with the Loſs of only one Man of Note, Sir John Wingfield, who ſlew a Spaniſh Commander with his own Hand. Then ſixty Men being knighted for their Valour, and the rich Spoils got on Shipboard, on the fifth of July the whole Fleet ſet ſail from thence, with this Commendation given them by the Spaniards, That tho' in ſacred things the Engliſh had ſhew'd themſelves Hereticks, yet in all other Matters, they behav'd themſelves like valiant Soldiers, wiſe Counſellors, and Men of Honour. After ſome little Cruiſings on the Spaniſh Coaſts, they return'd ſafe into England, contrary to the Inclinations of the Earl of Eſſex, who not only would have kept Cales, but alſo have undertaken ſome new Expedition this Year.

The Queen receiv'd them at their Return with ſingular Affability, and gave particular Thanks to thoſe who had beſt ſignaliz'd themſelves, eſpecially to Eſſex and the Admiral, whoſe Acts and Conduct ſhe highly applauded. And now conſidering with her ſelf which of her Commanders to make Governor of the Bril, which was given up by the Confederate States as a Caution-Town for Mony due, ſhe made Choice of Sir Francis Vere, altho' the Earl of Eſſex had recommended others to her for that Poſt. But another thing he took with greater Diſſatisfaction, that in his Abſence ſhe had preferr'd the Lord Burleigh's Son, Sir Robert Cecil, to be Secretary of State, where he had formerly with great Earneſtneſs recommended Sir Thomas Podley. Shortly after, the King of Spain, that he might retrive the Honour he had loſt at Cales, rigg'd out a new Fleet for England and Ireland, with a great Number of Iriſh Fugitives. But being at Sea, moſt of his Ships were by Storms caſt away upon Rocks, and overwhelm'd in the Ocean: So that the very Elements ſeem'd to fight for the glorious Queen, who heard of her Enemies Fate, before ſhe was inform'd of their Deſign.

The Spaniſh Fleet ruin'd.

At this Time the Queen, for the better Security of her People, enter'd into a League Defenſive and Offenſive with the French King, againſt the King of Spain, upon certain Conditions on both Sides; which League ſhe confirm'd by Oath, in the Chappel at Greenwich, the twenty ninth Day of Auguſt, laying her Hand upon the Hand of Henry de la Tour, Duke of Bouillon, and Marſhal of France; the Biſhop of Chicheſter holding out the Evangeliſts, ſurrounded by a great Number of the Nobility. In September following, Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury was ſent Ambaſſador into France, to take the French King's Oath, and to preſent Sir Anthony Mildmay for the Queen's Ambaſſador in Ordinary, in the room of Sir Henry Unton lately deceas'd, and likewiſe to inveſt the King with the Noble Order of the Garter: To which Order, deſign'd originally for the Honour of Military Men, the Queen had choſen him as a Prince highly renown'd for Martial Glory. And not long after Sir Thomas Baskervill went over into Picardy with two thouſand Engliſh Foot, according to the Agreement for this Year.

A League with France.

In the following Year, the Queen was inform'd, that the King of Spain was preparing a new Fleet againſt Ireland; whereupon ſhe alſo prepar'd a Navy of one hundred and twenty Sail, which were divided into three Squadrons, the firſt Commanded by the Earl of Eſſex, the ſecond by the Lord Thomas Howard, and the third by Sir Walter Raleigh; in which alſo ſeveral of the Nobility and Gentry were embark'd. On the ninth Day of July they ſet Sail from Plimouth, directing their Courſe to Farol and the Groyne; but before they had ſail'd forty Leagues, they were toſs'd with ſuch a terrible Storm for four Days, that the beſt Seamen were almoſt diſtracted, and with great Difficulty recover'd Plimouth, where they were detain'd by contrary Winds for a whole Month. On the ſeventeenth of Auguſt they got to Sea again, but before they came in view of Spain, they were diſpers'd by another dreadful Tempeſt, in which, one of the two great Ships taken at Cales was daſh'd in pieces. At the Iſles call'd Azores, the Fleet met again, where Raleigh wanting Water, went on Shore with-without Leave; and before he could be furniſh'd, was commanded to follow Eſſex to Fayall: But not finding him there, he obſerv'd the Port, and calling a Council, the Commanders advis'd him to attack the Place. Upon which Raleigh with ſome of his prime Volunteers landed, and ſoon won the Town, but found no ſuch conſiderable Booty, as they expected in it. The next Day Eſſex came thither, whom Merrick maliciouſly inform'd that Raleigh had made this Attempt to prevent his Lordſhip in the Honour of the Exploit. Whereupon ſome perſuaded the Earl to call a Council of War and caſhier him; and others even to take off his Head for Landing without the Leave of his chief Commander. This Matter was ſoon adjuſted by the Mediation of the Lord Howard; but from this and other Matters aroſe ſuch an unhappy Conteſt and Emulation between theſe two great Men, that never could be throughly extinguiſh'd but by Death it ſelf.

A Feud between Eſſex and Raleigh.

From hence the Fleet ſet Sail for Gratioſa, where the Inhabitants crav'd Mercy and obtain'd it; and here Eſſex would have tarry'd in Expectation of the Spaniſh Indian Fleet, but Graves the Pilot diſſuaded him becauſe of the Badneſs of the Harbour. This prov'd unfortunate Advice, for the Engliſh were not gone above an Hour or two, before the Spaniſh Fleet, conſiſting of forty Sail, arriv'd at the Place; but hearing that the Engliſh were in theſe Parts, they directed their Courſe to Tercera, where all gain'd the Harbour except three Ships which fell into the Hands of the Engliſh; who deſign'd to have ſet upon the reſt in the Port: But finding the Attempt impracticable, they ſail'd from thence to St. Michael's, where Southampton, Rutland, Evers, Bredon and Dockwray were Knighted. And then Eſſex landed within ſix Miles of the chief Place, near Villa-Franca, a fair Town, and well furniſh'd with Merchandize, Wine, Wood and Corn; where they tarry'd ſix Days, and the common Soldiers found good Booty. At the ſame Time a rich Carack was diſcover'd coming from the Indies, which by Means of a Warning Piece from a Dutch Veſſel, perceiving the Engliſh to be near, run her ſelf a-ſhore, unloaded the Merchandize, and then fir'd her ſelf. Thus the Engliſh met with Diſappointments in all Places; and on the ninth of October they ſet Sail for England: But within two Days, a violent Storm from the North diſpers'd them, and likewiſe the Spaniſh Fleet at the ſame Time, which had ſet out from the Groyne with great Preparations againſt England; ſo that they never came in View of each other. Not one of the Engliſh Ships periſh'd, but many of the Spaniards were loſt; one of 'em was caſt upon Dartmouth, where the half-ſtarv'd Seamen confeſs'd that the Spaniards deſign'd to have ſeiz'd upon ſome Port in Cornwall, which being near the Mouth of the Channel, might be convenient to receive Forces from Spain. But Providence now kept theſe two Nations aſunder, and diſappointed both their Deſigns, when they were haſt'ning to each others Ruin.

Both Nations are diſappointed.

The warm Earl of Eſſex at his Return found ſome Promotions made which infinitely diſguſted him; Sir Robert Cecil was made Chancellor of the Dutchy; and what more ſenſibly affected him, the Lord Admiral Howard was created Earl of Nottingham, with a Relation in his Patent of the Victory in Eighty Eight, and his great Services at Cales. This Glory he envy'd him, and beſides was much diſoblig'd, that he muſt now take Place of him: For it was Enacted in the Reign of Henry the Eighth, That the chief Officers of the Kingdom ſhould have Precedence of all Men of their Degree. Whereupon the Queen, who had a ſingular Value for Eſſex, to ſatisfie him, created him Earl-Marſhal of England; by which he recover'd his Place again.

Eſſex advanc'd.

Shortly after an Ambaſſador came into England from the King of Poland; who, when the Queen expected he ſhould return her Thanks for procuring a Peace between the King his Maſter and the great Turk, on the contrary expoſtulated with her for Breach of Privileges in Trading with Spain, requiring a preſent Redreſs, or elſe the King his Maſter would do himſelf Juſtice.

The

The Queen with Indignation reply'd extempore in Latin, How have I been deceiv'd! I expected an Ambaſſador, and behold a Herald; ſuch! a Speech I never heard before.——And after ſome farther checking him for his too great Freedom, ſhe referr'd him to her Council, and retir'd with Diſpleaſure. But upon the Ambaſſador's more ſubmiſſive Behaviour, all Affairs were ſoon adjuſted. In the ſame Year the Chancellor of Denmark came into England to reſtore the Garter, with which the Queen had inveſted the King's Father, and withal offer'd his Maſter's Mediation to make a Peace between the Queen and the Spaniard. The Queen thank'd him, but deſign'd not to uſe his Mediation for what ſhe did not deſire, and eſpecially now, when he had lately invaded the French King her Allie, and had taken Amiens, the chief and ſtrongeſt Place in Picardy. For which Reaſon the King of France urg'd the Queen for a new Aid of four thouſand Men; intimating to her, That he was now offer'd by the Pope's Nuntio a very advantageous Peace, if he would abandon her Intereſt. But while theſe Matters were negotiating, Amiens was happily recover'd again by the great Valour of Baskervill and Savage, as the King in his Letters to the Queen thankfully acknowledg'd.

D'Ewes, &c. The Queen now to fortifie her ſelf againſt all Inconveniences, call'd a new Parliament, that met at Weſtminſter on the twenty fourth Day of October, and was open'd with a Speech by Sir Thomas Egerton, made Lord-Keeper, in the Room of Puckering deceas'd. In this Parliament the Queen paſs'd ſeveral Laws very acceptable to the People; namely, For recovering Depopulations, committed upon Country Farms; For prohibiting Arable Land and Tillage from being turn'd into Paſture; Againſt imbezeling Lands and Goods given to Charitable Uſes; Concerning the Building of Hoſpitals and Work-Houſes for the Poor; For preventing of Frauds in the Queen's Tellers, Receivers, &c. For building Houſes of Correction to puniſh Rogues and Vagrants; For the Reſtraining Extortions and Rapes; For Confirmation of the Depoſing thoſe Popiſh Biſhops in the Beginning of the Reign. 'For theſe Laws paſs'd, the true 'Religion reſtor'd, the Republick moſt happily govern'd, the Nation deliver'd 'from the Fear of Enemies, Ireland defended, and the French King and the 'Netherlands reliev'd, the Parliament moſt heartily congratulated her Majeſty: 'And that ſhe might not want ſufficient Aids in Time of Neceſſity, the Clergy 'voluntarily granted three Subſidies, and the Laity pray'd her to accept of three 'Subſidies, and ſix Fifteenths and Tenths; beſeeching her as in the Year 1593, 'that ſuch extraordinary Contributions might not be drawn into a Precedent, 'unleſs it were upon the like urgent Neceſſity. After this the Parliament was diſſolv'd on the ninth Day of February in the following Year.

Great Aids granted.

The Queen now underſtanding, as ſhe had ſome Time ſuſpected, That the French being importun'd by the Pope, and his own Subjects, began to incline to a Peace with Spain, immediately ſent Sir Robert Cecil and others into France, to diſſuade the Negotiation; and after that by Letters charg'd the French King with Ingratitude, declaring, That if he gain'd any reaſonable Terms from the Spaniards, he was oblig'd to the Engliſh Succours for it; and That ſolemn Oaths and mutual Compacts were never deſign'd for Snares, unleſs by the worſt of Men. But notwithſtanding all her Endeavours, and thoſe of the Confederate States, he with ſome Compliments and Acknowledgments to the Queen of England, concluded a Peace with the King of Spain, which is call'd the Treaty of Vervin. And now that King, who hitherto flouriſh'd in Martial Glory, began from this Time to reſtore and promote the Welfare of France, by maintaining and ſupporting Religion, as well the Roman as the Reformed, reviving the Laws, cheriſhing Learning, reſtoring Commerce, and beautifying the Kingdom with ſplendid Edifices, inſomuch that he far ſurpaſs'd all the Kings of France before him, and gain'd himſelf the Name of Henry the Great.

A. D. 1598. Reg. 42/43.

A Peace between France and Spain.

In the mean Time the Queen carefully providing for her own and her Peoples Safety, ſent Sir Francis Vere to the Confederate States, to know if they were willing ling to join in a Treaty of Peace with the Spaniard: And if otherwiſe, what they would afford towards a War; and to urge them concerning the Repayment of Monies due to her from them. During the Negotiations, there was a grand Conſultation held at home, in which it was accurately debated, Whether it would be to the Benefit and Advantage of the Queen and Publick to make a Peace with the Spaniard; and many nice and curious Reaſons were urg'd on both Sides. The wiſe and ſedate Lord Burleigh declar'd for Peace, as moſt eligible and neceſſary in this critical Juncture. But the vigorous and valiant Earl of Eſſex ſtifly maintain'd, that no Peace could be made with the Spaniards but ſuch as would be diſhonourable to England, and fraudulent on their Side. Inſomuch that Burleigh was provok'd to ſay, That he breath'd out nothing but Slaughter and Blood: And after a warm Diſpute about this Subject, in a ſtrange preſaging Manner, the Treaſurer drew out a Pſalm-Book, and without ſpeaking any more Words, pointed him to this Verſe, The bloody-minded Man ſhall not live out half his Days. This Debate occaſion'd Eſſex afterwards to publiſh an Apology for himſelf, with Reaſons in Juſtification of his Opinion.

A Conſultation about a Peace with Spain.

In carrying on this Buſineſs of Peace, and chuſing a fit Perſon to manage the Affairs in Ireland, which were now in great Diſorder, there aroſe a hot Debate between the Queen and the Earl of Eſſex, in the Preſence only of the Lord Admiral, Sir Robert Cecil, and Windebank, Clerk of the Seal. The Queen thought Sir William Knolls, Uncle to the Earl, to be the fitteſt Perſon to be ſent into Ireland, and Eſſex obſtinately aſſerted, that Sir George Carew was fitter than him; and ſince he could not perſuade her Majeſty to be of his Opinion, quite forgetting himſelf and his Duty, uncivilly and in Contempt turn'd his Back upon her, and gave her a ſcornful Look. Which ſo rous'd the Female Spirit of the Queen, that not induring ſuch rude Behaviour, ſhe gave him a Box on the Ear, and bad him begon with a Vengeance. He immediately in a Rage laid his Hand upon his Sword, while the Admiral ſtepp'd between, and ſwore That he neither could nor would put up ſo great an Indignity; nor would he have taken it from her great Father Harry; and in a violent Fury withdrew himſelf from the Court. In his Retirement the Lord-Keeper by a Letter adviſ'd him to ſubmit to the Queen his Soveraign, and to remember that Paſſage of Seneca, If the Law puniſh one that is Guilty, he muſt ſubmit to Juſtice; if one that is Innocent, he muſt ſubmit to Fortune. He anſwer'd his Letter with great Violence, and us'd theſe and the like Expreſſions, I know what I owe as a Subject, and what as an Earl and Marſhal of England; but know not how to ſerve as a Drudge and a Slave. If I ſhould acknowledge my ſelf Guilty, I ſhould injure the Truth, and God the Author of it. My whole Body is wounded by that ſingle Blow; and having receiv'd this Indignity, it were Impiety to ſerve longer. However, not long after, he became more Submiſſive, obtain'd his Pardon, and was receiv'd into Favour; the Queen being of ſuch an excellent Diſpoſition, that ſhe always thought it leſs misbecoming her Majeſty to exaſperate a Man, than to hate him. Yet from this Circumſtance his Friends began to date his Fall, who had obſerv'd, That Fortune ſeldom careſs'd her ſlighted Favourites, and Princes more rarely the Perſons they had offended.

The Queen ſtrikes Eſſex.

His Reſentment.

Not long after his Oppoſer the Lord Burleigh, being worn out with Labour of Mind, the Gout and old Age, and falling ſick, wrote a Letter to the Queen for her leave to lay down his Offices. The Queen viſited and comforted him; but within a few Days, having liv'd long enough for Nature, long enough for his own Glory, but not long enough for his Country, he peaceably reſign'd his Soul to God, in the ſeventy eighth Year of his Age: A Man of extraordinary Worth and Abilities, who, not to mention his venerable Preſence, his calm and ſerene Deportment, was ſo diſpos'd by Nature, ſo poliſh'd by Education, and ſo inrich'd with Learning, that that for Wiſdom, Integrity, Gravity, Induſtry, Temperance and Piety, he had no Superior; and was one of thoſe Few in the World who both liv'd and dy'd in Glory. His Saying was, Prudens qui Patiens; and, That nothing was truly for a Prince's Profit, that was not for his Honour. The knowing Queen had ſuch Eſteem for him, that ſhe would always cauſe him to ſit down in her Preſence, ſaying, My Lord, we make uſe of you, not for your Legs, but for your Head: And viſiting him in his Sickneſs, and the Servants at the Chamber-Door deſiring her Majeſty to ſtop, ſhe anſwer'd, For your Maſter's ſake I will ſtoop, but not for the King of Spain. One great Service he did his Country a little before his Death, which was to bring the Confederate States to a Compoſition, for the Payment of eight hundred thouſand Pounds, by thirty thouſand Pounds per Annum; and likewiſe to the Concluſion of a new League; by which the Queen, beſides the receiving her Debts, was eas'd of a yearly Expence of a hundred and twenty thouſand Pounds. The Death of this great Support of the Nation was immediately ſucceeded by the Death of its moſt potent Enemy, Philip King of Spain, in the ſeventy firſt Year of his Age; a Prince of great Wiſdom and Patience, through his Father's Inſtructions and his own Experience; but in Matters of War for the moſt part Unfortunate: For being naturally weak, he was wary in taking Advice, and truſted to others in his Wars; by which the three Keys of the Spaniſh Empire, which his Father taught him to watch carefully, Guletta in Africa, Fluſhing in the Netherlands, and Cales in Spain were neglected; one being taken by the Turks, another by the Hollanders, and the third by the Engliſh, to the great Damage and Diſhonour of ſo great a Monarch: So that it was not without Cauſe that he adviſ'd his Son Philip to compoſe all Differences with the Engliſh and the Netherlanders.

His Services.

The Death and Character of Philip King of Spain.

No Year was now free from Treaſons and Conſpiracies from the Romaniſts; and in this a new Traitor was diſcover'd, one Edward Squire, who had firſt been an ordinary Scrivener, afterwards a Groom in the Queen's Stable; and going as a Soldier in Captain Drake's laſt Expedition, was taken Priſoner and carry'd into Spain, where he came acquainted with one Walpole an Engliſh Jeſuit, who caus'd him to be put into the Inquiſition for a Heretick. This Man to avoid further Miſery, was eaſily induc'd to turn Papiſt, and afterwards to attempt any wicked Act for the Catholick Cauſe. His Ghoſtly Father taught him that it would be a very meritorious Act to deſtroy the Queen and the Earl of Eſſex; and ſent him into England with a peculiar Poiſon, to anoint the Pommel of the Queen's Saddle, and the Chair where the Earl of Eſſex ſhould ſit; which he exactly perform'd, but neither of them took Effect. Whereupon Walpole, ſuſpecting the Fidelity of Squire, was reſolv'd to revenge it, and ſent a Perſon into England, who in general Terms ſhould caſt this Aſperſion upon him. This caus'd Squire to be apprehended and arraign'd for Treaſon, who not imagining that his Confeſſor would detect him, directly deny'd all at firſt; but finding himſelf really betray'd, confeſs'd the whole Matter, and ſuffer'd Death.

Squire's Conſpiracy.

Ireland had often been in Rebellion againſt the Engliſh in this Reign, but never in ſo formidable a Manner as in this Year: For the Head of the Rebels, the Earl of Tyrone, notwithſtanding he had lately obtain'd his Pardon for numerous Diſturbances, ſuddenly beſieg'd the Fort of Blackwater, and ingaging with Marſhal Bagnal his mortal Enemy, he gave the Engliſh ſuch a Defeat, as they had ſcarcely ſuſtain'd the like ſince they firſt ſet footing in Ireland; for beſides the General, thirteen valiant Commanders, and fifteen hundred common Soldiers were ſlain in this Encounter: By which the Iriſh gain'd Arms, Proviſions, Ammunition, and Reputation, and the Fort of Blackwater; ſo that the Engliſh were reduc'd from an offenſive to a defenſive War. This provok'd the Queen, who ſent to the brave Earl of Ormond, then Lieutenant-General, to clear the Army of all the Iriſh; and ſhe ſent two thouſand Foot, and a hundred Horſe to recruit the Army. After this Tyrone, whoſe Fame increas'd daily, ſent four thouſand Kerns into Munſter; and the Preſident being not able to reſiſt them, by reaſon of the Smallneſs of his Forces, that whole Province alſo rebell'd, and began to kill, rob and ravage the Engliſh, without Meaſure or Mercy. Thus the Rebellion became in a manner general, and grew to that Height, that it became formidable to the Queen. Tyrone in the mean Time ſent ſubmiſſive Letters to the Earl of Ormond, but with his uſual Treachery promis'd the Spaniards that he would accept of no Conditions from the Engliſh, magnifying his Victories beyond all Truth and Reaſon. So that now, by long uſe it was grown to a deſtructive Cuſtom in Ireland, that Rebels might with the Mony and Spoils they gain'd from the Engliſh, procure themſelves Protection and Pardon.

Tyrone's Rebellion and Succeſſes in Ireland.

A. D. 1599. Reg. 41/41. To extinguiſh this increaſing Flame, the Queen thought of ſending Charles Blunt Lord Montjoy, to be Deputy of that Kingdom; but the Earl of Eſſex intimated that he was a Man but of a mean Eſtate, of no Experience, and too Bookiſh for ſuch a martial Imployment; and in forming the Character of a Man fit for that Office, he ſo artificially drew his own Picture, that the Queen immediately reſolv'd to make him Lord-Deputy of Ireland, and General of the Army. All this he made a ſhew of Refuſing, praying the Queen to beſtow thoſe Honours upon ſome abler Perſon, yet if any other Perſon was nam'd, he ſtill made Objections againſt him, and behav'd himſelf in ſuch a manner, as gave his Enemies the Advantage of ſaying, He wanted nothing but an Army at his Command, to ſet up a Title to the Crown, which his Friends and Flatterers had drawn up for him. Other Courtiers, who deſir'd the Abſence of this Favourite, puſh'd him forwards to accept the Command, knowing his youthful Ardour, and Thirſt of Glory, would haſten his Ruin; there being no way ſo certain to deſtroy a popular and aſpiring Man as forcing him upon Buſineſs improper for his Management. But tho' he was ſomewhat anxious, and fearful of his Father's Fate, yet he did or would not perceive all theſe Arts; therefore with the general Applauſe of Queen and Council, he was made Lord-Deputy of Ireland. He had a greater Army allotted him than ever appear'd in Ireland, twenty thouſand Foot, and thirteen hundred Horſe; and whatever elſe he could deſire was obtain'd by the officious, but deceitful Intrigues of his ſecret Enemies, who were raiſing him on high, that his Fall might be the greater.

The Earl of Eſſex made Lord-Deputy of Ireland.

The unfortunate Earl went over into Ireland in the Month of March, and having receiv'd the Sword according to Cuſtom, he immediately made the Earl of Southampton General of the Horſe; and contrary to his Inſtructions, he march'd towards Munſter againſt the inferior Rebels, neglecting Tyrone, the moſt conſiderable Enemy in the Kingdom, againſt whom he was particularly ſent over; and all this without acquainting the Queen with his Reaſons for ſo acting, which caus'd her to be extreamly diſſatisfy'd with his Conduct. Two conſiderable Defeats the Engliſh ſuffer'd in Ireland; and at length the Earl, contrary to Order, treated ſecretly with Tyrone, and concluded a Peace with him. When the Queen had notice of this, and that with ſo ſtrong an Army, in ſo long a Time, and ſo great Expence of Mony, Eſſex had in effect done nothing, ſhe was highly incens'd, blam'd his Actions and Counſels, as over-raſh, unfortunate and diſreſpectful to her ſelf, and freely ſaid, That he had ſomething elſe in his Thoughts beſides doing his Prince and Country Service in Ireland. Nor were her Suſpicions ill grounded; for now he began to project a wicked Deſign of returning into England with a Party of ſelect Men to reduce his Adverſaries to his Power by Force of Arms, being perſuaded that many would join with him, either out of Affection, or the Deſire of Novelties: And had certainly attempted it, if the Earl of Southampton and Sir Chriſtopher Blunt had not deterr'd him from it, as an impious, bloody and dangerous Deſign. It does not fully appear whether the Queen had Intelligence of this Matter; tho' it is reaſonable to believe ſhe had; for at this time an Army of ſix thouſand Men were rais'd in London, of which three thouſand were appointed to guard the Queen's Perſon, and the reſt to be always near and ready upon all Occaſions, under the Command of the Earl of Nottingham; but a few Days after the Army was disbanded.

Within a Month the Earl of Eſſex poſted into England, and accompany'd with ſeveral ſelect Friends, went to Noneſuch, where the Queen then lay; and early in the Morning preſented himſelf on his Knees before her Majeſty in her Privy-Chamber, when ſhe had no Expectation of him. She receiv'd him ſomewhat graciouſly in a ſhort Conference, but not with ſo pleaſing a Countenance as formerly; and at his Departure commanded him to keep his Chamber: For as ſhe was before diſpleas'd with his ill Conduct, he had now incurr'd her further Diſpleaſure by leaving the Kingdom of Ireland without her Leave. Afterwards his Actions and Proceedings being generally diſlik'd by the Council, and aggravated beſides by the Fictions and Inventions of his Adverſaries, he was committed to the Cuſtody of the Lord-Keeper, that he might not be further withdrawn from his Duty by ſeditious Counſels. Here entering into Conſideration of his Caſe, he gave himſelf wholly to Divine Contemplations, and wrote remarkable Letters to his Friends concerning the Vanity of Human Affairs.

He returns into England.

He is committed to cuſtody.

To return to the Affairs of Ireland, where the ſix Weeks Truce was ſcarce expir'd, before Tyrone prepar'd again for open Hoſtilities, and being accus'd by the Council of Ireland for Breach of Faith, he declar'd he had juſt Cauſe to renew the War, ſince the Earl of Eſſex, on whom he depended for his Life and Safety, was committed to Cuſtody in England; nor would he for the future be concern'd with the Iriſh Council, which had heretofore dealt fraudulently with him. In the mean Time Rumours were ſpread abroad among the Rebels, that England in a ſhort Time would be imbroil'd in Civil Commotions, therefore he gave new Incouragement to the Iriſh Rebels to join with him, to the Deſtruction of the Engliſh Power in Ireland; to which he was farther encourag'd by the Spaniards, who had ſent him both Mony and Ammunition, and alſo by the Pope, who excited him by large Promiſes and Indulgences; all which Rebellious Practices in Tyrone, were either directly or indirectly charg'd upon the Earl of Eſſex by his Enemies. In the Depth of the Winter the Queen ſent Montjoy her Deputy into Ireland; who with great Care and Induſtry fortify'd the moſt important Places in that Kingdom, and ſo harras'd and manag'd Tyrone with continual Skirmiſhing, that he ſoon chang'd the Fortune of the War, drove that Arch-Rebel into his Faſtneſſes and abſconding Places, ſubdu'd the Rebels in Ulſter and Leinſter, and in all Places prov'd victorious. Nor had Sir George Carew leſs Succeſs in Munſter, againſt the Titular Earl of Deſmond; and ſo fully quieted and ſubdu'd thoſe Parts, that not ſo much as one Fort held out againſt the Queen.

Montjoy made Deputy of Ireland.

In England a new Conſultation was debating, concerning a Peace with the King of Spain, which was deſir'd both by him and the French King, and by Albert the Arch-Duke, who was now return'd into the Netherlands out of Spain, where he was marry'd to the Infanta. The Queen conſenting to the Treaty, left it to the French King to nominate both the Time and the Place for the Meeting of the Commiſſioners, who appointed the Month of May, and the Town of Boloign in France: But foreſeeing that a Queſtion would ariſe about Precedency, ſome Perſons were appointed to ſearch ancient Records concerning that Point. Theſe Perſons found in the Book of the Ceremonies of the Court of Rome, which according to the Canons gave Rule to the Chriſtian Princes, 'That among Kings, the firſt Place was due to the King of France, 'the ſecond to the King of England, and the third to the King of Caſtile, the 'chief Title of the Kings of Spain; and that the Engliſh quietly held this Privi-'lege in the General Councils of Baſil, Conſtance, and others. Accordingly

A Treaty with Spain.

'Pope Julius the Third gave Sentence for Henry the Seventh, King of En- 'gland, againſt Ferdinand then King of Caſtile. At the appointed Time the Commiſſioners met at Boloign; Sir Henry Nevil, Sir John Herbert, Sir Thomas Edmunds and Robert Beal, for the Engliſh; and a proportionable Number of others for the King of Spain and the Arch-Duke. The Engliſh had Inſtructions firſt to inſiſt ſtrictly upon Precedency; yet if the Spaniards contended the Matter, then to put it to the Deciſion of Lots, rather than diſſolve the Treaty; and for the reſt, to propoſe and mention the renewing the ancient Burgundian League, Freedom of Commerce, &c. At the Meeting, when they had ſeverally ſhown their Commiſſions, the Engliſh challeng'd the Precedency, and the Spaniards did the ſame, and in ſuch a peremptory manner, that without that obtain'd, they would break up the Treaty. Hereupon the Engliſh made a Propoſal to drop the Queſtion concerning Precedency, and to tranſact the Buſineſs by Writing, and Meſſengers between both Parties; or that the Treaty might be prorogu'd for ſixty Days, ſo that it might rather ſeem diſcontinu'd than diſſolv'd. But all this, and ſeveral new Propoſals came to no Effect; ſo that after the Space of three Months, the Treaty of Boloign came to nothing.

But to no Effect.

In the mean Time the Confederate States were ſo far from regarding a Peace, that at this Time they were reſolv'd upon reducing the Sea-Coaſts of Flanders into their Command. Accordingly they landed an Army into that Country of fourteen thouſand Foot, and three thouſand Horſe, under the Command of Prince Maurice of Naſſaw; and fifteen hundred of the Engliſh under the Command of the two valiant Brothers Sir Francis and Horatio Vere. At which Time there was fought the famous Battel of Newport, where Sir Francis order'd his Engliſh to throw off their Cloaths, telling them, That ſhortly they ſhould need none, or get better; and here nine thouſand Spaniards were ſlain, and the Victory by the Valour of the Engliſh fell to the Confederate States: For ſo forward and couragious were the Engliſh in the Battel, that of their fifteen hundred, eight hundred were ſlain or ſore wounded, eight Captains kill'd, and all the reſt hurt but two.

The Battel of Newport.

All this Year, and the laſt, ſeveral Conteſts and Complaints aroſe between the Engliſh and French, concerning the Reprizals of Goods taken from each other by Pirates of either Nation; alſo concerning Cuſtoms and Impoſitions, contrary to the Treaty of Blois, and corrupt and deceitful taking of Engliſh Cloaths, to the great Diſcredit of the Nation. With Denmark alſo aroſe Controverſies concerning Commerce, and the Fiſhing of the Engliſh upon the Coaſt of Iſland and Norway. The Queen likewiſe at that Time, for the Encreaſe of Navigation and Commerce, founded the Company of Eaſt-India Merchants, who having large Privileges granted them, ſetled ſeveral Factories in thoſe Parts, and carry'd on a great Trade even in this Reign. In the ſame Year, Pope Clement the Eighth, perceiving the Queen to be declining in Years, ſent two bold Breves into England, the one to the Popiſh Clergy, the other to the Laity, in which he pretended to authorize no Perſon whatſoever to aſſume the Engliſh Crown after the Queen's Death, but ſuch a one as ſhould promiſe by Oath to uſe his utmoſt Endeavours to promote the Catholick Religion, tho' he was never ſo near ally'd to the Blood Royal of England. This was deſign'd chiefly againſt the preſent King of Scotland; and as Camden obſerves, was the Foundation of the famous Powder-Plot in the next Reign.

The Pope's Deſigns againſt England.

Thus, with a Year of extraordinary Scarcity of Corn, concluded the Sixteenth Century; in which there occurr'd more famous Varieties in Church and State, both in England and all Chriſtendom, than in any Age ſince the firſt Propagation of the Goſpel and Chriſtianity.

XIV. All Things being in a reaſonable Degree of Peace and Security, the Seventeenth Century in England began with the fatal Tragedy of the gallant Earl of Eſſex, who was hurry'd on to his ruin by a Temper too violent and impetuous. He had been ſix Months in Cuſtody under the Lord-Keeper, and now out of his own good Nature, the Senſe of his Afflictions, and the good Advice of his Friends, he began to repent of his ill Deſigns, and made ſuch a ſhew of Piety, Patience, Modeſty and Humility, that his Friends hop'd for his Converſion, his Adverſaries envy'd him, and the Queen, molify'd with his ſubmiſſive Letters, ſuffer'd him to retire to his own Houſe, under the free Cuſtody of Sir Richard Berkley, often proteſting, That ſhe would do nothing againſt him for his Ruin, but only for his Reformation. But ſince the vulgar Sort had openly proclaim'd his Innocency; that her Majeſty might not be ſuſpected of Prejudice or Injuſtice, ſhe thought fit to have his Cauſe heard, not in the Star-Chamber, leſt he ſhould be ſeverely fin'd, but in the Lord-Keeper's Houſe, before the Queen's Council, four Earls, two Barons, and four Judges, and that ſome Cenſures ſhould be taken of his Actions, yet without any Charge of Perfidiouſneſs. The Heads of his Accuſation were, 'That contrary to his Com-'miſſion he had made the Earl of Southampton General of the Horſe, had drawn 'his Forces into Munſter, neglected the chief Rebel Tyrone, and held a private 'and ſuſpicious Parlee with him, contrary to the Dignity of the Queen's Ma-'jeſty, and the Perſon of a Vice-Roy, which he repreſented: And ſome Ag-'gravations were made by the Lawyers of ſome abrupt Sentences in his Let-'ter written to the Lord Privy-Seal. The Earl kneeling at the Table, gave Thanks to God for his Mercies, and to his gracious Princeſs, that proceeded ſo mildly againſt him, profeſſing, He would not contend with her, nor excuſe the Errors of his Youth, either in whole or in part; That he always meant well, tho' it happen'd otherwiſe in Appearance, but now he would bid the World Farewel. And ſhedding a Flood of Tears, which caus'd many to ſympathize with him, the Lord-Keeper in Concluſion proceeded to Sentence, which was, That he ſhould be remov'd from the Place of Privy-Counſellor, ſuſpended from his Offices of Earl-Marſhal and Maſter of the Ordnance, and be detain'd in Cuſtody during the Queen's Pleaſure. This Cenſure was approv'd by all the reſt; and many were in hopes that he would be reſtor'd to Favour, ſince the Queen had expreſly commanded, that he ſhould not be ſuſpended from being Maſter of the Horſe, and that this Cenſure ſhould by no means remain upon Record.

The Earl of Eſſex's Cauſe.

He is cenſur'd.

After this the Earl made a ſhew of extraordinary Humility, which ſo pleas'd the merciful Queen, that ſhe remov'd his Keeper from him, ſet him at Liberty, and gave him leave to retire into the Country; but admoniſh'd him now to make Diſcretion his Keeper, and by no means to come to the Court, or near her Perſon. But as ſoon as his Servant Cuffe had Acceſs to him, he began to poiſon his Ears, and to tax him with Cowardice and Weakneſs; which provok'd the Earl to command his Name to be ſtruck out of the Roll of his Servants, but Merrick his Steward, who was of the ſame Opinion, prevented it. And the Earl going into the Country, remember'd himſelf to the Queen by the Lord Henry Howard, in theſe Words, That he kiſs'd the Rod, and the Queen's Hand, which had only corrected, and not ruin'd him; yet he ſhould never enjoy real Comfort, 'till he might behold thoſe bleſſed Eyes, which had been his propitious Stars to guide him in his Courſe, while he ſteer'd at a lawful Diſtance. But now he reſolv'd to feed in the Field like Nebuchadnezzar, 'till it ſhould pleaſe his Queen to reſtore him to his Senſe. The Queen ſecretly rejoycing at theſe Expreſſions, ſaid, Would to Heaven his Actions were anſwerable to his Words; He has long try'd my Patience, I muſt now try his Humility. And now the Earl grew ſo confident of the Queen's Favour, that he became a Petitioner to her for the Farm of the ſweet Wines, which was was a Place of great Profit; but ſhe to try his Temper, return'd him Anſwer, That ſhe muſt firſt underſtand the Value of it; That Benefits were not to be beſtow'd blindfold: That a furious Horſe muſt be kept ſhort of Provender to bring him to due Management; commending the Aphoriſm of the Phyſicians, That corrupt Bodies are injur'd by feeding plentifully. Theſe unexpected Anſwers ſo inrag'd the Earl that they threw him into his former Frenzy, fir'd him with Indignation, and caus'd him blindly to hearken to the Suggeſtions of Cuffe, Merrick, and other Incendiaries, whoſe implacable Malice hurry'd them to their own and their Maſter's Deſtruction. Their exaſperating Speeches caus'd him often to join with them, and to drop paſſionate and indiſcreet Words, which coming to the Queen's Knowledge with aggravating Comments and Inferences, alienated her Affections from him. But what moſt ſenſibly provok'd her, and made the Breach irreparable, was his indecent reflecting upon her Majeſty's Perſon, ſaying, That the Queen was now grown an old Woman, no leſs crooked and diſtorted in her Mind, than in her Body: Which ſome of the Court Ladies, whom he had formerly deluded in Matters of Love, taking up at the Rebound, ſo ſpitefully repreſented it, that it blew up new Flames of Diſcontent between them, and ſo ſtung his diſtracted Mind, that he began to revive the clandeſtine Deſigns he had form'd in Ireland, made court to the Puritans and their Miniſters, and alſo to the Papiſts, by ſeeming to commiſerate their Afflictions. He ſecretly entertain'd Soldiers, and daring Prodigals, whoſe Poverty made them ready for any unlawful Enterprize. He and his particular Friends, the Earl of Southampton, Sir Charles Danvers, Sir Ferdinando Gorges, Sir John Davis, and John Littleton of Frankel, held their private Cabals in Drury Houſe, where they enter'd upon Reſolutions, To ſeize the Tower, the Court, the Queen's Perſon, and call a Parliament to erect another Government. Theſe frequent Aſſemblies, and the great Reſort to Eſſex's Houſe under Pretence of hearing Sermons, encreas'd the Suſpicions the Court had entertain'd of him, and caus'd him to be call'd before the Council, which he refus'd to obey, being reſolv'd to preſerve his Liberty, tho' with the Price of his Blood, and to that end had gather'd to his own Houſe Sands, Parker and Monteagle, with about three hundred Gentlemen of good Quality.

Eſſex relapſes.

The Queen having order'd the Lord Mayor to keep the Citizens in due Obedience, ſent the Lord-Keeper, the Earl of Worceſter, Sir William Knolls, and Lord Chief Juſtice Popham, to know the Cauſe of this unuſual Aſſembly. They were admitted with much Difficulty into Eſſex's Houſe through the Wicket; and in the Court-Yard they found a confus'd Multitude, with Eſſex in the middle of them, together with Southampton and Rutland. The Lord-Keeper demanded the Cauſe of the Tumult, and aſſur'd him that if any had injur'd him, he ſhould have equal Juſtice againſt the Perſons; to which Eſſex anſwer'd, There was a Plot againſt his Life; and when the Lord-Keeper urg'd him to be particular, the Multitude interrupted him, crying out, Away, let us begon, they come to betray you, kill them, throw away the Broad-Seal, ſecure them in Priſon. Upon which Eſſex, retiring with them into the Houſe, commanded the Doors to be ſhut, ſaying to the Lords, Have Patience, I will go into the City and adviſe with the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, and return immediately. Coming inconſiderately into London, with about two or three hundred in his Company, he cry'd out with the utmoſt Heat, For the Queen, for the Queen! a Plot is laid for my Life! and went directly towards Sheriff Smith's Houſe in Fen-Church Street; and ſeeing the Citizens run about in a Maze, he bid them Arm themſelves, or they could do him no Good: But not one Man took up Arms for him; and the Sheriff in whom he confided, hearing of his coming, withdrew himſelf out at a Back-Door, to the Lord Mayor's Houſe, and would not ſee him. In the mean Time Eſſex by a Herald was proclaim'd a Traitor in all Parts of the City; and ſeeing none would eſpouſe his Cauſe, and that his own Party began to deſert, he gave Gorges leave to ſet the the Privy-Counſellors at liberty, who did it, and went with them to the Court by Water. Eſſex returning to his Houſe, found a Chain drawn croſs the Street at St. Paul's, and Pikes and Musketeers planted againſt him by the Biſhop of London, under the Command of Sir John Leviſon. The Earl in a Rage drew his Sword, and commanded Blunt to fall on; which he did with great Reſolution, kill'd one Waite, and was himſelf deſperately wounded, and taken Priſoner. There fell alſo Henry Tracy, a young Gentleman for whom the Earl had a tender Affection, and one or two Citizens. Being thus repuls'd at this Place, his Hat ſhot through, and many ſecretly deſerting him, he return'd to his Houſe by Water, burnt ſeveral Papers, That they might tell no Tales, and fortify'd his Houſe on all Sides.

Immediately the Houſe was inveſted by Land by the Lord Thomas Howard, the Lord Gray, the Lord Burleigh, the Lord Compton, and others; while the Lord Admiral, the Lord Effingham his Son, the Lord Cobham, Sir John Stanhop, Sir Robert Sidney, and Sir Fulk Grevil enter'd into the Garden by the Thames Side; and being ready to attack the Houſe, he ſummon'd him by Sidney to yield. Southampton ask'd, To whom they ſhould yield? If to their Adverſaries, their Ruin would be inevitable; If to the Queen, their Guilt would be apparent; but if the Lord Admiral would give them Hoſtages for their Security, they would appear before her Majeſty, or elſe they would ſell their Lives as dear as they could. The Lord Admiral anſwer'd, That ſuch Conditions were not to be propos'd by Rebels; but in Commiſeration, to the weaker Sex, he would permit the Counteſs his Wife, the Lady Rich his Siſter, and their Women, who fill'd the Air with their diſmal Outcries, to depart in Safety. This the Earl took as a Favour, and only deſir'd the Space of an Hour or two to fortifie the Place, through which they ſhould paſs, which was granted. Now the Earl of Eſſex looking upon all Things as deſperate and loſt, after two or three Perſons were kill'd on each Side, once reſolv'd to force his Way through his Enemies, to which he was particularly incourag'd by the old Lord Sands, who declar'd, That the braveſt Courſes were the ſafeſt, and that it was more honourable for a Nobleman to die by the Sword, than the Axe. But Eſſex fluctuating in his Reſolutions, and having the Lord Admiral's Promiſe that all ſhould be civilly treated, all the Noblemen at ten a Clock at Night, falling upon their Knees deliver'd up their Swords, and themſelves Priſoners to him. Eſſex and Southampton were firſt confin'd to Lambeth-Houſe, and ſhortly after with Rutland, Sands, Cromwell, Monteagle, Sir Charles Danvers, and Sir Henry Bromley, were committed to the Tower. The next Day, Thomas Lea, Captain of a Company in Ireland, intimating to one Croſs a Sea-Captain, how noble an Exploit it were for ſix brave Soldiers to go to the Queen, and forcibly compel her to releaſe Eſſex and Southampton, was immediately apprehended, examin'd, found guilty, and executed.

His Houſe beſieg'd.

He yields.

Upon the nineteenth of February, the two Earls, Eſſex and Southampton, were brought to their Trials in Weſtminſter-Hall, before many of their Peers, where the Treaſurer Buckhurſt was made Lord High-Steward for that ſolemn Occaſion. They were jointly indicted of High-Treaſon, namely, 'That they 'had plotted to deprive the Queen of her Life and Kingdom, to ſurprize her 'in her very Palace; and that they broke out into open Rebellion, by impri'ſoning the Counſellors of the Kingdom, by exciting the Citizens with vain 'Fictions, by aſſaulting the Queen's loyal Subjects, and by defending of Eſſex's 'Houſe againſt her Majeſty's Forces: To all which they pleaded not guilty, and Eſſex averr'd, That he had done nothing, but what was agreeable to the Law of Nature, and upon urgent Neceſſity. Telverton the Queen's Sergeant, and Edward Coke her Attorney, open'd the Indictment, and according to the Cuſtom of Lawyers, upbraided Eſſex with the Queen's Favours, compar'd him to Catiline, and as ſome thought made too indecent Reflections and Inſults upon Men of their Quality and unhappy Circumſtances: For Coke ended his Harangue with this this ſevere Concluſion: It were to be wiſh'd that this Robert, Earl of Eſſex, might be the laſt of this Name, who affected to be Robert the firſt of that Name King of England. The Earl of Eſſex with great Courage and Modeſty anſwer'd, That this Art of ſcandalous Oratory was common to Men of their Profeſſion, who accounted it their Glory to depreſs innocent Men with Multiplicity of Words, and therefore pray'd the Lords not to regard their Clamours and noiſie Suggeſtions, but weigh the Matter according to Truth, and not by Rigour and Quirks of Law. The Evidences againſt them being heard, Southampton endeavour'd to excuſe himſelf out of his Love to Eſſex, and his Ignorance of the Laws, and with great Humility begg'd the Queen's Mercy, whom he had always eſteem'd as the lively Image of the Divine Goodneſs, and againſt whom his Heart had never harbour'd a diſloyal Thought. Eſſex, when the Heat was over between him and Cecil, anſwer'd more calmly, That he had no Deſign but to repel Force by Force; nor would he have enter'd the City inconſiderately, if he had not thought his Life in Danger; nor with ſo ſmall a Number, if he deſign'd any thing but to defend himſelf againſt his private Enemies. After this the Lords withdrew, and in an Hour return'd to their Places, where every one of them pronounc'd Eſſex and Southampton guilty; who being brought again to the Bar, and acquainted with it, Eſſex humbly begg'd the Lords Favours, that they would intercede with her Majeſty for Southampton's Pardon, who might do her good Service, But, added he, for my own Life I value it not; for I deſire nothing more than to lay it down with ſincere Faith to God, and Loyalty to my Prince, tho' the Law has made another Interpretation of it. Yet I would have none to tell the Queen that I ſlight her Mercy, tho' I believe I ſhall never ſervilely beg it: And I beſeech you, my Peers, tho' you have condemn'd me by Law, that you would abſolve me in your Conſciences, who never deſign'd any Ill againſt my Prince.

They are condemn'd.

The next Day Sir Robert Vernon, Sir William Conſtable, Sir Edmund Bainham, Knights; John Littleton, Henry Cuffe the Earl's Secretary, Captain Whitlock, John and Chriſtopher Wright, and Orel an old Soldier, were arraign'd; and as ſoon as they had held up their Hands, and the Queen was inform'd they were unwarily drawn into this Plot, ſhe commanded that none but Littleton, Bainham and Orel ſhould be try'd, and that the reſt ſhould be remanded to Priſon; and tho' Sentence paſs'd againſt thoſe that were try'd, yet at laſt all their Lives were ſpared. Bainham redeem'd his by a Sum of Mony paid to Sir Walter Raleigh, Littleton dy'd of a Diſtemper, and Orel was pardon'd.

In the mean Time the ſorrowful Earl of Eſſex, diſturb'd in his Conſcience, and terrify'd by the attending Miniſter, deſir'd to diſcourſe with ſome of the Privy-Council, and particularly with Secretary Cecil. Upon which Requeſt, the Lord-Keeper, the Lord-Treaſurer, the Lord-Admiral and Cecil went to him; and after he had ask'd Pardon of the Lord-Keeper and Cecil for what he had done or ſaid againſt them, he aſſur'd them, That the Queen could never be ſafe as long as he liv'd, and therefore begg'd that he might be executed privately in the Tower. He diſcover'd ſeveral of his Aſſociates in the Conſpiracy; and deſiring to ſpeak with Blunt and Cuffe, as ſoon as he ſaw them, he cry'd out, Ah Cuffe! Ask Pardon of God and the Queen; for you were the Perſons that chiefly provok'd me to this Diſloyalty. Nor was he ſatisfy'd with this verbal Confeſſion, but in Writing diſcover'd the Conſpirators, which were then in ſeveral Countries, as Scotland, Ireland, and the Netherlands.

Eſſex's Confeſſion.

The twenty fifth of February was appointed for the fatal Day of Execution, when Thomas Montford and William Barlow Doctors of Divinity, with Aſhton Miniſter of the Tower Church, were ſent to him early in the Morning, to prepare him for Death. In the Preſence of theſe Men he gave Thanks to God, that his Deſigns, ſo dangerous to the Publick, had no Succeſs. He freely told them, That he had now look'd ſeriouſly into his Sins, and was heartily heartily ſorry that he had ſo obſtinately defended an unjuſt Cauſe at the Bar. He thank'd the Queen who had granted him a private Execution, leſt his Mind, at preſent compos'd, might be diſturb'd by the Peoples Behaviour; for he had learn'd how vain a Thing was popular Breath, and how he deſerv'd to be cut off from the Commonwealth, for the Contagion of his Enterprize, which like a foul Diſeaſe had ſpread and infected many. In the mean Time the Queen's Mind was violently agitated with various Apprehenſions; and her former Affection reviv'd, which with the Remembrance of paſt Services, produc'd ſuch tender Emotions of Pity and Clemency, that ſhe ſent her Commands by Sir Edward Cary, that he ſhould not be executed: On the other Side his perverſe Obſtinacy, who ſcorn'd to ask her Pardon, and had openly declar'd, That his Life would be the Queen's Deſtruction, did ſo puſh her on to Juſtice and Severity, that ſoon after ſhe ſent a freſh Command by Darcy, that he ſhould be executed. Accordingly he was brought to a Scaffold erected in the Tower, near which ſate ſome few Lords, ſome of the Aldermen of London, and ſeveral Knights, among whom was Raleigh, purpoſely, as he ſaid, to anſwer to any Accuſation the Earl might make againſt him; but as others thought, to feed his Eyes with the Sufferings of his Enemy; therefore he was adviſ'd out of Decency to withdraw into the Armory, where he beheld the whole Tragedy. The Earl having aſcended the Scaffold with the above-nam'd Divines, uncover'd his Head, and lifting up his Eyes to Heaven, confeſs'd his Sins, and begg'd Mercy for them, eſpecially this laſt, which he call'd, A bloody, crying and outragious Sin. He pray'd the Queen and her Miniſters to forgive him, And that God would give her a long and happy Reign, proteſting, That he never deſign'd to lay violent Hands on her Perſon. Then he pray'd God to ſtrengthen his Mind againſt the Terrors of Death, and intreated the Spectators to join with him in a ſhort Prayer, which he deliver'd with great Devotion. Then he rehears'd the Apoſtle's Creed; and laying himſelf down, plac'd his Neck upon the Block; and having repeated the firſt Verſes of the fifty firſt Pſalm, and commended his Spirit into the Hands of God, his Head was ſtruck off at the third Blow; but the firſt took away both Senſe and Motion. Thus fatally dy'd Robert D' Evereux, Earl of Eſſex, in the thirty fourth Year and Prime of his Age; a Perſon endow'd with all thoſe Accompliſhments that ſerve to finiſh a Nobleman, and a gallant Warrior, whoſe Genealogy was ancient and illuſtrious. He had been a great Favourite, and loaden with Preferments, had a towering Spirit, and an obliging Affability; but he was not born for a Courtier, for he could neither flatter nor diſſemble, but always carry'd his Love and Hatred in his Countenance. His great Thirſt after Popularity, and his continual Ingroſſing of Fame procur'd him many Enemies, and made his Mind boil into undecent Paſſions, more advantageous to his Enemies Deſigns than his own. For they lighted their Candle at his Fire; and this Heat being blown into a Flame by ſome fiery Spirits about him, ſtain'd his good Nature with Thoughts of Revenge, which his Enemies turn'd upon the Queen her ſelf; ſo that the ſame Coal with which he deſign'd to conſume his Enemies Houſes, kindled his own Funeral Pile. Thus Pride and Ambition do often uſurp the Names of Greatneſs and Gallantry, 'till they prove the Downfall and Ruin of the braveſt Men upon Earth.

The Queen diſturb'd in her Mind.

His Execution and Character.

Not many Days after Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, Sir Charles Danvers, Sir John Davis, Sir Gilly Merick, and Cuffe, being accus'd of the ſame Crimes with the Earl, were brought to their Trials, and being convicted by the Jury, receiv'd the Sentence of Death, and were all executed at Tyburn; except the two firſt, who being nobly deſcended, were beheaded upon Tower-Hill. To this Cauſe alſo there belongs a peculiar Cenſure, given at this Time in the Star-Chamber: The Earl of Eſſex complain'd at his Trial, that his Letters were counterfeited, and upon a diligent Enquiry into the Matter, a bold Impoſture was diſcover'd. The Counteſs of Eſſex, being apprehenſive, that in thoſe troubleſome Times ſome Miſchiefs might befal her Husband and her ſelf, put ſome Letters which ſhe had receiv'd from him into a Cabinet, and intruſted it in the Hands of a Dutch Woman call'd Ribove, who hiding them in her Houſe, they were accidentally diſcover'd by her Husband John Daniel; who reading them over, and obſerving ſome Paſſages in them that might incenſe the Queen and endanger the Earl, caus'd them to be tranſcrib'd by a Perſon expert at Counterfeiting of Hands. And when the timorous Counteſs was ready to be deliver'd of a Child, he told her that unleſs ſhe would give him three thouſand Pounds, he would put them into the Hands of her Husband's Enemies. The good Lady, to prevent that threatning Danger, immediately gave him eleven hundred and ſeventy Pounds; and ſtill for that great Sum the Impoſtor only gave her the Counterfeit Copies, and kept the Originals, to get another Sum for them from the Earl's Enemies. For which he was condemn'd to perpetual Impriſonment, fin'd in three thouſand Pounds, two of which was to be paid to the Counteſs, and to ſtand with his Ears nail'd to the Pillory, with this Inſcription on his Breaſt, A wicked Forger and Impoſtor.

The tenth Parliament in this Reign.

Not long after the vigilant Queen ſummon'd her laſt Parliament, which met at Weſtminſter upon the twenty ſeventh Day of October; in which grievous Complaints were made by the Houſe of Commons concerning the Miſchiefs of Monopolies. The Queen, by way of Prevention, ſent out Proclamations, declaring the ſaid Licences and Patents to be void in part, leaving ſome Part to the Determination of the Laws; which was ſo acceptable to the Commons, that they immediately ſent eighty ſelect Perſons, together with their Speaker, to return their hearty Thanks to her Majeſty. She on the other Side in a tender Speech gave them Thanks, For being ſuch faithful Miniſters to her, and recalling her from an Error proceeding from her Ignorance, not Will. After that ſhe declar'd to them, That ſhe had rather her Heart or Hand ſhould periſh, than that either one or the other ſhould allow ſuch Privileges to Monopoliſts as might be prejudicial to her dear People. That the Splendor of Regal Majeſty had not ſo blinded her Eyes, that licentious Power ſhould prevail more than Juſtice. That ſhe was none of thoſe Princes that would be deceiv'd by the Glory of the Name; for ſhe knew the Commonwealth was to be govern'd for the Good of thoſe committed to her, not of her ſelf to whom it was intruſted; and that an Account was one Day to be given before a ſuperior Judge. She thought her ſelf moſt happy, that ſhe had by God's Aſſiſtance ſo proſperouſly govern'd the Commonwealth; and that ſhe had ſuch loving Subjects, as for their Good ſhe would willingly leave both her Kingdom and Life. This Speech, and her endearing Behaviour, ſo pleas'd and charm'd the Commons, that they now gave her greater Aids than ever ſhe had receiv'd, namely four intire Subſidies, and eighteen Fifteenths and Tenths. After which this Parliament, after a ſix Weeks Seſſion, was diſſolv'd upon the nineteenth Day of December.

The Queen's Generoſity.

Reg. 44. During theſe Tranſactions at home, the Arch-Duke Albert beſieg'd Oſtend in the Netherlands, and the Confederate States being oblig'd for their own Preſervation to defend it, they made Sir Francis Vere Governor of it, under the Title of General of all the Forces within and without Oſtend. This Place, within the Memory of that Generation, was but a few Cottages for poor Fiſhermen on a naked Shore; but at the Beginning of the Netherland Wars, was fortify'd by the States, firſt with a Paliſado; afterwards upon the Sea working in, and making a very convenient Harbour, they added a Trench to it, and plac'd an Engliſh Garriſon in it. Theſe Men firſt under John Conway, and afterwards under Sir John Norris, ſo diſturb'd and over-run Flanders, that the Prince of Parma began to lay Siege to it, but in vain. Le Motte attempted it by Treachery, but was repell'd with great Loſs; and the Arch-Duke Albert ſurrounded it with ſeventeen Sconces. But when the Garriſons with theſe Sconces prov'd as burdenſome and vexatious to Flanders as the Enemies, and the Haven being thought convenient both to harbour the Spaniſh Gallies, and diſturb the Navigation of the Engliſh and Hollanders, the Spaniards reſolv'd to take it at any Expence, and the States on the other hand were as reſolute to preſerve it. Never in that Age was a Siege more obſtinately maintain'd, or more gallantly defended; nor a greater Slaughter of Men, or a Piece of Service that laſted a longer Space. At the End of five Months, Sir Francis Vere finding his Forces diminiſh'd by frequent Sallies, the Enemies Shot and the Peſtilence, a Part of the old Town ſwallow'd by the Sea, their Proviſion almoſt ſpent, and by reaſon of contrary Winds no Hopes of Supplies, which he had often in vain demanded; and underſtanding that the Enemy were ready to make a general Aſſault upon the Town, he deſir'd a Parly with the Arch-Duke concerning a Surrender of the Place; and after Hoſtages were given on both Sides, Commiſſioners were ſent to treat about it. But General Vere only protracted Time, and fed them with Hopes of a Surrender, 'till freſh Supplies of Men arriv'd; and then ſent back the Commiſſioners, excuſing himſelf by that Military Axiom, That to over-reach an Enemy is both pleaſant and advantageous, and therefore deſir'd their Pardon, if in caſe of the like Neceſſity he ſhould make uſe of the ſame Stratagem. The Arch-Duke in Revenge made a furious Aſſault the next Day, but was beaten back with Loſs; and General Vere, when he had repair'd the ſhaken and batter'd Places, was recall'd by the States, who thought fit every five Months to ſend a new Governor with freſh Supplies of Men: Which ſucceſſive Governors, with great Management and Reſolution, defended the Town above three Years and three Months, againſt all the furious Attacks of the Sea and the Enemy. And it would have been thought happy by vaſt Numbers, if the Sea had been let in and had ſwallow'd it up; for the beſt and braveſt Soldiers of the Netherlands, Spain, England, France, Scotland, and Italy, while they contended for a barren Plat of Sand, found here one common Sepulchre, tho' with that an eternal Monument of their Valour.

The Spaniards land in Ireland.

As to the Affairs of Ireland, the Inhabitants there had been in long Expectations of Aſſiſtance from Spain, which now to their great Joy arriv'd in Safety at Kingſale; and having peaceably enter'd the Town and refreſh'd themſelves, Don John d'Aquila, who commanded them, with the Title of General of the Catholick King in God's War, for maintaining the Faith in Ireland, publiſh'd ſeveral Papers, to perſuade the People, 'That Queen Elizabeth was by ſeveral 'Sentences of the Pope depriv'd of her Crown, that her Subjects were abſolv'd 'from their Oath of Allegiance, and that now the Spaniards were come to 'deliver Ireland from the Jaws of Hell; and by that ſpecious Pretence he induc'd great Numbers of lewd and diſſolute Perſons to join with him. The Lord-Deputy having drawn together what Forces he could, inveſted Kingſale, forc'd the Caſtle of Kincurran to ſurrender; and with the Aſſiſtance of Vice-Admiral Leviſon, ſtraiten'd the Town with a cloſer Siege, which was ſoon after a little relax'd, in regard Leviſon with his Fleet was oblig'd to ſail from thence againſt two thouſand Spaniards, landed at Bear-Haven, Caſtle-Haven and Baltimore, five of whoſe Ships he happily ſunk. About the ſame Time, Tyrone, O-Donel, O-Rock, and the principal Rebels drew near, and joining the new-landed Spaniards, compos'd an Army of ſix thouſand Foot and five hundred Horſe; and were ſwell'd with ſuch an Aſſurance of Victory, as being freſh Men, more numerous, and well provided with Neceſſaries, while the Engliſh were extreamly fatigu'd with a Winter's Siege, and both Men and Horſes deſtitute of Proviſions and Conveniences. However when both Armies came to ingage, they ſoon found their Error; for the Spaniards were miſerably ſlaughter'd, and the Iriſh threw down their Arms, and betook themſelves to Flight. Don Alphonſo O Campo was taken Priſoner, with three Spaniſh Leaders and ſix Enſigns; twelve hundred Men were ſlain, and nine Colours taken; and of the Engliſh few were kill'd, though many were wounded. Upon this the two Rebel Earls, Tyrone and O-Donel, made their Escape, the former to his Northern Shelters, and the latter into Spain. The next Day the Lord-Deputy commanded Bodley to survey the Works about Kingsale, to finish the Mount, and draw the Trenches nearer the Town; which caus'd D'Aquila to send a Trumpeter and desire a Parly, and that General signify'd to Sir William Godolphin, 'That he had found the Lord-Deputy a sharp but honourable Ene-'my, and the Irish weak, rude and perfidious; that the Catholick King had 'sent him to assist two Earls, whom he now question'd whether they were in 'the World, since one Blast of War had blown one into Spain, and the other 'into the North; wherefore he was willing to treat of a Peace, which might 'be advantageous to the English, and not prejudicial to the Spaniards; tho' he 'wanted nothing for a Siege, and daily expected Succours to enable him to per-'form his Master's Commands. At length it was concluded that the Spaniards should surrender Kingsale, with the Castles and Forts at Bear-Haven, Castle-Haven and Baltimore, and depart honourably with their Goods and Liberties, without being molested by any English Ship in their Voyage to Spain, all which was soon after perform'd. Great and many were the Advantages of the Victory and Treaty; for Ireland that was staggering, and ready to revolt, was hereby kept in Obedience, the Spaniards driven out of the Country, the Rebels dispers'd, the Queen's Authority restor'd, the Hearts of honest Men reviv'd, and a solid and perfect Peace establish'd in the Kingdom of Ireland.

They and the Iriſh are beaten.

They abandon the Kingdom.

A. D. 1602. Reg. 44, 45.

The last Expeditions against the Spaniards.

The Spaniards being thus happily expell'd out of Ireland, the wise Queen, to prevent their Return into that Kingdom, sent out Sir Richard Levison and Sir William Monson, with eight of her own Men of War, and some inferior Ships, to make new Attempts upon the Coasts of Spain. On the nineteenth Day of March Levison set Sail, and Monson afterwards, having in vain tarry'd behind for some Dutch Ships to join with them. Levison in the mean Time fell in with the Spanish Fleet of thirty eight Sail, which brought the Treasure from America, and ingag'd them, but to no great Effect. When Monson was come up with the rest of the Fleet, they receiv'd certain Intelligence that a mighty Indian Carack of sixteen hundred Tun, and richly laden, was upon the Coast of Portugal, where they found it: But it lay close under a Fort, attended with eleven Gallies, and the Carack it self appear'd like a strong Castle; yet they resolv'd to fire it, if they could not take it. The next Day they thunder'd so furiously against the Gallies, that within seven Hours the Marquess of St. Crosse, together with the Gallies he commanded, retir'd, and two of them were taken and fir'd, in which were great Quantities of Powder design'd for the Netherlands. Upon which Levison signify'd to the Captain of the Carack, that the Gallies in which they confided were repuls'd and remov'd, therefore if they now refus'd Mercy, they were to expect none hereafter. After much Debate on both Sides, it was at last agreed, That the Carack, with all the Goods and Ordnance, should be yielded up to Levison. Thus the English having a fair Wind, return'd home with a Booty amounting to a Million of Ducats, by the Portugueze Account, and not above five of their Men lost in the Expedition.

A Contest between the Jesuits and the Secular Priests.

About this Time a famous Contest arose between the Jesuits and the Secular Priests in England: For Blackwell, who was wholly at the Command of Garnet, General of the Jesuits in England, usurp'd an Authority over the Secular Priests, depriv'd them of their Faculties, and procur'd a Breve from the Pope, declaring them Schismaticks and Hereticks, from which they clear'd themselves by a Censure of the University of Paris. In publishing of several Books, the Secular Priests highly extoll'd the Queen, and made it appear, 'That in the first 'eleven Years of her Reign, there was not one Papist had his Life call'd in 'question for his Religion; and that in ten Years after the Publication of the 'Bull of Pope Pius Quintus, and the Rebellion of the Papists, not above 'twelve Priests were put to Death for Treason, 'till in the Year 1580, when

'the

'the Jeſuits firſt crept into England. Then they largely ſhew'd, That the 'wicked Deſigns of the Jeſuits confounded all, and enforc'd the making of ſe-'vere Laws againſt Catholicks. That ever ſince Engliſh Seminaries had been 'erected by the Procurement of Parſons a Jeſuit, fifty had been yearly ſent 'to diſturb the Peace of the Kingdom of England: That Parſons excited 'the Spaniards to invade England and Ireland, and ſet up the Title of 'the Infanta of Spain to the Crown of England: That Holt a Jeſuit 'perſuaded Hesket to raiſe a Rebellion, and hir'd Cullen, York and Williams 'to kill the Queen; and that Walpole a Jeſuit perſuaded Squire to poiſon her. 'Inſomuch that the Queen, whoſe Judgment was, That Conſcience ought 'never to be forc'd, was neceſſitated to uſe Severity, or betray her own and 'her Kingdom's Safety. They reproach'd Parſons with being a Baſtard, the 'Dregs of the People, and a turbulent ſeditious Equivocator: They condemn'd 'the defamatory Libels which the Jeſuits had writ againſt the Queen, and the 'Authors as Traitors to God and her Majeſty; and deſir'd the Engliſh Catho-'licks not to ſend their Children to be educated in the Jeſuits Colleges, where 'they imbib'd the Poiſon of Treaſon and Rebellion with their firſt Rudiments. Theſe Conteſts were politickly promoted by the Biſhop of London, as advan-tageous to the Church of England; but the Privy-Council were of Opinion, that notwithſtanding this pretended Animoſity, they were both agreed to per-vert her Majeſty's Subjects, and therefore were both baniſh'd by Proclama-tion: Which prov'd very ſeaſonable; for while theſe Diſputes were depending, Thomas Winter and Teſmund a Jeſuit were ſent over into Spain, where they carry'd on a dangerous Conſpiracy for cutting off Queen Elizabeth, and ex-cluding the King of Scotland from his Succeſſion to the Crown of England.

Both Parties are baniſh'd.

In France, the Marſhal Biron, for entering into dangerous Attempts againſt the publick Peace of that Nation, was arraign'd and beheaded. His Confeſſion brought ſome others into Danger; and amongſt them the Duke of Buillon, of the Proteſtant Religion, ſo that when he was cited, he durſt not appear, but fled into Germany. Upon this Accident the King of France ſent a Meſſage to Queen Elizabeth, complaining, 'That the Duke had declar'd his Marriage 'unlawful, and the Pope's Diſpenſation of no Validity, pronouncing his Sons 'Illegitimate; had deſtin'd the Prince of Conde to the Succeſſion of the Crown, 'and conſpir'd the Deſtruction of the chief of the Nobility. The Queen was much concern'd for this Proteſtant Duke, and by her Leiger Ambaſſador ad-vis'd the King, not too credulouſly to entertain thoſe Reports, as doubting theſe Suggeſtions might proceed from ſome of the Spaniſh Faction. Upon which the King became very angry, and ſaid, That the Queen had a better Opinion of the Duke than he deſerv'd, and that he was one of the chief Founders of the Earl of Eſſex's Treaſon, for that being queſtion'd by him about it, was not able to deny it. About the ſame Time alſo, the Duke of Savoy by Strata-gems and open Force proceeded againſt the State of Geneva; upon which the generous Queen reliev'd them with large Sums of Mony, gather'd amongſt the Clergy and Laity all over England.

Foreign Affairs.

As moſt Places began to be at reſt before the Death of the mighty Queen, ſo Ireland this Year was brought to a perfect Peace by the final Submiſſion of the Arch-Rebel Tyrone; who being haunted with an evil Conſcience, and ſuſpicious of his own Party, wrote ſubmiſſive Letters to the Queen and the Lord-Deputy, and gave ſuch Marks of true Repentance, that the Queen or-der'd the Lord-Deputy to receive him into Mercy, provided he would beg it upon his Knees with that Humility he promis'd in his Letters. Upon notice of this welcome News Tyrone repair'd to the Court at Dublin, and being ad-mitted into the Preſence-Chamber, where the Lord-Deputy ſate in his Chair of State, with great Numbers about him, he fell on his Knees at the very En-trance, and then advancing nearer with a dejected Countenance, ſaid, I ac-knowledge my Sin againſt God, and my Offence againſt my moſt gracious Queen

Queen and Soveraign, to whoſe Royal Clemency, as to a ſacred Anchor I fly, offering up my Life and Eſtate to her Diſpoſal; and as I have felt her former Bounty and preſent Power, ſo now I humbly beg that I may taſte of her Mercy, and be made an eternal Example of her Princely Clemency. My Age is not ſo far ſpent, my Body ſo feeble, nor my Mind ſo broken, but that by my valiant and faithful Service, I may yet expiate the Sin of my Rebellion. Thus ended the famous Tyrone's Rebellion by the auſpicious Fortune of the Queen, and the good Conduct of the Lord-Deputy Montjoy, about eight Years after it firſt began: Which was continu'd ſo long, by the too great Slight and Covetouſneſs of the Engliſh, who were unwilling to grant proportionable Supplies; and was protracted by unſeaſonable Emulations, diſſembled Truces, difficult Acceſſes in the Country, and by the Temper of the Iriſh, who truſted more to the Celerity of their Feet, then the Strength of their Hands.

And now all Things being in Peace at home, and in a good Proſpect with Spain abroad, after the mighty Queen had acted the nobleſt Parts in the Theatre of the World, ſhe who had hitherto enjoy'd a continu'd State of Health, now became ſenſible of the Infirmities of old Age, by a general Weakneſs and Indiſpoſition that had lately ſeiz'd upon her. Therefore ſhe remov'd from Weſtminſter to her Palace at Richmond, which ſhe call'd her Warm Box where ſhe could beſt truſt her diſtemper'd old Body, and where ſhe could more freely attend the Service of God, and the Salvation of her Soul. And here commanding her Inauguration Ring to be fil'd off her Finger, as being grown into the Fleſh and painful, it was by all thought an unfortunate Omen, and that the Marriage between her and her dear People was near a Diſſolution. Her Sickneſs began with a Swelling in her Throat, but that ſoon abated; and then by Degrees her Appetite fail'd, and ſhe had no Reliſh for any thing ſhe taſted. She much deſpis'd the Counſels of Phyſicians, declaring, She was ſatiated with this preſent Life, and deſir'd to be tranſlated to a State of Immortality, and to eſcape out of this dark and diſorder'd State of human Affairs: That Death, ſo abhorr'd by many, was only the Payment of a Debt to Nature; and that our Spirits were of Right to be reſtor'd to God from whom they came. Thus her Body by ſlow Degrees conſum'd away, and ſhe became very lean, weak and faint; and her Mind ſeem'd more afflicted than her Body, being Night and Day diſturb'd with an uneaſie Remembrance of the late executed Earl of Eſſex, as likewiſe with her too great Compliance with Tyrone, whom ſhe had in ſome meaſure rewarded for his Treaſons and Perjuries. Her Sorrows were daily increas'd, and render'd more inſupportable by the melancholy Humour which then abounded in her Blood, and from a juſt Indignation to find her ſelf neglected by ſome who were too ready to worſhip a riſing Sun; yet ſtill ſhe bore her laſt Sickneſs with a wonderful Conſtancy and noble Patience of Mind. And now the Lord-Admiral informing the reſt of the Privy-Council, what the Queen had ſometime ſaid to him concerning the Succeſſion, they all thought fit that he, with the Lord-Keeper and Secretary of State, ſhould wait upon her Majeſty, and in the Name of all of them underſtand her Pleaſure concerning her Succeſſor. The Queen made Anſwer with a weak Voice, but ſound Mind, I ſaid that my Throne was the Throne of Kings, and that I would have no mean Perſon ſucceed me. The Secretary asking her the plain Meaning of theſe Words, ſhe ſaid, I will that a King ſucceed me; and who ſhould that be, but my neareſt Kinſman the King of Scotland? When ſhe had ſaid this, and recommended her Name and Memory to her Nobility, ſhe caſt off all Thoughts of this Life, and wholly betook her ſelf to Acts of Piety and Devotion; keeping the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury near her, with whom ſhe often pray'd with great Zeal and Fervency. When that pious Prelate adviſ'd her to place all her Truſt in the Merits of Chriſt, ſhe anſwer'd with a gaſping Breath, That ſhe was weary of this miſerable Life, ſubject to ſo many Calamities and Dangers; that from her Soul ſhe begg'd to paſs to that eternal Light which flow'd with moſt perfect Felicity; and was haſtning to her Heavenly Kingdom, to the Preſence, and into the holy Arms of her good Saviour. Then turning a little, and laying her Head upon her right Arm, ſhe compos'd her ſelf for her Diſſolution, with a quiet Mind and calm Countenance; and when the Arch-Biſhop deſir'd her to keep her Thoughts upon God, ſhe juſt anſwer'd, I do, nor does my Mind wander from him. The laſt Moments of her Life were of the ſame Nature; for it appear'd by the Motions of her Hands and Eyes, that they were ſpent in the moſt ſublime Devotions and Mental Prayer. Thus gradually expiring, on the twenty fourth of March, near Mid-Night, ſhe peaceably reſign'd her pious Soul to God, after a long and incomparable Reign of forty four Years, four Months, and ſix Days, in the ſeventieth Year of her Age, to which Age no King of England but one ever arriv'd. Her Death.

Thus dy'd the renown'd Virgin Queen, cover'd with all the Glories of this World, and nobly qualify'd for thoſe of the next; having had all the Virtues and Accompliſhments of her mighty Father, and ſcarce any of his Vices and Imperfections; only ſhe was in ſome Caſes a little too parſimonious, and a little too liable to Paſſion and the Love of Flattery. The News of her Death immediately fill'd the Court, the City and the whole Nation with ſuch Floods of Tears, and produc'd ſuch Marks of inexpreſſible Sorrow, as were never known before; and in Reality no Princes ſince the Creation had ever more ſincerely the Hearts of their Subjects, than this illuſtrious Queen. We have before given the Character of her Perſon, and mention'd her Qualifications; all which are ſtill more compleatly learnt from the Hiſtory of her Reign; which if the Goodneſs and Excellency of it may be meaſur'd by the great Happineſs of the People, may juſtly be eſteem'd the moſt glorious yet extant in our Annals. The Wiſdom, the Grandeur, and the Fame of it, have been largely celebrated and diſplay'd by the nobleſt Pens both at home and abroad. At Rome, where ſhe was both hated and excommunicated, Pope Sixtus Quintus us'd to ſpeak with the greateſt Honour of her Government; and profanely wiſh'd he might enjoy her but one Night, that he might beget a ſecond Alexander the Great. Her Court was as compleat an Academy of honourable Counſellors, illuſtrious Peers, gallant Courtiers, learned Profeſſors, and profound Politicians, as ever attended any Chriſtian Prince: And as her great Stateſmen reflected new Luſtre upon her own Wiſdom and Underſtanding, in making ſo worthy a Choice; ſo ſhe never was ſo happy in her Choice, as when ſhe govern'd by her own Judgment without the Advice of others. Having ſurmounted the chiefeſt Difficulties in Church and State, one of her great Obſervations was That the People of England were more governable in Times of War, than in Times of Peace. Tho' ſhe never thirſted after any unjuſt Inlargement of her Dominions, yet the great Affairs of Europe principally depended upon her Directions; while ſitting at the Helm of all, ſhe arbitrated and guided their Eſtates both in Peace and War. Spain endeavouring to overflow all, was driven back, and ſcarce able to maintain its own Banks. In France, the Houſe of Valois was happily ſupported by her Counſels, that of Bourbon advanc'd by her Countenance, Forces and Treaſure; Scotland reliev'd by her Love, the Netherlands by her Power, Portugal's King by her Bounty, and Poland by her Commiſeration: Likewiſe Germany, Denmark and Swedeland, often took up and laid down Arms at her Pleaſure and Diſpoſal. Nor could the utmoſt Bounds of Europe, Ruſſia and Tartary, limit the Extent of her great Fame; but it ſpread further into the more remote Parts of Aſia, Africa and America, among the Turks, the Perſians, Barbarians and Indians. In moſt of whoſe Dominions, to the great Inriching of her Kingdom, ſhe ſetled Commerce, and gain'd large Privileges for the Encouragement of her Merchants, whom ſhe cheriſh'd as a moſt neceſſary and important Part of her Common-wealth. Her Character and Reign.

Not-

The Blemiſhes in the Government.

Notwithſtanding all the various Excellencies of this Reign, and the admirable Virtues and Qualifications of the Queen her ſelf, we ought not to diſmiſs her Character, without taking Notice of the real Spots and Blemiſhes of the Government, both as to Church and State. The Eſtabliſhment of the Reformation has been juſtly accounted one of the greateſt Glories of this Reign, and what procur'd the Bleſſings of Heaven upon it for many Years: Yet in the ſame Parliament, the Queen conſented to ſeveral unjuſtifiable Incroachments upon the Lands and Revenues of the Church, for which it ſuffers to this Day, tho' ſome have been lately gloriouſly reſtor'd; not to mention ſeveral other bold Attempts in this Reign. The other Blemiſh is the myſterious Proceedings in the Scotch Affairs, and ſtrange Treatment of the Queen of Scotland; but this is candidly interpreted to be more her great Misfortune than her real Fault; as the other is thought by ſome to have been occaſion'd more by her Ignorance in that very Caſe, and from the Neceſſities of that infirm Juncture of Affairs; tho' ſome Alienations of the Church Revenues cannot be excus'd. Beſides theſe, ſeveral Scandals have been charg'd upon her by ſome implacable and malignant Pens; which, being as much beneath the Dignity of Hiſtory, as they are ſhort of Probability, are better omitted, than recited. But if we ſet aſide the forementioned Particulars, and conſider the whole Reign in general, we find it the moſt ſurpriſing and amazing Thing in the World, that all that is great and glorious ſhould be manag'd, and the chief Affairs of Europe ſhould move and be directed by a Woman's Nod. This for a whole hundred Years has been a continu'd Subject of Admiration, 'till the new Wonders of our preſent Age began to eclipſe all the Glories of former Times; and, to our unexpreſſible Joy, have nobly convinc'd us, That as the greateſt Magnanimity is agreeable to the ſweeteſt Diſpoſitions, ſo no Attempt can be too Extenſive, nor no Enterprize too Great for the Female Sex. ✝

CHAP. I.

The Reign of King JAMES the Firſt.

Containing twenty two Years, and three Days.

Speed. Spotſwood. Wilſon. Baker. An. Camd &c.

I. HItherto we have treated of the Monarchy of England it ſelf, and with the different Acceſſions of Ireland and Wales; but now we are arriv'd at a new State of Affairs, and a more remarkable Addition to the Engliſh Empire, namely, the ancient Kingdom of Scotland, which was happily join'd in the Perſon, and under the Subjection of James Stuart the preſent King of Scotland. And conſidering the vaſt Effuſion of Blood, and immenſe Sums of Mony, that for ſeveral Ages had been waſted and expended between the two contending Nations, nothing could be judg'd more fortunate and propitious, than this long deſir'd Conjunction, and nothing could ſooner alleviate and extinguiſh the Remembrance of the wonderful Felicities of the laſt Reign. So that all People began ſoon to dry up their Tears, and to caſt their Eyes towards the bright Northern Star, which was now to guide and influence the whole Iſland. Therefore immediately upon the Death of Queen Elizabeth, the Lords of the Council gave full Satisfaction to the People in proclaiming James the Sixth, King of Scotland, by the Name of James the Firſt, King of England, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. to the great Joy of all true Engliſhmen, as well for his unqueſtionable Claim, as his Profeſſion of the eſtabliſh'd Religion, as alſo for his ſingular Learning and Experience, with which he was qualify'd for the Management of ſo great an Empire; having now attain'd to the Age of thirty ſix Years and nine Months, and exercis'd in the Practice of Regal Government from the firſt

King James proclaim'd.

Years of his Infancy. His Title was good beyond all Diſpute, being deſcended from the united Families of Lancaſter and York, King Henry the Seventh, and Queen Elizabeth his Wife; whoſe Iſſue by the Male failing in the laſt deceas'd Queen Elizabeth, the Iſſue of Margaret their eldeſt Daughter was the next Heir, which Lady marry'd to James the Fourth, King of Scotland, and by him had James the Fifth, whoſe only Daughter Queen Mary was Mother to this preſent Monarch.

Notice given to him in Scotland.

The firſt News of Queen Elizabeth's Death was brought to him by Sir Robert Cary, a younger Son of the late Lord Hunſdon, who coming without Order, and the greateſt Expedition, was afterwards rewarded with a Barony of the Realm. But tho' this was ſufficient for the King's Information, yet it was not ſufficient for the Lords of the Council, in Diſcharge of their Duty; therefore as ſoon as they could provide proper Perſons, they ſent Sir Charles Percy, and Mr. Thomas Somerſet, and after them Sir Thomas Lake Clerk of the Signet, a Man well acquainted with the State of the Kingdom, both to inform him of the general Applauſe and Satisfaction of the Nation, and of the preſent State and Condition of the Realm, that he might not be altogether a Stranger at his Arrival. Queen Elizabeth indeed had left him a great and flouriſhing Kingdom, without Incumbrance, rich and free; no Wars abroad, no Sedition at home; a Kingdom furniſh'd with all the Fruits of Peace, Plenty of all Things neceſſary, and the chief of all Neceſſaries, a wiſe Council: For ſhe left Sir Thomas Egerton Lord-Chancellor, Thomas Lord Buckhurſt Lord-Treaſurer, Charles Earl of Nottingham Lord-Admiral, and Sir Robert Cecil principal Secretary of State; four ſuch Men, as the meaneſt of them were fit to ſit at the Helm of any Kingdom in Europe. All theſe the new King by his Letters kept in their Stations, and afterwards added ſome others of his own chuſing; as the Earls of Northumberland and Cumberland, the Lord Thomas Howard and the Lord Henry Howard, the one the Brother and the other the Son of the late Duke of Norfolk, who had ſuffer'd ſo much for the Queen his Mother. But tho' the advancing of theſe two laſt, was probably done out of Favour to that Family; yet, one of them being a known, and the other a reputed Papiſt, it was immediately apprehended as a Favour to the whole Party; and the Catholicks were not a little confident of his good Inclinations to them in general. And in reality it was convenient they ſhould at this Time have ſuch kind of Imaginations; for more than once in the late Reign Brieves had been tranſmitted from Rome to the Catholicks in England, to admit of none to ſucceed in the Kingdom, When that miſerable Woman ſhould die, but ſuch a Perſon, of whoſe good Inclinations to the See of Rome, they ſhould at leaſt be well perſuaded. Whatever this Prince's Inclinations and Actions were then and afterwards, this is certain that no King of England ever came to the Throne with greater Love and Reputation than himſelf.

He leaves Scotland.

King James having ſetled the Government of his Kingdom of Scotland, and made Preparations to take Poſſeſſion of a greater Kingdom, on the fifth of April, with a noble Attendance of Lords and others, he ſet forwards from Edinburgh, and on the ſeventh arriv'd at Berwick, and the ninth at New-Caſtle, where he ſtaid three Days, and heard the Biſhop of Durham preach on Sunday; and the Inhabitants were ſo tranſported with his Arrival and Preſence, that during his Stay they bore all the Charge of his Houſhold. On the thirteenth of April he ſet forwards to Durham, from thence the fourteenth to Waltworth, and the fifteenth towards the City of York, where his Train increas'd to ſuch a Multitude, that he was neceſſitated to publiſh an Inhibition to prevent too great a Concourſe.

His Progreſs.

As he was in all Places receiv'd with Royal Entertainment and rich Preſents, ſo he carry'd himſelf with great Affability, and with much Freedom diſtributed his Favours, in moſt Places diſcharging all Priſoners that were not confin'd for Treaſon or Murther; and ſo great was the Obſequiouſneſs and Applauſes of all Men, that a rough Scotchman openly ſaid, This People

People would ſpoil a good King. After three Days ſtay at York, where the Earl of Cumberland was declar'd the King's Sword-bearer in that Place, his Majeſty went to Sir Edward Stanhope's Houſe at Grimſton, from thence to Pontfract, and ſo to Doncaſter, and on the twenty firſt Day arriv'd at Newark upon Trent; where a Cut-purſe being taken in the Fact, was by the King's Warrant alone hang'd, without any formal Trial, which afterwards gave ſome Occaſion for Reflection. On the twenty ſecond, hunting all the Way, he arriv'd at Beavoir Caſtle, and the twenty third at Burleigh Houſe near Stamford, where he tarry'd two or three Days with great Satisfaction. On the twenty ſeventh he remov'd to Hinchinbrook by Huntington, a Houſe of Sir Oliver Cromwell's, where he was ſolemnly met by the Heads of the Univerſity of Cambridge; and as he paſs'd through Godmanchester, the Bailiffs of the Town preſented him with ſeventy Team of Horſe all trac'd to fair new Ploughs, declaring to his Majeſty, That it was the ancient Cuſtom ſo to do when any King of England paſs'd through their Town, and by which they held their Lands, as Tenants to the King. At Royſton he firſt lodg'd at his own Charge; and from thence went to Sir Thomas Sadler's Houſe at Standon, where he ſtaid on Sunday, and heard the Biſhop of London preach. On the ſecond of May he remov'd to Broſbourn, a Houſe of Sir Henry Cook's, Coferer to the late Queen, and now to the King, where he was met by the Lord-Keeper, the Lord-Treaſurer, the Lord-Admiral, and divers other Lords of the Kingdom. The next Day he arriv'd at Theobalds, a Houſe belonging to Sir Robert Cecil, who had accompany'd him from York; where all the Lords of the Privy-Council preſented themſelves, and there the Lord-Keeper made a ſolemn Oration. On Saturday the ſeventh of May he rod towards London, being met on the Road by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Sheriffs, who by their Orator Sir Richard Martin, made him an eloquent Speech; and thus the King arriv'd with a glorious Train at the Charter-Houſe, near Smith-field, a Place belonging to the Lord Thomas Howard, where he ſtaid four Days. In his whole Journey, which laſted above a Month, he made many Diſtributions of Honour: At Theobalds he made ſeveral Noblemen of Scotland of his Privy-Council, as the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Marre, the Lord Hume, Sir George Hume, Sir James Elphingſton, the Lord of Kingloſs, and immediately after the Lords Zouch and Burgley. After that he made Sir George Hume Earl of Dunbarre, Sir Thomas Ereskin Earl of Kelley, Sir John Ramſey Earl of Holderneſs, Sir James Hay Earl of Carliſle, and Sir Richard Preſton Earl of Kildare. As to Knights, he made great Numbers of both Nations, particularly twenty eight at Theobalds, about eighty at the Charter-Houſe, and a hundred not many Days after, and ſtill far greater Numbers before the Year was out, ſo that many admir'd what Occaſion the King could have for ſo many Milites in the Time of Peace: Yet it was thought fit to give a free Courſe to the Paſſage of Honour, which during Queen Elizabeth's Reign had been ſo ſtopp'd, that few Counties of England had Knights enough to make a Jury. On the ſeventeenth of May he made fourteen new Serjeants at Law, and on the twentieth, four new Engliſh Lords, namely, Sir Robert Cecil Baron of Eſindon, Sir Robert Sidney Baron of Penhurſt, Sir William Knolls Baron of Greys, and Sir Edward Wotton Baron of Morley; and ſhortly after, the Lord Henry Howard Earl of Northampton, and Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurſt, Earl of Dorſet.

His arrival at London.

New Advancements.

Tho' King James was now ſafely arriv'd at London, yet he accounted himſelf but half ſetled, 'till his Queen and Children were alſo with him; therefore there were now appointed many Lords and Ladies to conduct them into England: Of Lords, the Earl of Suſſex, the Earl of Lincoln, the Lord Compton, the Lord Norris, and Sir George Carew, Lord Preſident of Munſter: Of Ladies, the Counteſs of Worceſter, the Counteſs of Kildare, the Lady Anne Herbert Daughter to the Earl of Pembrook, the Lord Scroop's Lady, the Lady Rich, Wife

Wife to the Lord Rich, and the Lady Walsingham, one of the late Queen's Bed-Chamber. But tho these were only appointed by Name, yet many other Lords and great Ladies went voluntarily to attend their new Queen, as the Countess of Bedford, the Lady Hastings, the Lady Cecil, the Lady Hatton, the Lady Harington, and several others: And with this glorious Attendance the Queen, with two of her Children, Prince Henry nine Years of Age, and the Lady Elizabeth, arriv'd at York on the eleventh of June. Where resting themselves a few Days, on the twenty seventh of the same Month they came to Eaton in Northamptonshire, a House belonging to Sir George Fermor, where the King himself met them at Dinner; and afterwards they rod together to a House of Sir John Fortescue, and so to the City of London. The King's younger Son, Charles Duke of Albany, did not come at this Time, as being not three Years of Age, and therefore thought not able to endure such a Journey; but the following Year, falling sick of a Feaver, Doctor Atkins, one of the King's Physicians, was sent to take Care of him, who in six Weeks cur'd him of his Distemper; and in October brought him safe to Windsor, where the King then resided; for which Service he met with great Rewards, and no less advantageous Practice.

The Queen and Family sent for out of Scotland.

The King had by this Time found the Love and Affection of his own People, but the Inclinations of the neighbouring Princes towards him was at present in Suspence; 'till about the Beginning of June, there came first an Ambassador from the Prince Palatine of the Rhine; shortly after another from the States of Holland and Zealand; then another from the Arch-Duke of Austria; another from the King of Spain; a Fifth from the State of Venice; another from the Duke of Tuscany, and lastly Monsieur de Rosny from the King of France; all congratulating his happy Accession to the Throne of England. For the more solemn Reception of which Ambassadors, and all others for the future, the King instituted a new Officer by the Name of Master of the Ceremonies, allowing him two hundred Pounds a Year Fee; and the first that had this Place was Sir Lewis Lewkenor, a Gentleman who besides other Accomplishments, was very skilful in the neighbouring Languages. All this while the King mov'd within his own Sphere, and had transacted nothing out of the Nation: But now in the Month of June he sent the Earl of Rutland Ambassador to his Brother-in-Law the King of Denmark, upon two Occasions; the one was to offer himself to be God-Father to his Son, who was nam'd Christianus, and the other was to present him with the honourable Order of the Garter: Upon the like Imployment, he shortly after sent the Lord Spencer to Frederick Duke of Wirtenberg; both which Lords saw the said Princes invested with the Garter, and after solemn Entertainments return'd home.

Ambassadors from Foreign Princes.

In England, it was probably conceiv'd that all Offences against Queen Elizabeth had been forgotten; but King James, more sensible of Wrongs done to her than himself, would not suffer Valentine Thomas so to escape; who after he had lain many Years Prisoner in the Tower, was on the fourth of June arraign'd at the King's Bench-Bar, and for Conspiring against the late Queen and some of her Council, was on the seventh of June, after six a Clock at Night, drawn to Sir. Thomas Watrings, and there hang'd and quarter'd. About this Time the honourable Charles Lord Montjoy return'd out of Ireland, and brought with him the famous Rebel Hugh O-Neal, Earl of Tyrone; at whose Arrival the Lord Montjoy was sworn of the King's Privy-Council; and Tyrone himself, who had been the Cause of such an Effusion of English Blood, was notwithstanding pardon'd, and Proclamation made, that he should be treated by all Men with Respect and Honour. The Lord Montjoy, as a Reward for his good Services, was created Earl of Devonshire, and thus having given Way to new Creations, they soon after broke in like a Deluge upon the Nation; the King being an inexhaustible Fountain of Honour, which might serve for all Kinds of Rewards and Purposes.

Tyrone pardoned.

While all Men enjoy'd the Bleſſings of Peace and Plenty, ſuddenly, like a Storm in a fair Day, there broke out a Conſpiracy of a ſtrange Compoſition; for as moſt Treaſons are compos'd of Men of one particular Faction, in this there were Perſons of all ſorts, Prieſts and Lay-Men, Papiſts and Proteſtants, Noblemen, Knights and Gentlemen: So that ſeveral would have thought it to have been a deep laid Conſpiracy; but it prov'd ſo ſhallow, that it could ſcarce be obſerv'd what the Authors of it deſign'd, or what they would have effected. It ſeems the great Favour King James had ſhown to the Earl of Southampton, who nearly eſcap'd when the Earl of Eſſex ſuffer'd, prov'd highly diſobliging to all his Oppoſers; and it was ſaid, that as the King had ſent to enlarge the Earl of Southampton, and appointed him to meet him upon the Way, ſo when he heard that his two chief Oppoſites, the Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Raleigh, were likewiſe deſign'd to meet him, he ſent them word, That they might ſave themſelves that Labour. However it was, they found ſome Cauſe for a fatal Diſcontent, which hurry'd them into the Company and Society of ſome who had more real Deſigns againſt the Government than themſelves. Sir Walter Raleigh had been turn'd out of his Place of Captain of the Guards, which was given to a Scotch Lord, to his great Diſguſt; and not long after parting, with his Siſter at London, he recommended himſelf to her Prayers, ſaying, That he was going whence he thought never to return; which ſhe underſtood of ſome Combate he had undertaken, and diſcovering it to her Neighbours, the Words were carry'd to Court, where they receiv'd a different Conſtruction. Upon this and other Accidents ſeveral were apprehended, as Henry Lord Cobham, George Brook his Brother, Thomas Lord Grey, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Griffith Markham, and Sir Edward Parham Knighs, Bartholomew Brookesby, and Anthony Copley, Gentlemen, William Watſon and William Clark Romiſh Prieſts. Tho' they were apprehended in July, yet they came not to their Trials 'till November following; for by reaſon of a Peſtilence then raging in London, the Term was deferr'd, and order'd to be kept at Wincheſter; only the Courts of the Exchequer, Wards and Liveries, and the Dutchy of Lancaſter were kept at the King's Mannor at Richmond.

Reg. 1.

A ſtrange Conſpiracy.

Sir Walter Raleigh diſguſted.

In the mean Time his Majeſty held a ſolemn Feaſt at Windſor, where Prince Henry was inſtall'd Knight of the Garter, as alſo the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Marre, and the Earl of Pembroke. After which Preparations were made for the King's Coronation, which was preceeded by a new Stream of Creations and Honours. Sir Thomas Egerton, Lord Chancellor, was made Baron of Elſmere; Sir William Ruſſel, Baron of Thornaugh; Sir Henry Gray, Baron of Groby; Sir John Peter, Baron of Writtle; Sir John Harrington, Baron of Exton; Sir Henry Denvers, Baron of Dantſey; Sir Thomas Gerrard, Baron of Gerrard Bromley in Staffordſhire; and Sir Robert Spencer, Baron of Wormeleyton. After which the King conferr'd inferior Orders, and made Knights of all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, and all his Gentlemen Uſhers, with ſeveral others: And laſtly he made ſixty two Knights of the Bath, moſt of Noblemen's Sons, and the reſt Gentlemen of ſpecial Worth. Theſe Things compleated, on the twenty fifth Day of July, being the Feaſt of St. James, the King and Queen were both ſolemnly crown'd and anointed at Weſtminſter, by the Hands of John Witgift, Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, in the Preſence of the Nobility and others, namely Sir Robert Lee Lord Mayor of London, the Aldermen his Brethren, and twelve principal Citizens admitted to attend on them. All other Citizens were ſtopp'd from paſſing either by Land or Water by Reaſon of the Plague; and on the firſt of Auguſt following all Suitors were by Proclamation forbidden to repair to the Court 'till the Winter following. And indeed the Sickneſs rag'd ſo much, that in the City of London this Year there dy'd above thirty thouſand of that Diſtemper.

The King's Coronation.

On

The Trial of the Conſpirators.

On the fourth of November, the Lord Cobham, Sir Walter Raleigh, and the reſt of the Delinquents formerly mention'd, were remov'd from the Tower by ſtrong Guards, and arraign'd at Wincheſter. Their Indictment lay for conſpiring to kill the King, to raiſe Rebellion, to alter Religion, to ſubvert the State, and to procure a Foreign Invaſion. Concerning the firſt Point it was prov'd, That the Lord Grey deſign'd to obtain the levying of two thouſand Men, for the Defence of the Netherlands, and with them to ſeize upon the King and Prince, and ſecure the Lords of the Council in their Chambers. For the other Particulars, it was prov'd or alledg'd, That the Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Raleigh met at St. Martins in the Fields, and there conſulted about moving Sedition, raiſing Rebellion, altering Religion, ſubverting the State, and ſetting up the Lady Arbella Stuart. And for the particular Point of ſubverting the State, it was prov'd, That Watſon the Prieſt was deſign'd to be Lord-Chancellor, George Brook Lord-Treaſurer, Sir Griffith Markham Secretary, and the Lord Grey to be Maſter of the Horſe, and Earl-Marſhal of England. And for the effecting of theſe Treaſons, it was prov'd, That Watſon had drawn up particular Oaths in Writing, by which all Parties were bound to Secrecy. Then for the laſt Point, it was urg'd, That Sir Walter Raleigh was appointed to treat with Count Aremberg for a large Sum of Mony, and the Lord Cobham to apply himſelf to the Arch-Duke and King of Spain, to induce them to aſſiſt the the Lady Arbella. Theſe Particulars being largely alledg'd againſt them on the ſeveral Days of their Indictments, what was chiefly reply'd in Mitigation of their Crimes was, firſt, That theſe Things could not be Treaſon, becauſe the King was not yet crown'd; and ſecondly, That the whole was but a verbal Matter, and never took Effect, therefore it could not be Treaſon. But theſe Aſſertions being both refuted by the Court, they were all, but Sir Edward Parham, found guilty of High-Treaſon, and Sentence paſs'd upon them.

They are condemn'd.

In Purſuance of this Sentence, the two Prieſts, Watſon and Clerk, were executed at Wincheſter on the twenty ninth Day of November; and George Brook was beheaded on the fifth of December; but then the Hand of Juſtice was ſtopp'd, and the King was pleas'd to ſhew Mercy after this peculiar Manner. After the Death of the three laſt nam'd Delinquents, he ſign'd three other Warrants for the Execution of the Lord Cobham, the Lord Grey, and Sir Griffith Markham, upon a prefix'd Day; but before that Day he privately ſign'd another Paper, written with his own Hand, and directed to the Sheriff, by which he countermanded the former Warrants. And that this gracious Deſign might be manag'd with Secrecy, and produce an agreeable Surprize, he ſent the Paper by Mr. John Gybbe, a Scotch Man, and one utterly unknown to all in Office upon this Occaſion, appointing him to deliver it in ſuch a Manner, that it might not take Effect, 'till after their ſeveral Confeſſions, and at the very Point of their Execution; all which was exactly perform'd. At which Moment it was remarkable to ſee how the Offenders upon their Knees lamented and deteſted their Crimes, and moſt of all applauded and extoll'd the King's uncommon Tenderneſs and Commiſeration. But tho' they were thus pardon'd, yet they were carry'd back to the Tower; where the Lord Grey not long after dy'd, which extinguiſh'd that Barony and Family which had formerly poduc'd many valiant and worthy Men. Sir Griffith Markham after ſome Time was ſet at Liberty, and retired beyond Sea, where he liv'd long after in a very mean Condition. The Lord Cobham likewiſe was afterwards diſcharg'd from his Impriſonment, but depriv'd of his Eſtate, living many Years in great Penury and Miſery; and in his Perſon ended that noble Family, which had flouriſh'd in great Honour for many Ages. Sir Walter Raleigh was detain'd ſeveral Years in the Tower, where with great Reputation he ſpent his Time in Writing one of the nobleſt Hiſtories in the World; and might have continu'd a happy Man, had he never been releas'd.

Some are ſpar'd.

As

As ſome have thought this whole Conſpiracy, as well as that of the Gowries in Scotland, to have been only a State Trick to weaken a Party; ſo moſt are of Opinion that the Part of Sir Walter Raleigh, ſo great a Man and a Proteſtant, was all Riddle and Myſtery. Weldon, if he may be credited, has ventur'd to unfold this, and tells us, That the greateſt Evidence againſt Raleigh was Cobham's Accuſation, whom he only deſir'd might appear Viva Voce, and he would yield without further Defence; but his Enemies knowing that Cobham neither would nor could accuſe him, they made uſe of Wade, the Lieutenant of the Tower and Cecil's great Confident, to perſuade him to Sign a Paper of Accuſation againſt him. This being refus'd, at laſt Wade prevail'd upon Cobham's Weakneſs to ſet his Hand to a blank Paper, over which Wade wrote the Accuſation. Cecil therefore upon Raleigh's Trial, often asked him if he would confeſs, provided Cobham accus'd him under his Hand? Raleigh reply'd, That he knew Cobham a weak Man, and knew not how far he might be inſnar'd; but was confident he would not accuſe him to his Face, and therefore he had no Reaſon to venture his Life upon it. On this Defence he inſiſted 'till nine at Night; at laſt his Fate carry'd him againſt his Reaſon, and he conſented that upon producing of Cobham's Hand he would yield, when immediately that Paper was produc'd, which was really his Hand, but the Contents the Contrivance of Wade. Afterwards the Queen falling into a deſperate Sickneſs, which the Phyſicians thought incurable, Sir Walter Raleigh, being an excellent Chymiſt and Maſter of all Kinds of Learning, undertook and perform'd the Cure; for which he would receive no other Reward, but that his Majeſty would ſend certain Lords to the Tower to examine the Lord Cobham, Whether he had at any Time under his Hand accus'd him of Treaſon. Whereupon the King ſent ſix Lords, who were Enemies to Raleigh, to make Enquiry into this puzling Affair. Cobham proteſted, That he never did or could accuſe Sir Walter, but acknowledg'd that he was by a Slight prevail'd upon to ſet his Hand to a Blank-Paper, but never knew what the Contents of it were to be. The ſix Lords returning to the King, made one of them their Spokeſman, who ſaid, Sir, my Lord Cobham has confirm'd all that ever he wrote or ſaid; which was a horrid Equivocation, for 'tis true, he made good whatever he wrote, but he wrote nothing to accuſe Sir Walter Raleigh. Thus was the King abus'd, according to Weldon's Account, and Sir Walter much more; who by that Means was afterwards brought to entire Ruin.

II. The King being now happily and peaceably eſtabliſh'd in his Throne; like a Wiſe and Pious Prince, proceeded to conſider the State of the true Religion in his Kingdom. He found a great Difference ariſing between the Epiſcopal Party, and thoſe call'd by the Name of Puritans, and both active in attaining their Ends, and that ſeveral Petitions were exhibited to him for the Reformation of Abuſes in the Church; therefore at the Importunity of both Parties he appointed a ſolemn Conference at Hampton-Court, to be held by ſome Biſhops, Deans and Doctors, together with ſome of the moſt grave and modeſt among the Complainers. The Biſhops were thoſe of Canterbury, London, Wincheſter, Durham, Worceſter, St. Davids, Chicheſter, Carliſle and Peterborough; the Deans were thoſe of the Chappel, Chriſt-Church, Worceſter, Weſtminſter, Paul's, Cheſter and Windſor, together with Doctor Field and Doctor King. For the Petitioners were Doctor Reynolds, Doctor Spark, Mr. Knewſtubb, and Mr. Chatterton. All theſe being call'd into the Privy-Chamber, his Majeſty ſpoke to this Effect; That following the Example of all Chriſtian Princes, who uſually began their Reigns with the Eſtabliſhment of the Church, he had now, at his Entering upon the Throne, aſſembled them, for ſetling an uniform Order in the ſame, for planting Unity, removing Diſſentions, and reforming Abuſes, which were naturally incident to all Politick Bodies. And that he might not be miſapprehended, and his Deſigns in aſſembling them miſconſtrued, he he declar'd that his Meaning was not to make any Innovation of the Government eſtabliſh'd, which he knew was approv'd of God, but to hear and examine the Complaints that were made, and remove the Occaſion of them; therefore he deſir'd the Petitioners to begin, and ſhew what were their Grievances.

The Complaints of thoſe call'd Puritants.

Doctor Reynolds with the other three, falling upon their Knees, after a ſhort Preamble, reduc'd the Matters in Queſtion into two Heads; ſome he ſaid concern'd the Doctrine of the Church, and others the Government. Concerning the Doctrine, that in the Books of Articles, ſome Things were obſcure, and ſome Things defective, which they deſir'd to be ſupply'd and explain'd, of which he nam'd ſome Particulars; which being a while diſcuſs'd and debated, and the Doctor profeſſing he had receiv'd Satisfaction, the King ſaid, That if theſe were their greateſt Grievances, ſuch Importunity needed not to be us'd to him, and that a more private Courſe had been better. Then proceeding to ſpeak of the Government of the Church, they complain'd of the Want and Scarcity of ſufficient Miniſters in every Pariſh, of the Subſcription urg'd to the Common-Prayer Book, the Cenſures inflicted by Lay-Chancellors, the Croſs in Baptiſm, the Ring in Marriage, the Surplice, and ſome other Circumſtantials. After about three Hours Debates, they were all commanded to meet again in the ſame Place ſome few Days after, at which Time they were to know his Majeſty's Pleaſure concerning theſe Matters.

At the appointed Day, which was the eighteenth of January, the Biſhops, Deans and Doctors of the Arches being call'd firſt, the Arch-Biſhop preſented certain Notes of Explanation of the Liturgy, which the King had recommended to the Biſhop's Care. Accordingly the King queſtion'd them concerning the Exerciſe of the High-Commiſſion, the Oath Ex Officio, the Cenſure of Excommunication, and the Matter of Subſcription; and when they had anſwer'd to all Points to his Majeſty's Satisfaction, Doctor Reynolds and the others were deſir'd to appear in the Chamber, and the aforeſaid Explanations read to them, with which likewiſe they profeſs'd to be ſatisfy'd and content. The King upon this expreſſing a great Satisfaction with what had paſs'd among them, ſeriouſly exhorted them to the Preſervation of Unity, and the Biſhops to treat their Inferiors with all Lenity, and uſe the mildeſt Methods for reclaiming thoſe who were of a contrary Opinion; warning the others alſo to beware of Obſtinacy in their Opinions, and Diſobedience to the Orders of the Church. Obedience and Humility, added he, are the Marks of good and honeſt Men, ſuch as I believe you to be; but I fear many of your Sort are humorous, and too buſie in perverting of others. The Exceptions againſt the Common-Prayer Book, as I perceive, are Matters of meer Weakneſs, and they who are diſcreet will be gain'd by Time and gentle Perſuaſions; and if they be indiſcreet, it is better to remove them, than the Church ſhould ſuffer by their Contentions. For the Biſhops I will anſwer, That it is not their Deſign immediately to enforce Obedience, but by Fatherly Admonitions and Conferences to gain thoſe that are diſaffected; but if any be of an obſtinate and turbulent Spirit, I will have them inforc'd to a Conformity. Neither tell me, That the wearing of a Surplice, or uſing the Croſs in Baptiſm, can diminiſh the Credit of Miniſters that were formerly of another Opinion; for that is the Scotch Argument, when any thing was concluded not agreeing with their Humours, the only Reaſon for their Diſobedience is, that it ſtands not with their Credit to yield, having been ſo long of a contrary Opinion. I will have none of that, but that a Time be limited by the Biſhops of every Dioceſe, and ſuch as will not ſubmit, whoever they are, let them be remov'd; for we muſt not prefer the Credit of a few private Men to the general Peace of the Church.

They ſeem ſatisfy'd.

The King's Wiſdom.

Throughout all this remarkable Conference, in every Point that was mov'd, or came to be diſcuſs'd, the King ſhew'd ſuch a Knowledge and Readineſs, as rais'd no ſmall Admiration in all the Hearers. The Lord-Chancellor Egerton being ſurpriz'd to ſee him ſo expeditious and perfect in all Kinds of Divinity, ſaid, That he had often heard and read, that a King was a mixt Perſon with a Prieſt, but never found it verify'd 'till that Day. And Arch-Biſhop Whitgift, a moſt learned and pious Man, went further, and ſaid, He was verily perſuaded that the King ſpoke by the Spirit of God. This great Man, who had the higheſt Concern for the Church, finding the King inclinable after this to make ſome Alterations, is ſaid to have dy'd of Grief on the twenty ninth of February. He was ſucceeded in his See by Richard Bancroft Biſhop of London, but not with the ſame Spirit; for what Whitgift ſtrove to effect with Sweetneſs and Gentleneſs, Bancroft proſecuted with Rigour and Severity, to the great Weakning of the Church, as many have rationally believ'd.

Beſides the main Fruit of this famous Conference, the uniform Settlement of the Church, ſeveral other important Matters were at the ſame Time projected, and by his Majeſty's provident Care had then their Conception, tho' after Times brought them to Perfection. The firſt was his ſacred Order for a new Tranſlation of the Holy Scriptures, according to the Originals, as alſo for an uniform Reading of them in all Churches. To which pious End, three ſelect Companies from London and the two Univerſities, moſt skilful in Languages, being imploy'd, after long Conference, much Reading, and diligent comparing of former Tranſlations, it was publiſh'd in due Time, and to this Day continues in Uſe. The King's ſecond Project was, that as in England, ſo alſo in Ireland, Wales, and the Northern Parts, the ſame Religion might be fully planted and eſtabliſh'd. Which purpoſe he ſo zealouſly proſecuted, eſpecially for the Kingdom of Scotland, that he held it not ſufficient to join theſe two Crowns into one temporal Monarchy, unleſs he ſaw them united in the Rites and Government of one Spiritual Hierarchy. Nor was his Wiſdom leſs conſpicuous than his Zeal, in making ſo happy a Choice of ſuch Engliſh Divines, as not long after were ſent for this Deſign into Scotland. The chief of whom was Doctor George Abbot afterwards Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, whoſe Labours, as Speed aſſures us, were a Document to others, how admirably ſucceſsful is true Learning, where it is guided by true Prudence, and Piety to God is join'd with Charity to Men. But notwithſtanding all the King's Care, the Jeſuits being in hopes to catch ſomething by troubling the Stream, flock'd into England in great Numbers; and the King perceiving that their near Approaches put his Perſon and Religion into Danger, he iſſu'd out a Proclamation, commanding all Prieſts and Jeſuits to depart out of the Kingdom, and if any of them ſhould preſume to return again, they ſhould be proſecuted according to Law. This ſomewhat allay'd the Heats and Hopes of the Jeſuits, and their Correſpondents; but it made Way for more dark and ſecret Conſpiracies, which they afterwards put in practice. Another Proclamation came out for Uniformity in Religion according to Law, and to reduce thoſe who had not receiv'd Satisfaction at the Conference at Hampton-Court; for now it became a doubtful Queſtion among many, whether the Jeſuits or the Nonconformiſts were greateſt Enemies to the Church of England. The Conſequences of this were found to be afterwards, that of the ten thouſand Miniſters in England, not above forty nine ſtood out and were depriv'd. After this there came out many other Proclamations, againſt Monopolies, Salt-Petre Men, Purveyors, Cart-Takers, and other inſolent Officers that were grievous to the Subject.

And for Uniformity.

The King's firſt appearing abroad was privately, to viſit ſome of his Houſes, for naturally he did not love to be gaz'd on; and thoſe Formalities of State which ſet a Luſtre upon Princes in the Peoples Eye, were but ſo many Burthens to him: For his private Recreations at home, and his Hunting Exerciſes abroad, were his greateſt Delight, when he met with the leaſt Company. Continuing in the Tower, in order to paſs through the City in State, he took great Pleaſure in baiting of Lions; and the firſt Parliament being to meet on the nineteenth Day of March, he with his Queen and Prince Henry, four Days before, rod from the Tower to Whitehall, having his Eyes entertain'd with the Pageants and Splendor of the City, and his Ears fill'd with the Compliments and Applauſes of the People. But he was not like his Predeceſſor, Queen Elizabeth, who with a well-pleas'd Affection met her Peoples Acclamations, thinking moſt highly of her ſelf when ſhe was born upon the Wings of their humble Supplications. He endur'd this Day's Fatigue with Patience, and that of his Triumphal Riding to the Parliament, as not expecting to meet with the like again; but afterwards in his publick Appearances, eſpecially in his Sports, the Acceſſes of the People render'd him ſo impatient, that he often diſpers'd them with Frowns, and ſometimes with Curſes: So various and noted are the Natures and Actions of Princes, that the ſame Perſon may paſs for a good Man, that will not be accounted a good Prince.

The firſt Parliaments in this Reign.

At the Opening of the Parliament, the King was pleas'd to entertain them with a very long and extraordinary Speech, containing great Variety both as to the Matter and Method; in which he interweav'd the Rights and Duties of the Monarchy, with the Privileges of the Subject, ſo that all Men thought it worthy of Commendation. In ſpeaking of the Prerogative he declar'd, That the Difference between a rightful King and an uſurping Tyrant was this; that the Latter thought his Kingdom and People were ordain'd for the Satisfaction of his Deſires and unreaſonable Appetites; while the Former, on the contrary, acknowledg'd himſelf to be ordain'd for procuring the Wealth and Proſperity of his People, and that in theſe conſiſted his principal worldly Felicity. And a little after he ſaid, That as the Head is ordain'd for the Body, and not the Body for the Head; ſo muſt a righteous King know himſelf to be ordain'd for his People, and not his People for him. Theſe and many other Paſſages gave a general Satisfaction, but ſome Things he ſaid concerning Religion was not ſo univerſally receiv'd: For the Romaniſts were uneaſie at his ſaying, They were unſufferable in the Kingdom, as long as they maintain'd the Pope to be their ſpiritual Head, and to have Power to dethrone Kings. On the other ſide the Separatiſts were offended at his acknowledging The Roman Church to be our Mother Church, tho' defil'd with ſome Infirmities and Corruptions, and his declaring, That if the Papiſts would lay aſide King-killing, and ſome other groſs Errors, he would be content to meet them half Way, ſo that all Novelties might be renounc'd on either Side. So that every one grounded his Hopes, or his Fears, upon the Shallows of his own Fancy, not exactly knowing what Courſe the King would ſteer. But in general the Parliament applauding the King, and admiring his Abilities, made a Recognition of his Right to the Crown of England, to which they oblig'd themſelves, their Heirs and Poſterity; ſo that the King as it were triumph'd upon a Throne of the Peoples Love and Duty.

The King's Speech.

A Recognition of the King's Title.

An Union attempted between England and Scotland.

One of the great Deſigns of the King was to have an intire Union made between the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland; accordingly the Parliament paſs'd an Act to Authorize certain Commiſſioners, namely fourteen of the chief Lords of the Kingdom, and above double the Number of Commoners to manage and effect that laudable End. Theſe Commiſſioners, any eight of the Lords and twenty of the Commons, had Power to aſſemble, meet, treat and conſult with certain ſelect Commiſſioners to be nominated and authoriz'd by the Parliament in Scotland, concerning ſuch Matters and Cauſes, as they in their Wiſdoms ſhould think convenient and neceſſary, for the Honour of the King, and the common Good of both Nations. In order to promote this great Work, the King caus'd himſelf to be proclaim'd King of Great Britain, and the Names of England and Scotland to be diſcontinu'd; the Scotch Coins were made current, and the Engliſh Ships had St. George's and St. Andrew's Croſſes quarter'd together in their Flags. But all theſe Deſigns had not their deſir'd Effects, as appear'd afterwards; but ſtill many wiſe and good Laws paſs'd in this Parliament, too numerous to be recited in this Place. Only we ought not to omit mentioning the King's Religious Care of the Church, which, to the almoſt only

Blemiſh

Blemiſh to the laſt Reign, was much endanger'd and threaten'd by the ſeveral Alienations of its Lands and Revenues, which were often granted to ſuch as had leaſt Right to them. To prevent the like Miſchiefs, it was Enacted, 'That neither Arch-Biſhop, nor Biſhops ſhould alienate, aſſure, give, grant, 'demiſe, or in any ſort convey, no not to the King himſelf, his Heirs or Suc- 'ceſſors, any of the Honours, Caſtles, Manors, Lands, Tenements, or Here- 'ditaments, being Parcel of the Poſſeſſion of his Arch-Biſhoprick, or Biſho- 'prick; and if any ſo were made, to be utterly void and of none Effect, not- 'withſtanding any former Law, Statute, Act or Ordinance to the contrary. The Churches Lands ſecur'd.

Beſides this laudable Care, the Clergy in Convocation, by the King's Directions and Authority, did many Things to the Honour and Eſtabliſhment of the Church of England, and made many excellent Canons, which are in Force to this Day, and are the laſt that had a full and legal Sanction. The Parliament having ſate almoſt three Months, the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons made a long Speech anſwerable to that made before by the King, after which it was on the ſeventh Day of July prorogu'd to the ſeventh of February following. The Parliament prorogu'd.

In Relation to Foreign Affairs, King James had hitherto been conſider'd in two Capacities, one as King of Scotland, in which he was in perfect Amity with the Spaniard, and the other as King of England, which caus'd him to be at Enmity with that Monarch; but he as Rex pacificus choſe the beſt from both, and ſtood altogether for the Olive-Branch. Therefore when at his firſt Arrival in England, he found Letters of Repriſal granted againſt the Spaniards, he firſt caus'd them all to be call'd in, and then conſented to a Treaty of laſting Peace and Amity. In which Treaty, negotiated at London, the Commiſſioners for the King of England were the Earls of Dorſet, Nottingham, Devonſhire, and Northampton, and Secretary Cecil lately made Viſcount Cranburn; for the King of Spain were the Conſtable of Caſtile, the Earl of Villa Mediana, and Alexander Robidius Profeſſor of Law; and for the Arch-Duke were the Count de Aremberg, Richardot Preſident of the Privy-Council, and Werreikin principal Secretary. By theſe a Peace was concluded, conſiſting of many Articles, which were ſaid to be very advantageous to the Spaniard, and in a great Meaſure purchas'd by the Gifts of the Conſtable of Caſtile, which were ſo rich and numerous, that there was not one Courtier of Note who did not taſte of Spain's Bounty either in Gold or Jewels; and we are told that Audley-End, and other magnificent Structures had their Foundation from Spaniſh Gold. The Treaty being finiſh'd, the King of Spain, beſides the Conſtable of Caſtile, ſent la Syerra his Great Chamberlain, accompany'd with ſeveral Marqueſſes, Earls and Barons, who arriving in England with great Pomp, were by the Earl of Devonſhire, on the nineteenth of Auguſt, brought to Court; where the King in his Chappel, and in the Preſence of the Commiſſioners and other Engliſh Lords, while the Conſtable held the King's Hands between his own, took his Oath upon the Holy Bible, religiouſly to obſerve and keep all the Articles agreed upon in the ſaid League and Treaty. A Treaty of Peace concluded between England and Spain.

In March following, the Earl of Nottingham, Admiral of England, was ſent into Spain, in like manner to take the Oath of the Spaniſh King; who accompany'd with three Lords, many Knights, Gentlemen, and others, to the Number of ſix hundred and fifty, on the fifteenth of April arriv'd at the Groyne, from whence he was conducted three hundred Miles to Valledolid, where the King of Spain then kept his Court, being entertain'd in all Places at that King's Charge, with ſuch extraordinary Proviſions and Demonſtrations of Joy, as plainly manifeſted the great Satisfaction the Spaniards had in the Engliſh Amity. Indeed they were aſtoniſh'd at the Splendor of the Embaſſie, and the Beauty of the Gentlemen that made up the Retinue: For the Jeſuits had reported that the Engliſh had all the Ugglineſs of Hell, as a Puniſhment for their Apoſtacy from Rome; but when they beheld the Looks of Angels, they with Indignation reſented the Impoſtors of their Confeſſors. The Lord Ambaſſador being arriv'd A. D. 1605. Reg. 3. An Embaſſie into Spain.

at Court, he caus'd Thomas Knolls to deliver the Preſents ſent from the King of England, which were ſix ſtately Horſes, with Saddles and Trappings richly imbroider'd, three for the King, and three for the Queen; two Croſs-Bows, with five Sheafs of Arrows; four Fowling-Pieces, inlaid with rich Plates of Gold, and a Couple of Lyme-Hounds of ſingular Excellencies; all which the King and Queen very kindly receiv'd. On the thirtieth of May, the Lord Ambaſſador being deſir'd to appear, the King came forth into a large Room; where having a Table ſet before him, and a Bible very reverently laid upon it, together with a Crucifix, the Arch-Biſhop of Toledo read the Oath, while the Lord Ambaſſador held the King's Hands between his own, and the King kneeling down, laid his Hands upon the Book, and after his Oath ſubſcrib'd the Articles formerly concluded. While the Earl of Nottingham was thus imploy'd in Spain, Edward Earl of Hartford was likewiſe ſent to Albertus and Iſabella, Arch-Dukes of Auſtria, to take their Oaths, for Confirmation of the ſaid Articles of Peace; which were taken at Bruſſels the firſt Day of May, with extraordinary State and Solemnity. After which, as the Earl beſtow'd on the Arch-Duke's Servants, to the Sum of three thouſand Pounds, ſo the Arch-Duke at his Departure preſented the Earl with a Jewel worth nine hundred Pounds, and a Suit of Arras worth three hundred, and bore his Charges all the Time of his Stay at Bruſſels. Thus was King James truly ſtil'd Rex Pacificus, being now in full Peace and Amity with all the Princes of Chriſtendom; a Happineſs which few of his Anceſtors ever enjoy'd; which continu'd Peace, as ſome have thought it the Glory, ſo others have accounted it the great Unhappineſs of his whole Reign. Before the full Concluſion of it, the ſtrong Town of Oſtend, after above three Years Siege, and the Deaths of above a hundred and twenty thouſand Men on both Sides, was taken by the Marqueſs Spinola, for which he was highly honour'd by the King of Spain.

In theſe peaceable Times, the munificent King open'd new Fountains of Honour, beginning firſt with his ſecond Son Charles Duke of Albany, then but four Years of Age, who with unuſual Pomp and Solemnity was created Duke of York. Afterwards keeping St. George's Feaſt at Greenwich, the King there made two Knights of the Garter, namely Duke Ulrick Heir of Norway, and Brother to the preſent Queen Anne, and the noble Lord Henry Howard Earl of Northampton. A few Days after, in the Hall at Greenwich, richly hang'd with Arras, he created three Earls, one Viſcount, and four Barons; namely Secretary Cecil, and Viſcount Cranburn, Earl of Salisbury; Thomas Cecil, Lord Burleigh, and his eldeſt Brother, Earl of Exeter; Sir Philip Herbert, younger Brother to the Earl of Pembroke, Earl of Montgomery; Robert Sidney, Baron of Penſhurſt and Lord-Chamberlain to the Queen, Viſcount Liſle; Sir John Stanhope, Vice-Chamberlain to the King, Lord Stanhope of Harrington; Sir George Carew, Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen, Lord Carew of Clopton; Mr. Thomas Arundel of Devonſhire, Lord Arundel of Warder; and Mr. William Cavendiſh, Lord Cavendiſh of Hardwick. Not long after, on the fifteenth of June, a notorious Scotchman call'd Thomas Dowglaſs was committed to the Tower, being ſent into England three Days before by the Count Palatine of the Rhine. His Offence was, that he had counterfeited the King's Privy-Seal to ſeveral Princes of Germany; one to the Arch-Biſhop of Cologn, another to the Arch-Biſhop of Triers, another to the Duke of Cleves, another to the Arch-Biſhop of Mentz, and a fifth to the Count Palatine of the Rhine. Of all which, being examin'd and convicted, he was drawn on a Hurdle into Smithfield, and their hang'd and quarter'd. On the twenty ſeventh of Auguſt, the King with his Queen made a Viſit to the Univerſity of Oxford; where their Entertainment was ſuitable to the Dignity of their Perſons, and the Honour of ſo noble and auguſt a Body.

III. Whilst all Things appear'd in a most happy and peaceable Condition, no Storms abroad, no Troubles at home, there was suddenly detected a horrible Conspiracy against the King, and the whole Body of the State of England; of such a prodigious and infernal Nature, as no Age or History can parrallel; proceeding from a restless Spirit of Envy, and an implacable Zeal inflam'd against the Protestant Succession and Religion. This had its Rise and Foundation in the latter End of the last Reign, when Pope Clement the Eighth publish'd his bold Breves in England, to exclude the King of Scotland from the Succession; but all Endeavours failing then, and in the Beginning of this Reign, new and unheard of Attempts were now put in practice to support a desperate Cause. The principal Contriver of this black Conspiracy was Robert Catesby, a Gentleman of great Account in Northamptonshire, descended from that famous Catesby, who had been chief Counsellor to King Richard the Third, to whose Family the Divine Vengeance had now ordain'd a disastrous Period: This rash Gentleman, not able to perform the Work alone, drew in many to assist him, as Thomas Piercy, Thomas Winter, John Graunt, Ambrose Rookwood, Christopher Wright, Francis Tresham, Guido Fawks, and at last Sir Everard Digby, all zealous Papists and Promoters of the Catholick Cause. Five of these meeting together behind St. Clement's Church, and consulting by what Methods they might retrieve their declining Cause, Piercy immediately propos'd the killing of the King, and offer'd to perform it at the hazard of his own Life: But Catesby, who had a much deeper Contrivance in his Thoughts, reply'd, That if he should succeed, the Catholick Cause would be no better, while the Prince and Duke of York were alive; and if they were remov'd, still the Counsellors, Nobility, Judges, Knights, and many others would remain, sufficient to cross all their Purposes: Therefore he had thought of a safer and more effectual Way, which was at one Time and with one signal Blow to cut off all their Enemies; by blowing up the Parliament-House with Gun-powder, at the very Moment the King and the Estates of the Realm were assembled. This was approv'd on by all, as a noble and extraordinary Project; but first it was thought proper to ask the Opinion of their Ghostly Fathers, and be inform'd of the Lawfulness of the Fact, from Henry Garnet, Oswold Tesmond, and John Gerard Jesuits; who being consulted applauded the Enterprize, assuring them, They might proceed with a good Conscience and perform the Deed, since the Design was against Hereticks and Excommunicated Persons.

The Parties concern'd.

Their grand Design.

Having gain'd this Point, and being satisfy'd in their Consciences, for their greater Security, they proceeded to take an Oath of Secrecy, swearing to each other, By the sacred Trinity and the blessed Sacrament, which they were then going to receive, that neither directly nor indirectly, by Words or Circumstances, they would discover the Purpose they had taken to any whomsoever, nor would desist from performing the same, without leave from their Associates. The Oath was administer'd in the Presence of Gerard the Jesuit; and having heard Mass, and receiv'd the Sacrament, Piercy was appointed to hire a House close adjoining to the Upper House of Parliament, for the more safe and secret Working of their Mine design'd for the Powder. This being obtain'd, and Guy Fawks assuming the Name of John Johnson Servant to Mr. Piercy, about Christmass, in the Year 1604, they began their Work with no small Labour and Difficulty, in digging through a vast thick Wall; and had several Intermissions, by reason of the Prorogation of the Parliament from the seventh of February to the third of October, and lastly to the fifth of November. About Candlemass they had almost wrought their Mine through the Wall, when suddenly they heard a Noise in the next Room, which threw them into a great Consternation, for fear of a Discovery; but sending Guy Fawks to find out the Occasion, he brought advice, that it was a Cellar where Sea-Coals had been laid, which were now under Sale, and the Room offer'd to be let for a yearly Rent. This Room

Their Oath of Secrecy.

Room being directly under the Parliament-House, and most proper for their Purpose, was immediately hir'd by Mr. Piercy, who brought thirty six Barrels of Gun-Powder from Lambeth, and placing them in this Cellar, cover'd them over with great Quantities of Sea-Coal, Billets and Faggots.

They find a Cellar for their Purpose.

The first Part of the Plot being brought to so hopeful an Issue, it now remain'd to consider what was to be effected, when the fatal Blow should be given: For tho' the King and Prince might be slain, yet the Duke of York and the Lady Elizabeth would still be safe, and consequently their main End endanger'd if not defeated. Therefore Piercy, by reason of his Acquaintance in the House, undertook to secure the Duke of York; and for surprizing the Lady Elizabeth, they agreed upon a Match of Hunting near to Dunchurch, where under Colour of Sport they might draw Company together, and secure her at the Lord Harrington's House in Warwickshire, where she then resided. The next Doubt they propos'd was where to procure Mony and Horses; for which Digby made offer of fifteen hundred Pounds, Tresham of two hundred, and Piercy promis'd to bring all he could gather from Northumberland Rents, which he thought would amount to four thousand Pounds, and to provide ten Horses for his Share; not doubting, when having the Heir Apparent in their Hands, but they should find Means for their Purpose. A third Question propos'd, was what Lords they should save from going to the Parliament; which they agreed to be as many Catholicks as they could prevent with Conveniency. Next it was mov'd amongst them, what Foreign Princes should be acquainted with their Designs, and whose Aid they should seek: In which it was agreed, That none of them should be made Privy to the Conspiracy, as fearing they could not obtain their Secrecy; but for Aid after the Work perform'd, they might have Time to apply themselves to France, Spain or Flanders. Lastly they resolv'd to make the best Use of the Lady Elizabeth, and to proclaim her Queen: To which purpose they had a Proclamation form'd, in which no mention was made of altering Religion, because they wanted sufficient Forces; and 'till they could sufficiently strengthen their Party, they would not acknowledge the Fact to be theirs, but use their Endeavours to charge it upon the Puritans.

Their several Resolutions.

Thus far the monstrous Design was carry'd on with a promising Aspect to all the Conspirators; and now all Dangers being foreseen, and all Engines provided against the fifth Day of the next November, there remain'd nothing but the Performance of the last Act of the intended Tragedy. But of a sudden the infernal Secret, cover'd with all the Clowds of Darkness, and secur'd by all the Fences of Human Policy, was brought to Light after a wonderful Manner. The Lord Monteagle, Son and Heir to the Lord Morley, being in his Lodgings at seven at Night, was surpriz'd with a Letter given him by one of his Footmen, who receiv'd it in the Street from an unknown Person, with a strict Charge to put it into his Master's Hand. The Letter was this: My Lord, Out of the Love I bear to some of your Friends, I have regard to your Preservation; therefore would advise you, as you tender your Life, to invent some Excuse to shift off your Attendance at this Parliament: For God and Man have concur'd to punish the Wickedness of this Time. Think not slightly of this Advertisement, but retire your self into your Country, where you may expect the Event in Safety: For tho' there be no Appearance of any Stir, yet I say they shall receive a terrible Blow in this Parliament, and shall not see who hurt them. This Counsel is not to be contemn'd, because it may do you Good, and can do you no Harm; for the Danger is pass'd as soon as you have burn the Letter: And I hope God will give you the Grace to make good Use of it, to whose holy Protection I commit you. It was only ten Days before the Parliament that this Letter was receiv'd, and but twelve Hours before their Meeting that the Plot was really discover'd; in which it seems wonderful, that when so many were concern'd in it, it should remain conceal'd for almost the Space of a Year. Some Advices were indeed sent to the King, and several of the Council from beyond Sea, 'That the Papiſts were preparing a Petition for 'a Toleration for Religion at the Meeting of the Parliament, which ſhould be 'be ſo well back'd, that the King would be loath to refuſe it; but theſe were only look'd upon as little Deſigns to put the King in Fear of a weak Party. And this Lord, when he receiv'd the Letter, ſtill doubted that it was only ſome private Artifice to deter him from attending the Parliament; but yet out of a Tenderneſs to the King's Preſervation, he reſolv'd to communicate it to the Earl of Salisbury, the principal Secretary; and going the ſame Night to Whitehall, he deliver'd the Letter to him. The Secretary acquainted the Lord-Chamberlain, the Admiral, and ſome others of the Council with it; and examining every Line of it, reſolv'd to ſhew it to the King at his Return from his Hunting at Royſton, and not to ſearch further 'till they ſhould hear his Opinion.

Which is communicated to the Council.

The King returning to London on the laſt of October, the Letter was ſhown him the next Day; and having carefully read and conſider'd it, he ſaid, It was not to be contemn'd, for the Stile ſeem'd more quick and nervous than that of Libels, Paſquils, and the like. The Secretary perceiving the King to apprehend the Matter more deeply than he expected, told him, That the Letter ſeem'd to have proceeded from Folly or Madneſs; and pointing to that Paſſage, 'The Danger is paſs'd as ſoon as you have burnt the Letter, he ſaid, The Warning would be of no Uſe, if the Burning of the Letter would remove the Danger. But the King deſir'd him to conſider the former Sentence, where it was ſaid, 'They ſhould receive a terrible Blow in the Parliament, and not ſee 'who hurt them, and when he ſhould join that with the other, he ſhould find it to be a ſudden Danger there meant, ſuch as Blowing up by Powder. Therefore he order'd all the Rooms about the Parliament-Houſe to be ſearch'd, both above and below, to prevent all future Dangers; which Buſineſs, belonging to the Chamberlain, was purpoſely deferr'd 'till the Afternoon before the firſt Seſſion of Parliament. At which Time the Chamberlain taking with him the Lord Monteagle, who was highly deſirous to ſee the Event, went and view'd all the Rooms, where he perceiv'd in the Vault under the Upper Houſe a great Quantity of Faggots, Billets and Coals; and demanding of Whinyard, the Keeper of the Wardrobe, to what Uſe he had put thoſe Cellars, he anſwer'd, That Mr. Piercy had hired the Houſe and Cellar, and the Wood and Coals were the Gentleman's Fuel for Winter. The Chamberlain caſting his Eye aſide, and eſpying a ſuſpicious Man in the Corner of the Vault, tranſiently ask'd who he was, and was anſwer'd, He was Mr. Piercy's Man, who kept the Houſe for his Maſter. Thus having view'd all Places after a ſeeming careleſs Manner, he return'd and made report of all to the King, which increas'd his Majeſty's firſt Apprehenſions; who thereupon gave order for turning up the Wood and Coals to the very Bottom; and if nothing were found, it was agreed that Whinyard ſhould pretend the Stealing of ſome of the King's Furniture in his Keeping, which might give Colour to the Search. Accordingly Sir Thomas Knevet, a Gentleman of the Privy-Chamber, and a Juſtice of the Peace for Weſtminſter, was appointed for this Buſineſs; who going thither with ſome few in Company about Midnight, found a Man ſtanding at the Entrance of the Vault in a Cloak and Boots, which he immediately apprehended. Then entering the Place, by overturning the Billets and Coals, they ſoon found the Serpents Neſt, ſtor'd with thirty ſix Barrels of Gun-Powder; and ſearching the Villain who ſhould have brooded theſe Eggs, they found about him a Dark-Lanthorn, three Matches, and other Contrivances to have given Fire to the Train at an exact Juncture of Time. This was Guido Fawks, who paſs'd for Piercy's Man, and was ſo far from relenting, that he declar'd with an Oath, That if he had been found within the Houſe, he would have blown up himſelf and them together. Sir Thomas ſecuring the Man, immediately repair'd to the Palace, and ſhew'd the Chamberlain and Secretary how he had ſucceeded; who making themſelves ready, with what Counſellors they could get, went all together ther to his Majesty's Bed-Chamber. The King being awak'd, the Chamberlain, not able to conceal his Joy, cry'd aloud, The Treason was discover'd, and the Traitor in their Hands! Then the Council were order'd to examine the Prisoner concerning his Accomplices; but he, nothing dejected or mov'd with so honourable a Presence, boldly avow'd the Fact, and was only sorry that he had fail'd in the Execution, declaring, That the Devil, and not God had betray'd his good Design. All that Day he would discover no one Associate, but took all the Blame upon himself, professing he had done it for Religion and Conscience Sake, and speaking of the King, he deny'd him to be his Soveraign, in regard he was a Heretick; and therefore it was no Sin to destroy him. This was his Behaviour for a while; but being convey'd to the Tower, and the Rack presented, he laid open the whole Substance of the Conspiracy, and confess'd the whole Truth.

Fawks Confesses all.

In the Time of this strange Discovery, Catesby, Piercy, Winter, Tresham, and the younger Wright, were lodg'd in the City; who hearing that all was discover'd, hasten'd into the Country, appointing to meet at Dunchurch in Warwickshire, where Digby resided. John Graunt, with some Confederate Recusants, had the same Night broke open a Stable of one Bourch, a Manager of large Horses, and took away seven or eight belonging to certain Noblemen in the Country; for he concluded the Conspiracy had taken effect, and was preparing to surprize the Princess Elizabeth, whose Residence was not far from the Place. But within a very short Time, Piercy and others that were fled from London, assuring them of a total Miscarriage, they desperately resolv'd upon a publick Rebellion, and pretending the Cause of Religion, endeavour'd to draw some Companies together; yet when they had gather'd all their Force, they could not produce a hundred Men. In the mean Time Sir Fulk Grevill, Deputy-Lieutenant of Warwickshire, hearing of Graunt's Outrage, and supposing it the Beginning of a Rebellion, sent Advice to the neighbouring Towns, and warn'd them to be upon their Guard. The Sheriff of the County likewise calling the People to Arms, pursu'd these desperate People from Shire to Shire; and Sir Richard Walsh, the Sheriff of Worcestershire, having found where they had taken Harbour, sent a Trumpet and Messenger, commanding them in his Majesty's Name to surrender, and promising to intercede for their Lives. But they, finding their Crimes to be unpardonable, return'd Answer, That the Sheriff must have more powerful Assistance than he had brought, before he could command or compel them. The Sheriff, provok'd by their insulting Answer, prepar'd to attack the House; and while they made their Defence, it happen'd that a Spark of Fire falling among some Powder they were drying, blew up the House, which so scorch'd their Faces and Bodies, that losing their Courage, they open'd the Gate, and expos'd themselves to the Fury of the People. Catesby, Piercy and Sir Thomas Winter joining Backs, and resolving to die rather than be taken, the two first were kill'd with one Shot, and the other after some Wounds was made Prisoner: The two Wrights were also kill'd, but Rookwood, Graunt, Digby and Bates were taken and secur'd. Tresham had staid at London, and changing his Lodgings, thought to have met an Opportunity of escaping by Sea, but was at last discover'd; as likewise was Robert Winter, with one Littleton, who with all the rest were committed to the Tower of London. Upon Examination, Thomas Winter ingenuously confess'd the whole Conspiracy, writing down the Particulars with his own Hand, and acknowledging the Offence to be greater than could be forgiven. Digby extenuated the Crime by the Despair to which they were driven, having Hopes from the King at his Accession to the Crown, That the Catholicks should have a free Toleration of Religion, which being deny'd they had ventur'd upon these impious Attempts. Tresham in his Confession nam'd Garnet the Jesuit as privy to the Conspiracy; but afterwards by his Wife's Instigation deny'd it, declaring he had injur'd him, and had not seen him for sixteen Years; yet

The Conspirators are taken.

Garnet being apprehended after his Death, confeſs'd that they had met ſeveral Times within the laſt half Year.

In the mean Time the King met his Parliament upon Saturday the ninth of November, and made a long and remarkable Speech to the publick Eſtates; in which having aggravated the Danger by many Circumſtances, and as much magnify'd the Mercies of God in the Diſcovery, when he mention'd the Trial and Puniſhment of the Offenders, he was obſerv'd to retain an excellent Temper in his Diſcourſe, wiſhing that no innocent Perſon, either domeſtick or foreign, ſhould thereby receive any Hurt: For, added he, however the blind Superſtition of their Errors in Religion has been the only Motive in this deſperate Attempt, it muſt not be thought that all who profeſs the Roman Religion are guilty of the ſame: For as it is true, that no other Sect, or Hereſie, not excepting Turk, Jew, or Pagan, or thoſe that worſhip the Devil, did ever maintain by the Grounds of their Religion, that it was lawful and meritorious to murther Princes or People upon the account of that; yet it is true on the other Side, that many honeſt Men, blinded perhaps with ſome Opinions of Popery, as if they be not found in the Real Preſence, the Number of the Sacraments, and ſome ſuch School-Queſtions, do either not know, or not believe at leaſt, all the true Grounds of Popery, which is indeed the Myſtery of Iniquity. And therefore we juſtly confeſs that many Papiſts, eſpecially our Fore-Fathers, laying their only Truſt upon Chriſt and his Merits, may be ſav'd; deteſting in that Point, and thinking that Cruelty of Puritans worthy of Fire that will allow no Salvation to any Papiſts. And then concluding that Part of his Diſcourſe he declar'd, As on the one Part many honeſt Men, ſeduc'd with ſome Errors of Popery, may yet remain good and faithful Subjects; ſo on the other Part, none of thoſe who truly know and believe the whole Grounds of Popery, can prove either good Chriſtians or faithful Subjects. Having finiſh'd his Speech, without further Buſineſs he prorogu'd the Parliament to the twenty firſt Day of January next.

The ſecond Seſſion of the ſecond Parliament.

The King's Speech.

The King's Management and Wiſdom in this Affair was highly applauded, and univerſal Rejoicings appear'd among the People; inſomuch, that the Ambaſſadors of the King of Spain and the Arch-Duke made Bonfires, and threw Mony among the People in Token of their great Satisfaction. And on the fourth of January the Spaniſh Ambaſſador deliver'd a Preſent to his Majeſty from the King his Maſter, conſiſting of ſix Jennets of Andaluſia, with Saddles moſt richly imbroider'd, and Trappings of fine Cloath of Iſſue. This was a Preſent ſent before any Knowledge had of the Powder-Plot; but as ſoon as this was known, there was immediately another Preſent ſent from the Queen of Spain to the Queen of England, purpoſely to congratulate the King's happy Deliverance from the execrable Treaſon, and brought by Don John de Mendoſa, which was a curious Robe of Murry Sattin, twice imbroider'd about every Seam and Skirt with Gold; the fore Part of which was ſet with forty eight Tags three Inches long of beaten Gold, hollow within, and fill'd with Amber-Greeſe: Alſo two large Chains of Gold, two rich Carkanets, a Velvet Cap with Gold Buttons, finely enamel'd, and a Girdle ſuitable to the Buttons; all which were preſented together in a capacious Veſſel of Gold, in Form of a Baſon: So that it ſeems none more rejoic'd for the Overthrow of this Plot for the Catholick Cauſe, than the Catholick King himſelf. And now King James was not unmindful of the Lord Monteagle, the firſt Diſcoverer of this Conſpiracy; for he gave to him and his Heirs for ever, two hundred Pounds a Year in Fee-Farm Rents, and five hundred Pounds a Year beſides, during his Life, as a Reward for his good Service.

Congratulations and Preſents from Spain.

On the twenty firſt Day of January the Parliament again met according to the Prorogation; and ſix Days after a Commiſſion was directed to ſeveral Lords and Judges of both Benches, for the Trial of the ſeveral Conſpirators, namely, Sir Everard Digby Knight, John Graunt, Ambroſe Rookwood, and Robert Winter,

The third Seſſion of the firſt Parliament.

Winter, Eſquires, Thomas Winter, Robert Keys, Thomas Bades, and Guido Fawks, Gentlemen or Yeomen. Theſe were all fairly convicted and condemn'd to die; and on the Thurſday following Sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, Graunt and Bates, were accordingly drawn, hang'd and quarter'd at the Weſt-End of St. Paul's Church in London; and on the next Day, the other four, Thomas Winter, Keys, Rookwood and Fawks, were after the ſame manner executed in the Parliament Yard at Weſtminſter. Of all whom, none was ſo much lamented as Sir Everard Digby, and not without Cauſe; for he was a noble Perſonage, and of excellent Parts, and had it ſeems been ſubtilly drawn in, and bound to Secrecy by Oath, when he leaſt imagin'd ſuch a Treaſon. Not long after, Henry Garnet, Provincial of the Engliſh Jeſuits, was arraign'd at Guild-Hall, for concealing and promoting the aforeſaid Treaſon, where he was condemn'd to be drawn, hang'd and quarter'd; and accordingly on the third Day of May, he was drawn from the Tower to the Weſt-End of St. Paul's Church, and there executed. At his Death he acknowledg'd his Crime, begg'd Forgiveneſs, and exhorted all Catholicks never to attempt any Treaſon againſt the King of State, as a Method to which God would never give Succeſs. Beſides thoſe who ſuffer'd Death, ſome others were brought into Danger and Trouble; particularly Henry Lord Mordant, and Edward Lord Sturton, who were brought from the Tower to the Star-Chamber; where tho' they were not charg'd with any direct Point of Treaſon, yet were obliquely accus'd of neglecting to appear at the Parliament, according to the Summons; for which Neglect alone, without any further Charge, the former was fin'd ten thouſand Marks, and the latter ſix thouſand, and both to be Priſoners during the King's Pleaſure. But the Burthen fell heavier upon the Earl of Northumberland, who after them being brought to the Star-Chamber, was more directly charg'd with Circumſtances concerning the Treaſon, eſpecially with Regard to Thomas Piercy, whom he had admitted to be one of the King's Gentlemen Penſioners, without adminiſtring to him the Oath of Supremacy, knowing him to be a Recuſant; for which he was puniſh'd with a thirty thouſand Pound Fine, Forfeiture of all his Offices, and Impriſonment during the King's Pleaſure.

The Puniſhment of the Conſpirators.

The People in a Conſternation.

While the Parliament was ſitting, and all Men in a pleaſing State of Security, the publick Satisfaction was ſtrangely diſturb'd by a ſudden Rumour and Outcry at Court, That the King was ſtabb'd with an invenom'd Knife at Oking, twenty Miles from London. Upon which the Court-Gates were immediately ſhut, and double Guards ſet in all Places about the City, and all Mens Minds were infinitely confounded and diſtracted: But within two Hours all theſe Clouds were diſpers'd, and a new Sun-ſhine appear'd, when it was unqueſtionably known, that the King was ſafe, and in perfect Health: For which a Proclamation was immediately iſſu'd out to ſignifie the ſame to the People; and that Afternoon the King came himſelf to Whitehall, where innumerable Multitudes, tranſported with Joy, came flocking to ſee him. And ſo general was the Triumph, that the Spaniſh Ambaſſador gave Sir Lewis Lewknor, Maſter of the Ceremonies, a valuable Chain of Gold for bringing him the News. Tho' afterwards, according to Sir Richard Baker, it was thought by ſome, that this Rumour was politickly invented to cauſe the Parliament and People to be more tender of the King's Safety; and by making them more ſenſible what a Treaſure they enjoy'd by his Life, they might more willingly part with their Treaſure for his well-living. However it was happy for the King, for the Parliament did every Thing that might oblige his Majeſty, and gave him three intire Subſidies, and ſix Fifteenths; beſides four Subſidies of four Shillings in the Pound, granted him by the Clergy of the Realm in Convocation. The Parliament likewiſe made many material Laws for the Diſcovery and Suppreſſing of Popiſh Recuſants; and they attainted the Blood of thoſe Traitors that were executed, as alſo thoſe who were ſlain in the Field, or dy'd in the Priſon. And to compleat all, 'With Hearts full of Affection for God's great Deliverance of

'the

'the whole Kingdom from Ruin and Deſolation, they made a ſpecial Act to have 'the fifth Day of November for ever ſolemniz'd with publick Thankſgivings: 'Imputing the Diſcovery of the Treaſon to God, inſpiring the King with a 'divine Spirit to interpret ſome dark Phraſes in the Letter, above and beyond 'all ordinary Conſtruction. When this and many other Acts had paſs'd the Royal Aſſent, on the twenty ſeventh of May the Parliament was prorogu'd to the eighteenth of November.

The fifth of November made a Holy-Day.

And here happily ended that famous Conſpiracy, call'd the Gun-Powder-Plot, the Blackneſs of which hath been ever ſince annually diſplaid by the moſt eloquent Tongues and Pens in the Kingdom; which Thuanus calls ſuch a Monſter of Conſpiracies as no Age or Country did ever produce; in which the King, Queen, the Royal Family, Nobility, Prelates, Judges, Knights and Gentry, and in effect the whole Body of the Kingdom, were to be exterminated; ſo that it might be well call'd a Wickedneſs beyond Expreſſion, as well as Excuſe. Yet ſo different are the Notions or Intereſts of Mankind, that Garnet and the reſt of the Traitors executed for this Plot, were afterwards reputed and pronounc'd Martyrs for the Catholick Cauſe by the College of Jeſuits in Rome.

IV. This laſt threatning Storm was ſucceeded by a Calm of ſeveral Years, without any violent Agitations, or many memorable Actions; in which Pleaſures, Entertainments and Expences, took their ſeveral Turns in Court, City and Country. All which were introduc'd by the Arrival of Chriſtianus King of Denmark, Brother to the Queen, who having been long expected, with eight Ships enter'd the River Thames, and anchor'd before Grave's-End, being met the next Day by King James with Prince Henry, and ſeveral of the Lords in Barges, who formally conducted him to London, where he ſtaid above three Weeks. In which Time he was entertain'd with all the Magnificence that could be invented, the King and he riding in great State through the City, where ſtately Pageants were erected in many Places; and after he had been ſhown all the chief Buildings and Rarities of the City, had been feaſted by the King, by the Earl of Salisbury four Days together at Theobalds, and had ſeen Tilting, Fencing, Wreſtling, and many other Exerciſes, on the twelfth of Auguſt, conducted by the King, the Queen and Prince, and many great Lords, he took Shipping, and in eight Days arriv'd ſafe in Denmark: A peculiar Happineſs when Princes can converſe together like private Perſons, and are not kept aſunder by Jealouſies of State. After the King of Denmark's Departure, on the twenty third of September there arriv'd in London, Francis Prince of Vaudemont, third Son to the Duke of Lorrain, accompany'd with ſeven Earls, ten Barons, forty Gentlemen of Quality, and a hundred and twenty others; who all went by Coach to the King at Hampton-Court, where for fourteen Days together they were feſtead, and royally entertain'd, and then return'd home.

The Arrival of Chriſtian King of Denmark.

On the eighteenth Day of November, the Parliament according to Prorogation met again at Weſtminſter, where the main Conſideration was the Union with Scotland, which was much urg'd by thoſe who knew the King's Mind: Among whom Sir Francis Bacon, now his Majeſty's Sollicitor, was a principal Inſtrument, who came prepar'd for it, and firſt mov'd the Houſe of Commons, That the Scots might be Naturaliz'd by Act of Parliament; which was oppos'd by ſeveral ſtrong and modeſt Arguments. After many ſeveral Debates and Arguings on both Sides concerning this remarkable Affair, on the laſt Day of March in the following Year, the King ſent for both Houſes of Parliament to Whitehall, to whom in a formal Speech he earneſtly preſs'd the Matter, and declar'd, 'That as there was but Unus Rex, ſo there ought to be but Unus 'Grex, and Una Lex; and that his Intention was not, as ſome idly alledg'd, to 'give England the Labour and Sweat, and Scotland the Fruit and Sweet; and 'he profeſs'd, he ſought this Union only to advance the Greatneſs of the Empire here in England, yet with ſuch Cautions as might ſtand with the Weal of both States. He likewiſe gave diſtinct Anſwer to Objections againſt, and the Inconveniencies ariſing from this Union; but all did not ſatisfie the Parliament, who ſtill apprehended the King's Partiality to his Countrymen, and that Damage would proceed from an Union, where the Laws and Government were of different Natures. The Scots would by no means leſſen, or in any Degree derogate from the Dignity of their long continu'd Monarchy; and the Engliſh thought they had no Reaſon to yield to them, and derogate from themſelves; and ſo the Matter reſted in this Seſſion of Parliament. They ſtill fear'd that the King would have ſuch an Influence upon the Judges, that the Scots would be Naturaliz'd too ſoon, therefore they would not be acceſſary to it; which not long after was confirm'd in Calvin's Caſe of the Poſt-nati, and reported by the Lord Chief-Juſtice Cook, the Lord Chancellor Elleſmere, and moſt of the Judges of the Kingdom, in the Exchequer Chamber, tho' many Arguments were brought againſt it. On the fourth Day of July, the Parliament was again prorogu'd firſt to the ſixteenth of November next, and then to the ninth of February in the Year 160$\frac{9}{10}$.

The Parliament againſt an Union with Scotland.

Before the Parliament broke up, ſome Diſturbances happen'd in the Midland Parts of the Nation, as in Northamptonſhire, Warwickſhire and Leiceſterſhire, where many aſſembled together, firſt not in a treaſonable, but in a riotous and felonious Manner, throwing down many Incloſures, and committing many Outrages of the like kind, and all without any particular Head. 'Till at length there aroſe a mean Perſon, call'd John Reynolds, whom they nam'd Captain Pouch, becauſe he wore a large Leather Pouch by his Side, declaring to the reſt, That in that he had ſufficient to defend himſelf againſt Oppoſers; tho' it afterwards appear'd that all the Magick in that Repoſitory lay in a Piece of Green Cheeſe. A Proclamation was iſſu'd out, ſtrictly commanding them to ſurceaſe their Diſorders, and declaring them Traitors if they perſiſted; but this had no Effect, 'till the King ſent the Earl of Huntington, the Earl of Exeter, the Lord Zouch, and Sir Edward Cook, Lord Chief-Juſtice of England, to ſuppreſs them by Force of Arms, and to puniſh the Levellers according to the Nature of their Crimes; ſome by Death, as for Treaſon, and others by Fines, as for Riots; of the former Kind Captain Pouch was made an Example, which put an End to the Diſturbance. Beſides this Inſtance of ill diſpos'd Perſons of the meaner Sort, the Earl of Tyrone, ungratefully forgetting the King's Clemency to him, together with Tirconell, the Lord of Dungannon, and ſeveral other Iriſh Lords, fled into Foreign Parts, purpoſely to ſollicit thoſe Princes againſt their own Soveraign, and to offer the Kingdom of Ireland to the Pope, all which was immediately ſignify'd to the Realm by Proclamation.

Diſturbances in the Midland Counties.

Now the King paſs'd his Time in Eaſe and Diverſions; and in the Month of June, being attended by ſeveral Lords, he din'd with the Lord Mayor of London, Sir John Wats; who after Dinner preſented him with a Purſe full of Gold, and humbly beſought his Majeſty, that he would be pleas'd to be free of his Company the Cloth-Workers. To which the King graciouſly condeſcended; and thereupon call'd to Sir William Stone, Maſter of the Company, and familiarly ſaid, Stone, give me thy Hand, I am now a Cloth-Worker; and in Token of my ſpecial Favour to this Society, I do here give a brace of Bucks yearly for ever to this Company, at the Election of the Maſter and Wardens. At which Time alſo many Lords and Gentlemen were made free of the Cloth-Workers. In the following Month, the King and Prince, with many Lords, din'd at Merchant-Tailors Hall, where the Maſter and Wardens of that Society preſented his Majeſty with a Purſe of Gold, giving him humble Thanks for honouring their Company with his Royal Preſence: And likewiſe ſhew'd him a Roll wherein were regiſter'd the Names of ſeven Kings, one Queen, ſeventeen Princes and Dukes, two Dutcheſſes, one Arch-Biſhop, thirty one Earls, ſixty ſixty ſix Barons, ſeven Abbots, ſeven Priors, with a great Number of Knights and Eſquires, who had been free of that Company; which his Majeſty graciouſly accepted, but told them; That he himſelf was already free of another Company; but the Prince his Son ſhould be free of theirs, and that he would ſee the Garland put on his Head. Whereupon the Maſter preſented the Prince alſo with a Purſe of Gold, which he graciouſly accepted, and ſaid, That not only himſelf would be free of the Merchant-Tailors, but the Lords alſo that were with him ſhould do the like; all which was perform'd with no ſmall Solemnity. and the Prince of the Merchant-Tailors.

The King made Free of the Cloth-Workers,

And now the King proceeded to his wonted Bounty in new Creations, and by a Writ call'd Sir Thomas Knevet to the Parliament by the Name of Baron of Eſtrick; and the next Day Sir Julius Cæſar, Chancellor of the Exchequer, was ſworn a Privy-Counſellor. Not long after Sir Jervis Clifton, Knight, was call'd to the Parliament by Writ, by the Name and Title of Baron of Layton Brameſwold; whoſe only Daughter and Heir was ſoon after marry'd to Eyſme Stuart, Baron D'Aubigny in France, ſole Brother to the Duke of Lenox, whom he afterwards ſucceeded in that Dignity. And as the King in the laſt Year was pleas'd to advance two great Men to the honourable Order of the Garter, namely, the Earl of Salisbury, and Thomas Howard Viſcount Bindon; ſo in the following Year, and the Month of May 1608, he rais'd two others to that Honour, namely George Earl of Dunbar, and Philip Earl of Montgomery; the former of which left both his Honour and Life not very long after, and was magnificently interr'd in the Abby Church at Weſtminſter. New Promotions. A. D. 1608. Reg. 6.

Tho' the Affair of the Union was not approv'd by the Parliament of England, yet that of Scotland at this Time was more inclinable to join in it, eſpecially when they found the King of England ſo zealous for it. He naturally thought that the Work would be more eaſily effected, if a Beginning was made in Scotland, and therefore he call'd a Parliament in that Kingdom, which was held by Lodowick Duke of Lenox, as Commiſſioner for his Majeſty, in the Room of the Earl of Montroſs then deceas'd. The Eſtates, to ſatisfie the King's Deſire, did allow all the Articles concluded by the Commiſſioners in the Treaty, with this Proviſo, 'That the ſame ſhould be in like manner ratify'd by the Parliament of England, otherwiſe the Concluſions taken 'ſhould not have the Force of a Law: And it was alſo declar'd, 'That if the 'Union ſhould take Effect, the Kingdom of Scotland notwithſtanding ſhould 'remain an abſolute and free Monarchy; and the Fundamental Laws receive no 'Alteration. But after all the King's Endeavours, by means of the Suſpicions of the Engliſh, and the Stiffneſs of the Scotch, the whole Deſign fell and ſunk to nothing; and all that was obtain'd from the Engliſh Parliament, was, That the Laws of Hoſtility, anciently made between England and Scotland, were repeal'd, that the old Reſentments which caus'd the Diſunion might be remov'd. And in the ſaid Act they provided, 'That if a 'natural born Engliſhman did commit any Miſdemeanor in Scotland, and fly 'into England, he ſhould be try'd where he was taken, and not carry'd into 'Scotland to receive Sentence there; 'till ſuch Time as both Kingdoms ſhall 'be made one in Laws and Government. And further they proceeded not; for they found and fear'd the old Enmity would for ſome Time continue: For ſince the King's coming into England, the looſe and unſetled Borderers, that liv'd upon Spoil and Rapine, had upon theſe new Changes committed new Outrages; who tho' they were ſuppreſs'd by the Garriſons of Berwick and Carliſle, and many of them made Examples, yet Cuſtom and Habit had bred a natural Fierceneſs in them, which nothing but new Laws and Uſages could fully reſtrain. The Laws made in Scotland to the Prejudice of the Engliſh, were likewiſe repeal'd; ſo that all Paſſages were made and left ſmooth on both Sides, for future Times to accompliſh that Work. The Scots inclinable to an Union. The Deſign dropt.

This Year was ſomewhat remarkable for the Execution both of Prieſts and Pirats; for on the eleventh of April, George Jervis a ſeminary Prieſt, and the twenty Some Perſons executed.

twenty third of June following, Thomas Garnet a Jeſuit, were both executed according to Law at Tyburn; and the latter had the Favour offer'd him to be pardon'd, if he would but take the Oath of Allegiance, which he utterly refus'd. About the ſame Time there were many famous Engliſh Pirats, ſome of whom likewiſe turn'd Mahometans, and liv'd in great State at Tunis, among which were Ward, Biſhop, Sir Francis Verney, and Glanvile. Theſe and ſeveral others, after many Depredations and outragious Acts at Sea, were ſuppreſs'd partly by the King of Spain, and partly by the King of England, and nineteen of their Aſſociates being taken, were according to their Deſerts hang'd at Wapping.

The Earl of Dorſet's Death.

In the ſame Year the Lord-Treaſurer, Thomas Earl of Dorſet, being at the Council-Table at Whitehall, dy'd ſuddenly, while he was pulling out ſome Papers of his Title to Lucies Lands in Kent, which put an End to that Diſpute which he had brought before the Council. His ſudden Death, and effeminate Life, gave Occaſion to his Enemies to make ſevere and unuſual Interpretations; but his Head being open'd, there were found in it certain little Bags of Water, which by breaking might naturally cauſe ſuch a Death. He was undoubtedly of excellent Parts, and in his Place exceeding induſtrious; in which he was ſucceeded by the famous Earl of Salisbury, a Courtier and Politician from his Infancy; tho' Nature was not propitious to his Outſide, as having a crook'd Back, yet ſhe ſupply'd that Defect with admirable Endowments of Mind. The Earl of Northampton was alſo made Lord Privy-Seal, and theſe were the two prime Miniſters of State, upon whoſe Shoulders the King laid the main Burden of all his Affairs. Another great Miniſter was the Earl of Suffolk, who was made Lord-Chamberlain; but he came far behind in the Management of the King's Buſineſs, having a Spirit of a groſſer Nature, fitter to part a Fray, and compoſe the Differences of a diſorder'd Court, than thoſe of a Kingdom.

Salisbury made Treaſurer.

A. D. 1609. Reg. 7.

Being ſupported by theſe Counſellors, the King joining with Henry the Fourth of France, undertook a Mediation between the King of Spain and the Confederate States of Holland, and brought them to a Treaty of Amity, in which the States were acknowledg'd Free and Independent; and this after they had manag'd a famous and bloody Conteſt of above forty Years Continuance. This was the firſt Scene in which King James appear'd abroad, either as a Party or Mediator, ſince his Acceſſion to the Throne of England; and tho' the Treaty prov'd of extraordinary Conſequence, yet it is ſaid that his Part in it was as mean as that of the King of France was glorious; and his Conduct towards the States, for whom he mediated, and towards France with whom he join'd, was quite different from the Methods and Maxims of his renowned Predeceſſor. For beſides ſeveral unuſual Condeſcentions to the French in the Perſons of his Ambaſſadors, which gave Foreigners a mean Idea of his Government, he was tax'd with being ſubtle and inſincere in the Treaty which he appear'd to promote and incourage. And what Opinion the French Miniſters had of him in this Affair, appears from the printed Negotiations of Jeannin, the chief Agent for France, who in ſeveral Letters to the French King his Maſter, wrote That King James was never hearty in the Treaty, but had all along condemn'd the Hollanders for throwing off the Soveraignty of Spain, upon the Account of its bad Example. In Anſwer to one of which Letters, King Henry, whoſe Opinion of King James was never very great, own'd his Knowledge of that King's ill Intentions towards the States, and withal told Jeannin, That his Carriage did not break his Sleep; and concluded his Letter with an Expreſſion of Contempt, rarely us'd among Princes of that Rank, I know his Capacity, and the Inclinations of his Subjects.

A Treaty between Spain and Holland.

About this Time, the Suburbs between London and Weſtminſter had many ruinous Piles of Buildings, which Age had worn out, and Induſtry and Riches began to revive. Among the reſt the Lord-Treaſurer Salisbury, out of the old Stables Stables of Durham-Houſe in the Strand, erected a noble Fabrick to be Rival to the Old-Exchange, which the King by his Preſence dignify'd with the Name of Britain's Burſe, ſince call'd the New-Exchange. But he took particular Notice of the increaſing Buildings upon the new Foundations, which he look'd upon as a weakly Conſtitution in the Head of the Kingdom, as drawing a Flux of Humours and Diſeaſes too near the Court; beſides he fear'd the Plague might endanger Whitehall, if that Diſtemper increas'd. And therefore, with mature Deliberation of his Council, he forbad all new Buildings to be erected for the future, within two Miles of the City; and by Proclamation ſtrictly commanded, if any were made, they ſhould be pull'd down, which however was not obſerv'd 'till ſeven Years after. On the eighth of May, by another Proclamation the King prohibited all Foreign Nations, that after Auguſt they ſhould not Fiſh upon any of the Coaſts of England, Scotland or Ireland, nor the adjacent Iſles, without the ſpecial Licence from the Commiſſioners ordain'd for that Purpoſe. At this Time the making of Allum, which hitherto with great Charges had been brought from Foreign Parts, was by ſeveral that labour'd in it, and now laſtly by Sir John Bourchier brought to Perfection in England; and thereupon the King prohibited upon Pain of Confiſcation any Allum to be brought from beyond the Seas, and aſſum'd the whole Trade and Buſineſs of it to himſelf.

A. D. 1610. Reg. 8.

At this Time Prince Henry, arriving at ſixteen Years of Age, began to ſhow himſelf in a more Heroick Manner than was uſual with Princes of his Time, by Tiltings, Barriers, and other Martial Exerciſes on Horſeback; which caught the Peoples Eyes, and made their Tongues the Meſſengers of their Hearts, in daily extolling his hopeful and gallant Behaviour to Admiration. Being thus qualify'd, the King now thought him full Ripe for the Honour of Knighthood, in order to which, according to an ancient Cuſtom, the King receiv'd an Aid of his Subjects throughout England, which was levy'd with great Moderation. Then to add new Splendor to this glorious Youth, he not long after created him Prince of Wales, after this ſolemn Manner: Garter King at Arms bore the Letters Patents, the Earl of Suſſex the Robes of Purple Velvet, the Earl of Huntington the Train, the Earl of Cumberland the Sword, the Earl of Rutland the Ring, the Earl of Darby the Rod, the Earl of Shrewſbury the Cap and Coronet, the Earl of Nottingham and Northampton ſupported the Prince, who was only in his Surcoat and Bare-headed. Being conducted in that Manner to the King, and attended by twenty five Knights of the Bath of eminent Note, Secretary Salisbury read the Letters Patents, while the Prince continu'd upon his Knees before the King; and at the accuſtom'd Words the King inveſted him with the Robe, the Sword, the Cap and Coronet, the Rod and the Ring, and then with a Kiſs the Solemnity ended. After this, it was thought proper that he ſhould keep his Court by himſelf; and thereupon Sir Thomas Chaloner, a learned Gentleman, who had before been his Governor, was now made his Lord-Chamberlain, Sir Edward Philips his Chancellor, and all other Officers aſſign'd him belonging to the Court of a Prince, which was kept at St. James's. In all his Management he ſhew'd himſelf ſo ripe for Majeſty, that he ſeem'd to be a King while he was yet but a Prince; and all Mens Eyes began to be fix'd upon him as the great Hopes of the Nation, to the increaſing Jealouſie of the King himſelf, who now endeavouring to find a ſuitable Match for him, ſent Sir Charles Cornwallis Ambaſſador into Spain to treat with that King for his eldeſt Daughter; but this never met with the deſir'd Effect.

Prince Henry created Prince of Wales.

He has a diſtinct Court.

This Year prov'd fatal to King Henry the Great of France, who in the midſt of all his Grandeur and Glory, was by one Ravillack aſſaſſinated and ſlain in the open Streets of Paris, to the Surprize of all Chriſtendom. It has been obſerv'd, That this great Man, when he came firſt to the Crown, was a profeſs'd Proteſtant; but finding himſelf in a tottering Condition among his Popiſh Subjects, jects, he began first to comply with them in Ecclesiastical Affairs; which yet so little satisfy'd the Jesuits, that one of their Instruments stabb'd him into the Mouth with a Knife, without much Hurt: Upon which Accident an Intimate of his freely told him, That the Hand of God was visible in this Action; for he had now deny'd his Religion but with his Mouth; but let him take Care of denying it with his Heart, for if he did, he fear'd God would strike him there also: Both which were remarkably accomplish'd. The Contagion and Fear of this Blow soon reach'd into England, where the King by Proclamation strictly commanded all Jesuits and Priests out of the Kingdom, and all Recusants to their own Houses, and not to come within ten Miles of the Court, without special Licence. Then to secure all his Subjects, he caus'd 'em to take the Oath of Allegiance; which the Parliament, then sitting, both Lords and Commons began, and the rest of the People follow'd, to the King's great Satisfaction. Then turning from Matters of Policy to those of Trade, upon the humble Petition of the East-India Merchants, the King was pleas'd to enlarge their Patents granted them by Queen Elizabeth, gave them a Charter to continue for ever, and enabled them to be a Body Corporate; which so incourag'd the Merchants, that they built a Ship of twelve hundred Tun, the greatest that was ever made in this Kingdom by Merchants; which the King and Prince honour'd with going to Debtford to see it, and then nam'd it The Trades Increase: And at the same Time gave to Sir Thomas Smith, Governor of that Company, a fair Chain of Gold, with a Jewel, wherein was his own Picture. But this great Ship, having been in the Red Sea, and returning to Bantham, was there unfortunately Lost, and most of her Men cast away. But then the King himself built the finest Man of War that was ever known in England, being of the Burthen of fourteen hundred Tuns, and carrying sixty four Pieces of great Ordnance; which he gave to his Son Prince Henry, and nam'd it after his own Dignity, The Prince.

A Proclamation against Jesuits.

The East-India Company establish'd.

But long before these Transactions, the Parliament that had been prorogu'd in the Year 1607, met again on the ninth Day of February, and continu'd sitting a great Part of the Year with fewer Compliments, and less Satisfaction than formerly. For the King and his Friends were now labouring hard, and using all Methods and Arguments to induce them to grant new Supplies of Mony, when many thought there was no just Occasion; and there wanted not some in both Houses that openly said, THE WHOLE WEALTH OF England was not sufficient for the King's vast Bounty, and therefore it was in vain to give him Mony who would give it away again: For it was said that he had made Gold and Silver as plentiful in Edinburgh, as it was in Jerusalem in the Reign of Solomon. Besides this, they began to complain of general Grievances, and of the King's Incroachments upon the publick Liberty, by his Proclamations, the High-Commission Court, and by other Means. To put a stop to these and the like Oppositions, the King summon'd both Houses of Parliament to Whitehall; where in a Speech he told them, That tho' the King's Heart was in the Hands of the Lord, yet he would set it before the Eyes of the People; assuring them, That he never design'd to govern by any Law but that of the Land, tho' it was disputed among them, as if he had an Intention to alter the Law, and govern by the absolute Power of a King. He knew the Power of Kings, and compar'd it to the Power Divine: For as God can create and destroy, make and unmake at his Pleasure, so Kings can give Life and Death, judge all, and be judg'd of none. They can exalt low Things, and abuse high Things, making the Subjects like Men at Chess, a Pawn to take a Bishop or a Knight. But still all Kings, who were not Tyrants, or Perjur'd, would always bind themselves within the Limits of the Laws; and they that persuaded them to the contrary, were Vipers and Pests both against them and the Common-wealth. Yet, as it was Blasphemy to dispute what God might do, so it was Sedition in Subjects to dispute what a King might do in the Height of his Power: And as he would not have Subjects diſcourſe of his Power, ſo he would do nothing but what was conſonant to Law and Reaſon. After this he proceeded to ſpeak much in Commendation of the Common Law, and to thank the Houſe of Commons for burning ſome Papers preſented as Grievances, giving them Rules how to receive Grievances, among which, They ſhould not meddle with the main Points of Government, which would be to leſſen his Craft, who had been thirty Years at his Trade in Scotland, and ſerv'd an Apprenticeſhip of ſeven Years here. But after theſe, with more obliging Expreſſions, he ſhew'd the emergent Cauſe of his great Expences, declaring, That when he firſt open'd his Neceſſities to them, his Purſe only labour'd, but now his Deſires were made ſo publick, his Reputation labour'd as well as his Purſe: For the World would think it want of Love in them, or Merit in him, that had leſſen'd their Hearts, and ty'd up their Hands. In Concluſion, after the paſſing of many good Laws, which the Reader will meet with in the Statute Book, he obtain'd one Subſidy and a Fifteenth; and after this Parliament had continu'd above ſix Years in Being, and had five Meetings, and went through a great Number of uſeful Acts, both for promoting many Advantages, and ſuppreſſing many Miſchiefs, it was diſſolv'd upon the thirty firſt Day of December. The Parliament diſſolv'd.

V. All Things being now in a reaſonable State of Quiet and Calmneſs, the King may be ſaid to live at this Time in the Height of his Diverſions and Expences, keeping two ſeveral Courts beſides his own; for as the Prince was Maſter of St. James's, ſo the Queen was Miſtreſs of Somerſet-Houſe, to which ſhe gave the Name of Denmark-Houſe, and that continu'd as long as ſhe liv'd. She was not without ſeveral great Men to attend her, for outward Magnificence, the Court being then in a continu'd Courſe of Interludes and Maskarades, where ſhe and her Ladies, like ſo many Sea-Nimphs, or Nereids, often appear'd in ſtrange and various Dreſſes, to the Wonder of the Spectators; while the King himſelf was not a little delighted with ſuch extraordinary Entertainments, that made the Night more glorious than the Day. She had alſo her particular Favourites in one Place, as the King had his in another; for ſhe affected the Earl of Pembroke the elder Brother, and he the younger, whom he made Earl of Montgomery and Knight of the Garter. But ſtill either not finding him ſuitable to his Humour or Affections, or viewing another more agreeable Object, his Fancy run with a violent Stream upon a young Gentleman, born about Edinburgh, of no great Parts or Birth, but of a comely Aſpect, and a courtly Addreſs. His Name was Robert Car, who being lately come from France, in a Tournament before the King, by a Fall off his Horſe broke his Leg; which Accident gave the King occaſion to take Notice of him, and hearing that his Name was Car, remember'd he had a Page of that Name when he came firſt into England, which was found to be the ſame Perſon. The King recollecting his Thoughts, fix'd them upon this Object of Commiſeration, and gave particular Orders to have him lodg'd in the Court, and to have his own Phyſicians and Surgeons uſe their beſt Endeavours for his Recovery. The King often viſited him during his Reſtraint, ſometimes an Hour or more diſcourſing with him upon ſeveral Subjects; and tho' he found no great Depth of Learning or Experience, yet ſuch a ſmooth and calm Outſide, made him judge there might be a fit Harbour for his moſt retir'd Thoughts. As ſoon as he recover'd, the King with great Satisfaction made him a Knight, and Gentleman of his Bed-Chamber, took the Pains himſelf to teach him the Latin Tongue, and laid a Foundation by his daily Diſcourſes to improve him into a Capacity of receiving his moſt endearing Affections. A. D. 1611. Reg. 9. The Riſe of Robert Car.

And now all Addreſſes were made to Sir Robert Car, who was ſaid to be Favourite in Ordinary; no Suit nor Reward were manag'd but by his Means; his Hand diſtributed Favours, and his Hand reſtrain'd them; and the Lords could ſcarce have a Smile without his Approbation. And what greatly added to his encreasing Power, was the Death of the Earl of Dunbar, who was the King's old Servant, and the Cabinet of his Secret Counsels; so that he solely took them into his Charge, together with the Office of Lord High-Treasurer of Scotland, which Staff the other had left behind him: And tho' it could be no mighty Supporter, yet the Credit of it carry'd some Reputation into his own Country, where it was his Happiness to be extoll'd, as well as in England. Then further to aggrandise this young Favourite, the King created him Baron of Brandspech, and Viscount Rochester, and shortly after Knight of the Garter, together with his Son Charles Duke of York, and the Earl of Arundel. Thus was he drawn up by the Beams of Majesty, to shine with the greatest Splendor, often contesting with the Prince himself in his own Sphere. For the Prince, being of a high-born Spirit, and meeting with a young Competitor in his Father's Affections, of a short and sudden Growth, thought the Infection would increase too near him, and therefore he us'd all reasonable Means to stifle and suppress it: And this Contest was gradually blown up by some Sparks of Love, as well as Emulation, being both amorous, warm and youthful, and by Accident fixing their Thoughts upon one Object, contracted to a third Person, in which the Viscount gain'd the Superiority, but to his final Ruin.

He is a great Favourite.

A. D. 1612. Reg. 10.

In the mean Time, while Fortune thus smil'd upon the Viscount Rochester, it frown'd with as much Severity upon the Lord Sanquir, a Baron of the same Nation, and marry'd into a considerable Family in England. This Man too much valuing himself upon his unfortunate Skill in Fencing, undertook a Design to affront and disparage a Fencing-Master in his own School, whose Name was John Turner; but he apprehensive of his Design, press'd so rudely upon the Baron, that he push'd out one of his Eyes. The Baron being afterwards in the Court of France, where that King freely entertaining him in Discourse, ask'd him how he lost his Eye; and understanding it was done by a Sword, without knowing the Circumstances, he reply'd, Does the Man live that did it? The Question from the Mouth of a King blew up new Fires of Revenge in the Baron's Breast; and several Years after, coming into England, he hir'd two of his Countrymen, Gray and Carliste, to murther the Fencing-Master, which they did with a Case of Pistols at his own House in White-Friars. One of the Murtherers was apprehended upon the Borders of Scotland, the other in a Ship bound for Hamburgh; and the Lord Sanquir having absconded, and hearing that no less than a thousand Pounds was offer'd for his Head, he resign'd himself to the King's Mercy, by the Mediation of Dr. Abbot, now Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, to whom he presented himself as an Object of Commiseration. But no Intercession could prevail, and their Lives satisfy'd the Law, without allowing the Baron the Death of a Nobleman, who in a very penitent Manner suffer'd before the Gate of Westminsterhall.

The Case of the Lord Sanquir.

His Execution.

Still the juvenile Favourite Rochester maintain'd his Ground against all Opposers; and among his chief Friends Sir Thomas Overbury was the Creature he most particularly honour'd with his Familiarity. This begot an Emulation between the two great Earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, who should ingross him; each presenting, proffering, and accumulating Favours upon Overbury's Relations. His Father was accordingly made a Judge in Wales, and he himself was offer'd a Place; but being naturally of a rough and insolent Temper, and swell'd with being the Confident of such a Favourite, whose Munificence could not be retail'd without him, he with a kind of Scorn neglected both their Friendships, and yet made use of them when he had Occasion. Before that Time the politick Minister, the Earl of Salisbury, had made an Alliance with the House of Suffolk, by marrying his eldest Son, the Lord Cranborn, to Catharine the eldest Daughter of that Family; and that Resentments might not become Hereditary, he was a great Instrument in marrying the young Earl of Essex to the Lady Frances Howard, another of those Sisters. The Earl of Essex was then but fourteen

fourteen Years of Age, and the Lady thirteen when they were marry'd; and therefore he was ſent to Travel in Foreign Countries 'till Time might capacitate their Co-Habitation. The Lady in the mean Time was kept by her Mother, and educated in all the inchanting Pleaſures of the Court; and being a celebrated Beauty, every Tongue became an Orator at her Shrine; and the Prince himſelf ſent out many amorous Glances as the Ambaſſadors of his Inclinations. But the victorious Lady more favouring the increaſing Fortunes of the Viſcount Rocheſter, the moſt zealous of her Adorers, the Prince ſlighted her, as tho' he had offer'd his Addreſſes more to diſtract the other's Amours, than to purſue his own Deſires. Upon the Return of the Earl of Eſſex, the Counteſs, who was actuated by the moſt violent Reſolutions of Enjoyment, had a double Task to undergo; firſt to hinder her Husband from carnal Knowledge of her, and then to ſecure the Viſcount's Affections; for unlawful Love always produces the greateſt Jealouſies and Confuſions. In order to effect her impious Deſigns, ſhe had recourſe to infernal Arts, and conſulted one Mrs. Turner, a Doctor of Phyſick's Widow, whom Prodigality had reduc'd to Poverty, and render'd her fit for any Miſchief; and ſhe introduc'd into their Conſultation one Forman an Aſtrologer, and a reputed Magician, who ſupply'd the Lady with Charms, Spells and philtrous Potions, both to debilitate the Ardour of the Husband, and to inflame the Paſſion of the Gallant. Theſe Things being manag'd and adminiſter'd according to unknown Arts, they gave this uneaſie Woman Aſſurances of extraordinary Effects. Her amorous Invitations that drew the Viſcount to admire her, were imputed to the Operation of thoſe Drugs he had taſted; and the very unnatural Comportment ſhe expreſs'd to her Husband, was concluded by her to be the Effects of thoſe wonderful Potions and Powders adminiſter'd to him: So ready is the Imagination to take Impreſſion of thoſe Things we are willing to believe.

The unhappy Marriage of the Earl of Eſſex.

The Wicked Deſigns of his Counteſs.

The innocent Earl being made ſenſible of his own Misfortunes, complain'd to her Father, in hopes of Relief; and through his Importunities and Threatnings, ſhe was perſuaded to retire into the Country to Chartley with her Huſband; where her Diſappointments ſo enrag'd her Spleen, that ſhe would ſcarce afford common Civility to him, and brought her ſelf to a continu'd Melancholy and Sullenneſs. At length ſhe wrote to her wicked Correſpondents Forman and Mrs. Turner, That ſhe ſaw little Effect produc'd by all the Potions ſhe had given her Husband, for he ſeem'd more eager after her than ever, and ſhe was ſenſible that the Viſcount would never love her, if he knew her Huſband enjoy'd her, whom with Difficulty ſhe had put off; but how long ſhe ſhould be able to reſiſt his Violence ſhe knew not; and therefore unleſs they deſign'd to ſee her the moſt miſerable Creature in the World, they ſhould ſpeedily aſſiſt her, and for their Reward they ſhould make their own Propoſals. And now all the abominable Tricks that could ariſe from Sorcery and Female Averſion being imploy'd to debilitate the Earl, he at length ſuffer'd her to ſteer her own Courſe; and the next Winter came up with her to London, where ſhe us'd all the Ornaments that Art and Nature could invent, to inflame the Viſcount's Affections; and her Abſence increaſing his Paſſion, they had many repeated Meetings. Several Perſons qualify'd for ſuch kind of Offices were imploy'd; and when Nature was infeebled and exhauſted, new Spirits were purchas'd at the moſt extravagant Rates to rekindle their unlawful Fires. Thus the Viſcount triumph'd in his Conqueſts, but as to the Heighth of the King's Favours, the great Saliſbury was ſtill an Obſtacle in his Way, ſo that he could not arrive to that Pitch of Grandeur in his Time, that he afterwards obtain'd. One Thing among the reſt, in which he defeated or diſappointed him, was in Moderating the King's Bounty to him on this Occaſion: The King had given to Rocheſter five thouſand Pounds, which this Treaſurer thought too extravagant a Preſent, where there was ſo little Merit, therefore he laid the Mony in Silver upon Tables in his Gallery at Salisbury Houſe; and having invited the King to Dinner, he made made this Room the Paſſage to his Entertainment. The King ſurpriz'd at the Sight of theſe great Heaps of Mony, ask'd for what purpoſe it was aſſign'd; to whom the Earl reply'd, That he had Orders from his Majeſty to give ſo much to the Viſcount Rocheſter. The King, who either carelelly thought five thouſand Pounds was no more than the Name of ſo much in Scotland, or ſubtlely finding the Treaſurer's Meaning, ſaid, It was too much for one Man, and made him be contented with leſs than half of the Sum. But the King was generally profuſe to his Favourites; particularly one Day being in his Gallery at Whitehall, with only Sir Henry Rich a young ingenious Knight, and James Maxwell, one of his Bed-Chamber; ſome Porters paſs'd by with three thouſand Pounds going to the Privy-Purſe: Sir Henry whiſpering Maxwell, the King ask'd what he ſaid; and being told he wiſh'd for ſuch a Sum, he immediately order'd the Porters to carry it to his Lodgings, with this Expreſſion, You think you have a great Reward; but I am more delighted in giving you the Mony, than you in receiving it.

The King's Profuſeneſs.

The Body of the Queen of the Scots remov'd to Weſtminſter.

And now the King caſt his Thoughts towards Peterborough, where the Body of his unfortunate Mother lay, which he caus'd to be tranſlated to a Magnificent Tomb at Weſtminſter; where many ſolemn Ceremonies were perform'd, to pay the laſt Tribute to her Memory. About the ſame Time the King, in ſpecial Favour for the preſent Plantation of Engliſh Colonies in Virginia, granted a Lottery to be held at the Weſt-End of St. Paul's; of which one Thomas Sharplys, a Tailor of London, had the chief Prize, amounting to four thouſand Crowns in fair Plate. This Year was alſo obſervable for the Arrival of Sir Robert Sherley, third Son to Sir Thomas Sherley of Suſſex, who for ſixteen Years had betaken himſelf to Travel, and had ſerv'd ſeveral Chriſtian Princes for the Space of five Years, but chiefly Rodolphus the Emperor, who for his Services made him an Earl of the Empire. He afterwards travell'd into Perſia, and ſerv'd that Emperor ten Years, who made him General of the Artillery, and had ſo great an Eſteem for his Perſon, that he gave him the Lady Tereſia in Marriage, whoſe Siſter was one of the Queens of Perſia: After which, the Perſian imploy'd him to ſeveral Princes of Europe; and ſent him in a ſpecial Embaſſie to King James in England, to whom he deliver'd his Letters, and ſhew'd his Commiſſion; all which teſtify'd the Perſian's great Love and Affection to his Majeſty, with voluntary Offers of free Commerce to all his Subjects throughout the Perſian Dominions. After a Year's Stay in England, in which Time his Lady was deliver'd of a Son, to whom the Queen was God-Mother, and Prince Henry God-Father, he left the Child in this Kingdom, and then with his Lady took Shipping for Perſia.

Sir Robert Sherley's Travels.

The Arrival of Fredercik Prince Palatine.

It was in the tenth Year of King James's Reign, and the ſixteenth of October, when the illuſtrious Prince Frederick, Count Palatine of the Rhine, with whom a Treaty of Marriage had been made with the King's Daughter Elizabeth, arriv'd at Graveſend, to whom the Duke of Lenox and ſeveral other Lords were ſent by his Majeſty, who conducted him to Whitehall, and from thence into the great Banquetting-Houſe; where the King, the Queen, the Prince, and the Lady herſelf, entertain'd him after the moſt obliging Manner, and then by Barge conducted him to Eſſex Houſe, appointed for his Reception. It was many Years ſince any King's Daughter had been marry'd in England; which now occurring, and to ſo worthy a Prince, was a juſt Cauſe of Triumph and Rejoycing: But according to the frequent Changes of human Happineſs, Joy was no ſooner ſet forth, but was purſu'd by an unexpreſſible Sorrow; firſt by the Sickneſs, and then the Death of that great Delight and Hopes of the Nation, Prince Henry, who on the ſixth Day of November was ſnatch'd away at the Age of eighteen Years, eight Months, and ſeventeen Days. Several Paſſages are related of this excellent Prince that redound to his Honour; particularly once when he was Hunting the Stag, it happen'd that the Game was kill'd, and his Sport ſpoil'd by a Butcher's Dog; at which the Company endeavour'd vour'd to incenſe him againſt the Butcher, and told him, That if his Father had been thus interrupted, he would have ſworn ſo that no Man could have endur'd it: Away, reply'd the Prince, all the Diverſion in the World is not worth one Oath. At another Time, when the French Ambaſſador, upon taking his leave, ask'd him, What Service he would command him to his Maſter, the Prince bad him tell his Maſter What he was doing, being then toſſing a Pike. The World is always ready to attribute the Deaths of beloved Princes to unfair Practices, and it became the general Rumour of that Time, that the Prince was poiſon'd. We dare not determine that nice Matter, yet the Preſumptions ſeem too ſtrong to be bury'd in Silence; eſpecially if we conſider the violent Conteſts between him and Rocheſter, and the wicked Practices of that implacable Man. For the Prince being an open-hearted Man, and reſenting every Injury done to his Nation, had once declar'd, That if ever he was King, he would not leave one of that Family unpuniſh'd; and therefore he and the Howards could not think themſelves ſecure, 'till he had paid his Debt to Nature; and ſo the Manner of his Death was paſs'd over by a Certificate from ſome Court Phyſicians, 'That his Liver was paler than ordinary, his 'Gall without any Choler in it, his Spleen, Midriff and Lungs were very 'black, and his Stomach in no Part offended; as if no Poiſon could produce ſuch Effects. On the ſeventh of December he was ſolemnly carry'd on a Herſe to Weſtminſter, where the Pomp of his Funeral was fully compleated by the Tears and Lamentations of the People.

The Death of Prince Henry.

Cenſures upon it.

But all Tears were ſoon dry'd up at Court, where all Preparations were making for the Solemnities of a Chriſtmaſs, and a Marriage between the Prince Palatine and the excellent Lady Elizabeth. In order to the latter, on the ſeventh of February, the Prince was firſt inſtall'd Knight of the Garter at Windſor, together with the Deputy of Grave Maurice of Naſſaw. And on Shrove-Sunday, and St. Valentine's Day, the much deſir'd Marriage was ſolemniz'd after an extraordinary Manner in the Chappel at Whitehall. The beautiful Bride was publickly led by two Batchelors, her Brother Prince Charles, and the Earl of Northampton, Lord Privy-Seal; ſhe being glorioufly ardorn'd in White, having a reſplendent Crown of Gold upon her Head, her Hair diſhevel'd down her Back, nobly ſhining with Jewels like a Conſtellation, and her Train ſupported by twelve young Ladies, finely attir'd with all the Emblems of Innocence. The King himſelf gave her in Marriage, the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury perform'd the Office, and the Biſhop of Bath and Wells preach'd the Nuptial Sermon; during which Time, ſome peculiar Coruſcations and Lightnings of Joy appear'd in her Countenance, which ſome thought to be Preſages of her future Misfortunes. This Marriage was celebrated the firſt Night with a magnificent Maſque of the chief of the Nobility, both Lords and Ladies; the ſecond Night with another of the Gentlemen of the Middle-Temple and Lincolns-Inn; and the third Night with another as remarkable preſented by the Gentlemen of the Inner-Temple and Grays-Inn: And after this the Lord Mayor and Aldermen preſented the fair Bride with a Chain of Oriental Pearl, valu'd at two thouſand Pounds. Now when all Things had been perform'd for the Honour of this Marriage, which either Love and Obſervance could invent, or Art and Magnificence could effect, on the tenth of April the illuſtrious Couple took leave of the King and Queen at Rocheſter; and there taking Shipping, they arriv'd not long after at Fluſhing: From whence the Earl of Lenox, the Earl of Arundel, the Viſcount Liſle, and the Lord Harington waited upon them to their capital City of Heidelberg; being receiv'd in all Places as they paſs'd with great Pomp and State. On the fourteenth of June the Engliſh Lords return'd home; only the Lord Harington dy'd by the way at Worms; whoſe Corps was brought over, and interr'd in England. A Gentleman much lamented in his own Perſon, but much more in that of his admiral Son, whoſe Deceaſe ſhortly after put a Period to that noble Family.

About

The Earl of Salisbury's Death.

About the ſame Time dy'd that famous Stateſman, the Earl of Salisbury, and Lord Treaſurer of England; a Perſon of admirable Abilities, and one of whom Osborn confeſſes, That with all his Faults, he was a Man of incomparable Prudence, who coming ſo near ſuch an unadviſed Scatterer as King James, might have much more inrich'd his Family, had he not look'd upon low Things with Contempt; leaving much to the Gleaning of his Servants, of whom many were afterwards advanc'd. He further inſinuates, 'That this Earl was the 'firſt ill Treaſurer, and the laſt good one ſince Queen Elizabeth's Reign; the laſt Part of which Cenſure might naturally ariſe from the numerous and ſudden Changes in this high Office. For within this Reign, and the Compaſs of a very few Years, the Earl of Salisbury was ſucceeded by five ſeveral Treaſurers: Firſt, The Earl of Suffolk, who held the Office longeſt, and was diſcharg'd in a great Meaſure for the Miſmanagement of his Lady: Secondly, Sir Henry Montague, taken from the King's Bench, and made Earl of Manchester, and within leſs than a Year diſcharg'd: Thirdly, Sir Lyonel Cranfield, who was made Earl of Middleſex, and then not only thrown out, but alſo fin'd fifty thouſand Pounds: Fourthly, Sir James Lee, taken from the King's Bench, and made Earl of Marlborough, who thought fit to reſign his Place in a ſhort Time: And laſtly, Sir Richard Weſton, from Chancellor of the Exchequer was made Lord Treaſurer, and ſhortly after Earl of Portland.

The great Changes in the Treaſury.

Rocheſter's Greatneſs.

Upon the Death of the Earl of Salisbury, the aſpiring Rocheſter without Controul aſſum'd the whole Adminiſtration of the Government, executed the Place of Principal Secretary, receiv'd Pacquets and diſpatch'd Anſwers, without the Knowledge of the King or Council, and all done by the Privity, if not Aſſiſtance of his Confident Sir Thomas Overbury. But when that Gentleman underſtood that Rocheſter deſign'd to marry the Lady Eſſex, he dealt freely and honeſtly with him, declaring to him, That nothing could be more deſtructive to both their growing Hopes, than to lay a Foundation upon ſo much Injuſtice, as to marry another Man's Wife, while her Husband was living; and therefore paſſionately deſir'd him, To fix his Thoughts upon a more honourable Object, and not upon one, whoſe Diſloyalty to her Husband was branded with perpetual Infamy. This rough Advice found no Reception in the debauch'd Mind of the Viſcount, who being faſcinated with the Charms of his amorous Miſtreſs, did not only eſtrange himſelf from the Friendſhip of Overbury, but both denounc'd Enmity, and alſo excited the Fury of the Counteſs againſt him: And ſhe, fir'd with the moſt implacable Reſentments, muſtring up all the Paſſion and Envy that a Female Malice could invent, never left him 'till ſhe had diſcharg'd all the Vollies of her Rage upon him. She importun'd the Earl of Northampton her Uncle, to vindicate the Honour of their Family; and he joining with the Viſcount, they agreed to take away Overbury's Life by Poiſon; but that not being eaſie to be done in a publick Way, they contriv'd to exaſperate the King againſt him, and procure him to be impriſon'd, that they might with greater Privacy effect his Ruin. The King about this Time deſigning to ſend an Ambaſſador into Flanders to the Arch-Duke, the Viſcount treacherouſly recommended Sir Thomas Overbury to him for that Service; and dealing on both Sides he us'd all Methods to diſſuade him from undertaking the Imployment, as well knowing that his Refuſal would highly diſoblige the King. Overbury was not ſo little a Courtier, or ſo void of Reaſon, as not to ſee the Danger of diſobeying the King's Commands; therefore the Viſcount promis'd him both to molifie the King's Diſpleaſure, and to procure him better Preferment; while on the other Side he ſo aggravated his Offence in Refuſing his Obedience, and ſo incens'd the King, that the poor Gentleman was without Hearing ſent to the Tower for Contempt. Then to compleat his ſtrange Tragedy, Sir William Wade Lieutenant of the Tower was diſplac'd, and Sir Jervaſe Elways put into his Room.

Overbury checks him.

For which his Life is threatned.

He is thrown into the Tower.

This firſt Point being gain'd, the Counteſs, like another Alecto, drove on furiouſly with two Wheels, which ran over all Impediments; the one was to procure a Divorce between her and her Husband, that ſhe might marry the Viſcount; and the other was to remove Sir Thomas Overbury, who had laid ſuch a Stain upon her Honour, as nothing but his Blood could expiate. For theſe ſhe had ſeveral Inſtruments and Agents, particularly the Earl of Northampton, who reſenting his Niece's Grievances, acquainted the King with her Virgin Modeſty, how unwilling ſhe was to divulge her Husband's Infirmities, and how long ſhe had been marry'd without enjoying the Rights of a Wife; that the Earl's Inability muſt needs produce an unnatural Conjunction, ſuch as neither Law nor Reaſon could excuſe; and that there was an entire Affection between the Viſcount and her ſelf, which ought to be encourag'd, as more ſuitable to Equity and Nature. This was ſeconded by the Viſcount's humble Submiſſions to the King's great Wiſdom, who he acknowledg'd had not only rais'd him to his preſent Condition, but might yet make him more happy, by uniting him to a Lady of ſo much Honour and Virtue. The King, who abundantly delighted to compleat the Happineſs of thoſe he lov'd, immediately granted a Commiſſion under the Broad-Seal, to ſeveral Biſhops and others, to try the whole Cauſe, who accordingly made their Appearance. But before they proceeded any further, they empanell'd a Jury of twelve diſcreet Matrons to ſearch the Counteſs, whither ſhe was a Maid or not, as ſhe pretended to be in her written Allegations; for if that prov'd true, they might fix upon a Nullity, and ſo ſeparate them for the Honour of her Virginity. The Counteſs, under a Pretence of Modeſty and Shame to undergo ſuch an Examination, would not expoſe her Face to the Light, but procur'd leave of the Court to appear in a Veil before the Matrons; by which Means ſhe had an Opportunity to ſend in a young Girl in her Place, who in the Opinion of the Jury paſs'd for a real Virgin. Then Articles being drawn up in Form, the good Earl, willing to be freed from ſo horrid a Plague, confeſs'd that he had ſeveral Times attempted to enjoy her, but he never did, and believ'd he never ſhould. Upon theſe Grounds the Judges proceeded to a formal Sentence of Divorce and Separation, in ſuch Terms as are more fit to be tranſcrib'd by Perſons of any Profeſſion than my own. The ſcandalous Reports that had flown about concerning this Lady, caus'd ſome worthy Men to decline the Buſineſs, particularly the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury and Biſhop of London refus'd to appear, tho' they were nominated in the Commiſſion; and what is ſaid in Favour of the reſt of the Judges, is, That they might not know that another Female was impos'd upon the Jury inſtead of the Lady Eſſex.

They are parted by Law.

While one great Engine was working at Lambeth, the other had its Motion in the Tower, puſh'd forwards by the Lady Eſſex againſt the unfortunate Sir Thomas Overbury; and two of her Agents, Forman and Greſham being dead, ſhe rely'd wholly upon the Aſſiſtance of Mrs. Turner, who procur'd one Weſton, formerly her Husband's Servant, and not unskill'd in the Art of Poiſoning, to be the Inſtrument to effect their impious Purpoſes. The Lady alſo procur'd Sir Thomas Munſon to recommend him to Sir Jervaſe Elwayes, and he to Sir Thomas Overbury to be his Attendant; by whoſe Means, with the Aſſiſtance of one Franklin, and the Connivance of the Lieutenant, ſeveral Potions were adminiſter'd to conſume Nature inſenſibly. But theſe were not thought quick enough to ſatiate that Malice, that was as active as ſubtle; therefore ſtronger Ingredients were infus'd, and given him in his Broths, his Meats and his Tarts; and his very Salt was uſually mixt with White-Mercury. Thus was the poor abandon'd Gentleman daily rack'd and tortur'd with a horrid Diſtemper; but being young and of a ſtrong Conſtitution, was able to ſtruggle a long Time with theſe corroding Tormentors: But his Body being not always able to bear ſuch unnatural Preſſures, he fell extreamly ſick; and having no Friend that could or durſt viſit him, none to ſupplicate but the mercileſs Cauſers of his Miſery, sery, he without Knowledge of his Diſtemper, languiſh'd both in Body and Mind, after an unheard of Manner.

In the mean Time the Counteſs being freed from her Husband, triumph'd and ſhin'd above all the Court Ladies, and became admir'd by the King, as well as lov'd by Rocheſter; who to deſerve ſo valuable a Lady was now created Earl of Somerſet; and all the ſplendid Equipage, and magnificent Preparations, that could fill a Court with Delight, or the People with Wonder, were not wanting for the Marriage. On the twenty ſixth Day of December the new Earl and Counteſs were marry'd at Whitehall, in the Preſence of the King, Queen and Prince, and a great Confluence of the Biſhops and Temporal Nobility: The Biſhop of Bath and Wells marry'd them, and the Dean of Weſtminſter preach'd the Nuptial Sermon, and that Night was concluded with a glorious Maſque of Lords and Ladies; which a few Nights after was much exceeded by another of the Prince's Gentlemen, to the extraordinary Satisfaction of the King, who caus'd it to be acted a ſecond Time, upon the third Day of January. But Whitehall was too narrow to contain the Triumphs for this Marriage, which were extended into the City; for on the next Day, the happy Pair, accompany'd by the Duke of Lenox, the Lord Privy-Seal, the Lord Chamberlain, the Earls of Worceſter, Pembroke and Montgomery, with a numerous Train of Nobility and Gentry, were invited to a Feaſt in the City at Merchant-Taylor's-Hall; where the Lord Mayor and Aldermen entertain'd them with extraordinary Pomp and Formality, and after the Treat with a Waſſaile, two Maſques, a Play and a Ball; and after all the whole Company were invited to a magnificent Banquet, which continu'd 'till three in the Morning. Before theſe Pleaſures were well digeſted, upon Twelfth-Day, the Gentlemen of Grays-Inn invited the Bride and Bridegroom to a ſolemn Maſque; which concluded all the triumphal Gaities of this remarkable Marriage.

A. D. 1614. Reg. 12.

The Pomp of the Nuptials.

The Noiſe of theſe Rejoicings reſounding in the moſt ſecret Receſſes, brought the News to Sir Thomas Overbury, a poor Relief to a Man in Miſery, who was conſcious to himſelf, that all his Sufferings proceeded from his Oppoſition to what was now fully ſurmounted; ſo that in his dark Confinement he could not ſee the leaſt Glimmerings of Liberty, when he conſider'd the implacable Nature of the Woman. But yet preſuming upon the former Friendſhip between the Earl of Somerſet and himſelf, he wrote to him in the midſt of his Glory, to let him know his deplorable Condition, and how vaſtly his Health was impair'd, which he imputed to his Recluſeneſs and want of Air; humbly imploring his Aſſiſtance, that he might no longer languiſh under the Burden of his intolerable Infirmities. Somerſet not willing to have him exclaim, made Anſwer, That the King was now full of great Buſineſs; but he would take the firſt Opportunity to move him for his Relief, and make his great Indiſpoſition a Ground for the King's Mercy; including in the Letter a White Powder, which he deſir'd him to take; aſſuring him, That tho' it made him a little ſick at firſt, it would do him much good in the End. The poor abus'd Gentleman took his Powder, which having a poiſonous Quality, added to his Affliction; yet it was not ſtrong enough to compleat the Deſign. The Lieutenant of the Tower daily liſten'd to his Complaints with all the outward Marks of Commiſeration, but always declar'd what he ſaid to the Authors of his Calamities; ſo that his very Words were rack'd, as well as his Body tormented. Thus he continu'd in this diſmal Place above four Months, languiſhing under unheard of Pains; 'till his Enemies being more impatient that he endur'd ſo long, than that he ſuffer'd ſo much, they finiſh'd their Work by an impoiſon'd Glyſter compounded by Franklin, which in a few Days ended his miſerable Life. Here we may ſee the unhappy Fate, and precarious Fame of Princes govern'd by Minions and Favourites; and how many Ways the King's Name was us'd and abus'd in perpetating this execrable Fact: Firſt in procuring the King to ſend Sir Thomas on an Embaſſy into Flanders; Secondly in committing him to the Tower Overbury in great Diſtreſs.

His Death by Poiſon.

Tower for his Refusal; Thirdly in continuing a close Prisoner from all Relations and Servants, a Practice never known for a bare Contempt; and lastly in practising his Death, when he was under the King's immediate Protection.

The Earl of Northampton, who was a great Actor in this Tragical Event, inhumanly endeavour'd to kill him a second Time by ruining his Fame, and raising a Report, 'That he dy'd of the Pox, and had prodigious Sores and Ulcers in his Body, that produc'd such Putrefaction, that the People, unable to 'indure the noisome Smell, were forc'd to throw him in a loose Sheet into a 'Coffin, and bury him privately on Tower-Hill; concluding in a Letter to 'the Earl of Somerset, That God was gracious in cutting off evil Instruments 'before their Time; tho' he little imagin'd that he was then pronouncing his own Sentence and Doom. For he being one of the principal Ministers of State, and a Papist in Reality, tho' a Protestant by Profession, he did many Kindnesses to the Roman Catholicks contrary to Law; and a Letter of his being intercepted, that was directed to Cardinal Bellarmine, discover'd both his Religion and his Intentions: Which Things being first whisper'd, then urg'd against him, they touch'd him to the Heart; so that he suddenly retir'd, dispos'd of his Estate, and dy'd. He had a capacious Mind aiming at great Things, which he was the better able to effect by living a Batchelor to an old Age, being always attended with Gentlemen of Quality, to whom he was very bountiful. Leaving no Issue to propagate his Name, he built a noble House by Charing-Cross to continue it, by him call'd Suffolk-House, and since Northumberland-House. His contriving Overbury's Death was yet a Secret, and made no Noise against him; but when it broke out, Fame loaded his Memory with all the Blackness that Infamy and Odium could produce. The Earl of Northampton's Death.

Still the great Favourite, the Earl of Somerset, and his Business met with no Stop nor Interruption, 'till by Degrees he perceiv'd he must a little alter his Biass, or find some new Ways to bring in Mony; for the Revenues of the Crown were not sufficient to maintain such vast Expences, occasion'd by his Riot, tho' he had all the Earl of Westmorland's Lands at his Marriage and Creation added to his Earldom. Therefore a new Project was advanc'd and now effected, which the Earl of Salisbury had formerly promoted, upon the Occasion of new Colonies and Plantations to be establish'd at London-Derry and Colerain in Ireland, of which Alderman Cockain was the first Governor. In order to promote these and the like Improvements, King James instituted a new Order of Knights, call'd Baronets, which were to be Hereditary, and to take Place next to Barons younger Sons, and appointed certain Laws to make them capable of being admitted: First that they should maintain thirty Foot Soldiers in Ireland for three Years, at the Rate of eight Pence a Day; and to pay down a whole Year's Wages at the passing of their Patent, the whole amounting to a thousand Pound for their Honour: That they should be Gentlemen of Blood of Three Descents; and lastly should have Land of Inheritance in Possession, or immediate Reversion, to the Value of a thousand Pounds a Year. Then to keep the Order from swarming, it was limited to the Number of two hundred, and as the Issue should fail, the Order to cease; of these Sir Nicholas Bacon in the County of Suffolk was the first. Sir Richard Baker observes, That he who examines how well the Institution and the Order has been observ'd, will find it to be here as it was in the Order of St. Michael in France, into which at first none were admitted but Princes and eminent Persons, but afterwards all Sorts of Men without Distinction, which made it a Question, Whether the Dignity of the Order did more grace the Persons, or the Meanness of the Persons disgrace the Order; and when the Laws of an Institution are not in some Measure observ'd, it seems to make a Nullity in the Collation. The first Institution of Baronets.

Notwithstanding these, and other Projects of raising the Value of the Gold Coin, the King's Expences prov'd too large for his Incomes and Revenues; therefore after four Years Intermission, he resolv'd to have Recourse to a Parliament, The second Parliament in this Reign.

which was ſummon'd to meet on the fifth of April. There were ſeveral about the Court, preſuming to have Friends in every County and Borough, undertook to make Elections of ſuch Members for Knights and Burgeſſes, as ſhould ſolely comply with the King's Deſires; of whom Somerſet was the Head and Chief: But this prov'd a meer Embrio, and became abortive. For the Parliament meeting according to their Summons, when they were excited to give Mony, in Conſideration of the King's marrying his Daughter, and his unuſual Entertainments, with other Expences, they inſtead of contributing to the King's Wants, freely laid open his Waſtes, eſpecially thoſe made to the Scots, 'With whom they deſir'd a Shate of his Favour; alſo beſeeching his Majeſty to 'ſtem the Current of the future Acceſs of that Nation to his Preſence and 'Bounty. They likewiſe enquir'd into the Cauſes of the unexpected Encreaſe 'of Popiſh Recuſants ſince the Gun-Powder Plot, the Deteſtation of which, 'they thought, ſhould have utterly extinguiſh'd the whole Party; and this 'they found was owing to his Majeſty's Admiſſion of Popiſh Nobility into his 'Councils; his Silencing of many watchful and diligent Miniſters; the ſeve-'ral Treaties he had made, not only for the Marriage of the deceaſed Prince 'Henry, but for the preſent Prince Charles, with the Daughters of Popiſh 'Princes; all which diſheartned the Proteſtant, and incourag'd the Recuſant. Theſe, and other Miſcarriages in the Government being freely remonſtrated, the King, without receiving any Advantage, or paſſing any Act, put a ſtop to all, and diſſolv'd the Parliament on the ſeventh Day of June. After which he committed ſeveral of the moſt tumultuous Members of the Commons to the Tower and other Priſons, without Bail or Main-Prize. And laſtly he proceeded to the moſt uneaſie of all Aids in England, a Benevolence upon the Subject; where thoſe that did not give their Mony, were oblig'd to give their Names: So that what was in its Nature and Eſſence a free Gift, was judg'd in its Effect and Conſequence, a heavy Impoſition.

It is diſſolv'd.

The King of Denmark's ſecond Arrival in England.

In the ſame Year, and the Month of July, Chriſtian King of Denmark, out of a great Love to his Siſter and King James, came a ſecond Time into England; but being ſecure of himſelf, he travell'd privately, and with a ſmall Retinue, ſo that he unexpectedly enter'd Somerſet-Houſe, where the Queen reſided, before the Nation had any Knowledge of his Arrival. But King James being then in his Progreſs in Bedfordſhire, upon the News of it, immediately return'd back; and after he had entertain'd him fourteen Days with Hunting, Hawking, Running at the Ring, Bear-Baiting, Plays, Fire-Works, and Fencings, on the firſt of Auguſt, Prince Charles brought him aboard his Ship, where he took his laſt Leave and return'd home. Thus theſe two Kings met with a Happineſs, rare among Princes, of freely ſeeing and converſing with each other, without any Marks of Danger or Jealouſie.

A. D. 1615. Reg. 13.

VI. The King having now reign'd above twelve Years in England, by turning the Stream of his Bounty into particular Channels, gave more and more Occaſion to uneaſie People to ſhow their Diſguſts and Reſentments; for he had generally the Misfortune, incident to many Princes, to be too much govern'd by Favourites. The Earl of Somerſet, lately made Lord-Chamberlain, now like a mighty Coloſs ſtood the Fury of all the Tempeſts rais'd againſt him, making thoſe who carry'd the greateſt Sail to ſtrike and come under him; nor would he ſuffer any Place in Court, or Dignity in State, to be conferr'd on any, which was not ſweeten'd with his Smile that gave it, or their Bounty that enjoy'd it. This Pride and Avarice, join'd to his other Miſcarriages, caus'd ſuch a Number of Underminers, that he ſoon found he had but a tottering Foundation, with no other Support but the King's Favour, which by Providence and inferior Accidents was gradually remov'd; making a Way towards the Vengeance due to the Blood of Sir Thomas Overbury.

Wilſon. Baker. An. Camd Clarendo. &c.

For

For about this Time the King began to caſt his Eye upon a new and brighter Object; a young Gentleman nam'd George Villers, a younger Son to Sir George Villers of Brookesby in Leiceſterſhire by his ſecond Lady of the Family of the Beaumonts. This promiſing Youth being left by his Father with a ſmall Fortune, his Mother took an extraordinary Care in his Education; and having a beautiful Perſon and a graceful Deportment, to compleat his Accompliſhments ſhe ſent him into France, where he ſpent two or three Years in attaining the Language, and perfecting himſelf in the Exerciſes of Riding and Dancing, which laſt was his Maſter-piece: And thus taught and qualify'd, and glorioufly attir'd, at the Age of twenty one Years, he made his Appearance in the Court of England, after he had been well acquainted with the Nature and Cuſtoms of that of France. The Lord Clarendon obſerves, that King James, of all Wiſe Men living, was the moſt delighted and taken with handſom Perſons and fine Cloaths; ſo that he was ſoon captivated with this pleaſing Object, firſt affording him his Smiles, and making him his Cup-Bearer, and then bringing him nearer by ſeveral Steps, leſt he ſhould too much expoſe him to the Malice of a jealous Competitor. The Courtiers ſoon perceiving the King's Inclinations, began to adore this Riſing Star, and the more becauſe they hated Somerſet, and knew that the Riſe of one Favourite would be the Ruin of the other; for which Reaſon alſo, the Queen her ſelf, tho' ſhe expreſs'd great Fears of Villers's future Power, conſented to join in his Advancement, to Suppreſs the exorbitant Authority of the other. He was Cup-Bearer but a few Weeks before he mounted higher, and being Knighted, without any other Qualification he was made Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, and then Knight of the Order of the Garter; and in a ſhort Time, conſidering the Vaſtneſs of the Aſcent, he was made a Baron, a Viſcount, an Earl, and a Marqueſs, and became Lord High-Admiral of England, Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, Maſter of the Horſe, and entirely diſpos'd of all the Favours of the King, in conferring all the Honours and Offices of three Kingdoms without a Rival.

The Riſe of George Villers.

His Greatneſs.

The Beginnings of theſe accumulated Graces became very formidable to the Earl of Somerſet, who as he began to decline, became more ſenſible of the Terrors ariſing from the innocent Blood of Overbury; therefore was as active to preſerve himſelf, as his Enemies were to ruin him. Tho' nothing at preſent was laid to his Charge but the imbezelling ſome of the King's Jewels, yet finding himſelf in a tottering Condition, he threw himſelf at the King's Feet, acknowledging The great Truſt his Majeſty had repos'd in him, and the mighty publick Weight lying upon him, which through Youth and Ignorance might make him ſlip into ſome Miſcarriages; therefore he humbly beſought his Majeſty to grant him a general Pardon for what was paſs'd, that he might not be expos'd to the Malice of thoſe who would make the worſt Interpretation of all his Actions. The King who had rais'd this fair Edifice, being unwilling to have it quite deſtroy'd, gave Order for the drawing up a general Pardon, in ſo ample and full a Manner, that it might rather exceed than take riſe from any former Precedent; which was immediately ſent to the Broad-Seal. But the Queen having Intelligence of this, and uſing her Power with the Lord-Chancellor Egerton, put a ſtop to the Seal 'till the King ſhould come to Town, who was then on his Progreſs in the Weſt. And now what had been privately murmur'd in Corners openly reſounded in the Streets; for the Apothecary's Boy that gave Overbury the Cliſter, falling ſick at Fluſhing, reveal'd the whole Practice, of which Sir Ralph Wenwood, Secretary of State, gave a full Relation by his Correſpondent; and a ſmall Breach being thus made, the Earl had Enemies enough to ruſh in and overwhelm him. The King being inform'd of theſe Tranſactions, and ſtruck with Horror at the Relation, he ſent for the Judges, and gave them ſtrict Charge to examine the Matter with the utmoſt Severity, making Imprecations againſt them and their Families if they did not endeavour to diſcover it; and if he ſpar'd any that was guilty, he wiſh'd God's Somerſet declines.

Curse might light upon him and his Posterity; so Zealous the King appear'd in the Prosecution of this black Affair. Upon this he repair'd to Royston, and took Somerset along with him, whose Ears were now continually tormented with fresh Reports and Discoveries; but he still thought himself too firm in the King's Favour to be remov'd. Therefore when the Lord Chief-Justice Cook sent for him, he went to the King with an open Complaint, reputing it an extraordinary Presumption; but the King made Answer, Then must go then, for if Cook sends for me I must go too. Others say that when he came to take his Leave of the King, his Majesty embrac'd and kiss'd him often, urging him to hasten his Return, and showing an extream Concern to be without his Company, but as soon as he was gone, said with a Smile, I shall never see thy Face again. However it was, his Countess was apprehended before his Arrival at London, and committed to Custody in Black-Friars; and as soon as he came he was seiz'd, and committed to the Charge of Dr. Mountain, Dean of Westminster; and then they proceeded without Interruption, try'd, convicted, and condemn'd all the Offenders.

He and his Countess are imprison'd for Overbury's Murther.

Weston was the first Man examin'd and try'd, who stood very stiff and obstinate, 'till the Bishop of London on one side, and the Lord Cook on the other, so effectually manag'd him, that he laid open the whole Conspiracy; and being at the Gallows allur'd with Promises to deny his former Confession, his Mind being prepar'd for Death, he resisted the Temptation, and penitentially seal'd the Truth of it with his last Breath; and Hollis, Wentworth, and Lumsden, who had violently urg'd him to pervert Justice, were afterwards fin'd and imprison'd. Mrs. Turner follow'd next, a notorious Example of Pride and Lasciviousness, who now became sensible of the Follies and Impieties of her past Life. Sir Jervaes Ellways, Lieutenant of the Tower, was the third who suffer'd on Tower-Hill, and was pity'd more than the rest, being seduc'd by the Earl of Northampton to be a Spectator, rather than an Actor in this bloody Tragedy; which Connivance was too Criminal to be vindicated. At his Death he left two useful Sentences for human Instruction: The first, Not to vow any thing to God, but to perform it; the second, Not to take too great Delight in a Pen; for one began, and the other perfected his Ruin. The fourth that fell by the Hand of Justice was Franklin, a Man whose sordid Behaviour at his Death agreeing with his pernicious Life, his Memory deserves no further Notice.

The Condemnation of the rest of the Offenders.

A. D. 1616. Reg. 14.

After the Execution of these inferior Criminals, the primary Murtherers, the Earl of Somerset and his Countess, were solemnly arraign'd before their Peers; where all the scandalous Letters between the Lady and Forman were read in open Court, and the Wax and Brazen-Poppets were publickly expos'd, to display the Folly, as well as the Malignity of her Actions. But the Earl and her self being both condemn'd to die, found the King's Mercy, notwithstanding his former Imprecation, and after some Time of Imprisonment in the Tower were set at Liberty, and liv'd in private and obscure Condition: Manifesting, That no Content or Happiness can be truly establish'd, but on the solid Foundation of Justice. For that Love that caus'd them to break through all Reason and Opposition, either on her Side declining towards some new Object, as was commonly reported; or on his inclining to Reluctancy towards the old, became at length so languid, that it quite pin'd away, and they liv'd long after in the same House as Strangers to each other. Her Death happen'd first, having all reasonable Marks of the Vengeance of Heaven, being accompany'd with such loathsom and prodigeous Circumstances, as are not fit to be mention'd, only that they were directly opposite to all the fatal Charms of her former Beauty that ever could produce Love or Desire. The Earl's Death was obscure, without Fame, and without Posterity; of whom we shall say no more, but that he had several commendable Qualities, and publick Affections, 'till they were all swallow'd up in this Gulf of Beauty, which plung'd him into Somerset and his Lady condemn'd and pardon'd.

Their Exits.

theſe dangerous Contrivances. Sir Thomas Monſon, another of the Counteſſes Agents, had paſs'd one Day's Trial at Guildhall; but the Lord Chief-Juſtice Cook, in his Rhetorical Flouriſhes at his Arraignment, dropp'd ſome Expreſſions, as if he could diſcover more than the Death of a private Perſon; intimating, tho' remotely, That Overbury's untimely Death had ſome thing in it of Divine Retaliation, as if he had been guilty of the ſame Crime againſt Prince Henry; bleſſing himſelf with Admiration at the Horror of ſuch Actions. In which he flew to ſo high a Strain, that he was taken down by a Court Lure, Sir Thomas Monſon's Trial laid aſide, and he ſoon after ſet at Liberty, and the Judge was humbled ever after. This ſudden ſtopping of Monſon's Trial, fill'd Mens Minds with ſtrange Imaginations; and the Lady Arabella dying about this Time in the Tower rais'd new Apprehenſions and Suſpicions, that ſhe dy'd no natural Death; ſo naturally does one evil Action introduce the Belief of another. The Lady was Daughter to Charles Stuart, younger Brother to the Father of King James by Elizabeth Cavendiſh, who privately marry'd to Sir William Seymour, Son to the Lord Beauchamp, and Grandſon to the Earl of Hartford: So that both were at ſome Diſtance ally'd to the Crown; which caus'd all her Trouble and Confinement, ſo dangerous is every Appearance that borders upon Soveraign Titles.

The Lady Arabella's Death.

During the ſeveral Trials of Overbury's Murtherers, ſome publick Acts were perform'd of another Nature; particularly a memorable one was compleated by Mr. Hugh Middleton, a Citizen and Gold-Smith in London, who having an Act of Parliament for his Warrant, with infinite Expence, and indefatigable Labour, brought Water to the City of London from the two great Springs of Chadwell an Amwell in Hartfordſhire; having cut a Channel from thence to a Place near Iſlington, whither he convey'd it to a large Pond, and from thence in Pipes of young Elms to all Places of the City. As this was a great Conveniency to the City, ſo another Act was perform'd which added much to the Pleaſure of the Place: For on the North-Side of London, a Place call'd Moorfields, inviron'd with deep ſtinking Ditches, and noiſom Common-ſhoars, was now not only made fair and ſweet, but ſo levell'd into Walks, and ſet with Trees, that it became the pleaſanteſt Place in all the City. On the following Year another thing was done for the Benefit and Beauty of the City; for Smithfield, which was before a rude and miry Place, was now pav'd all over, and ſtrong Rails ſeparating the middle Part of it, were ſet up to make it a fair Walking-Place, and fit for Markets, or any other publick Uſe.

Several Conveniences added to the City.

VII. In theſe peaceable Times, the Temples of Janus being ſhut, all warlike Habiliments were turn'd into Masking-Attire, Halcyon Days ſhin'd round the Iſle, and the Influence of the King's pacifick Mind had almoſt an univerſal Operation. Spain's Ambition was content to be bounded with the Pyrenean Hills and the Atlantick Ocean, reaping the Fruits of Italy and Sicily, hoarding the Treaſures of the Indies, and willingly ſinging a Requiem to the Netherlands. France wanting ſufficient Exerciſe, began to ſurfeit with Diſeaſes at home, which by Fits broke out into Tumours among themſelves: And the Germans were ſwell'd into a Dropſie of Voluptuouſneſs, by a continu'd Plenty, and the Delights of Peace. In theſe Times of Reſt, the grand Care and Concern of the King of England was for his only Son Charles, now about ſeventeen Years of Age, whom this Year he ſolemnly made Prince of Wales, with a Creation of twenty five Knights of the Bath, and a publick Tournament of forty Gentlemen of the Inns of Court. But the principal Part of his Care was how to find a proper Match for him, about which he was ſo earneſt and intent, that for moſt of the latter Part of his Reign, it over-rul'd all his Counſels, and had a mighty Influence upon the whole State of Chriſtendom. His Intentions were ever Zealous for the Honour and Height of Royal Majeſty, and his Deſire was to match him with one of the higheſt Rank; tho' of a different Religion.

A. D. 1616. Reg. 14.

The King's Son Charles made Prince of Wales.

There-

Therefore his Thoughts were ſo long and earneſtly fix'd upon Spain, that it gave that King great Advantages over him and his Creatures. There had been a Treaty of Marriage between the late Prince Henry and a Daughter of Spain, which on the Spaniard's Part was found to be a meer Compliment, carry'd on with the accuſtomed Gravity and Formality of that Nation. For the wiſe Earl of Salisbury purſu'd and drove the Matter to that Point, that the Duke of Lerma, wanting further Evaſions, diſclaim'd the very Being of a Marriage-Treaty. Nevertheleſs, the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, to acquit himſelf to England, and vindicate his Honeſty, openly produc'd his Commiſſion, together with Letters of Inſtruction from the Duke's own Hand: Which manner of Dealing might have been a ſufficient Cauſe of Indignation againſt any future Motions of this Nature.

His Father's Deſigns for his Marriage.

Therefore after the Death of Prince Henry, King James turn'd his Thoughts upon a Daughter of Henry the Fourth, late King of France, as the moſt proper Match for his Son Charles; and by Sir Thomas Edmonds, his Legier Ambaſſador, endeavour'd to know the Mind of that Court; but could not diſcern their Affections, being not very willing to diſcover his own. At length, in this Year 1616, he took an Occaſion to ſend the Lord Hayes extraordinary Ambaſſador to the French King, with unuſual Pomp and Magnificence, to Congratulate his Marriage with Anne the Infanta of Spain; and at that Time reſolv'd to make a full and compleat Trial. The Subject Matter was declar'd, and in Appearance well approv'd, but ſtill had no Succeſs; for the Duke of Savoy had engag'd King Lewis, and prevail'd for his Son the Prince of Piedmont. In the very Time of this Negotiation in France, the Duke of Lerma frequently intimated to Sir John Digby, Ambaſſador in Spain, 'An extraordina-'ry Deſire in the King his Maſter, not only to maintain Amity with the King of 'Great Britain, but to join in all Methods that might be offer'd for the nearer 'Uniting of their Majeſties, and their Crowns; as alſo a Diſpoſition in this 'regard, to marry his ſecond Daughter to the Prince of Wales. The Ambaſſador, remembring the laſt Defeat, was extraordinary cautious how he gave Ear to the Spaniard's Propoſals; but after many Debates, innumerable Scruples rais'd, and Difficulties urg'd, the Matter was brought to this Iſſue, 'That the 'ſeveral Difficulties ſhould be digeſted into certain Heads, and ſelect Perſons be 'appointed for a Conference, but with this Proviſo, That the Kings on either 'ſide ſhould not be intereſted, nor their Names us'd, 'till by clearing of Par-'ticulars there ſhould be great Appearances that the Marriage would take 'effect. Upon a Review of theſe Proceedings, Digby adviſ'd King James, 'Not to ſuffer his other Reſolutions to be interrupted by this Overture, which 'might be made purely to divert the Match with France, and to keep his Ma-'jeſty from declaring himſelf againſt Spain, in the Affairs of Cleves and Juli-'ers, ſtill undermin'd; nevertheleſs, he might be pleas'd for a while to ſu-'ſpend the French Treaty, and to entertain this Motion; to which End he deſir'd 'from him, only ſome private Inſtructions for his Direction and Warrant. Theſe remote Conferences made Way for that tedious ſolemn Treaty of ſeveral Years Continuance, in which the Advantage was apparent on the Spaniard's ſide, who was indeed very formal and ſpecious in it, but no ways warm and vigorous, if in any Degree real. But King James having a violent Inclination that way, when he was once induc'd and elevated with Hopes, was ſo fix'd upon it, that he would grant all Things poſſible rather than break it, and was impatient in diſſembling his own Eagerneſs. This Affair was chiefly manag'd by the famous Gondomar, a Man exquiſitely form'd for the Purpoſe, who by his facetious Ways had highly captivated the King's Affections.

The Management with Spain.

The King now endeavour'd to move all Impediments that lay in the Way to his darling Deſign, and ſtudy'd all Methods to render himſelf acceptable to Spain. The Walls of Great Britain, the Engliſh Fleet, once the ſtrongeſt of all Europe, now lay uſeleſs in the Road, diſarm'd and in a ruinous Condition; while Gon- domar, as we are told, alledg'd to King James, that the refitting and furniſhing of it would raiſe Suſpicion in the King his Maſter, and avert his Mind from the deſign'd Alliance. Moreover the King reſolv'd to ſurrender the three Towns of Fluſhing, Ramekins and Brill, which were held by Way of Caution from the United Provinces 'till vaſt Sums were repaid, and which were the Keys of the Netherlands, and open'd the Paſſages in and out of the Maes, the Rhine, and the Scheld. For a Sum not amounting to the tenth Part of the Debt, due at this Time from Holland to England, he freed himſelf from thoſe Places, to prevent Requeſts and Propoſitions from the King of Spain, who claim'd the Propriety of them; and Gondomar puſh'd hard to obtain them, as knowing the great Advantage of their Situation. Such was the King's Care and Contrivance to keep Faith with the Confederate States, and not diſoblige Spain; and to make this appear a politick Action, it was alledg'd, That the vaſt Expence in keeping thoſe Forts, was as conſiderable as the Advantages of Poſſeſſion. However the States were certainly great Gainers, and all the Power of the Engliſh Intereſt in their Country was by this Means weakned, and brought to a Period; and the Alienation between King James and theſe Provinces, which appear'd of late, and was nouriſh'd by Bernvelt a Pentioner of Spain, was now increas'd, by the Obſervation and Diſcovery of his Compliances with Spain.

The King delivers the Cautionary Towns to Holland.

His Intereſt loſt in thoſe Parts.

Before theſe Tranſactions, ſeveral Alterations were made in the Miniſtry, beginning with a Breach between the Lord Chief-Juſtice Cook, and the Lord Chancellor Egerton, which made a Paſſage to both their Declenſions. Sir Edward Cook was diſcharg'd from his Place, and within two Days Sir Henry Montague, the King's Serjeant at Law, was plac'd in his Room. The Perſon remov'd was a Man of excellent Parts, and an extraordinary Lawyer, but Paſſion and Pride was too predominant in him; yet being turn'd out chiefly by Villers, he might have been reſtor'd, if he would have given a Gratuity; but he honourably anſwer'd, A Judge ought not to receive, or give a Bribe. About the ſame Time, the Lord Chancellor, weary with the Imployment and weakned with Age, deſir'd the King's Permiſſion to retire; upon which the Seal and Place was given to the famous Sir Francis Bacon, the Attorney-General; and the Lord Egerton, or rather Elleſmer, wore out the Remainder of his Life in Quiet, dying in a good old Age full of Honour and Fame, proving the Fountain of a noble Poſterity, who were afterwards advanc'd to the Earldom of Bridgewater. Time and Age had alſo worn out Sir Ralph Winwood, the King's able and faithful Secretary, who dying, Sir Robert Naunton, and Sir George Calvert, were made Secretaries; Men of contrary Religions and Parties, but join'd by the King, like contrary Elements, to find a Medium between them. But the greateſt Remove was the Earl of Suffolk, the Lord Treaſurer, who began to ſink upon Somerſet's Fall; and now both his and his Wife's Extortions and Briberies being laid open, he not only loſt his Place, which was given to Sir Henry Montague, but was alſo fin'd thirty thouſand Pounds. About the ſame Time, Sir John Bennet, Judge of the Prerogative Court, being charg'd by his own Servant with Bribery, he was turn'd out of his Place, and cenſur'd in the Star-Chamber to pay twenty thouſand Pounds; being ſucceeded by William Byrde, a Man of greater Integrity. Alſo Sir Henry Yelverton, the King's Attorney, for ſecretly adding new Privileges to the Charter of London, was remov'd in Diſpleaſure, and Sir Thomas Coventry put in his Room; tho' afterwards Yelverton, for his great Undertakings in the Law, was made a puiſny Judge of the Common-Pleas.

A. D. 1617. Reg. 15.

As there were frequent Varieties in Matters of State, ſo great Waverings were now diſcover'd in Mens Minds in Points of Religion; ſome went over from the Church of England to the See of Rome, and others came from Rome into the Engliſh Church. Among the reſt, one of eminent Note, M. Antonius de Dominis, Arch-Biſhop of Spalato, a Man tho' old, corpulent and unfit for for Travel, came into England. Here he both preach'd and wrote againſt the Church of Rome; and extoll'd the Proteſtant Religion, 'till he came to be made Dean of Windſor, and Maſter of the Savoy, which he enjoy'd ſome Years: And then, whether out of an Humour of Change, or in Expectation of greater Preferment at home, he return'd to Rome, where he renounc'd and reproach'd the Proteſtant Religion: But all he could do to ſatisfie that Court had no Effect, for the Inquiſition laid hold upon him, he dy'd in Priſon, and after his Death they burnt his Body for a Heretick. We are aſſur'd that to this Man the World has been oblig'd for that noble Hiſtory of The Council of Trent; for by his Means and the Meaſures he had concerted with the famous Father Paul, before he left Italy, Arch-Biſhop Abbot got the Manuſcript tranſmitted by Parcels into England.

The King's Journey to Scotland.

It was now above fourteen Years ſince the King had ſeen his native Country Scotland, whereupon he reſolv'd to take a Progreſs thither, beginning his Journey in the Spring, and warming the Country as he went with the Glories of the Court. In his ſlow Paſſage, the Days were generally ſhorten'd with the Diverſions of Hawking, Hunting, and Horſe-Racing, and the Nights extended by the Entertainments of Feaſting, Masking and Dancing. And the King had proper Inſtruments for theſe Sports about his Perſon, as Sir George Goring, Sir Edward Zouch, Sir John Fennit, and others, who knew exactly how to pleaſe his Majeſty with their Witticiſms, their Diſguiſes and Maskarades; but chiefly his great Favourite Villers, who being an excellent Dancer, brought that Paſtime into the higheſt Requeſt. Upon this Man he had ſhower'd many Titles and Preferments, one of which was Earl of Buckingham, who now reign'd ſole Monarch in the King's Affections; his Majeſty could not be well without him, and the Nobility could not be happy but by his Means, ſo that all Addreſſes were made to him for every Place or Office, in the Court or Country. In the Diſpoſal of which, the Lord Clarendon ſays he was guided more by the Rules of Appetite than of Judgement, exalting almoſt all his own numerous Family, and Dependants, whoſe greateſt Merit was their Alliance to him; which equally offended the ancient Nobility and the People, who daily ſaw the Flowers of the Crown fading and wither'd, and the Demeaſns and Revenues ſacrific'd to enrich a private Family, ſcarce known to the Nation, and the Expences of the Court ſo vaſt and unlimited, that they had a ſad Proſpect of that Poverty and Neceſſity, which afterwards fell on the Crown, almoſt to the Ruin of it. The King enter'd Scotland in the beginning of May, where he ſtay'd about three Months, took ſeveral Progreſſes, receiv'd many Entertainments, and made ſeveral Eſtabliſhments, and return'd into England in the Month of Auguſt.

Buckingham's Greatneſs.

The King's Return.

The Book of Sports publiſh'd.

The King being a great Lover of Sports and Recreations, this Year put out a Book, that gave Tolleration for the uſe of all common Paſtimes after Evening Prayers on Sundays; which was call'd The Book of Sports, and all Miniſters were enjoin'd to read it to their Pariſhioners in the Churches, and thoſe who refus'd were ſummon'd into the High-Commiſſion Court, impriſon'd and ſuſpended; all which gave great Offence to many pious and conſcientious Perſons, and was one Cauſe of the many Miſchiefs in the ſucceeding Reign. This new Encroachment upon the Sabbath gave both King and People more Liberty to prophane the Day with Authority; tho' the Arch-Biſhop, and ſeveral of the Biſhops, took the Liberty to declare againſt ſuch Practices. And as Prophaneneſs crept in on one Side, ſo Superſtition increas'd on the other, by the means of new Swarms of Romiſh Prieſts, who now dealt much in pretended miraculous Operations. One Company of them repair'd to Staffordſhire, among the Family of the Giffords in that Country, Gentlemen of plentiful Eſtates, where they practis'd their ſubtle Artifices to ſeduce the People. Among which there was a notorious Inſtance of the Boy of Bilſon, who pretended to be bewitch'd and poſſeſs'd by the Devil, proving one of the greateſt Impoſtures of the the Age. After he had plaid many ſtrange and deluding Tricks, and caus'd a poor Woman to be condemn'd for a Witch at the Aſſizes, the Cheat was by much Time and Diligence detected by Dr. Morton Biſhop of the Dioceſe, who happily preſerv'd an innocent Woman, diſplay'd the Roman Forgeries, and converted a wicked Boy, who afterwards prov'd a good Man; as the whole Story may be ſeen at large in Wilſon.

About this Time the Fate of the famous Sir Walter Raleigh began to operate after a peculiar Manner; of whom Prince Henry was wont to ſay, That no King but his Father would have kept ſuch a Man in a Cage. He had been almoſt two Years releas'd out of the Tower, where he had been a Priſoner twelve Years, during which he compil'd his incomparable Hiſtory of the World, a Deſign and Performance ſo great, that no other Man of leſs Parts and Abilities could have accompliſh'd. Being now enlarg'd, and deſirous of Action and a full Liberty, he propos'd to the King to undertake a Voyage to America, upon a particular Aſſurance from one Captain Kemiſh of gaining a Mine of Gold in Guiana, a Country which he had formerly known. The King knowing him to be a Man of Skill and Bravery, gave him Liberty, and a Commiſſion under the great Seal of England to ſet out Men and Ships for that Service; but commanded him upon his Allegiance to give under his Hand, the Number of his Men, the Burthen and Strength of his Ships, together with the Country and River which he was to enter. All which was exactly done, and came ſo timely to Gondomar's Knowledge, that a full Account was ſent to Spain, and from thence to the Indies, before the Engliſh Fleet ſet Sail from the Thames: So that Sir Walter was unfortunately betray'd in the Beginning of a Deſign, which ſome thought ſo Romantick in it ſelf.

Sir Walter Raleigh undertakes a Voyage to America.

He is betray'd.

In the mean Time his Reputation and Merit brought many Gentlemen of Quality to venture their Eſtates and Perſons, in this promiſing Enterprize; and being gallantly furniſh'd with all Things neceſſary for Peace or War, they ſet out with ten Ships, encountring no Difficulties 'till they came to Cape Verde in Africa; but there, and at Bravo, they met with many violent Storms, which prov'd a great Hindrance to their Voyage, being forc'd to leave their Cables, Anchors and Water-Casks behind them; ſo that by length of Time, Heat of the Climate, and Want of Water, a great Sickneſs fell among them, and ſwept away many of their beſt Men, both for Sea and Land Service. But with much Patience and Hardſhips gaining Sight of the Coaſt of Guiana, they came to Anchor in the River Caliana; where they landed their ſick Men, ſet up Barges and Shallops that were brought out of England in Quarters, waſh'd their Ships, and took in freſh Water, being furniſh'd and aſſiſted by the Indians whom Sir Walter had formerly known. He, in this general Contagion, having ſtruggled with a long Sickneſs, and being yet unable to move otherwiſe than in a Chair, gave order to five ſmall Ships to ſail up the River Orinoque, under the Conduct of Captain Kemiſh, towards the Mine of which he had inform'd Sir Walter in England. In theſe five Ships were as many Companies of Foot, under Command of Captain Walter Raleigh the General's eldeſt Son, Captain Parker, Captain North, Captain Thornhurſt, and Captain Chedley, Gentlemen of great Valour, and infinite Patience, in ſuffering Hunger, Heat and Labour. As they paſs'd up the River, the Spaniards began the War, and fir'd at the Engliſh Ships with great and ſmall Shot; yet ſtill they landed their Forces without much Loſs, near the Town call'd St. Thomas, of which with little Difficulty they made themſelves Maſters, but with the Death of Captain Raleigh, to the great Grief of the Aſſailants. Tho' the Spaniards were not ſtrong enough to defend the Town, yet they were ſufficiently prepar'd to ſecure the Mine; ſo that Captain Kemiſh finding it impracticable to get up to it by Water, and the Avenues by Land ſo well guarded, he thought the Enterprize too hazardous, and with deep Sorrow return'd.

He Lands in Guiana.

St. Thomas taken.

Sir Walter Raleigh, with the News of his Son's unhappy Death, and the fruitleſs Return of Kemiſh, was touch'd to the very Soul, crying out to Kemiſh, That he had utterly ruin'd him, and wounded his Credit with the King beyond Recovery; but he, who was the firſt Mover of the Deſign, muſt expect to bear the weight of the King's Anger as well as himſelf. Kemiſh, as deeply tormented as himſelf, and leſs able to ſuſtain the Burden, retir'd to his Cabin overwhelm'd with Melancholy, and ſhot himſelf; and the Bullet only breaking the Rib, which was too ſlow for his Fury, he deſperately thruſt a Knife in after it up to the Haft, and with him the Glory of the whole Voyage expired.

The Voyage unſucceſsful.

For the Deſign being thus diſcover'd and broken, their Ships being leaky, Proviſions failing, and the Men miſſing the Golden Showers they expected, ſeveral of them began to Mutiny, ſome would return home; and the major Part forc'd the General to ſwear, not to go home without their Allowance. Then ſome would go for Italy, ſome for France, and few for England, fearing the Spaniſh Power there more than they did in the Indies; and thus being ſhatter'd in Judgement, with greater Storms than the Seas and Winds had produc'd, Sir Walter at length arriv'd with four Ships at Kingſale in Ireland, where he ſtaid for ſome ſhort Space in Safety.

A. D. 1618. Reg. 16.

The News of the taking and burning St. Thomas coming to Gondomar, he violently ſet upon the timorous King, and inſiſted upon Reparation; and the Matter was aggravated with the blackeſt Circumſtances by thoſe of the Spaniſh Faction, as if this Enterprize not only might make a Breach of that deſign'd Marriage between Prince Charles and the Infanta, but alſo prove an Infringement of the Peace and Amity eſtabliſh'd between the two Crowns. The King's Fears being kindled into Anger, he diſavow'd the whole Action; and leſt other of his Subjects ſhould by this Example attempt the like Hoſtility againſt Spain, he iſſu'd out a Proclamation, in which he ſhew'd his Deteſtation of ſuch Proceedings, and threaten'd ſevere Puniſhment to the Actors; which gave ſome Satisfaction to Gondomar, whoſe chief Deſign was now to get Sir Walter Raleigh into his Power. Therefore he ſubtlely veil'd over his Reſentments, that whilſt Sir Walter lay in Ireland, he neither found nor heard of ſuch great Difficulties, but that he might appear ſafely in England; and the Men not willing to be baniſh'd their own Country, put in at Plimouth. Raleigh was no ſooner on Shoar, but he had private Intimation, which gave him Cauſe to ſuſpect the Smoothneſs of the Beginning would have a rough Concluſion: Therefore he attempted an Eſcape from thence in a Bark of Rochelle; but being ſuddenly apprehended by Sir Lewis Stukley, his Kinſman, who had a private Warrant for that Purpoſe, he was brought to London, and recommitted to the Tower, from whence he attempted a ſecond Eſcape, but was taken upon the Thames, and more cloſely committed. Being now in ſafe Cuſtody, all his Tranſactions in this Voyage were put upon the Rack, and by his Adverſaries ſtretch'd to his Diſadvantage; yet he ſtill excus'd the main Charge by ſaying he was forc'd to take St. Thomas by the Spaniards firſt attacking him, without which he could not arrive at the Mine. Gondomar prov'd an Adverſary too powerful for him, ſo that at length his Life was offer'd up as a Sacrifice for Spain, but not upon ſuch Grounds as that Ambaſſador had deſign'd: For he deſir'd a Judgement upon the pretended Breach of Peace, that by this Occaſion he might ſubtlely gain from the Engliſh an Acknowledgement of his Maſter's Right in thoſe Parts of America, and prevent all future Attempts of that Kind. But the late Voyage was not ſo much as brought into Queſtion, only his former Condemnation, which was believ'd to have been obtain'd by an Artifice, was now reviv'd; his Arraignment at Wincheſter fifteen Years before was laid before him at the King's Bench-Bar, where it was demanded of him, Why Execution ſhould not paſs upon him, according to the Sentence therein pronounc'd? Sir Walter courageouſly anſwer'd, That he was reſtor'd by the King's late Commiſſion, which gave him new Life and Vigour; for he that has Power over the the Lives of others muſt neceſſarily be Maſter of his own. This reaſonable Plea was by no means admitted by the Court, therefore he deſir'd that ſome Time might be allow'd him to prepare for Death; but it was anſwer'd, That the Time appointed was the next Morning, and it was not to be doubted, but that he had long ſince prepar'd himſelf for Death.

The next Day, to the deep Concern of many worthy Perſons, he was brought to a Scaffold purpoſely erected in the Palace-Yard in Weſtminſter, where with a brave Conſtancy and Chriſtian Courage he loſt his Head, in the ſixty ſixth Year of his Age; at which Stroke ſuch Abundance of Blood iſſu'd from his Veins, as ſhew'd he had a ſufficient Stock to have continu'd many Years, if it had not been taken away by the Hands of Violence. This was the fatal End of the great Sir Walter Raleigh, highly in Favour with Queen Elizabeth, and next to Drake the great Scourge and Terror of the Spaniards; a Man of extraordinary Bravery and admirable Abilities, who in his excellent Writings has nobly trac'd the Steps of the Divine Providence and Vengeance in the Falls of great Men, yet after all could not eſcape himſelf. This has given Occaſion to others to trace thoſe leading to his own Fate; and to inſinuate, as the Hardſhips he ſuſtain'd were Indications of the Hand of Heaven, ſo his unjuſt ſwallowing ſuch large Portions of the Church's Revenues in the late Reign, and his thirſting after the Blood of the Earl of Eſſex, did at length call for Puniſhment, by a double Deprivation, one of Eſtate, and the other of Life.

He is beheaded.

His Character.

However, it was one of the great Blemiſhes of the Reign of King James, who now ſeem'd totally wedded to the Spaniſh Intereſt, or at leaſt fully reſolv'd to carry his Cauſe in the Marriage of Prince Charles with the Infanta. Therefore after many tedious Delays and Obſtructions, he this Year enter'd into certain Articles with the King of Spain; the Sum of which were, 'That the 'Pope's Diſpenſation ſhould be firſt obtain'd by the King of Spain: That the 'Children of this Marriage ſhould not be compell'd in Matters of Religion, 'nor their Titles prejudic'd if they prov'd Catholicks: That the Infanta's Fa'mily might be Catholick, and have a decent Place for Divine Service, ac'cording to the Uſe of the Church of Rome, the Eccleſiaſticks wearing their 'proper Habits: That ſhe ſhould have a competent Number of Chaplains, a 'Confeſſor, &c. That the Marriage ſhould be firſt ſolemniz'd in Spain accord'ing to the Council of Trent, and afterwards reiterated ſo as to make it valid 'according to the Laws of England. In the allowing of theſe Articles, the King thus expreſs'd himſelf, Since this Marriage is to be with a Lady of a different Religion from us, it becomes us to be ſo tender, as on the one ſide to give them all Convenient Satisfaction, ſo on the other, to admit nothing that may blemiſh our Conſcience, or detract from the Religion here eſtabliſh'd. The People of England, equally hating the Spaniards and the Popiſh Religion, were irreconcilably averſe to the Marriage, and would have bought it off at the deareſt Rate; and as far as they durſt oppos'd it by Speeches, Counſels, Wiſhes and Prayers; but if any ſpoke lowder than the reſt, he was ſoon ſilenc'd or check'd from above; when as in Spain and in Flanders, Books and Pictures were publiſh'd to expoſe both the King and State, for which the Engliſh Ambaſſadors in vain ſought for Satisfaction. The Engliſh Catholicks extreamly deſir'd the Match, hoping for a Moderation of Fines and Laws, perhaps a Toleration, if not a total Reſtoration of their Religion; for they gain'd more and more Indulgence by this ſlow-pac'd Treaty; and the Articles of Religion were long forming in the Spaniſh Court, and inlarg'd and multiply'd by endleſs Demands.

Articles of the Spaniſh Match.

The Engliſh averſe to it.

The King at this Time was alſo buſily imploy'd in Matters of Religion, occaſion'd by the Spreading of the Doctrines of Arminius in Holland, whoſe Followers were call'd Remonſtrants. The King hearing ſome Years ago, that the States of Holland were determin'd to chuſe one Vorſtius, the chief of theſe Remonſtrants, to be Divinity Profeſſor in Leyden, whoſe Opinions were contrary to those King James had imbib'd, he earnestly sollicited the States, both by his own Letters and by his Ambassador Sir Ralph Winwood, by no means to admit the said Vorstius to that Employment, lest his Doctrines should spread themselves into his Dominions. The Ambassador in the King's Name pressing the Matter, the States answer'd in Justification of Vorstius, 'That he was 'chosen according to ancient Custom, by the Curators of Leyden; and whereas 'he was afterwards charg'd by some Persons to be unsound in Doctrine, the 'Curators thought fit, with the Consent of Vorstius, that both at Leyden and 'the Hague, he should appear and answer his Accusers, which he did, and 'none came to charge him. But not long after six Ministers undertook to prove 'that Vorstius had publish'd false Doctrine, who being heard in a full Assem-'bly of the States, they could find no Reason to displace him: And they assu-'redly believ'd, That if his Majesty of Great Britain were inform'd of the 'true Circumstances of this Affair, he would according to his great Wisdom 'conceive favourably of them; their Proceedings being with all Reverence, Care 'and Respect to his Majesty's serious Admonition. The King perceiving by this Answer, that the States thought so well of Vorstius that they would not comply with his Request, he caus'd his Books to be publickly burnt in St. Paul's Church-Yard, and in both the Universities, and again wrote to the States, That if they did not displace him, he would publickly protest against them. Sir Ralph Winwood represented this to the States, and finding them cold and backwards in proceeding against Vorstius, he severely remonstrated against them; to which the King finding them only to make dilatory Answers, he at last exhorted them to call a National Council, to put an End to these Controversies, to which they at length consented.

The Arminians or Remonstrants knowing that they were like to be out-number'd, oppos'd the calling of a Council; and it was discover'd that Barnevelt, the chief of the Remonstrants, now Arminius was dead, had secretly levy'd Soldiers in Utrecht, to defend themselves against Maurice Prince of Orange, who sided with the contrary Party; on Notice of which the Prince with five hundred Men march'd to Utrecht, which struck such a Terror into the new levy'd Companies, that at the first Word of Command they laid down their Arms and submitted. After this, Barnevelt, Hogenberts, Leydenberg, and Grotius, the four Chiefs of the Arminian Party, were seiz'd, and committed to several Prisons. Leydenberg in Despair stabb'd himself in Prison; Hogenberts and Grotius were condemn'd to perpetual Imprisonment; but Grotius after some Time, made an escape in a Trunk, which his Wife told the Soldiers of the Castle was full of Arminian Books, which she would send away that they might not distract her Husband's Head. Barnevelt met with the hardest Fate, for he was beheaded at the Hague: Yet he liv'd long enough to see his own Opinions condemn'd at a National Synod held at Dort, whither King James sent Dr. Carlton, Bishop of Landaff; Dr. Hall, Dean of Worcester; Dr. Davenant, Divinity Professor, and Master of Queen's College in Cambridge; Dr. Ward, Master of Sidney College in Cambrige; and Mr. Belcanquel, a Scotchman and Batchelor of Divinity; where they met with Divines from the Palatine, Hesse, Geneva, Bern, Emden, and other Provinces, who generally agreed to condemn the Doctrines of Arminius, concerning Conditional Election and Reprobation, the Universality of Redemption, &c. But herein King James in a great Measure lost his Aim; for this Censure caus'd these deep Points to be more nicely search'd and examin'd, and these condemn'd Opinions sprouted and gather'd Strength by being topt by a combin'd Party; so that in this and the next Reign, Arminianism became fashionable in England, and was generally oppos'd to Puritanism.

The Synod of Dort.

Shortly after there appear'd a mighty Blazing-Star in Libra, which occasion'd Variety of Conjectures concerning its Influence and Prognostication. Many thought it portended the Death of Queen Anne, who after its Appear-

VIII. The King for a conſiderable Space continu'd a very melancholy Widower; which was a ſort of Introduction to further Troubles, Perplexities and Imbarraſſments, from which he was ſcarce ever free all the reſt and moſt infirm Part of his Reign. Theſe had their Riſe from the Fires that broke out in Germany in the preceding Year, between the Proteſtant Princes and the Houſe of Auſtria; which Commotions involv'd and drew along the Affairs of moſt Chriſtian Princes, eſpecially the two Potent Kings of England and Spain. The Catholick Cauſe, and the Lot of the Houſe of Auſtria, induc'd and oblig'd the King of Spain, who was the ſtrongeſt Branch of that Family; and King James was ingag'd both by common and particular Intereſt, the Religion he profeſs'd, and the State of his Son-in-Law, the Elector Palatine, who was a principal Agent in theſe Wars. It was a mighty Concern to the whole Chriſtian World, and the Iſſue had a main Dependance upon the King of England, being the moſt powerful Prince of the Proteſtant Profeſſion; but his Proceedings were now ſtrangely govern'd by the unhappy Spaniſh Treaty; ſo that it brought great Diſhonour to himſelf, and inſuperable Calamities to his Son-in-Law.

The King's Troubles.

The Troubles in Germany.

The German Troubles and Commotions began with the Emperor's Crowning his Couſin Ferdinand King of Bohemia and Hungary; but with a Reſervation of all Regal Power to himſelf during Life. The Conſequence of this ſoon prov'd a terrible Oppreſſion of the Proteſtants in Bohemia, which at that Time were very numerous, and had large Privileges, as well as great Power and Authority. Theſe States and Nobles of the Country, ſummoning an Aſſembly at Prague to redreſs their Grievances, were oppos'd by ſome of the Emperor's Miniſters of State, the very Day of their Meeting; the Manner of which exaſperated them to ſuch a Height of Paſſion, that they threw Slabata the Emperor's Chief-Juſtice, Smeſantius one of the Council, and Fabritius the Secretary, from a high Window into the Caſtle Ditch. Upon cooler Thoughts the Bohemians endeavour'd to palliate this raſh Action by Apologies to the Emperor; but at the ſame Time they ſtrengthen'd themſelves with new Levies both of Horſe and Foot, the better to ſecure their own Peace, and to baniſh the main Incendiaries, the Jeſuits, out of Prague, whoſe diſtemper'd Zeal had firſt kindled the Flame. The Emperor finding theſe Diſturbances, rais'd an Army under the Command of Count Bucquoy; and the Proteſtant States perceiving the Emperor inrag'd, rais'd two Armies, one commanded by Count Thurne, and the other by Count Mansfeldt. Some Skirmiſhes paſs'd between the Imperial and Bohemian Forces, and ſome Towns were taken on both Sides; but in the Heat of theſe Conteſts, the old Emperor dy'd in the Beginning of the Year 1619. Upon which the Count Palatine of the Rhine, who in the Interregnum is chief Vicar of the Empire, publiſh'd his Right by the Golden Bull to govern in Chief, 'till a new Emperor be choſen; and by Advice he aſſum'd the Power, requiring the People to demean themſelves peaceably under his Government.

The Emperor Matthias dies.

After many Struggles, Ferdinand King of Hungary and Bohemia, and adopted Heir of Matthias the late Emperor, at Frankfort was elected King of the Romans, and afterwards crown'd Emperor of Germany. The States of Bohemia diſclaim'd the Election as invalid, becauſe he could not be an Elector himſelf as King of Bohemia; for that he had never been actually in Poſſeſſion of the Crown. And tho' their Diſſent could not leſſen the Election of Ferdinand to

to the Empire, yet they proteſted by Oath, never to acknowledge him their King. Theſe Heats grew into greater Flames, and the Proteſtant States of Moravia, Sileſia, and Hungary, join'd with the Bohemians, and baniſh'd the Jeſuits. They were proſperous in the Beginning; but the Auſtrian Party receiv'd Vigour by new Supplies out of Hungary and Flanders; and the Emperor capitulated with the Duke of Bavaria to levy Forces to his Uſe, for the Expence of which he engag'd Part of his Country to him. The War daily increaſing, the King of England interpos'd in theſe Differences, and ſent the Viſcount Doncaſter extraordinary Ambaſſador to mediate a Reconciliation. His conſtant Love of Peace, and his preſent Fear of the fatal Iſſue of ſuch Commotions, together with the Requeſt of the King of Spain, mov'd him to undertake this Affair. It was the Spaniard's Policy to make him a Reconciler, and ſo by that Means to place him in a State of Neutrality, and fruſtrate the Hopes of that Support the Princes of the Union might expect from him by the Intereſt of the Count Palatine: For which Cauſe the King of Spain ſpread abroad ſpecious Pretences, That King James ſhould be the ſole and grand Arbiter of this Cauſe of Chriſtendom. Nevertheleſs his Mediation was neglected by the Catholick Confederates, and his Ambaſſador ſlighted and poſtpon'd in the Buſineſs. And at the ſame Time, the King's Agent Mr. Cottington, being ſenſible of their unworthy Dealings in the Court of Spain, profeſs'd, That his moſt uſeful Service, and beſt agreeing with his own Conſcience, would be to diſingage the King his Maſter. However the Bohemians reſolv'd to proceed in their own Way; and being aſſembled for that Purpoſe, with the Conſent of their Confederates, they ſolemnly elected Frederick Count Palatine of the Rhine, for their King; ſtill hoping to be ſtrengthen'd and ſecur'd by the Alliance and Aſſiſtance of his Father-in-law, the King of Great Britain.

The Count Palatine elected King of Bohemia.

The Count Palatine being elected King of Bohemia, immediately crav'd Advice of King James his Father-in-law, concerning the Acceptance of that Royal Dignity. When this important Buſineſs was debated in the King's Council, Arch-Biſhop Abbot, whoſe Infirmities would not permit him to be preſent in the Conſultation, wrote a zealous and fervent Letter to the Secretary of State, to urge the King's utmoſt Aſſiſtance in this critical Juncture, which might turn highly to the Advancement of the Proteſtant Religion all over Europe. But the King was unfortunately engag'd in thoſe Ways, out of which he could not eaſily extricate himſelf. Beſides it did not pleaſe him to find Kingdoms diſpos'd after ſuch a Manner, as that his Son-in-law ſhould ſnatch a Crown out of ſo hot a Fire; and he was wont to ſay, That the Bohemians made uſe of him, as the Fox did of the Cat's Foot to pull the Apple out of the Fire for his own Eating. In the mean Time, before the King could give any Anſwer, the Count Palatine was perſuaded by the Proteſtant States to accept of the Election; and thereupon he made his Entrance into Prague upon the laſt of October, and on the Fourth of November was ſolemnly crown'd King of Bohemia. Of all which he ſent ſpeedy Advice into England, excuſing the Suddenneſs of this Action, becauſe the Urgency of the Cauſe would admit of no further Deliberation. King James ſurpriz'd at this bold Step, diſavow'd the Act, and would never ſo much as grace his Son-in-law with the Stile or Title of his new Dignity. But Sir Richard Weſton and Sir Edward Conway were ſent Ambaſſadors into Bohemia, to make up the Breach between the Emperor and the Elector Palatine. And he was ſo very apprehenſive, leſt the Palatine's Nearneſs to him might give Cauſe of Suſpicion to his Brother of Spain, that he commanded his Agent Cottington to give that King plenary Information of all Proceedings, and to let him underſtand that whatever the Palatine had done, was without his Countenance, Procurement or Allowance. The King of Spain, tho' he condemn'd Doncaſter's Proceedings, was at length ſatisfy'd with King James's Integrity, declaring, That it would gain the more Authority and Eſtimation, if he ſhould continue to diſclaim that which had been done ſo contrary to his Opinion.

King James diſapproves the Election.

The Count Palatine was no ſooner ſetled in his new Kingdom, when the Emperor publiſh'd a Proſcription againſt him, 'wherein he proclaim'd him 'guilty of High-Treaſon, excluded him out of the publick Peace, and proſe-'cuted him as the publick Enemy of the Empire, and a Contemner of his Im-'perial Majeſty; likewiſe abſolving all his Subjects from their Oaths and Du-'ties to him, and commanding all Perſons whatſoever to abandon him and his 'Adherents. All the Princes and Potentates in the Empire were alarm'd, and began to make ready for War, joining to that Side whither their Intereſts or Inclinations led them. In Spain alſo they made all Preparations for the ſame War; only the King of England would take no Alarm, abhorring War in general, and diſliking the Palatine's Cauſe as a dangerous Precedent againſt Monarchy, being ſtill fed with Hopes of compoſing all Differences by the Succeſs of the Spaniſh Treaty. For which Purpoſe Sir Walter Aſton was ſent Ambaſſador into Spain, and Gondomar return'd into England, to continue there, 'till the long-debated Match ſhould be concluded. The Articles of Religion for Securing Liberty of Conſcience to the Infanta and her Family were greatly enlarg'd by the Commiſſioners, and allow'd by the King of England; but ſtill without a Diſpenſation from Rome, all the Tranſactions were but Nullities. And for this Cauſe it was expected, that King James ſhould propoſe ſuch Conditions for the Increaſe and Advantage of the Catholick Religion, that the Pope might deliberate whether they might any ways merit the Diſpenſation. To this Demand the King made Anſwer in his Letter to the King of Spain, 'That 'he had done as much in Favour of the Catholicks as the Times would bear, 'and promis'd upon the Word of a King, That no Roman Prieſt, or other Ca-'tholick, ſhould henceforth be condemn'd upon any Capital Law: And tho' he 'could not at preſent reſcind the Laws, inflicting only pecuniary Mulcts, yet 'he would ſo mitigate them, as to oblige his Catholick Subjects to him: And 'if the Marriage took effect, his Daughter-in-law ſhould find him ready to in-'dulge all Favours which ſhe ſhould requeſt for thoſe of her Religion. With this the Spaniſh Council acknowledg'd great Satisfaction; and a Paper was drawn up accordingly by a Junto of Canoniſts, Lawyers, and Divines, to perſuade the Pope to perform his Part.

A. D. 1620. Reg. 18.

The King of Bohemia proſcrib'd by the Emperor.

The Spaniſh Deſigns.

In the mean Time an Army of thirty thouſand Men was raiſing in Flanders, under the Command of the Marqueſs Spinola; which gave King James an Occaſion to enquire after the Cauſe of ſuch great Preparations. The Marqueſs gave Anſwer, That he receiv'd his Commiſſion ſeal'd up, with a Command, not to open it 'till his Army was compleated, and brought to a Rendevouz; but the King had ſufficient Proof to aſſure him, that his Army was deſign'd for the Palatinate. Yet after all, no more than one Regiment, under the Command of Sir Horatio Vere, could be obtain'd from him, tho' two more were promis'd. When Spinola had his Rendevouz, where he muſter'd twenty ſix thouſand Foot and four thouſand Horſe, he open'd his Commiſſion, which requir'd him to make War againſt all ſuch as ſhould be confederate with the Bohemian Rebels; all which he communicated to the Ambaſſador of Great Britain. At the ſame Time the Engliſh began their March, with as brave a Regiment as had appear'd in any Age, conſiſting moſt of Gentlemen, under a moſt worthy Commander, who was accompany'd with the Earls of Oxford and Eſſex, Perſons ennobled as well by their own Virtues, as by thoſe of their Progenitors. This handful of Men reach'd the Palatinate with ſome Difficulty, by the particular Aid and Conduct of Henry Prince of Naſſaw. But Spinola, having got the Start of the Engliſh, by reaſon of a far ſhorter March, had no ſooner arriv'd, but he took in ſeveral Towns, and greatly prevail'd over a diſpirited People: Yet he cautiouſly declin'd the Hazard of a Battel with the Proteſtant Confederates; nor was the Marqueſs of Ansbach, the Head of them, very forward to engage his Forces. And now the great Acceſs of Strength to the Emperor's Party, and this ſlender Aid from the King of Great Britain, to preſerve his Childrens Inheritance, extreamly diſhearten'd the German Princes, and at length diſſolv'd the Confederacy. After a ſhort Space, the Seaſon of the Year advancing, the Princes of the Union retir'd into their ſeveral Countries, and the Engliſh Regiment was diſpos'd into three principal Garriſons: Sir Horatio Vere commanded in Manheim, Sir Gerard Herbert in Heidelberg, and Captain Burrows in Frankendale; having only Power to preſerve themſelves in thoſe Walls, while the Enemy rang'd the Country at their Pleaſure.

Sir Horatio Vere ſent into the Palatinate.

But with ſmall Succeſs.

As the new King of Bohemia ſuffer'd extreamly in his Hereditary Dominions, ſo at this Time he met with a more ſevere Fate in his own Kingdom, which ſoon put a Period to his ſhort Reign. The Imperial Forces gathering Strength under Bavaria, Bucquoy, and D. Balthazar, advanc'd towards Prague, with a Reſolution to fight King Frederick; upon which the Bohemians quitted their Garriſons, to make their Army the more compleat. So upon the eighth Day of November, being Sunday, both Armies met for the fatal Deciſion of the grand Controverſie: The Bohemians ſtood upon the moſt advantagious Ground, between the Imperaliſts and the City of Prague; but the Enemy breaking through, diſpers'd and ruin'd the whole Army, and effectually purſu'd their Victory. The King and Queen, ſurpriz'd with this Defeat, among a wavering People, in a City not very defenſible, were conſtrain'd to fly the next Morning, with what Things they could carry with them. The Queen, being of the more gallant Spirit, bore it with moſt Undauntedneſs; but the King ſuffer'd doubly as he went, being condemn'd for keeping his Soldiers without Pay, having a vaſt Maſs of Mony by him, which he was forc'd to leave behind him, to augment the Spoils of his Enemies. Thus after one Year's Reign, King Frederick firſt loſt a deciding Battel, with all his Treaſure, and ſhortly after all his Kingdom of Bohemia, and not long after that, all his Hereditary Lands and Dominions in Germany; being at length forc'd to abandon his Native Country, all his Honours and Places, and with his Lady and Children retire into Holland for a Place of Refuge and Reſidence.

The King of Bohemia defeated at Prague.

He loſes all his Dominions.

The Misfortunes of this Family began now to rouſe King James, and to move him both to Pity and to Action: Wherefore a Council being call'd, an Order was made to promote the Palatine's Reſtoration; and the King, to encourage the Princes of the Union, and to keep them in Arms, ſent them thirty thouſand Pounds; yet withal reſolv'd to treat for a Peace, and diſpatch'd Sir Edward Villers to carry the Palatine's Submiſſion to the Emperor, upon Conditions to be conceiv'd according to Equity and Conveniency. On the other Side the Spaniards never more flatter'd King James, than after the Defeat at Prague: They declar'd that he ſhould order all Things according to his Pleaſure, for the Palatine's Reſtoration, and be obey'd; that the Infanta's Portion was preparing, and that the Pope was oblig'd to grant the Diſpenſation, from whom they reſolv'd to take no Denial: All which was encourag'd by Digby, Cottington, Arundel, Worceſter, and eſpecially by Buckingham and Gondomar; which laſt had gain'd the Acceſs of a Favourite, rather than a Foreign Ambaſſador; ſo that Sir Robert Naunton, for ſhowing a Diſlike to him, notwithſtanding his known Worth, was remov'd from his Secretary's Place, and Conway put in his Room. The King took great Delight in the Company and Converſation of Gondomar; a Perſon, as Nani obſerves, who with a ſtupendious Acuteneſs of Wit, ſo confounded pleaſant Things with ſerious, that it was not eaſie to be diſcern'd when he rally'd, or when he ſpoke of Buſineſs. He knew how to inſinuate and transform himſelf to the King's own Way and Humour; was full of Conceits, Jeſts and witty Sayings, and would ſometimes ſpeak falſe Latine purpoſely to pleaſe the King, telling him, That his Majeſty ſpoke Latine like a Pedant, but himſelf like a Gentleman. By ſuch little pleaſing Arts, and others of a more bountiful Nature with the Nobility and Ladies, he gain'd an extraordinary Influence, and ſerv'd his own Maſter with great Advantage.

The Spaniſh Policy.

The

The Favourite Earl was now made Marqueſs of Buckingham, and to his Maſterſhip of the Horſe was added the Office of Lord High-Admiral of England; and continually lying in the King's Boſom, every Man paid Tribute to his gracious Smiles. His Mother was made Counteſs of Buckingham, her eldeſt Son was made firſt a Knight, and afterwards Viſcount of Purbeck, her other Son was created Earl of Angleſey; and now happy was that Perſon who could gain a Kinſwoman, it being the next Way to a rich Office, or a ſwelling Title. The King, who never much regarded Women, had now his Court fill'd with young Ladies, Relations to the Marqueſs. Sir Henry Montague, Lord Chief-Juſtice, who was reported to have given twenty thouſand Pounds for the Office of Lord-Treaſurer, before the Year expir'd, had it taken from him, and it was conferr'd upon Sir Lionel Cranfield, who by being bred up in the Cuſtom-Houſe, and knowing the ſecret Arts of thoſe Offices, beſt knew how to ſupply by Projects, what was conſum'd by a riotous and prodigal Court. But the great Step to this Office, was Cranfield's marrying one of the Marqueſs's Kindred, which ſoon rais'd him to be Earl of Middleſex; and the Lord Chief-Juſtice Montague, in lieu of his Mony, was made Preſident of the Council, Viſcount Mandeville, Earl of Manchеſter, and after Worceſter's Deceaſe, Lord Privy-Seal. The Marqueſs of Buckingham, in Appearance made all theſe Removes and Advancements, but in Reality moſt of the Affairs in Church and State were privately tranſacted by his Mother, for moſt Addreſſes were firſt made to her, and ſo convey'd to be finiſh'd by her Son, who generally regarded his Pleaſure more than his Profit: Which caus'd Gondomar, among his other pleaſant Stories, to write into Spain, That there was never more Hopes of England's returning to Popery than now; for there were more Prayers and Offerings made here to the Mother, than to the Son.

The Power of Buckingham's Mother.

The Marqueſs himſelf, as he was a Man of excellent Symetry and Gracefulneſs, ſo he affected Beauty where he found it; but being a general Lover, he treated all Women accordingly, only to gratifie his own unlawful Ends, and then diſmiſt them for the more prevailing Charms of the next fair Lady. He deſign'd to have practis'd this Method upon the Earl of Rutland's only Daughter, who was to be Miſtreſs of all her Father's vaſt Fortunes: He ſpread his fine Nets for her, carry'd her to his Lodgings in Whitehall, kept her there for ſome Space, and then return'd her back to her Father. But the ſtout old Earl, fir'd with Indignation, ſent him this threatning Meſſage, That he was too much of a Gentleman to ſuffer ſuch an Indignity; therefore if he did not immediately repair his Daughter's Honour by marrying her, his Greatneſs ſhould not protect him from his Juſtice. The Marqueſs, who perhaps made uſe of this Stratagem to gain her Father's Conſent, ſhe being the greateſt Match in the Kingdom, had no Reaſon to diſlike the Propoſal, and therefore he ſoon ſalv'd up the Wound by conſummating the Marriage. This young Lady was bred up a Roman Catholick by her Mother, but was converted by Dr. White to be a zealous Proteſtant; which croſſing the Inclinations of the old Counteſs of Buckingham, who was a fiery Romaniſt, ſhe with the Help of her Jeſuits at length plac'd her on the firſt Foundation.

Buckingham marries the Earl of Rutland's Daughter.

The King himſelf being jealous of uncontroll'd Soveraignty, and impatient of his Peoples viewing the Myſteries of State, had fallen into a great Diſlike of Parliaments, and for ſeveral Years had given way to Patents, Monopolies, and ſuch diſtaſteful Projects: And probably many of his Miniſters, fearing an Enquiry into their own Actions, ſuggeſted to him, That he had better furniſh himſelf by thoſe Ways, and the Match now in Treaty, than by Subſidies accompany'd with the Redreſs of Grievances. Nevertheleſs he now reſolv'd to call a Parliament, conceiving it might prove of ſpecial Advantage: For he found the Affections of the People much rais'd for the Recovery of the Palatinate, which would naturally open their Purſes to the Supply of his Wants; then the Treaty of Spain might effect the Buſineſs, without the Expence and Troubles of War, and the good Agreement between him and his People would quicken the Spaniard to conclude the Match. Accordingly a Parliament was ſummon'd to meet on the thirtieth Day of January at Weſtminſter; where the King made a long Speech, which may be ſeen at large in the Introduction to Nalſon's Collections; in which he laid open his great and numerous Expences, and handſomly pleaded for ſuitable Supplies; he alſo declar'd his great Readineſs to recover the Palatinate, for which rather than fail he would engage his Crown, his Blood, and his Son's Blood, to effect it. At the ſame Time his Majeſty ſent the Lord Digby Ambaſſador to the Emperor to urge him to a poſitive Anſwer, whether the Palatinate might be recover'd by Peace, before he proceeded to actual War; and now expecting the Emperor's Anſwer, the Parliament proceeded in their Work, receiving Petitions from ſeveral Perſons impriſon'd and ruin'd by the horrid Extortions of voracious Patentees and Monopolizers, who were active in promoting illegal Exactions, to which the King's Neceſſities and ill-adviſ'd Counſellors had driven him. The chief Inſtruments of theſe Grievances were Sir Giles Mompeſſon, and Sir Francis Mitchel. The former had Fortune ſufficient to have maintain'd him fairly in the Country, but at Court he wanted this Novelty for his better Support; to whom Mitchel was made a Co-Partner, a ſervile Suburb Juſtice of Peace, who living by the Failings of his Neighbouring Females, was brought to Court and Knighted, and corroborated by theſe Letters Patents to oppreſs the needy Commoners. All which being canvas'd and laid open in Parliament, Mompeſſon made his Eſcape, and Sir Francis Mitchel was cenſur'd after this Manner: Firſt he was degraded with all the debaſing Ceremonies that Juſtice could invent, and after that was made to ride through the City with his Face to the Horſe's Tail, with a Paper on his Breaſt and Back declaring his Crimes: This expos'd him to the Scorn and Contempt of the Rabble in his Paſſage; but a large Fine and long Impriſonment ſecur'd him from further Miſchief. The pecuniary Puniſhment fell as heavily upon Mompeſſon, and upon other leſſer Confederates, which put an End to this Grievance.

Oppreſſors puniſh'd.

Not long after the great Lord-Chancellor Bacon was brought to a Cenſure for the moſt extravagant Weakneſſes that ever enter'd into the Heart of a wiſe Man: He was a true Emblem of human Frailty, being more than a Man in ſome Things, and leſs than a Woman in others. His Crimes were Bribery and Extortion, yet more thoſe of his Servants and Dependants than his own, all which were prov'd and aggravated againſt him by ſo many Circumſtances, that he who in moſt things was thought a Man of the greateſt Parts in the Kingdom, and elevated above Pity, now fell miſerably below it; and his eloquent Tongue that us'd to charm his Auditors with admirable Harangues, was now forc'd to deſcend to ſervile Supplications; for throwing himſelf and his Cauſe at his Judges Feet, before his Sentence was paſs'd, 'he humbly begg'd the Lords in Par-'liament, That his penitent Submiſſion might be his Sentence, the Loſs of 'the Great Seal his Puniſhment, and that their Lordſhips would recommend 'him to his Majeſty's Grace and Pardon for all that was paſt. Thus his great and towering Spirit was brought low, and Humiliation might have rais'd him up again, if the Weight of his Miſdemeanors had not kept him down. He loſt both his Peerage and Seal, and the Beam was wavering whether he ſhould carry the Title of Viſcount St. Albans to his Grave, which now was all he had; and to heighten his Miſery, many were cruſh'd in Pieces by his Fall, through the Debts he had contracted; and tho' he had a Penſion from the King, he wanted to his laſt; living obſcurely in his Lodgings at Grays-Inn, where the Remembrance of former Plenty and Grandeur lay ſo heavy upon his ingenious and now melancholy Temper, that he pin'd and conſum'd away. He was of a very grave and comely Preſence; of a quick and high flying Wit, ſtriving in ſome things rather to be admir'd than underſtood, and yet when he pleas'd to condeſcend no Man was more intelligible. In ſhort, he was of a moſt capacious Mind, and a great Maſter of all Kinds of Learning, and the World is ſo much oblig'd to his noble Diſcoveries in Nature, that his Name will be celebrated with Honour to Perpetuity. Gondomar hearing of his Miſcarriages, and meeting him the Lent before his Cenſures, thought to pay him with his Spaniſh Sarcaſms, ſaying, My Lord, I wiſh you a good EASTER; and you, my Lord, reply'd the Chancellor, a good PASSOVER: For he could neither indure his Engliſh Buffoonry, nor his Spaniſh Treaty, tho' he was too wiſe to oppoſe them publickly. He treaſur'd up nothing either for himſelf or his Family, but his fatal Error was his Indulgence to his Servants; and his Decrees were always made with ſo much Equity, that none were ever revers'd as unjuſt. He was ſucceeded in his Place by Dr. Williams, Dean of Weſtminſter, who was firſt made Biſhop of Lincoln, and afterwards Arch-Biſhop of York. Dr. Williams made Lord-Keeper.

In this Parliament, tho' no Laws and Statutes were paſs'd, yet many Debates aroſe, relating to the King's Power and Prerogative, and particularly in the Houſe of Lords, where the King had the ſtrongeſt Party; yet ſeveral of that Houſe ſtood up boldly for the publick Liberty, as the Earls of Oxford, Southampton, Eſſex, and Warwick, the Lord Say and Seal, and the Lord Spencer. This laſt Lord ſpeaking ſomething in the Houſe of Actions of their great Anceſtors, Arundel being diſpleas'd, ſaid, My Lord, when theſe things were doing, your Anceſtors were keeping Sheep, reflecting upon the numerous Flocks he lov'd: Spencer immediately reply'd, When my Anceſtors were keeping Sheep, as you ſay, your Anceſtors were plotting Treaſon. This caus'd ſuch a Heat, that Arundel as the Aggreſſor was ſent to the Tower, where after ſome Time, upon his Submiſſion to the Houſe, he was reſtor'd. The Commons on the other Side were no leſs warm and impatient, highly diſreliſhing both the Treaties with the Emperor and the King of Spain; and Gondomar had ſo rais'd the Peoples Fury, that he was revil'd and aſſaulted in the Streets of London. Upon which the King reſolv'd upon exemplary Juſtice; and being inform'd that one Man was apprehended, who had us'd railing Speeches againſt the Ambaſſador, it was his Majeſty's Pleaſure, that on the next Morning he ſhould be publickly and ſeverely whipt through London, beginning at Aldgate, and ſo along by the Place where the Affront was offer'd in Fleetſtreet, to Temple-Bar, without any Manner of Favour. This terrible Puniſhment more enrag'd the People againſt Gondomar, who by means of his Power with the King, had tranſported Ordnance and other Warlick Proviſions, to furniſh the Spaniſh Arſenals; and it was believ'd that he privately procur'd the ſending of Sir Robert Manſel into the Mediterranean Sea, againſt the Pirates of Algier. The Merchants of England, by them much infeſted, were alſo induc'd to move for this Expedition, in which the Engliſh Fleet perform'd gallant Exploits, and bravely fir'd the Pirates Ships within their Harbours. Nevertheleſs by this the Engliſh Strength was diverted, the Treaſure exhauſted, and the Spaniſh Fleets and Merchants ſecur'd from thoſe Robbers, and Spain left at Liberty to aſſiſt in ſubduing the Palatinate. Heats in both Houſes.

The Parliament having ſate about four Months, the King was deſirous to give them a Time of Receſs; therefore on the fourth of June, a Meſſage was ſent to the Houſe, 'That his Majeſty, by the Advice of his Privy-Council, thought 'fit to Adjourn the Parliament, leſt the Seaſon of the Year, by the continual 'Concourſe of People, ſhould cauſe Infection: Which Adjournment, keeping the Parliament ſtill in Being, was thought better than a Prorogation. The Commons were extreamly ſorry at their Diſappointment, having but juſt before made ſo hearty a Declaration to aſſiſt his Majeſty in the Affair of the Palatinate. A Committee of both Houſes attending his Majeſty, he declar'd to them, That he took it very ill, That the Commons ſhould diſpute his Reaſons of Adjournment, all Power being in him alone, to call, adjourn, prorogue, and diſſolve Parliaments. The Adjournment was appointed 'till November following, with a Declaration, That in the mean Time he would by his own Autho- The Parliament Adjourn'd by the King.

Authority redreſs Grievances. Moreover he iſſu'd out a Second Proclamation againſt licentious Speeches and Diſcourſes concerning Affairs of State: For notwithſtanding the Strictneſs of the King's former Commands, the Peoples inordinate Liberty of irreverend Language daily increas'd. Wherefore the King now threaten'd Severity, as well againſt the Concealers of ſuch Diſcourſes, as againſt the Laviſhneſs of audacious Tongues and Pens. The King grew more and more uneaſie, being continually ſollicited both from Spain and Rome, to enlarge his Favours to the Popiſh Recuſants; for Reports were then brought to Rome that all the Catholicks in his Dominions were cruelly treated. And beſides this, a Rumour was there ſpread, That King James in a Speech in Parliament had declar'd, That notwithſtanding the Spaniſh Match, the Engliſh Catholicks ſhould not in the leaſt Point be in a better Condition, when he had only ſaid, That if any of that Party grew inſolent, let his People count him unworthy to reign, if he gave not extraordinary Puniſhment. Thus was the King unhappily embarraſs'd and intangled in the Ways he had choſen; for it was not poſſible for him at once to pleaſe his People, and to ſatisfie his Foreign Intereſts.

The Second Meeting in of the Parliament.

At the Beginning of the Winter, the Lord Digby return'd from ſolliciting the Emperor, and the Duke of Bavaria, to the Reſtoration of the Palatinate, where he had met with no reaſonable Succeſs. And on the twentieth of November, when the Parliament met a Second Time, the King commanded him to give an Account of his Journey to the Houſe of Commons, and to repreſent how neceſſary it was for the King to obtain that by War, which he could not procure by a Peace. But tho' the King by his Miniſters encourag'd the Parliament to a War, yet they found him more inclinable to Peace, both in regard of Gondomar's Power with him, his Indulgence to Roman Catholicks, and his Fondneſs of the Spaniſh Match, which he hop'd might heal all Breaches; tho' it was poſitively diſlik'd and diſapprov'd by all England, beſides Romaniſts and thoſe of the Spaniſh Faction. Therefore the Houſe of Commons, before they granted Subſidies, reſolv'd to try the King's Spirit by a ſolemn Petition and Remonſtrance, in which they laid open to his Majeſty the ſeveral great and increaſing Dangers ariſing from the Romiſh Religion in general, the Power of Papiſts in particular, and the great Oppreſſions of the Proteſtants in Foreign Parts; repreſenting at the ſame Time proper Remedies for theſe great Calamities, too long to mention in this Place. The Commons were more appehenſive of the Danger of their Religion, not only from the terrible Wounds lately given by the Houſe of Auſtria, but alſo from the Severities the Proteſtants met with in France, from Lewis the Thirteenth, who at this Time beſieg'd them in Montaubon and Rochelle, and other Places, againſt all the Arguments and Mediations of King James's Ambaſſador. When the Remonſtrance was brought to Perfection, the King had a Copy of it before the Houſe had time to ſend their Members with it; in which ſomething ſo highly diſpleas'd him, that he wrote the following Letter from Newmarket to Sir Thomas Richardſon, Speaker of the Houſe of Commons. We have heard by divers Reports, to our great Grief, that ſome fiery and popular Spirits in the Houſe of Commons, have publickly argu'd and debated Matters far above their Reach and Capacities, tending highly to our Diſhonour, and Breach of the Royal Prerogative. Theſe are therefore to command You, in our Name to make known to the Houſe, that none therein ſhall preſume henceforth to meddle with any Thing concerning our Government, or deep Matters of State, nor with our Son's Match with the Daughter of Spain, nor to touch the Honour of that King, or any other our Friends or Confederates. And if they have already touch'd any of thoſe Points, which we have here forbidden, in a Petition of theirs, which is to be ſent unto us, it is our Pleaſure that You tell them, That except they Reform it before it comes to our Hands, we will not deign the hearing of it.

The Commons remonſtrate.

The King writes to the Speaker.

When

When the Houſe had duly conſider'd the Reaſons they had to draw up their Remonſtrance, which at that Time were very cogent and prevailing with them, they ſent the ſaid Remonſtrance, together with a new Petition to the King, in which they declar'd, 'That the Honour and Safety of the King and his Poſte- 'rity, the Welfare of Religion and State of the Kingdom, are at no Time un- 'fit for a Parliamentary Conſideration; not that they took upon themſelves, 'but as Loyal Subjects, to demonſtrate ſuch Things to his Majeſty, which 'they were not aſſur'd could otherwiſe come ſo fully and clearly to his Know- 'ledge. And whereas his Majeſty ſeem'd to reſtrain them from intermedling 'with the Matters of Government, that have their Motion in the Courts of 'Juſtice, and ſeem'd to abridge them of the ancient Liberty of Parliaments, 'Freedom of Speech, they were now forc'd to pray his Majeſty to allow it, 'and to take away the Doubts and Scruples, which his Letter to the Speaker 'had brought upon them. After this the Houſe were much diſcourag'd to pro- ceed to Buſineſs, while there was ſo great a Difference between the King and them; for the King thought their Actions an Incroachment upon his Prerogative, and they thought the King's Expreſſions an Infringement of their Liberty; therefore they reſolv'd to give over all Buſineſs, 'till they had an Anſwer to their Petitions. The King hearing of this, was exceedingly vex'd and uneaſie, and very roughly entertain'd the twelve Members that were ſent to him; ſome ſay he call'd for twelve Chairs for them, ſaying, Here are twelve Kings come to me. After he had conſider'd their Deſires and Requeſts in their laſt Petition, he return'd them a long Anſwer in Writing, mix'd with ſome ſevere Expreſſi- ons, in which he ſaid, That their firſt Petition was unworthy of Anſwer, that their giving Advice about his Son's Match, and urging him to a War, was Intrenching upon his Prerogative, inſinuating that the Firſt concerning his Son was High-Treaſon. In the latter End he tells them, That he won- ders they ſhould make ſo unjuſt a Comment upon the Words in his Letter to the Speaker, as if he meant to reſtrain them from their ancient Privileges and Li- berties in Parliament: For tho' he cannot allow the Stile, calling it their an- cient and undoubted Right and Inheritance, but rather have wiſh'd they had ſaid, That their Privileges were derived from the Grace and Permiſſion of his Anceſtors and himſelf, ſince moſt of them grew from Precedents, rather ſhow- ing a Tolleration than an Inheritance, yet he gave them his Royal Aſſurance, that as long as they continu'd within the Limits of their Duty, he would be as careful to maintain their Liberties and Privileges, as ever any of his Pre- deceſſors did, nay, as he was to preſerve his own Royal Prerogative.

The Parliaments Reply.

The King's Rejoinder.

But before this Heat aroſe in the Houſe of Commons, the Lords began to conſider how cheap they were made by the Multitude of Iriſh and Scotch Earls and Viſcounts the King had created, not the Natives of thoſe Kingdoms, but private Engliſh Gentlemen, who had purchas'd and aſſum'd thoſe Titles, to get above the Engliſh Barony, contrary to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Land. Therefore a Petition to the King was drawn up and ſign'd by thirty three Lords, praying that the Privilege of their Birth-Rights might be preſerv'd, and a Stop put to this growing Miſchief. The King was extreamly uneaſie at this Petition, not knowing what Conteſts the Endeavours for Place and Prece- dency might produce: And being fully prepar'd, he ſent for the Petitioners ſe- parately, and privately expoſtulated the Buſineſs with them one by one, begin- ning roughly with ſome of them; yet ſtill he clos'd with them at laſt, as tho' his Anger was rais'd to make them humble, and reconcile themſelves to him, that he might the better reconcile himſelf to them. And to the Earl of Eſſex he threw out this Expreſſion, I fear thee not Eſſex, if thou wert as well belov'd as thy Father, and hadſt forty thouſand Men at thy Heels: Which Words were utter'd with ſuch a Force, as if he had chid himſelf for letting him eſcape from him. And tho' this Petition did not derogate from the Dignity of thoſe Creations paſt, yet the King willingly reſtrain'd himſelf for the Time to come.

The Petition of the Lords.

But

But the House of Commons proceeded to bolder Attempts; and judging the King's Letters so many Impediments to their Privileges, and for all the King's Promises the Protestant Religion was unsecure, if the Spanish Match succeeded, they resolv'd, whatever might be the Consequence, to leave some Prints and Footsteps of their Parliamentary Rights and Privileges to their Posterities, as their Ancestors had done to them; and therefore on the nineteenth of December, they register'd the following Protestation in their Journal Book, after they had given two entire Subsidies. That the Liberties, Franchises, Privileges and Jurisdictions of Parliaments, are the ancient and undoubted Birth-Right and Inheritance of the Subjects of England; and that the arduous and urgent Affairs concerning the King, State and Defence of the Realm, and of the Church of England, and the Maintenance and making Laws, and Redress of Mischiefs and Grievances, which daily happen within this Realm, are proper Subjects, and Matter of Council and Debate in Parliament. That in handling and proceeding in such Business, every Member of Parliament hath, and of Right ought to have Freedom of Speech, to propound, treat, reason, and bring the same to Conclusions. That the Commons in Parliament have likewise Liberty and Freedom to treat of these Matters, in such Order as in their Judgments shall seem fittest. That every Member of the said House hath like Freedom; from all Impeachment, Imprisonment and Molestation, other than by Censure of the House it self, for, or concerning any Speaking, Reasoning, or Declaring of any Matter or Matters, touching the Parliament, or Parliament Business. And that if any of the said Members be complain'd of, or question'd for any Thing done or said in Parliament, the same is to be shew'd to the King, by the Advice and Assent of all the Commons assembled in Parliament, before the King give credit to any private Information.

The Commons Protestation.

The King was again alarm'd by this Protestation, and he who naturally lov'd Peace both at home and abroad, had a War rais'd within his own Breast: For if he should be silent or connive at this Protestation, it would remain as a strong Bulwark for the People to Posterity. Therefore neglecting his Pleasures and Health in the Country, he came hastily up to London, and upon the thirtieth of December, in a full Assembly of the Council, and in the Presence of the Judges, he declar'd the said Protestation void, invalid, and of none Effect, and with his Hand took the said Protestation out of the Journal Book of the Clerk of the House of Commons, and commanded an Act of Council to be made thereupon, and this Act to be enter'd in the Register of the Council-Causes. And to put a Stop to all Complaints, as he conceiv'd, on the sixth of January he by a Proclamation dissolv'd the Parliament, after it had continu'd almost a Year, without passing one Act besides the Subsidies, of which the Commons gave two and the Clergy three. The Proclamation set forth, 'That 'the Meeting, Continuing, and Dissolving of Parliaments does so peculiarly 'belong to the King, that he needs not give any Account thereof to any other; 'yet he thought fit to declare, That in the Dissolution of this Parliament he had 'the Advice and uniform Consent of his whole Council; and that some particular Members took inordinate Liberty, not only to treat of his High Prerogatives, and Matters not fit to be argu'd in Parliament, but also to speak di'respectfully of Foreign Princes: That they spent their Time in disputing Pri'vileges, and discanting upon the Words and Syllables of his Letters and Messa'ges; and that these ill temper'd Spirits sow'd Tares among the Corn, and by 'their Carriage have impos'd upon him a Necessity of discontinuing the present 'Parliament. And lastly he declar'd, That tho' the Parliament was broken 'off, yet he intended to govern well; and should be glad to lay hold on the first 'Occasion to call another.

The King oppses it.

The Parliament dissolv'd.

This unexpected Dissolution and Proclamation gave Occasion to several sawcy Tongues to slander their Soveraign and his Government; especially when they found that several eminent Members of the House of Commons, as Sir Edward Cook, Cook, Sir Robert Philips, Mr. Selden, Mr. Pym, Mr. Mallery, and others, were committed to the Tower and other Perſons. They ſaid that Great Britain was now grown leſs than Little England, which had loſt its Strength by Changing of Sexes; and the ſcandalous Story of David Rizio, written by the King's Tutor Buchanan, had dy'd in every Engliſh Man's Opinion, if it had not been reviv'd by theſe Controverſies with the Parliament. And as Troubles bred Diſturbances at home, ſo they caus'd no leſs Diſhonour abroad, for they now deſpis'd the King's Power, as much as they formerly did his Courage; and in the King of Spain's own Towns, in their publick Comedies, they preſented Meſſengers bringing News in haſte, That the Palatinate would ſhortly be repleniſh'd with a moſt formidable Army; For the King of Denmark would furniſh them with a hundred thouſand Pickel'd Herrings, the Hollanders with as many Butter-Boxes, and England with as many Ambaſſadors. In one Place they pictur'd King James with a Scabbard without a Sword, and in another with a Sword that none could draw out, tho' ſeveral were pulling at it; and at Bruſſels they painted him with his Pockets hanging out, and no Mony in them, or his Purſe. And what was highly pitiable, as well as vilely diſhonourable, at Antwerp they pictur'd the unfortunate Queen of Bohemia like a poor Iriſh Mantler, with her Hair diſhevel'd, and her Child on her Back, with the King her Father carrying the Cradel after her. And every one of theſe Pictures had ſeveral Motto's, expreſſing the Fruitfulneſs of their Malice; ſuch Deriſions and Reflections were put upon the King, and in him upon the whole Nation. But Spanhemius more ſeriouſly and ſolemnly ſums up the Ills that attended the Conduct of King James, and his Son-in-law in Germany, 'That thereby the 'Proteſtant Religion was entirely rooted out of Bohemia, the Electoral Dig-'nity transferr'd from the Palatine Family, the Palatinate it ſelf loſt, the 'Liberty of Germany overthrown, and the Famous Library of Heidelberg 'remov'd to Rome, to the irreparable Prejudice of Learning. So that Gondomar ſeem'd to have ſome Reaſon to ſay in one of his Letters to the Duke of Lerma, That he had lull'd King James ſo faſt aſleep, that he hop'd neither the Cries of his Daughter nor her Children, nor the repeated Sollicitations of his Parliament and Subjects on their Behalf, ſhould be able to awaken him.

Cenſures upon it.

Wilſon Ruſhworth Clerendon. Hacket. An. Cand &c.

IX. King James having freed himſelf from the Complainings of a troubleſome Parliament, ſtill retain'd his main Deſigns and Reſolutions of compleating the Marriage of his Son with the Infanta of Spain; where King Philip the Third being lately dead, was ſucceeded by Philip the Fourth. In order to effect this long and dilatory Affair, he ſent the Lord Digby his Ambaſſador Extraordinary into Spain; who landed at St. Andero, a poor Maritime Town in Biſcay, where the People uſually went bare-foot. In that mean Place his Lordſhip had the Patience to ſtay a Fortnight in Expectation of the Spaniſh Court Civilities; but in Reality was ſo ſlighted by tedious and impertinent Delays, and at laſt by baſe and ſordid Accommodations, that it was admir'd how he could bear it, and that the Spaniards were not aſham'd to offer it to an Ambaſſador. It was thought the more ſtrange, ſince King James had now treated the Roman Catholicks at home with ſo much Indulgence, that Gondomar boaſted he had releas'd four thouſand Recuſants by his own Mediation; either to make his Service more acceptable to his Maſter, or to let him ſee how willing King James was to advance that Match which had never been really deſign'd in Spain. Then to expedite the Diſpenſation at Rome, he wrote to ſome of the moſt active Cardinals there, and receiv'd Anſwers from them, by Gage, his Agent, full of promiſing Hopes. And that he might give ſome publick Teſtimony of his Indulgence, he commanded Biſhop Williams, then Lord-Keeper, to paſs Writs under the great Seal, to require the Judges of every Circuit to enlarge all ſuch Papiſts as were impriſon'd for Recuſancy, which was accordingly obſerv'd and perform'd. This Biſhop, as was formerly hinted, ſucceeded ceeded the famous Lord Bacon; and for some Time continu'd in Favour with the Marquess of Buckingham, and the Countess his Mother, whose Creature he was, and who, as it was believ'd, could mold and form him into any Shape to serve their Purposes; but afterwards growing high and stiff, they laid him aside. He was of a comely and stately Presence, which being animated with a great Spirit, made him appear very proud to vulgar Eyes; tho' really as he was a Man of extraordinary Parts, aiming at great Things, so he was of a bountiful Mind to all Men in Want, and a noble Patron to support where Merit wanted a Supply. This was shown in his Treatment of Monsieur de Moulin, a famous Minister of France, driven by Persecution into England; which being told the Bishop, he order'd Doctor Hacket his Chaplain to make him a Visit from him, and likewise to carry him some Mony, not naming any Sum, purposely to sound the Generosity of his Chaplain. Doctor Hacket finding the Bishop to mention no certain Sum said, He could give him no less than twenty Pounds. Upon which his Lordship suddenly answer'd, Is twenty Pounds a fit Present from me to a Man of his Parts and Merits? Take a hundred Pounds, and present it from me, telling him he shall not want, and I will come shortly and visit him my self. Which he afterwards perform'd, and made good his Promise, in supplying him during his Abode in England.

Arch-Bishop Abbot's Misfortune.

About this Time, the Reverend Prelate, Doctor Abbot Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, began to fall into Disgrace at Court, his Enemies taking Advantage of a late sad Misfortune; for shooting at a Deer with a Cross-Bow in Bramzil Park, the Arrow glancing casually kill'd the Keeper. This unfortunate Accident was such a sensible Affliction to this pious Man, that he retir'd to an Alms-House of his own Building at Guilford in Surrey, there to mortifie himself from the Enjoyment of worldly Pleasures. Some were of Opinion that it disabled him from exercising his Episcopal Function; but the King granting a Commission to enquire into the Fact, he found Friends that restor'd him from his Alms-House to his Palace, and he conferr'd a comfortable Subsistance upon the Widow and Children of this unhappily slain Man. But however, having disgusted the King by disapproving the Spanish Match, he never could recover any great Authority; and a Plant was now growing up that overspread him while he liv'd, and after his Decease obtain'd the Primacy. And this was the famous Dr. William Laud, a Person of extraordinary Spirit and Zeal, who was now made Bishop of St. Davids, by the Interest of the Marques of Buckingham and the Lord-Keeper Williams. This great and fiery Man, at Oxford had shown himself a mortal Opposer of the Puritans, of whom Abbot was thought to be a Favourer, and was there charg'd not only with Arminianism, but with holding several of the Romish Tenets. But for the scandalous Manner of his Rise, related by Coke, and pretendedly attested, it is so contrary to probability, that it can deserve no Place in History. The King had been disoblig'd at some Actions of his, therefore Buckingham his great Friend resolv'd to make use of Williams to raise him into the Bishoprick; and Williams knowing the Disposal of the Seal was at the other's Pleasure, found himself oblig'd to become Laud's Advocate to the King. But his Majesty was at first utterly averse, for several Reasons; but the Keeper earnestly persisting, the King at last said, Is there no Hold, but you will carry it! Then take him to you; but on my Soul, you will repent it: And so departed in a great Passion, with other fierce and ominous Words, publickly discours'd in Court; after this Arminianism daily increas'd, and Puritanism was more strictly watch'd; but to restrain the licentious Tongues among either Party, the King issu'd out a Letter to the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, with several good Articles and Directions to all Preachers whatsoever, as may be seen at large in Wilson and Rushworth.

The Rise of Bishop Laud.

As the King now labour'd to settle things at home, and keep his People in Obedience, so he was as active abroad to preserve his own Reputation: For he still ſtill concluded that he ſhould ſalve all Miſcarriages by the intended Match with Spain, and that his People might ſee he could diſcern further into deep Matters of State than they, and ſo make the Error theirs. Therefore he induſtriouſly urg'd it by his Agents and Ambaſſadors, and all Indulgences to Recuſants were admitted to ſmooth and ſoften their Addreſſes. The Lord Vaux, a Roman Catholick, had liberty to tranſport four thouſand Engliſh, to reinforce the King of Spain's Armies, both againſt King James's Confederates of Holland, where his baniſh'd Children had Refuge, and againſt their Country it ſelf the Palatinate, which he had ſo much endeavour'd to preſerve. The Articles of Marriage had taken up much Time in Debate, between the Commiſſioners of the two Kings, before they could be brought to any Form; and thoſe concerning Religion had many various Shapes and Turns, 'till they were dreſs'd to their Satisfaction; and when they were form'd and faſhion'd by them, the Pope ſtript them, and new modell'd them as he pleas'd. So that the ſending and reſending between Spain and Rome, and Rome and Spain, waſted much Time, and might have ſerv'd for a Colour to draw the Treaty in Infinitum. Wherefore King James wrote ſeveral Letters to the Lord Digby, whom he made Earl of Briſtol; and he was commanded to declare plainly to the King of Spain, 'How far the King his Maſter had condeſcended in Matters of Religi-'on, which was more than was capitulated in the late King of Spain's Reign; 'and if that would give Content, to proceed to a Concluſion of the Marriage, 'without further Delay; if otherwiſe, that then without more Loſs of Time, 'the King his Maſter may diſpoſe of his Son, and the King of Spain of the 'Infanta, as they pleas'd. But the Spaniard ſtill continu'd in his former Pace, and would not be ſpurr'd forwards; and the Earl of Briſtol ſtill aſſur'd his Maſter, That the King of Spain, tho' ſlow in his Proceedings, was real in his Intentions. And tho' the Articles were fully drawn up in form, and agreed on both Sides, yet it is plain from the King of Spain's Letter to Olivarez this Year, that the Spaniard never deſign'd the Match at all, in which he poſitively tells him, 'That his Father had the ſame Deſign, as well as himſelf, and 'ſo declar'd upon his Death-Bed; therefore he would have him break it off as 'ſoon as conveniently he could. Thus was King James's Plain-heartedneſs deluded, his Honour blemiſh'd, his Love among his Subjects diminiſh'd, his Childrens Patrimony deſtroy'd, and he himſelf left without any Satisfaction.

The Spaniards unfair Dealings.

This ſtrange and unreaſonable Management in the Court of Spain gave Riſe and Occaſion to a very peculiar if not romantick Project form'd by the Marqueſs of Buckingham, who envy'd the Earl of Briſtol for having the ſole Management of ſo great an Affair. Therefore he took an Opportunity to inſinuate to Prince Charles the common Misfortune of Men of his Rank, 'That in ſo 'nice a Part of their worldly Happineſs, as depended upon their Marriage, 'they had ſo ſmall a Share, uſually depending upon the uncertain Credit of 'others, for the Nature, Humour and Beauty of the Ladies they were to marry. 'Next, how brave and gallant it would appear for his Highneſs to make a 'Journey into Spain, and bring home his Lady; that it would put an End to 'all thoſe ſlow Formalities, which might ſtill retard the Infanta's Voyage for 'ſeveral Months; all which would be immediately remov'd by his engaging 'Appearance: That it would be ſuch a ſingular Obligation to the Infanta, as 'ſhe could never ſufficiently eſteem or requite, as being a Reſpect rarely paid by 'any other Prince, upon the like occaſion: That in the great Affair concern-'ing the Palatinate, it was very probable the King of Spain might readily 'gratifie his perſonal Interpoſition, which in a Treaty with an Ambaſſador 'might be protracted, or attended with the ſtarting of new Difficulties: How-'ever, the Mediation could not but be frankly undertaken by the Infanta her 'ſelf, who would ambitiouſly make it part of her great Debt to the Prince, 'that he might by her Influence preſent to his Majeſty the Peace and Reſti-'tution of his Family; which could not be effected by any other human Means.

A. D. 1623. Reg. 21.

Buckingham's ſtrange Project.

These Discourses made so deep an Impression upon the Mind and Spirit of the Prince, who was naturally inclin'd to Adventures, that he was transported with the Thought of it, and impatiently sollicitous to compass the Design. The most apparent Difficulty was how they should procure the King's Consent, who they knew to be very quick-sighted in discerning Difficulties, and raising Objections, but very slow in mastering and unravelling them; who, not knowing how to struggle with desperate Contingencies, abhorr'd to be involv'd and intangled with them. This was therefore first to be attempted by the Prince himself, and to communicate it to the King as his humble Suit, with this Circumstance, that since all his Actions depended intirely upon his Majesty's own Approbation, he would vouchsafe to promise Not to communicate the thing propos'd, before he had first taken his own Resolution: And that this Condition should be first obtain'd, before the substantial Part should be discover'd; and so this Approach being first made, the Success and Prosecution was to be left to the Credit and Dexterity of the Marquess.

The King acquainted with it.

All things being thus concerted, the two Adventurers soon found a proper Opportunity to make their Approaches. His Majesty chearfully consenting to the main Condition of Secrecy, the Prince upon his Knees declar'd his importunate Suit and Request, while the Marquess stood by, and enlarg'd upon the infinite Obligations his Majesty would accumulate upon the Prince, by his yielding to the tender Passion with which his Highness was transported, which being refus'd, would make a deep Impression upon his Spirits, and be accounted as the greatest Misfortune that could befal him in this World. The Prince taking Opportunity from the good Temper of his Father, insisted upon two Points, That his Presence in Spain would immediately conclude the Marriage, and likewise determine the Restitution of the Palatinate to his Brother and Sister; both which the King passionately desir'd. These Discourses, urg'd with the utmost Artifice and Address, so prevail'd upon the King, that with less Hesitation than was usual, and much less than was agreeable to his Wisdom and Character, he gave his Approbation and Consent that the Prince should make the Journey he so earnestly desir'd. They therefore, to prevent any new Measures which a solemn Preparation for so rash an Undertaking might gradually occasion, as soon as they had gain'd the King's Promise upon the main, represented, 'That the Security of such a Design depended on Expedition; that were 'they to stay either for the equipping a Fleet fit to attend the Prince of Wales, 'or till a Pass might be obtain'd from France, the principal Ends of their Jour-'ney would by Delays be disappointed: That therefore, since the Design had 'hitherto been a Secret to all but themselves, they might with the Attendance 'of only two Servants, get through France, before they could be miss'd at 'Whitehall: Which indeed was very probable, and so the more readily consented to by the King; the Time of their Departure, the Servants that were to attend them, and whatever else should be thought necessary, being defer'd 'till a second Consultation on the next Day.

The King consents to the Prince's Journey.

But when the timorous King in his Retirement came seriously to revolve what had been so loosely consulted, as he had a wonderful Sagacity in such Reflections, a thousand Dangers and Difficulties occurr'd to his distracted Thoughts; suggested as well by the violent Affection of a Father to his only Son, as the Influence he thought it might have on his People, too much inclin'd to murmur, and complain of the least Inadvertency; together with the Reputation he should forfeit among all Foreign Princes, if he so much departed from his Dignity, as to expose the immediate Heir of three Kingdoms to all the Jealousies and Dangers that might arise from that fathomless Abyss, Reason of State. These Reflexions were so terrible to him, that they robb'd him of all Peace and Rest; so that when the Prince and Marquess came to him about the Dispatch, he fell into a violent Passion with Tears, and told them, That he was undone, and that it would break his Heart, if they pursu'd their Resolution. Then he recounted recounted to them all the numerous Difficulties and Miſchiefs that had occurr'd to himſelf in his Retirement; particularly obſerving to the Marqueſs, who was already unpopular to the higheſt Degree, how unevitable his Ruin muſt be; concluding with that Diſorder and Paſſion with which he began, and with Sighs and Tears conjur'd them, That they would no longer urge him to conſent to a thing ſo contrary to his Reaſon and Underſtanding, the Performance of which would prove his Death. The Prince and the Marqueſs took no Pains to anſwer any of his Majeſty's Reaſons: His Highneſs only reminded him of the Promiſe he had made the Day before, Which if he ſhould violate, it would make him never think of Marriage more. But the Marqueſs, who better knew what Arguments would prevail, treated him more rudely, and with all the Inſolence of a Favourite told him, His Breach of a Promiſe ſo ſolemnly made, would ruin his Credit with all Mankind; that ſome Raſcal had furniſh'd him with his pitiful Reaſons; and that it would be ſuch a Diſobligation to the Prince, whoſe Heart was fix'd upon the Journey after his Majeſty's Approbation, that he could never forget it, nor forgive any Man who had been the Occaſion of it. So that at length the Prince by his humble and importunate Entreaties, and Buckingham by his rougher Dialect, prevail'd ſo far, that the Debate upon the Journey was reſum'd, in which it was agreed, That they ſhould take their leaves of the King in two Days, his Highneſs pretending to hunt at Theobalds, and the Marqueſs to take Phyſick at Chelſey.

Buckingham bullies him.

They next proceeded to the manner of Attendance, and told the King, That being to have no more than two in their Company, they had fix'd upon Sir Francis Cottington, and Endymion Porter, who were both grateful to the King, the former being Secretary to the Prince, and the other of his Bed-Chamber; ſo that his Majeſty wiſh'd that it might be immediately imparted to them, becauſe many things might occur to them, as neceſſary to the Journey, which they two would not think on. Whereupon Sir Francis Cottington, waiting then in the outward Room, was quickly brought in; to whom the King ſaid, Here is Baby Charles and Stenny (for ſo he uſually call'd the Marqueſs) have a Mind to go Poſt into Spain, to fetch home the Infanta, and deſigning to have but two in their Company, have choſen you for one, what think you of the Journey? Sir Francis, ſurpriz'd and trembling at the Conſequence, reply'd, That he could not think well of it; for the Spaniards, when they had the Prince in Poſſeſſion, would make what new Overtures they believ'd moſt advantageous to themſelves, and among the reſt, many that concern'd Religion, and the Exerciſe of it in England, and by that means ruin all the Attempts that have been for the compleating the Match. Upon this the King threw himſelf upon his Bed, and ſaid, I told you this before, and fell into new Paſſion and Lamentation, That he was undone, and ſhould looſe Baby Charles! Hereupon the Marqueſs reproach'd Cottington with all poſſible Bitterneſs of Words, and told him, That the King only ask'd him about the Journey, and beſt Way of Travelling, and not his Advice upon Matters of State, which he had the Preſumption to give againſt his Maſter, and which he ſhould repent as long as he liv'd. This threw the poor King into a new Agony, on the behalf of a Servant like to ſuffer for anſwering honeſtly, upon which he reply'd with ſome Heat, and a profane Oath, You are very much to blame to uſe him thus; he has anſwer'd like an honeſt and wiſe Man to the Queſtion I ask'd him, and you know 'tis no more than I told you before he came in. However, after all this Paſſion and Heats on both ſides, the King yielded; having by this plainly diſcover'd that the whole Intrigue was firſt contriv'd by the Marqueſs, and now purſu'd by his Spirit and Impetuoſity.

He yields.

The two Adventurers being ready, with their two Attendants, ſet forwards with falſe Beards to cover their ſmooth Faces, and paſs'd towards Dover under the Names of Jack Smith and Tom Smith, in all Places leaving greater Impreſſions of their Bounty than was agreeable with their Diſguiſes. At Dover the officious Mayor examin'd them ſo ſtrictly, that the Marqueſs was forc'd to diſcover himſelf in private, and tell him he was going to viſit the Fleet; ſo they had liberty to take Shipping, and landed at Boleign the ſame Day, making the ſwifteſt Motion by Poſt-Horſes 'till they arriv'd at Paris. There the Prince ſpent one Day to view the Grandeur of the City, and Splendor of the Court; and they both together ſaw the Queen Mother at Dinner, the King in the Gallery after Dinner, and towards the Evening they had a full View of the Queen Infanta, and the Princeſs Henrietta Maria, with moſt of the Beauties of the Court, at the Practice of a Masking Dance; being admitted by the Duke of Montbaſon, the Queen's Lord-Chamberlain, in Courteſie to Strangers, when many of the French were refus'd. Here the Prince ſaw thoſe Eyes, which afterwards ſo inflam'd his Heart, that it was thought to be one Occaſion of inflaming three Kingdoms. From Paris they paſs'd with all Expedition to Bourdeaux, where the Duke d'Eſpernon, Governor of the City, offer'd them the Civilities of his Houſe; but Sir Francis Cottington, handſomly declin'd the Invitation by informing him, That they were Gentlemen that deſir'd to improve themſelves, and had not Breeding ſuitable to his Grandeur. They met with ſome Difficulties alſo at Bayonne, the laſt Town in France, where the Count de Gramont was Governor; who being a pregnant Man read ſomething extraordinary in their Looks, but this being a Time of Peace, he out of ordinary Civility let them paſs: Yet within a few Hours after they had taken Poſt, he had Notice by a Courier from the Spaniſh Ambaſſador to the Engliſh Court, that the Prince of England was among them; ſo that the Prince had great Fortune in meeting with ſuch little Interruption, when the French might have made great Advantages by ſtopping his Paſſage.

They arrive in Spain.

Upon Saturday the ſixth of March they arriv'd at Madrid; where the Prince and Marqueſs came one Day before Cottington and Porter, to raiſe the leſs Noiſe in Appearances. They lighted at the Earl of Briſtol's Houſe in the Evening, where the Marqueſs brought in the Portmanteau, while his Maſter ſtaid without with the Guide, 'till he had prepar'd a way for Privacy. The Earl of Briſtol was aſtoniſh'd at the Sight; and the next Morning the City was fill'd with Rumours of the Arrival of ſome great Prince; which was ſufficiently known to the King of Spain, tho' he thought fit to conceal it. In the Evening Buckingham and Briſtol went to Court, and had private Audience of the King, who ſent his grand Favourite Olivarez back with them, to congratulate the Prince's Arrival, who let the Prince know how infinitely happy his Maſter was in the Enjoyment of him there, and that the Obligation was ſo great, that he deſerv'd to have the Infanta thrown into his Arms; all this while kneeling, kiſſing his Hands, and imbracing his Thigh, with all the Marks of Spaniſh Humility. Next he addreſs'd himſelf to the Marqueſs of Buckingham, telling him, That now the Prince of England was in Spain, his Maſter and he would divide the World between them, with other Flights of Rhetorick and Fancy. After his Departure, about ten a Clock at Night, the King of Spain came in a cloſe Coach to viſit the Prince, who having Notice of his coming, met him in the Way; and there they ſpent ſome Time in ſuch Careſſes and Embraces as are uſual at the Interviews of great Princes and Monarchs. Gondomar, lately return'd, had alſo his peculiar Compliment the next Day; for he declar'd to the Prince, That he had ſtrange News to tell him, which was, That an Engliſhman was ſworn Privy-Counſellor to the King of Spain; meaning himſelf, who had lately receiv'd that Honour, tho' he was an Engliſhman in his Heart.

Their kind Reception.

The common Sort did highly applaud this brave Adventure, and expreſs'd his Welcome by Shouts and Acclamations of Joy; and immediately they marry'd him to the Infanta, as it were by publick Voice. The King and Council contriv'd how to give his Highneſs the moſt honourable Reception, and decreed, that upon all Occaſions of Meeting he ſhould have the Precedency of the King;

King; that he ſhould make his Entrance into the Royal Palace, in the ſame State that the Kings of Spain us'd to do on the Day of their Coronation, and that one of the chief Quarters in the King's Palace ſhould be prepar'd for his Lodgings; that a hundred of the Guard ſhould attend him, and all the Council obey him as the King's own Perſon. A general Pardon was publiſh'd; the Priſons were open'd, and hundreds of Offenders were ſet at Liberty; and a late Proclamation againſt Exceſs in Apparel was revok'd. The following Day after Dinner the King came in Perſon, with his Favourite Olivarez, and ſeveral other of the Nobility, to conduct the Prince from the Town to the Court, having Horſes and all Equipage proper for ſuch Shew and Grandeur. Thus nobly mounted, they rod through the Streets under a Canopy in as much State as at a Coronation, the Prince riding on the King's right Hand. The Queen and the Infanta from a Window in the Court ſaw them; and when they diſmounted the Infanta retir'd, and the Queen went to her Chamber, in Expectation of a Viſit. When the King and Prince enter'd her Room, ſhe roſe to meet them, making a low Obeiſance to the Prince, which he return'd with a profound reverential Bow; and after ſome Compliments, they ſat down on three Royal Seats, the Queen in the middle, and the Prince on her right Hand; when after half an Hour's Converſation, the Queen brought the Prince to the utmoſt Extent of her Chamber, and the King to a ſtately Appartment provided for him. Immediately after the Queen by her Major-domo gave him a further Welcome, with ſeveral rich Preſents of Perfumes, and coſtly wearing Linnen; and the King ſent him two Golden Keys, which would open all his private Lodgings, and his Bed-Chamber, letting him know, that he had free Acceſs to him at all Hours. Here he was conſtantly attended and ſerv'd with Grandees and Titulados, as the King himſelf; and was entertain'd with many Shows and Triumphs, and ſeveral daily Paſtimes. And one Day running at the Ring, in Company of many of the Nobility, his Highneſs was the only Perſon that bore the Ring away, and that in the Preſence of the Infanta his Miſtreſs; which was interpreted as a fortunate Preſage at the Beginning of his Atchievement. In ſum, there wanted nothing that human Invention could produce to manifeſt and diſplay the Height of outward Glory. And now the Engliſh Nobility came over in great Numbers into Spain, and the Marqueſs of Buckingham had the new Title of Duke ſent him by King James, that he might be in the higheſt Rank among the Spaniſh Grandees; and the Prince was ſo encircled with a magnificent Retinue of his own People, that it might be ſaid, there was an Engliſh Court in the Palace of the King of Spain.

The Prince highly honour'd

When all the ſplendid Ceremonies were a little over, the Prince began to conſider the main Buſineſs of his Journey, and deſir'd a more intimate Acceſs to his Miſtreſs, which Olivarez promis'd from Day to Day, but ſtill delay'd: But at length, when unperform'd Promiſes were heighten'd into Shame, he plainly confeſs'd that it was agreed by the King and Council, That he might not ſee her as a Lover, 'till the Diſpenſation came from Rome; but he had ſometimes Acceſs to her as a Prince in a publick Way, the King of Spain being always preſent, and the Earl of Briſtol Interpreter. It was obſerv'd that the Prince had ſometimes his Eyes immovably fix'd upon the Lady for half an Hour together, in a thoughtful ſpeculative Poſture, othertimes he watch'd a full Hour in a cloſe Coach in the Streets to ſee her as ſhe went abroad; and one particular Time, he climb'd over a lofty Wall, and hazarded his Life, to ſee her in a Garden. But now the chief Obſtructions ſeem'd to have proceeded from the Pope, who us'd all Endeavours to cauſe the Prince to turn Catholick; the People of Spain were not a little elevated with ſuch Hopes, and Promiſes were made to him of great Aſſiſtance, if his own People ſhould rebel upon that Conſideration. Orations and Proceſſions and pompous Shows were made to allure him; Popiſh Books were dedicated, and Popiſh Pictures were preſented to him; they carry'd him to the moſt Religious Places, and to Perſons famous for for pretended Miracles; and the Pope himself wrote a smooth insinuating Letter to him, and another to the Duke of Buckingham, to bring about this glorious Conversion. He return'd a civil Answer to the Pope's Letter, but as he had first answer'd Olivarez, He came not thither for Religion, but for a Wife, so he remain'd stedfast in his Religion, nor did he express any shew of Change, when he was under the greatest Temptations.

His Inclinations for the Infanta.

A. D. 1623. Reg. 21. At length, after innumerable Scruples and Impediments, the long sollicited Dispensation came from Pope Gregory to the Court of Spain, but so clog'd that it caus'd new Delays and Difficulties, which where at last surmounted by the King of Spain, who now began to be seriously inclin'd to the Match, and caus'd it to be publickly declar'd at Madrid. After which certain Articles, to the Number of twenty three, were sign'd and sworn to by the King of England, the Prince and Privy-Council. These were stil'd by the Cardinals, 'Propositions for the right Augmentation and Weal of the Roman Catholick Religion, and were much of the same Nature with those of which we have given the Substance, Page 947; only in one Article it was provided 'That 'the Sons and Daughters that should be born of Marriage, should be brought 'up in the Company of the Infanta, at least 'till the Age of ten Years. Besides these publick Articles, which were confirm'd under the Great Seal of England, Rushworth has given us some private Articles, sworn to by King James and the Prince, greatly to the Advantage of the Romanists in England; but of these Nalson justly doubts, as being too much void of Proof, as well as Probability. Thus the great Business seem'd to have been accomplish'd; which gave King James so much Satisfaction, that being transported with an Assurance of the Match, he was heard to say, Now all the Devils in Hell cannot break it; to which one softly reply'd, There was never a Devil left in Hell, for they were all gone into Spain to make it up. In Spain the Infanta was stil'd The Princess of England, and was kept no longer in her Virgin Retirements. In England a Chappel was building for her at St. James's, and Don Carlos, the Spanish Ambassador, laid the first Stone: Her Picture was every where to be seen, and a Fleet was prepar'd for her Passage; and the greatest Enemies to the Alliance submitted to the King's Will. But in all this Capitulation between the two Crowns, the Restitution of the Palatinate was laid aside; the King conceiving that the Consummation of the Match would over-rule and settle that Affair to his intire Satisfaction. The French were very apprehensive of this Conjunction, and thought it safest to make Peace at home, and employ their Strength to bound the Incroachments of the Emperor and King of Spain: By which means a severe Persecution ceas'd in that Kingdom; the Protestants were permitted to call home their banish'd Ministers, to build their ruin'd Churches, and enjoy their Liberty in Religion. This Happiness did King James's joining with Spain procure to an almost ruin'd People.

Articles of the Marriage.

King James's Satisfaction.

But after all the King's Concessions, the Spaniards contriv'd new Delays, and propos'd harder Terms; and the Pope had oblig'd the Catholick King to see the Conditions perform'd, and to protract the Marriage, 'till Matters in England were put in perfect Execution. Whereupon the Divines advis'd the King, that the Promises of Marriage be immediately made, but the Consummation and the Delivery of the Infanta, be deferr'd 'till May in the following Year. But while they were contriving new Remora's, Pope Gregory that granted the Dispensation dy'd, which furnish'd them with a Pretence that the Dispensation was now invalid; yet with a Reserve to keep up the Prince's Spirit, That it should be no Hindrance to the Match, for the new Pope would immediately perform his Part; and the King of Spain assur'd the Prince, That if he would stay 'till Christmass, the Marriage should then be really celebrated. These repeated Delays, and continu'd Obstructions, caus'd the Duke of Buckingham, who was highly disoblig'd at Olivarez, to send home such provoking Accounts of the Spanish Procrastinations, that King James writ to Buckingham

in the moſt expreſs Terms to bring his Son back with all ſpeed, and if his Son's Youthful Follies ſhou'd tie him to a longer Expectation, he charg'd him upon his Allegiance to come away, and leave him there. This Letter was immediately ſhown by the Duke to the Prince, which ſo effectually wrought upon him, that he took up a ſudden Reſolution to return into England. Of which the Grandees in Spain having Notice, they were exceedingly concerned, for their Deſign was to detain the Prince there all Winter, not only hoping to turn him to their Religion, but to marry him to the Infanta, that ſhe being with Child before the Spring, they might keep her there 'till ſhe was deliver'd, that ſo the Child might be educated and naturaliz'd a Spaniard, both in Affection and Religion, which this ſudden Reſolution hindering, it extreamly ſtartled them. Olivarez charg'd the Duke of Buckingham with giving him Aſſurance of the Prince's turning Catholick, which the Duke told him was falſe; which caus'd very angry and reſenting Expreſſions on both ſides: So that the Duke, not regarding a ceremonious Farewel, departed haſtily a little before the Prince, pretending to prepare the Engliſh Fleet that lay at Port St. Andero for the Prince's Tranſportation. According to his open Temper, at his Departure, he told Olivarez, That he was oblig'd to the King, Queen and Infanta, in an eternal Tie of Gratitude; but for himſelf, he had ſo far diſoblig'd him, that he could not, without Flattery, make the leaſt Profeſſion of Friendſhip for him. Olivarez gave a ſhort Reply, That he accepted of what he had ſpoken. The Duke departing with ſo little Satisfaction, the Spaniards concluded, that he would endeavour by all Means poſſible to hinder the Marriage. Buckingham's Departure.

But his Highneſs had gain'd an univerſal Love and Eſteem, and was look'd upon to be a truly noble, diſcreet, and well deſerving Prince; his grave Deportment ſuited with the very Genius of that Nation, which during the whole Stay was ſupported with the greateſt Affability, Solidity and Conſtancy, and at his Departure, with unparallel'd Bounty, preſenting Jewels of ineſtimable Value to the Infanta, and ſeveral Grandees. Before which, the King of Spain and the Prince both took ſolemn Oaths to accompliſh the Marriage, and to make the Eſpouſals ten Days after the Diſpenſation from the new Pope ſhould arrive; and a Procuration was ſeal'd by the Prince to the King of Spain, and his Brother, and left in the Hands of the Earl of Briſtol, to ſtop the Delivery of the Proxies, 'till further Direction from him, alledging, That the Infanta might retire into a Cloiſter, and defraud him of a Wife; but theſe Inſtructions were to be conceal'd from the Earl, 'till the Diſpenſation came from Rome. The Eſpouſals agreed.

After ſix Months Stay, to the vaſt Expence of the Kings of England and Spain, the Prince took a moſt ſolemn Farewel of the Queen and Infanta, who look'd upon the Marriage as compleated in Effect; and the Infanta caus'd many Divine Duties to be perform'd, for the Safety of his Return into England, expecting to follow him in no long Space. When the Prince told her, His Heart could never be out of Anxiety, 'till ſhe had paſs'd the intended Voyage, and was ſafe on the Britiſh Land, ſhe anſwer'd with a modeſt Bluſh, That if ſhe were in Danger upon the Ocean, or diſcompos'd with the rolling Waves, ſhe ſhould take Courage, and remember all the Way to whom ſhe was going. The King himſelf conducted him as far as the Eſcurial, and there nobly feaſted him; and at the Minute of parting acknowledg'd the Obligation which his Highneſs had laid upon him, by putting himſelf in his Hands, a thing ſo unuſual with Princes: Proteſting, He earneſtly deſir'd a nearer Conjunction of Brotherly Affection, for the more intire Unity between them. The Prince extoll'd the high Favours he had found during his Aboad in his Court and Preſence, which had begotten ſuch an Eſtimation of his Worth, as he knew not how to value; but he would leave a Mediator to ſupply his own Defects, if he would make him ſo happy as to continue him in her good Opinion, his moſt fair and moſt dear Miſtreſs. From thence, attended with a Train of Spaniſh Courtiers to the Engliſh Fleet, he took Shipping, with great Hazard to his Perſon; This Prince's Departure.

Perſon; and it was obſerv'd, That the firſt Words he ſpoke after he was embarqu'd, were, That it was a great Weakneſs and Folly in the Spaniard, to grant him a free Paſſage, after they had us'd him ſo ill. He arriv'd at Portſmouth on the fifth of October, and ſoon appear'd to be the Kingdom's Delight and Darling; the Peoples Hearts were fir'd at the Sight and News of him, and unanimouſly prais'd God, without any publick Edict of Thankſgiving. Publick Societies and private Families overflow'd with the moſt rapturous Expreſſions of Pleaſure and Wonder; and when he enter'd London, the Bonfires, which the Peoples Joy had kindled, ſeem'd to turn the City into one Flame.

His Arrival in England.

The King was then at Royſton, to whom the Prince and Duke of Buckingham rod Poſt, and gave him a fair and plauſible Narration of all their Proceedings, laying the whole Weight of Odium upon the Spaniſh Delays, and the Earl of Briſtol's Miſcarriages; which the King, as an indulgent Father to his Son, and a kind Friend to his Favourite, took for current Payment, without further Examination. And to retaliate the former Uſage of the Spaniards, the Prince and Duke join'd with thoſe of the Council and Nobility who were averſe to the Spaniſh Match, cementing their Power with that Strength, that a Parliament was to be call'd, and the People conſulted; that they laying open the fraudulent Proceedings of the Spaniard, the King's Juſtice in breaking the Treaty might be more conſpicuous to the World. The News of a Parliament to break this Match was quickly carry'd through the Nation; and, according to their Expectations, it prov'd very grateful to the People, and gain'd them much Reſpect and Honour. But the firſt thing they did was to procure an abſolute Command from the King to the Earl of Briſtol, to ſuſpend the Delivery of the Proxy 'till Chriſtmaſs, tho' the Diſpenſation ſhould come ſooner; and being reſolv'd to affront the King of Spain for his former Delays, Briſtol in his Letter had poſitive Inſtructions to demand the Reſtitution of the Palatinate and the Electoral Dignity, which had been wav'd and neglected in the Concluſion of the Treaty: The King in his Letter writing, It would be very ſtrange in me to receive one Daughter in Joy, and leave another in Sighs and Tears. But Briſtol's Power of deferring the Eſpouſals 'till Chriſtmaſs, was to be kept within his own Breaſt, and not made publick, 'till the Diſpenſation ſhould come to diſcover it: And there was a Clauſe in the Procuration left by the Prince, that the Power of that Inſtrument ſhould expire at Chriſtmaſs; ſo that the Execution of it was to be reſpited 'till it was altogether invalid. All this was extreamly ungrateful to the Earl of Briſtol, wo had ſo long labour'd, and was ſtill endeavouring to bring about the Match.

New Propoſals to Spain.

In the mean Time the Spaniards made all ſolemn Proviſions for the accompliſhing ſo glorious a Work; and the King of Spain ſent a ſpecial Ambaſſador into England to congratulate the Prince's happy Voyage and ſafe Return; and from thence he had Inſtructions to go into Flanders, Germany and Italy, to make known to all Princes, Potentates and Allies, how near the Treaty of Marriage was to be conſummated. As ſoon as the Diſpenſation came from the new Pope, in the Beginning of December, Bonfires were made throughout all Spain, and the great Ordnance every where thunder'd out the general Joy. The ninth of the Month was prefix'd for the Marriage Day, a noble Terras was erected between the Court and the next Church, almoſt a quarter of a Mile in length, cover'd with Tapeſtry, for the greater Magnificence, and all things appointed in the higheſt State for ſuch an extraordinary Solemnity. Great Preſents were providing in the Court of Spain for King James and the Prince; the Infanta's Family, deſign'd for England, was ſettled and eſtabliſh'd; ſhe had prepar'd the richeſt Suits for her Lord and Husband, had long practis'd the Engliſh Tongue to make it Natural, and began to draw the Letters which ſhe deſign'd to have written the Day of her Eſpouſals to the Prince her Husband, and the King her Father-in-Law. Her Journey into England was reſolv'd to be in the Beginning of March; and tho' her Portion was not nam'd in the Articles, ticles, yet it was fix'd at no leſs than two Millions of Mony, which was four Times as much as had been given with any Daughter of Spain. In this State and Perfection were the Affairs of Spain, when King James's Commands at once blaſted all this blooming Glory: For Briſtol had now Orders to declare poſitively to the King of Spain, That without the Reſtoration of the Palatinate, and the Electoral Dignity, the Treaty ſhould proceed no further; which was a ſtrange Surprize to the King and Infanta, when the one was like to loſe his Honour, and the other her Lover. His Anſwer was, That the Palatinate was none of his to give, and the Electorate was in the Power of another; but if the Emperor and the Duke of Bavaria would not yield to Reaſon, he would arm himſelf againſt them. But this Anſwer was not Satisfactory from one who had us'd ſo many ſubtle Pretenſions, and had been a prime Inſtrument in the Ruin of the Count Palatine. Therefore, a Breach being apparent, the King of Spain ſent to the Earl of Briſtol to demand no more Audiences of him, to deliver no more Letters to the Infanta, and gave Command that none hereafter ſhould call her Princeſs of England. This was the End of the famous ſeven Years Treaty; in which the King of England, a King of Peace, notwithſtanding all the Spaniſh Armado's, gain'd the Victory; and Spain for many Years did not receive ſo retaliating and diſhonourable a Defeat. And this was an Amazement to the Chriſtian World, that when the Match was brought to ſuch Perfection, the Motion ſhould be rejected by that Side, which purſu'd it with ſo much Eagerneſs and unweary'd Patience; which by ſome has been call'd a Maſter-piece, by others a Myſtery of State, of which many various and uncertain Conjectures have been made.

The Match ſuddenly broke.

With the Breach of this Spaniſh Match ended the Life of the famous Antiquary and Hiſtorian Mr. William Camden, Clerenceaux King at Arms, in the ſeventy fourth Year of his Age; a Perſon highly eſteem'd by Foreigners, as well as thoſe of his own Country. The latter are oblig'd to him not only for his noble Productions, but alſo for his Munificence in founding a Hiſtory-Profeſſorſhip in the Univerſity of Oxford; doubly immortalizing his Name, both in his own happy Diſcoveries, and the laudable Incouragement given to the Labours of Poſterity and future Ages.

X. We are now approaching to the laſt great Turn of Affairs in this Reign, which had ſuch remarkable Effects in the next, namely the Marriage with France, which Buckingham had been a conſiderable Time in contriving and projecting. This Duke having by a long Converſe made himſelf Favourite to the Prince, as well as to the King, perſuaded his Highneſs to look back to the Beauty he had ſeen in France, which was nearer to him, and probably more eaſie to be obtain'd. But the Treaty with Spain ought firſt to be diſſolv'd, to give a Colour of Honour to a Proceeding with the other; and that was what nothing but a Parliament could fully accompliſh, who once removing the Cauſe, a Treaty of Peace, were beſt able to make good the Effect, which would be a War that muſt follow it. Therefore a Parliament was ſummon'd the twelfth Day of February; when the Grief that the ſudden Death of the Duke of Richmond had given the King, caus'd it to be deferr'd to the nineteenth of the ſame Month. Here the King in a long and very obliging Speech, 'us'd his utmoſt 'Endeavours to ſweeten the Parliament into a good Opinion of all his 'Actions, and of his ſincere Deſires to comply with them in every thing, for 'the Good of the Kingdom, and his utter Averſion to the Infringement of 'their Liberties. He deſir'd to be accounted the Husband of his People; 'and becauſe he was blam'd for Remiſsneſs in Maintenance of Religion, and in-'couraging a Toleration to Papiſts, he declar'd, As God ſhould judge him, he 'never thought, or ever in Words expreſs'd any thing that ſavour'd of it: On-'ly ſometimes, for ſpecial Reaſons, he did not ſo fully put the Laws in Exe-'cution, but conniv'd at ſome things that might have hinder'd more weighty

A. D. 1624. Reg. 22.

The fourth Parliament in this Reign.

'Affairs. As to what related to the breaking off the Spaniſh Match, he re-
'ferr'd them to the Prince and Duke of Buckingham, to give them Satisfaction
'in that Affair. And towards the latter End he declar'd, He ſpoke as a Chri-
'ſtian King, that never any Traveller, in the burning, dry and ſandy De-
'ſarts, more thirſted for Water to quench his Thirſt, than he did for a happy
'Concluſion of this Parliament, and that it might atone for the Miſcarriages
'of the three former.

Within three or four Days, the Prince began to ſpeak of the Spaniſh Affairs in Parliament, in which he forgot not to mention the Duke of Buckingham with more than ordinary Affection, who obſerving the heavy Reſentment the King had of what was paſt, and the Affection he ſtill bore to the Spaniſh Treaty, reſolv'd to uſe all poſſible Means to ingratiate himſelf with the Parliament and People, who he knew always deteſted the Match, and indeed any Alliance with Spain. So when at a Conference between the two Houſes, which his Highneſs and the Duke were deſir'd to manage, the Prince had made a ſhort Introduction, and commended the Duke for his great Care of him in Spain, and his Dexterity in bringing him away, he referr'd the whole Relation to him, who before that auguſt Body declar'd, 'That the real Deſign of the 'Prince's Journey into Spain, had been to make a clear Diſcovery of the Spani- 'ard's Integrity, and if he was ſincere in what he pretended. That the Am-
'baſſador, who had the ſole Management of that great Affair, wrote in one 'Diſpatch that all was concluded, and in the next, that new Difficulties and 'freſh Demands were ſtarted and inſiſted upon. Theſe Ebbs and Floods made 'the Prince apprehend, that their Buſineſs was to amuſe us while they had 'other ſecret Deſigns in Agitation; and thereupon his Highneſs had prevail'd
'upon his Father that he might make that Journey. That they were no ſoon-
'er arriv'd at Madrid, than they diſcover'd their Purpoſe never was to give him
'the Infanta. That inſtead of proceeding upon the Articles, which were 'thought concluded, they urg'd new Demands, and that ſo peremptorily
'in Matters of Religion, that the principal Clergy-Men, and moſt eminent of 'the King's Preachers, had not only frequent Conferences with the Prince to 'perſuade him to turn Papiſt, but had procur'd the Pope to write a Letter
'himſelf to his Highneſs upon the ſame Subject; but it had pleas'd God to give 'him not only a conſtant and unſhaken Heart in his Religion, but ſuch
'Strength of Argument to defend the ſame, that they ſtood amaz'd to hear him,
'and confeſs'd they were not able to anſwer him. That the Prince was never per'mitted to confer with his Miſtreſs, and very rarely to ſee her, even when they 'pretended he was upon the Point of Marrying. That they never could obtain a 'more Satisfactory Anſwer in the Buſineſs of the Palatinate, than That it 'was not in the King of Spain's Power to reſtore it, tho' it had been taken by 'the ſole Power of Spain, and ſtill'd poſſeſs'd by their Forces; ſo that he was 'well aſſur'd there was no more real Intention in that Point of Reſtitution,
'than in the other of Marriage, and that there was no Hopes of recovering the 'Palatinate by any other Means than that of Force, which would eaſily effect
'it. Throughout his whole Diſcourſe he frequently reflected upon the Earl of Briſtol, as if he was privy to the Spaniſh Deſigns, and concurr'd with them; that therefore the King had recall'd him, that he might account for all his Miſcarriages. Whereas in reality his Majeſty had ſent for him, rather to aſſiſt him againſt the Duke, than to expoſe him to his Malice and Fury.

Buckingham's Narrative of the Spaniſh Treaty.

The Parliament applaud him.

The Conference ended in an high Applauſe of the Prince's and Duke's Behaviour, and the Parliament, who had before look'd upon the Duke with a Malignant Eye, for tempting the Prince to ſo dangerous a Journey, when they found what extraordinary Effects it had produc'd, forgot all former Murmurings, and could ſcarce contain from acknowledging him the Preſerver of the Nation: His Diſcovery was highly extoll'd, and he ſoon became the Favourite of the Multitude. But the King himſelf was infinitely offended, when he he heard what the Duke had ſo confidently avow'd, without any Authority or Direction from him, a great Part of which himſelf knew to be falſe; ſo that he only wanted the Aſſiſtance of a reſolute brisk Counſellor to deſtroy the Duke, and ſuch a one he promis'd himſelf in the Earl of Briſtol, whom he daily expected. However he reſolv'd to comply in all things with his Parliament, who now wiſely paſs'd over all Reflections upon particular Perſons; and having the Treaty of Marriage with Spain put into their Hands, they cruſh'd that Serpent in the Head, by adviſing the King to break the Treaty, and proclaim open War againſt the King of Spain, proteſting to aſſiſt the King in the regaining the Palatinate, with their Lives and Fortunes. But the timorous King, apprehending that when the War was begun there would not be ſufficient Means to maintain it, thank'd the Parliament for their Advice, and anſwer'd That he would conſider better of it. The Parliament finding the King begin to ſtagger and ſink, were reſolv'd to rouſe and keep up his Spirits; and therefore they offer'd him an extraordinary Aid of three intire Subſidies, and three Fifteenths and Tenths, payable in the Compaſs of one Year, and ſo cloſely urg'd him to the Beginning of the War, that he had no longer Room to make an Evaſion, but was forc'd to declare both againſt the Emperor and the King of Spain, according to their Advice. Upon which it was reſolv'd, ſhortly to ſend ſix thouſand Men to join with the Forces of the States of Holland, that by weakning the Spaniards in the Netherlands, they might have a freer Acceſs into Germany, for the Recovery of the Palatinate.

They diſſolve the Spaniſh Treaty.

The Diſſolution of the Treaties with Spain, and the Preparations for War reſounding in every Ear, gave ſuch an Alarm to the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, the Marqueſs of Inoioſa, that he reſolv'd to act his Revenge againſt the Duke of Buckingham. In order to effect it, by a Stratagem he thruſt a Paper into the King's Hands, containing the Particulars of ſome ſtrange and deſperate Deſigns form'd by the Duke againſt his Majeſty, in which the Prince himſelf wanted not his Share; which were ſo plauſibly drawn up, as might have diſtracted a Mind far leſs timorous than his own. This Contrivance ſo prevail'd upon the King, that he became deeply thoughtful and melancholy, and would entertain the Prince and Duke with no Diſcourſe but Riddles and broken Sentences, that like Flaſhes of Lightning from a dark Cloud, ſhew'd a Storm was gathering within. Immediately the Prince and Duke concluded themſelves in Danger; and upon Enquiry found that the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, and Maeſtro a Jeſuit of that Nation, had been with the King, and that ſome of the Ambaſſador's Family had boaſted, That they had ſenſibly wounded the Duke, and laid ſuch a Train as ſhould blow the Parliament in pieces. The King, amidſt theſe terrible Anxieties, prepar'd for Windſor, hoping to divert and eaſe his over-charg'd Imaginations: And at the End of April he took Coach together with the Prince, but made ſome ſlight Pretence to leave Buckingham behind him, as he was putting his Foot into the Coach: At which he broke out into Tears, and humbly begg'd of his Majeſty To tell him his Crime, that he might confeſs it, or clear himſelf. To which the King only reply'd with a profound Sigh, That he was the moſt unhappy Wretch alive, to be forſaken by thoſe who were deareſt to him: Which was follow'd by a Flood of Tears both from himſelf and the Prince; but the King drove away for Windſor, and left the diſconſolate Duke behind him. This coming to the Ear of the Lord Keeper Williams, he haſten'd to the Duke's Houſe, where with Difficulty he gain'd Admittance to his Grace, whom he found lying on a Couch in a melancholy unmovable Poſture. But at length the Duke was perſuaded to declare the Caſe, at which the Keeper adviſ'd him immediately to follow the King to Windſor, and never to ſtir from his Preſence Night or Day; for the Danger was, leſt any one ſhould gain the King's Ear, and perſuade him to diſſolve the Parliament, and upon the Diſſolution of it, get his Grace thrown into the Tower, and then God knows what would follow. The Duke follow'd the Keeper's Advice, while the other in the mean Time, by a nice Piece of Dexterity, and through the Means of a Miſtreſs kept by the Spaniſh Secretary, found out the whole Occaſion of the Diſturbance: Which ended in a full and happy Reconciliation between the King, the Prince and Duke, at a Time when the Continuance of the Breach might have caus'd infinite Miſchiefs to them all.

He is reconcil'd to him.

By this the Duke's Power was more firmly eſtabliſh'd, notwithſtanding the ſecret Reſentments of the King, who contrary to his Promiſe was prevail'd upon to reſtrain the Earl of Briſtol at his firſt Arrival, and without admitting him into his Preſence, to throw him into the Tower, upon Suſpicion of High-Treaſon; this noble Earl had left the Spaniſh Court with Honour and Reputation, where he was offer'd Places, Sums of Mony, and Protection againſt his Enemies in England, all which he generouſly refus'd: But now finding Buckingham's Power and Popularity too mighty for him to oppoſe at this Inſtant, he was content with Submiſſion to gain his Liberty, and retire himſelf to a Country Privacy. The Duke, ſwell'd with Grandeur, next turn'd the Weight of his Authority againſt Lionel Cranfield, a Gentleman of great Abilities, who by marrying a near Relation of the Duke's, was raiſed by him to be made a Privy-Counſellor, Maſter of the Wardrobe, Maſter of the Wards, and ſhortly Lord High-Treaſurer of England, and Earl of Middleſex. This Lord had by his great Dexterity gain'd ſo much Credit with the King, that during the Duke's Abſence in Spain, he not only refus'd to remit ſuch Sums of Mony as thoſe unlimited Expences requir'd, but took the Courage to diſpute his Commands, and appeal to the King, whoſe Ear was always inclin'd to him. Therefore when the Duke found his Intereſt in the preſent Parliament, he projected the Ruin of this bold Rival, and eaſily procur'd ſome leading Men in the Houſe of Commons to ſend up an Impeachment of ſeveral Corruptions and Miſdemeanors to the Houſe of Lords againſt that great Miniſter. The diſcerning King readily foreſaw the ill Conſequences of ſuch an Activity, which was a Breach upon his Royal Authority, and a dangerous Precedent againſt the Supports of Regal Power. He therefore ſent for the Prince and Duke, who had both promoted the Matter, and earneſtly conjur'd them to make uſe of their utmoſt Intereſt to reſtrain it, as a Wound to the Crown not eaſie to be cur'd; and finding the Duke unmov'd by all his Arguments and Commands, he with an angry Oath call'd him a direct Fool, and prophetically told him, That in this Fit of Popularity he was making a Rod to ſcourge himſelf. Then turning to the Prince with the ſame Foreſight he ſaid, That when he was dead, he would have his Belly-full of Parliament Impeachments, and would remember to his Sorrow how much he had contributed to the Weakning of the Crown, by the two Precedents he was ſo fond of; meaning as well the engaging the Parliament in the War, as the Proſecuting the Earl of Middleſex. But the Duke had gain'd ſo powerful an Intereſt in both Houſes, that the King's Interpoſition was ineffectual, and the Earl, notwithſtanding the good Defence he made, was at laſt condemn'd in a great Fine, to a long Impriſonment, and an Excluſion from his Seat in Parliament during Life: A Clauſe of ſuch a Nature, as was never known before in any Judgment of Parliament, and indeed not to be inflicted on a Peer but by Attainder.

The Earl of Briſtol impriſon'd.

The Riſe and Fall of the Earl of Middleſex.

The Lords being now at Leiſure, began to conſider how highly neceſſary it was that they ſhould join with the Commons, in Petitioning the King to curb the Growth of Popery, and reſtrain the Aſpiring Romaniſts. And after ſome Conferences between both Houſes, the Petition was reduc'd to two Propoſitions, and preſented to the King as two Petitions: The firſt was to beg his Majeſty, 'That all the Laws might be put in Execution againſt Jeſuits, 'Seminary Prieſts, and other Orders of the Church of Rome, and generally 'againſt all Popiſh Recuſants. The ſecond was, 'That his Majeſty would be 'pleas'd to ſecure the Hearts of his Subjects, by the Engagement of his Royal 'Word, That upon no future Occaſion of Marriage or Treaty, or any Requeſt 'of

'of Foreign Prince or State, he would remove or relax the Execution of his 'Laws againſt the foreſaid Roman Catholicks. To both theſe the King gave a particular Anſwer viva voce before the Lords and Commons; and as to the firſt he proteſted before God, That his Heart had bled when he heard of the Increaſe of Popery, and that the Grief of it had been as Thorns in his Eyes, and Pricks in his Side; therefore he was ready by Proclamation to command all the Jeſuits and Prieſts of the Nation to depart by a certain Day. As to the ſecond he declar'd, That ſince it was againſt the Rule of Wiſdom, that a King ſhould ſuffer any Subject to tranſgreſs the Laws by the Interceſſion of other Princes, therefore he aſſur'd them, That he would be careful that no ſuch Condition ſhould be foiſted in upon any other Treaty whatſoever. From theſe Proceedings many Papiſts were turn'd out of Places of Truſt and Profit, which conſiderably cruſh'd their Party; 'till a new Treaty with France made a great Alteration, and gave them new Life and Incouragement. And now the Parliament having ſate above three Months, given three Subſidies, three Fifteenths and Tenths, paſs'd an Act of general Pardon, and thirty three other Acts of Conſequence, upon the twenty ninth of May it was prorogu'd from time to time, 'till the King's Death diſſolv'd it.

The King's Anſwer.

The Parliament ended.

During this Seſſion, four Regiments of Foot, fifteen hundred in each Regiment, were tranſported into Holland under the Command of the Earl of Oxford, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Eſſex, and the Lord Willoughby, ſince Earl of Lindſey. But while the Engliſh, the great Supporters of the Dutch, were fighting for them in their own Country, there arriv'd News out of the Eaſt-Indies of ſuch a horrid and barbarous Nature, as no Time nor Age could parallel. The Dutch graſping at the whole Spicery Trade in that Eaſtern World, and having induſtriouſly wrought out the Spaniards and Portugueze, endeavour'd to do the ſame by their beſt Friends the Engliſh, that they might engroſs the whole to themſelves; which cauſing many Conteſts between them, at length they came to Terms of Agreement, and the Engliſh conceiving themſelves ſecure, planted their Factories among them: Where after two Years, that they had reap'd the Fruit of their Dangers and Hazards, the Dutch began to attempt their utter Extirpation, not by the Sword of War or a Maſſacre, but by ſuch cruel and ſavage Tortures, as could hardly be thought to proceed from Chriſtians, or thoſe of human Race. The Iſland of Amboyna was the bloody Stage where they acted this diſmal Tragedy: For, pretending that Captain Gabriel Towerſon, and the reſt of the Engliſh Factory, had conſpir'd to ſeize the Caſtle, and expel the Dutch out of the Iſland, they ſeiz'd upon them, and having no Witneſſes againſt them but their Racks, they extended their Sinews to the full Length, and disjointed all the Limbs of their Bodies; and with their other Engines making them ſuck in Water with their Breath, they ſwell'd their Bodies to a vaſt Proportion, 'till their Skins were ready to burſt, and their Eyes to ſtart out of their Heads. And thoſe whoſe Innocency and Courage could not be compell'd by thoſe Torments to accuſe themſelves of unacted Crimes, they burnt the Soles of their Feet with Candles, 'till the dropping Moiſture extinguiſh'd the Flame, and with thoſe fiery Inſtruments made ſuch Holes in their Sides, that they might ſee their Entrails, tho' the Monſters would not ſee their Innocence, but perſiſted in their exquiſite Cruelties; which being horrible to expreſs, muſt be inſupportable to ſuſtain. Having thus weary'd out the miſerable Men with Tortures, and they being willing to die quickly, confeſs'd and gave under their Hands whatever their barbarous Tormentors dictated to them, and ended their Cruelties by cutting off their Heads. Ten of the Engliſh loſt their Lives, and the reſt, being near as many more, with rack'd, ſwell'd and macerated Bodies, were ſent to the Engliſh Plantations; ſo the whole Factory was deſtroy'd, and the Dutch ſeiz'd that Trade into their Hands, which they have kept ever ſince.

The Dutch Cruelties at Amboyna.

King

King James receiving the Account of this barbarous Tranſaction, is ſaid to have made a very cold Reply upon the Occaſion, having his Thoughts more nearly imploy'd about his own Family, and the Marriage of his Son with the Houſe of France; in Order to which, ſoon after the Breach with Spain, his Majeſty ſent over the Lord Kenſington, newly made Earl of Holland, privately to find out the Inclinations of the French King, in relation to a Match between the Prince and the Lady Henrietta Maria, younger Daughter to King Henry the Great. He continu'd there a Month before he mov'd in that Matter; but as ſoon as he propos'd it to the French King, he was ſo deſirous of the Match, that he told the Earl, He had rather have the Prince of England to be his Brother, than any other Man in the World, and was ſo ready to comply, that he ſeem'd indifferent in making Terms for the Catholicks in England. But when he found King James, who dreaded a ſecond Diſappointment, to be immeaſurably fond of this Alliance, he abated of his Forwardneſs, inlarg'd his Demands in Favour of Papiſts, and ſtrain'd the King to ſuch Conceſſions, as he had promis'd to his Parliament he would never grant upon the Mediation of Foreign Princes. The famous Cardinal Richlieu was now in the Infancy of his Riſe and Favour, and was made the principal Manager of this great Affair in Behalf of France; and the Earls of Holland and Carliſle were ſent Ambaſſadors Extraordinary from the Court of England in the Month of June. Theſe repreſented to the Cardinal, 'That the Propoſition they made of a Marriage 'being no new Thing, ſince it had been treated of many Years before to mar-'ry the Prince of Wales with Madam Chriſtiana, who was afterwards marry'd 'to the Prince of Piedmont; they had nothing now to do, but to re-aſſume 'the Articles already made, and to continue on the ſame Foot with the Lady 'Henrietta. But the French anſwer'd, 'That the Face of Affairs was chang'd 'ſince that Time, and that they had different Thoughts at preſent; that it was 'the King of England's Intereſt to preſerve the Reputation of the French King 'in this Marriage; that at preſent they could not be contented with what they 'had formerly offer'd about Religion, after what had happen'd in Spain, when 'there was a Treaty of Marriage between the Prince of Wales and the Infanta; urging, that it was neceſſary to begin the Negotiation by laying thoſe 'Articles upon the Table, which the King of Great Britain had agreed with 'Spain upon that Occaſion. The Engliſh Ambaſſadors rejecting this, one of the French anſwer'd, He was much ſurpriz'd that they were not come with Power to make the ſame Conceſſions to the Moſt Chriſtian King, as their Maſter had granted to his Catholick Majeſty, ſince they might eaſily imagine France would ſuffer no Inequality in this Affair.

A Treaty of Marriage with France.

The French inſiſt upon high Terms.

This put ſome Stop to the Negotiation, but in effect the Ambaſſadors of England ſoon conſented to agree to all the Articles with Spain, except three; of which one was concerning a Toleration for the Engliſh Catholicks; another for a publick Church for the Retinue of the Lady; and the laſt related to the Education of thoſe Children who ſhould be born of this Marriage, who 'till twelve Years of Age were to be in the Hands of the Queen, to educate them in her own Religion. The French repreſented it would do great Service to the King of England, by uniting to his Party all the Engliſh Catholicks, who would oppoſe themſelves to the Puritans and Presbyterians, by whom the King was not truly belov'd: But the Ambaſſadors would never conſent to grant a Church to the Papiſts, which would endanger a Mutiny in London, tho' they agreed to the Article concerning the Education of Children; but yet rejected to have a Biſhop ſent with the Lady, as a Matter of no Uſe. As for the Dowry, the King of England inſiſted upon eight hundred thouſand Crowns, of which one half was to be paid in London the Evening before the Marriage, two hundred thouſand a Year after, and the reſt in ſix Months after that. There was alſo a Proviſo made, that if the Lady ſhould die before the Prince without Children, he ſhould be oblig'd only to reſtore the Moiety. All this being agreed, the the main thing was to procure a Diſpenſation from the Pope to permit the Lady to marry with an Heretick Prince; for his Holineſs was no ways pleas'd with the Marriage, leſt it might occaſion the Reſtitution of the Palatinate. Therefore Father Berulle, who was ſent to Rome for that Purpoſe, us'd many Arguments with the Pope, and inſiſted upon the numerous Advantages that would accrue to the Catholick Religion by this Marriage; ſo that at length the Pope was mollify'd, and conſented to a Diſpenſation, which in three Months Time was compleated.

While one Negotiation was carry'd on at Rome, another more ſecret was managing in England by the Arch-Biſhop of Embrun, who was ſent over by the French King in Favour of the Roman Catholicks in England, and likewiſe to ſound King James about his Thoughts of the Romiſh Religion; of which remarkable Tranſaction we have this following Account from the Arch-Biſhop himſelf, and from Monſieur D'Ageant, a prime Miniſter of State in France. This Prelate, who was a Man of great Knowledge and Experience, having receiv'd his Orders from the French King, took a Voyage into England, in the Habit and Name of a Counſellor of the Parliament of Grenoble, whom Curioſity had induc'd to ſee the Nation. He was ſoon met and diſcover'd by the Duke of Buckingham, who told him That there was no occaſion for him to change his Name or conceal his Quality, for he ſhould receive nothing but Honour, eſpecially from the King his Maſter, who had a very particular Eſteem for him. Shortly after he introduc'd him to the King at Royſton, who entertain'd him very graciouſly, and order'd the Duke to be preſent all the Time of the Diſcourſe, which laſted above two Hours. At this firſt Meeting he prevail'd ſo far, that Orders were immediately given to releaſe many Roman Catholicks out of Priſon, in London and other Places, and the Execution of many Laws againſt them was ſuſpended; and further he was permitted to adminiſter Confirmation to what Catholicks he pleas'd, in the Houſe of the French Ambaſſador, while the Doors were open. Accordingly he confirm'd above ten thouſand, in the Preſence of a great Concourſe of People at the Door and in the Street; at which many were extreamly offended, and complain'd of it to the King, but to no Effect, for his Majeſty anſwer'd them, That he did nothing contrary to his Pleaſure. This Arch-Biſhop had ſeveral Conferences with the King, in which his Majeſty teſtify'd his great Deſire to be ally'd to France, and the other inſiſted upon a Toleration, as the moſt effectual Means to give Satisfaction to the Catholick Princes: Whereupon the King laying his Hand upon his Hand, ſaid, I plainly ſee that you are a Perſon appointed by God, in whom I ought to confide, and to reveal the Secrets of my Heart.

The ſecret Treaty of the Arch-Biſhop of Embrun in England.

He confirms ten thouſand in London.

Afterwards, he very freely acknowledg'd to the Arch-Biſhop the good Opinion he had conceiv'd of the Catholick Faith, and ſo particularly, that he omitted nothing; proteſting to him, 'That during his Minority, his Tutors 'having perceiv'd his Inclination to that Religion, he ran great Hazards of be- 'ing aſſaſſinated: As to a Toleration, he profeſs'd he had long deſign'd to grant 'it in his Dominions, and for that very Purpoſe, he intended to ſummon an 'Aſſembly of Prelates and other learned Men of England, together with an 'equal Number of Foreigners, and upon the Deciſions there made, to found 'the ſaid Liberty; adding, That he had already determin'd what Perſons ſhould 'be choſen among the Engliſh; and that if the Aſſembly could not meet at 'Dover, he would conſent that it ſhould be holden at Boloign, as ſoon as he 'ſhould be in a Condition to rely upon the King of France, by the Means of 'the intended Marriage: And to procure theſe good Effects, he thought conve- 'nient that after the Conſummation of it, the Arch-Biſhop ſhould return into 'England under the Pretence of accompanying the Princeſs, at which Time 'he would deliver to him two Letters written with his own Hand, one for the 'French King, and the other for the Pope, containing his ſerious Reſolutions: 'He would alſo give him a diſtinct Memorial concerning his Intention, which he 'would King James's Diſcourſes with him.

'would Sign, that the Arch-Biſhop being furniſh'd with theſe Diſpatches, he 'ſhould go to Rome, under Colour of viſiting the Apoſtolick See, there to treat 'with the Pope alone, for whom he ſaid, he had a greater Reſpect and Affecti-'on, ever ſince he underſtood he had compos'd Verſes in his Youth of the vio-'lent Death of the Queen of Scotland his Mother, in Commendation of her, 'and of the Family of the Stuarts, which he ſhew'd to the Arch-Biſhop. He further declar'd, 'That in Caſe the Arch-Biſhop return'd from Rome with the 'Approbation of his Holineſs concerning the Convention, he would cauſe it 'forthwith to be aſſembled, whereupon extraordinary and admirable Events 'would enſue: But before he proceeded to diſcover his Deſign as to his own 'Perſon, he would negotiate with the Proteſtant Princes of Germany, and 'with the principal Puritan Lords of England and Scotland, and promis'd that 'all things ſhould tend to a happy Concluſion, and to the great Advantage of 'the Catholick Church. This, ſays the Arch-Biſhop, is the Subſtance of all the Diſcourſes they had at ſeveral Times upon this Subject.

Monſieur D'Ageant further tells us, that being ſatisfy'd as to all the Points in Controverſie, the King wrote a long Letter to the Pope, by a Catholick Gentleman his Subject, whom he privately ſent to him on purpoſe. 'In which 'he acknowledg'd him as the Vicar General of Jeſus Chriſt on Earth, as the 'univerſal Father of the Chriſtians, and the Chief of all Catholicks; aſſuring 'him, that after he had taken Care of thoſe things to which he had agreed, he 'would openly declare himſelf: In the mean Time he promis'd not to ſuffer 'any Search to be made in his Kingdom after Prieſts that were ſent by his Ho-'lineſs, or the Moſt Chriſtian King, provided they were not Jeſuits, in whom 'he proteſted he could not confide, for ſeveral Reaſons; principally becauſe he 'accounted them the Authors of the Gun-Powder Treaſon, by which they 'were to have blown up him and the chief of the Nation. In his Letter, among other Particulars, he intreated the Pope 'To vouchſafe that the Goods 'of the Church that were enter'd into the Patrimony of the principal Families of 'England ſhould not be taken from them; but that they ſhould be permitted ſtill 'to enjoy them, becauſe otherwiſe great Troubles and Commotions would enſue. He affirm'd moreover, 'That nothing could hinder him from making a pub-'lick Profeſſion of the Catholick Religion at this Time, but the Deſire he had 'to gain the King of Denmark his Brother-in-Law, whom he had for that 'End, tho' under another Pretence, ſollicited to come over into England, 'where he hop'd to convert him: That by doing this, he ſhould be able to 'eſtabliſh Peace in his own Dominions, which otherwiſe could hardly be main-'tain'd; and that they two united in the ſame Deſign, would draw after them 'almoſt all the Northern Countries. The Duke of Buckingham, and the Gentleman he ſent to Rome, were the only two Perſons, that were Subjects, to whom he communicated theſe Intentions. The Duke had promis'd to follow him, and had made a conſiderable Progreſs in the Affair; but all theſe remarkable Deſigns were made void by the Death of the King of England not long after, at which the French King, declaring the News to the Arch-Biſhop of Embrun, expreſs'd a very ſenſible Regret in theſe Words, All our Hopes of England are loſt. Thus far the two French Authors, Monſieur D'Ageant, and William D'Hugues, Arch-Biſhop of Embrun; of whom we can ſay no more, than that the Credit of their Narrative muſt be left to all nice and impartial Readers of this Reign.

His Letter to the Pope.

In the mean Time the Marriage-Treaty with France ſucceeded, and held fewer Months than the Years that were ſpent in that of Spain. In Auguſt the Match was concluded, and in November the Articles were ſworn to by King James, Prince Charles, and the French King; tho' they were not fully concluded 'till February following, nor the Match conſummated 'till after the King's Death. Cardinal Richlieu, to prevent all Conteſts that might ariſe by Means of this Alliance, as in former Times had happen'd, oblig'd Madam the Princeſs

The Marriage-Treaty concluded.

Princeſs to renounce all Succeſſions, both Direct and Collateral, which might accrue to her; for which eight hundred thouſand Crowns was to be given to her in Marriage. He alſo took care that her Houſe ſhould be compos'd of as great a Number of Officers, as any Queen of England ever had: That her Dowry ſhould be ſixty thouſand Crowns per Annum, which ſhould be aſſign'd her upon Lands, one of which ſhould be a Dutchy or an Earldom: That if ſhe became a Widow, ſhe ſhould have her Choice to ſtay in England, or come into France, whether ſhe had Children or not; and if ſhe return'd into France, the King of England ſhould be oblig'd to conduct her at his own Charge, with agreeable Honours, as far as Calais. The publick Articles concerning Religion were not much ſhort of thoſe for the Spaniſh Match; beſides which Ruſhworth mentions ſome private Articles in favour of the Roman Catholicks, which Nalſon, upon rational Grounds, looks upon as fictitious, particularly for not being to be found in Monſieur D'Ageant's Memoirs, where the Secrets of the Engliſh Court were, or pretended to be diſcover'd. Yet the French Author of Cardinal Richlieu's Life in Effect declares as much as Ruſhworth, namely, that the King and Prince took a particular Oath to releaſe all the Catholick Priſoners, as ſoon as the Marriage was conſummated, and to prohibit for the future their being ill treated for their Religion: And further, that they both gave a Promiſe in Writing, by which they bound themſelves, by no Way or Means whatſoever, to oblige the Princeſs to change her Religion. The Author likewiſe highly reflects upon the Wiſdom of King James, and ſays, 'As 'this Match was againſt all the Maxims of good Policy, ſo it drew upon his 'Son King Charles thoſe Miſchiefs, which perhaps never befel any King ſucceeding to an Hereditary Crown; and his Sons born of that Marriage, and 'ſeduc'd by their Mother's Perſuaſions, have been moſt unfortunate ſince his 'Death. And ſeveral were of Opinion, that Cardinal Richlieu, who was then 'contriving a War againſt the Houſe of Auſtria, ſent this Princeſs into En-'gland, as a Ball of Diſſention, that would create ſo much Trouble in that 'Nation, as would incapacitate them from diſturbing their Neighbours 'Affairs. Cenſures upon it.

Yet ſtill King James thought it a propitious Match, and a great Step towards the Reſtoration of the Palatinate, and his unfortunate Progeny; but this prov'd no more ſucceſsful than another feeble Attempt this Year, made by Count Mansfield, who came into England for that Purpoſe, was receiv'd with great Splendor, and made Commander of an Army of twelve thouſand Engliſhmen. Theſe Forces were deſign'd to paſs through France into Germany, the French having promis'd, as well an Addition of Strength, as a free Paſſage. The French, notwithſtanding their Promiſe, and the Treaty of Marriage, delay'd, tho' not directly deny'd their Paſſage; nevertheleſs the whole Army was ſhipp'd off, and put over to Calais; and after a tedious Stay, in hopes yet to land and paſs through the Country, they were forc'd to ſet ſail for Zealand. Neither were they ſuffer'd to land there, coming ſo unexpectedly upon the States, and in a hard and ſcarce Time for Proviſion of Victuals. Thus they were long confin'd to their narrow Veſſels, and ſuffer'd the want of all Neceſſaries, by which means a Peſtilence broke out among them, and rag'd ſo extreamly, that they were thrown into the Sea by Multitudes: Inſomuch that ſcarce a third Part of the Men were landed, which alſo ſoon after decreas'd and diſpers'd, and the whole Deſign vaniſh'd into Air. Thus continually unfortunate was the King in the deplorable Caſe of his Children; and neither he nor his Son ſaw the Reſtitution of the Palatinate, which happen'd not 'till twenty three Years after, when the Monarchy of England was under a fatal Eclipſe, and its Soveraign Lord, by an unheard of Example, brought to the Scaffold to loſe his Head.

A. D. 1625. Reg. 23.

Count Mansfield comes into England.

His Expedition unfortunate.

Before King James could ſee the Misfortunes of Count Mansfield, or the Marriage of his Son, he was ſeiz'd with a Tertian Ague that prov'd fatal to him. This was preceded by the Deaths of two great and worthy Men, Lodowick Duke of Richmond and Lenox, and James Marqueſs of Hamilton, which exceedingly affected the King, who being inform'd of the Death of the latter, ſaid, If the Branches be thus cut down, the Stock cannot continue long: Which Saying was ſhortly verify'd. His great Indiſpoſition meeting with a fat and unweildy Body, and daily increaſing, he retir'd to Theobalds, and the Lord-Keeper Williams having Notice that they fear'd his Sickneſs was mortal, went and preſented himſelf before his Majeſty, endeavouring to divert him, and bring him to a chearful Diſcourſe, but all in vain: Thus he continu'd by his Bed-ſide 'till Midnight, but the King found no Comfort. The next Morning, after a Conſultation of Phyſicians, he ſaw no Hopes of Life, and therefore he ask'd leave of the Prince to acquaint his Father with his weak Condition, and put him in Mind both of his mortal, and immortal State. Having the Prince's Conſent, he went into his Majeſty's Chamber, and kneeling down told him, He knew he ſhould neither diſpleaſe, nor diſcourage him, if he brought him the Meſſage of Iſaiah to Hezekiah, to ſet his Houſe in Order, for he concluded his Days to come would be but few in the World. At which the King calmly reply'd, I am ſatisfy'd, and I deſire you to aſſiſt me in preparing to go hence, and to be with Chriſt, whoſe Mercies I pray for, and hope to find them. Finding himſelf much declining, he call'd the Prince his Son to his Bed-ſide, and recommended ſeveral uſeful Precepts to his future Conſideration; while the Keeper continually watch'd with his Royal Maſter, and never ſo much as put off his Cloaths to go to Bed, 'till after his Death. His great Buſineſs was frequently to pray, read and diſcourſe about Repentance, Faith, Remiſſion of Sins, Reſurrection, and Eternal Life; all which was the Preparation on Wedneſday for the bleſſed Sacrament on Thurſday, which his Majeſty receiv'd with ſingular Comfort. On Friday he became ſenſibly weaker; ſo that now the Keeper ſtirr'd very little out of the Chamber, and that not only to comfort the departing King, but likewiſe to keep off ſome of the Romiſh Religion, who were watching about the Chamber-Door, whom, as a Privy-Counſellor, he commanded to keep at a greater Diſtance. As he drew near to his End, the Prayer uſually ſaid at the Hour of Death being ended, having repeated theſe Words, Veni, Domine Jeſu, he gave up the Ghoſt without any Pangs, as are commonly ſeen in dying Perſons, and the Keeper clos'd his Eyes with his own Hands.

The King's laſt Sickneſs.

His Death.

This was upon Sunday the twenty ſeventh of March, being fifty eight Years of Age, and having reign'd twenty two Years, and three Days. Many ſcandalous Rumours were ſpread concerning his Death; and ſome took the liberty to write that he was poiſon'd, as the Duke of Richmond, and the Marqueſs of Hamilton had been before him; which might be occaſion'd by the too bold Officiouſneſs of the Duke of Buckingham in adminiſtring his own Phyſick. But upon opening his Body, there was found no Mark or Sign of Poiſon, his inward Parts being all ſound; only his Spleen was a little affected, which might be Cauſe enough to throw him into an Ague. His Body, for the greater State, was convey'd by Torch-Light from Theobalds to Somerſet-Houſe, where being depoſited from the twenty third Day of April, to the ſeventh of May, it was carry'd to Weſtminſter, where, according to Sir Richard Baker, it was interr'd with great Solemnity, but with greater Lamentation.

His Character.

To come at laſt to the Perſon and Character of this Prince, we find it a hard Undertaking to draw the Picture of one who had ſo many different Aſpects; eſpecially where both Friends and Enemies have ſo far exceeded the Limits of Juſtice and Impartiality. As to his Perſon and Preſence he made but an Ordinary Figure; his Countenance was homely, his Features harſh, tho' not altogether uncomely; his Stature was of the middle Size, his Body not ill compacted, but fat and unweildy in his latter Days, uſually wearing his Cloaths plain, large, and different from the common Mode. But as to his Mind, he has receiv'd the higheſt Applauſes and Commendations, particularly, That he was the Solomon of the Age for Knowledge, Learning and Wiſdom; one, who knew how to catch the Inclinations of the People at the firſt Rebound, not ſuffering them to mount higher than he could reach them, nor grow ſo ſtrong, but he could either alter or divert them: That he had an admirable Pregnancy of Wit, which being improv'd by continual Study, he acquir'd ſuch a Promptneſs and Elegancy in expreſſing his Mind, that his extemporary Speeches were little inferior to his premeditated Writings: That he was a mild, peaceful and munificent Monarch, ſuitable to the Engliſh Genius and Nation. All which Particulars were really true, but ſtill with a remarkable Mixture of Allay; and without that, Wilſon acknowledges, that his high, towering and maſtering Reaſon had been of a rare and ſublim'd Excellency. Upon which Account, his Knowledge has been by ſome thought fitter for the Head of a Society, than the Governor of a Kingdom; his Learning to border more upon Pedantry, than riſe to a compleat Underſtanding; his Wiſdom to have more of Subtlety, or a Sagacity in diſcovering Miſchiefs, than an Ability of ſurmounting them; and his Wit too often to deſcend to inferior Sorts of Jeſts and Quibbles, which was the common way of Wit in that Age. His Munificence was many Times a direct Profuſeneſs, and a waſting of the Revenues of the Crown; and his peaceful Temper, which made him take Beati Pacifici for his Motto, had too much of a timorous Diſpoſition, not to ſay Cowardize; which caus'd him not only to be often contemn'd by Foreign Princes, but alſo at home to be govern'd, and ſometimes inſulted by his Favourites, which was one of the greateſt of his Weakneſſes: And this led him to another Quality, or rather an Acquiſition, which ſome thought as wicked, as the other was weak, which he call'd by the Name of King-Craft, others an exquiſite Skill in Diſſimulation; in which he ſo much delighted, that it ſeems to be the greateſt of all his Blemiſhes. He had excellent Notions in Conception, but could bring but few into Action, tho' they tended to his own Preſervation: And this was one of his Maxims, of which he made no timely Uſe; A Prince, who would avoid Conſpiracies, ought to be rather jealous of ſuch, whom his Favours have advanc'd, than of thoſe whom his Frowns have diſcontented: For the latter want Means, while the Former have them at Pleaſure, to execute their Deſigns. But to come to his moral Virtues, he was eminent for his Chaſtity, which was remarkable in a Court ſo looſe and luxurious as his own. He was very temperate in his Exerciſes, and Diet, and not intemperate in his Drinking; yet he drank very often of the ſtrongeſt ſweet Wines, but always in very ſmall Quantities, and rather out of a Cuſtom than any Delight, as Weldon himſelf acknowledges. He was by Education patient, pious and religious; yet ſometimes his Choler and Paſſion would prevail over all, and throw him into the profaneſt Oaths and Curſes; for which he would afterwards ſhew himſelf heartily penitent: And indeed, he was not only ready to aſk Forgiveneſs of God, but alſo of Men; and ſometimes in ſuch a peculiar Manner, that they could ſcarcely ſay whether it was a pious Condeſcenſion, or an abject Diſpoſition. As to his Religion, in which he diſplay'd the Height of his Parts and Learning, he was really Calviniſt in moſt Points, excepting that of Epiſcopacy, as appears from ſome of his Books, and his Zeal for the Synod of Dort: Yet he gave unhappy Suſpicions to the Nation, by making ſuch Advances to the Pope and Papiſts, upon the Account of the Spaniſh and French Treaties. Notwithſtanding his open Indulgences, and perhaps ſecret Inclinations to the Roman Catholicks, yet in many publick Speeches he declar'd againſt them, and once in a very remarkable Manner, in the Preſence of many Lords, as we find it in Croke's Reports; for having been charg'd with a Deſign of granting a Toleration to Papiſts, he made a ſolemn Proteſtation, That he would ſpend the laſt Drop of Blood in his Body before he would do it; and pray'd, That before any of his Iſſue ſhould maintain any other Religion than his own, that God would take them out of the World. How far this Imprecation cation reach'd or affected himself, or any of his Family afterwards, we leave to the Determination of an omniscient Being.

His Reign in general.

To take some Notice of this Reign in general, it is highly remarkable, that tho' the Nation was warlike and ready to kindle at any Flame, yet this King kept it his whole Reign all in Peace, without any War from abroad, or Rebellion at home. It is true, there were some Heats between him and his Parliaments about the Prerogative; and it happen'd then, as it does in most Feuds, Things were carry'd to great Extremities: Yet impartial Writers think, that considering his Majesty's Circumstances, he was not well us'd, and that if the House had been freed from half a dozen popular and discontented Members, the Disturbances would soon have ended. It is also remarkable, that during this whole Reign the King never took away the Life of one Nobleman in England, but restor'd many; yet his artificial taking off Sir Walter Raleigh, by vertue of a former Condemnation, after an equitable Restoration, and his sparing the Earl and Countess of Somerset, after such Imprecations upon himself and Progeny, are both real Blemishes in this King's Conduct. He came to the Crown with all the Advantages of Power, Love and Reputation, and the former Part of the Reign was more active and laudable; but the latter, with the encreasing Weakness of the publick Ministry, became more passive, and declin'd in Vigour and Greatness to the last Moment of his Life. If we consider the whole Reign with the former, it will bear no Comparison; and tho' there was a great Increase of Affluence and Trade, the Reputation of England began sensibly to sink; so that the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland, when join'd under one Monarch, made a less Figure, than one of them had in former Ages. The martial Heat and Exercise of the Nation began gradually to decline, by the Example of a pacifick King; and Sir Richard Baker observes, that two Things in this Reign grew to lose their Lustre: One, the Exercise of Tilting, which in the last Reign was so much us'd, that no Year pass'd without special Solemnities in that Kind: The other, the Band of Gentlemen-Pensioners and Yeomen of the Guard, which in the Queen's Time consisted of the most select Persons of the Realm for Stature, and other Qualifications; and was so noble an Ornament in her Court, that no Prince in Christendom could show the like. But this King so little valu'd these Particulars, that both in his Time came utterly to be neglected; no Solemnity of Arms but by Accident, and no Regard had to what Persons were admitted into that Service. In short, the main Conduct of the Reign seems inconsistent with it self, and differing from the common Methods of Mankind: Therefore whatever may be said in Commendation of the Blessings of Peace and Plenty, and whatever Rhetorick has been us'd to extol the uninterrupted Pleasures of this Reign, it cannot be deny'd, but that this admir'd Calm was only the Fore-runner of a most dismal Storm, and that this peaceful Monarch was not only really unfortunate in himself and Daughter, but also left to his Son an unnecessary War, an exhausted Treasury, and a Crown of Troubles and Thorns. Of which we may be more particular, when, in another Volume, we come to trace the several Steps, and lay open the various Springs of those tumultuous and calamitous Times.
